Towards the end of the last century, Professor Grotefend, a German Orientalist of Hanover, set to work to study these inscriptions. He began by just looking at them, and guessing upon them. Neibuhr had already guessed a little. The marks were in three columns; so Neibuhr guessed by differences in the general appearance of the signs that they were in three different languages. He also guessed from the looks of the single strokes of the signs, that these languages were all written from left to right, as we write English. And he guessed that the right hand column of the three, whose signs were less complicated than the others, was the simplest of the three languages. All these guesses were right. The inscriptions came from Persepolis, which was built by the Achaemenian kings of Persia, (who ruled from about 521 to 331 B. C.), and they were found in the upper parts of bas-reliefs, which seemed to represent a king or ruler of some kind. Tychsen and Münter, two other scholars, with this set of Niebuhr's guesses to begin with, had already also guessed that a certain character several times repeated in the right hand inscriptions of two of these triple sets, might mean king, and that certain others found with this might be the king's name.

This was the point at which Grotefend took up the questioning. He took it for granted that the guesses so far were right, viz., that probably the signs in question were the names and titles of some of the Achaemenian Persian kings. But which kings? Here he happened to think of something; he remembered some inscriptions whose position and general arrangement was somewhat analogous to those in hand,—inscriptions in Pehlevi, a dialect of old Persian, already deciphered, and known to be of the Sassanian dynasty, a much later one. He translated the beginning of one of these; and he said, "Perhaps my supposed Achaemenian kings arranged the beginning of their inscriptions as my known Sassanid king did his. If so, my Achaemenid words in the first two lines, are these:

"[Somebody,] the great king, the king of kings, Son of King [Somebody], of the family of Achaemenes."

Then he looked about for a fact to fit his guessing. "What two Achaemenid kings were father and son?" he asked himself. "Cyrus and Cambyses were; but my two names do not begin with the same sign, and therefore cannot mean them. Cyrus and Artaxerxes were; but the sign which ought to mean Cyrus looks rather too long in proportion, and that which would be Artaxerxes too short. Darius and Xerxes were—that will do," and Grotefend filled in his blanks, conjecturally, thus:

"Xerxes, the great king, the king of kings,
Son of King Darius, of the family of Achaemenes."

And then Grotefend observed a detail which immensely strengthened his conviction that his guess was correct. It was this. He had been working over two of the inscriptions, which came from near each other, and were probably, he thought, not unconnected. The two initial lines were similar in these two inscriptions, except for a variation, which was this: In one inscription, the sign for king was with the name of the father mentioned; in the other not; and the son of this non-royal father in one inscription was the royal father of the royal son in the other. Now this exactly suited his guess of Darius and Xerxes; for Xerxes the king was son of Darius the king, whereas Darius the king was son of Hystaspes, who was not a king; and Grotefend now confidently wrote down the dozen or so letters which he extracted from his four names—Xerxes, Darius, Hystaspes, Achaemenes.

The key to the cuneiform inscriptions was found; although Grotefend himself, in consequence of not knowing enough about other Oriental languages, never got much beyond this first step.—F. B. Perkins.

WINTER FLOWERS.

Selected.

Though Nature's lonesome, leafless bowers
With winter's awful snows are white,
The tender smell of leaves and flowers
Makes May-time in my room to-night.

While some, in homeless poverty,
Shrink moaning from the bitter blast,
What am I, that my lines should be
In good and pleasant places cast?

When other souls despairing stand,
And plead with famished lips to-day,
Why is it that a loving hand
Should scatter blossoms in my way?

O flowers, with soft and dewy eyes,
To God my gratitude reveal;
Send up your incense to the skies,
And utter, for me, what I feel!

O innocent roses, in your buds
Hiding for very modesty;
O violets, smelling of the woods,
Thank Him with all your sweets for me!

And tell Him I would give this hour
All that is mine of good beside
To have the pure heart of a flower,
That has no stain of sin to hide.

ARE YE READY?

Selected.

Willy brought his little Bible,
With a grave and thoughtful look
In the eyes he lifted to me
From the pages of the book.
"Tell me what this means, dear papa!"
And he read me, from God's word,
What it says of being ready
For the coming of the Lord.

When I told him of the meaning
In the words that he had read,
He was silent for a moment,
Then looked up at me, and said
Gravely, "Are you ready, papa?"
Ah! the child could little know
How the simple question thrilled me
As, in shame, I answered, "No."

"If you can't tell when He's coming,
I should think you'd want to be Always ready," said my Willy,
Looking thoughtfully at me.
"If He came to-night, and called you,
You would have to say to Him,
'I'm not ready.' Think, dear papa,"
And his eyes with tears grew dim.

Then I clasped the darling closer,
Smitten with a sudden fear;
For the words that he had spoken
Seemed to bring life's end so near.
And my heart cried, "O my Master!
There shall be no more delay;
Make me ready for thy coming,
Be that coming when it may."

THE WAITING ONES.

Selected.

There are some among the blessed,
Waiting, watching every day,
Peering through the misty shadows
To the clear and lighted way;
Listening in the dusky twilight,
Waiting even in the night,
'Mid the toil and heat of noonday,
Bending forward to the light.

And they speak in eager whispers,
"Can we see His chariot yet?"
"Will the Master come this evening?"
"Will the heavenly Friend forget?"
So they stand, these earnest servants,
Waiting, watching evermore
For the clouds to part asunder,
And reveal the open door.

But they take their daily duties,
And perform them as for Him;
And they read his loving message
When their eyes are tired and dim.
They are living lives of blessing—
Lives of love—for His dear sake,
While they wait with eager longing
For the morn of joy to break.

There are aged pilgrims longing
For the Master's spoken word,
There are some in every country
Waiting, watching for the Lord.
He will come and will not tarry;
He will fold them in his breast;
He will make his watchers happy
In a calm and holy rest.

Wisdom.

Conceding as a well authenticated fact that King Solomon was endowed with greater wisdom than any king who lived before or after him, let us inquire, "From whence cometh wisdom? and where is the place of understanding?" In the Book of Job it is declared: "Behold, the fear of the Lord, that is wisdom; and to depart from evil is understanding."

God said unto Solomon, "Ask what I shall give thee?" Being Divinely inspired, he knew and understood somewhat of the greatness of God. With a God-given sense of his own littleness, he bowed in confession to Him, saying, "I am but a little child: I know not how to go out or come in." With such a preparation of heart from the Lord, he failed not to receive the blessing he sought, when saying: "Give therefore thy servant an understanding heart to judge thy people, that I may discern between good and bad; for who is able to judge this thy so great people." The Lord was pleased with this speech and said unto him: "Because thou hast asked this thing, and hast not asked for thyself long life; neither asked riches for thyself nor the life of thine enemies; but hast asked for understanding to discern judgment: behold, I have done according to thy word—lo I have given thee a wise and understanding heart—and have also given thee that which thou hast not asked, both riches and honor." In view of these facts, believers may well exclaim, "Who is wise, and he shall understand these things? prudent, and he shall know them." Great things the Lord will do for such as live in his fear!

The mind of Solomon being early imbued with the fear of God, he was prepared to make the wise choice he did. Sensible of his great need, he sought and obtained wisdom according to that need: receiving even more than he asked for, because of asking in the fear of God, and with "strong confidence." When the cry is raised, "God be merciful to me a sinner," then it is proved beyond controversy that Grace Divine is being interposed on behalf of the penitent heart in order to its justification. It may be viewed as the sinners' prayer; but we are plainly told that God heareth not sinners: "but if any man be a worshipper of God, and doeth his will, him He heareth." John ix. 31. The man born blind, as described in the Gospel, knew what he said by experience. He having received of the anointing by which his blind eyes were opened, he saw things in a true light. From such testimony as his it may be inferred that availing prayer for mercy is the breath of God in man—returning whence it came. It arises not from the sinful nature, but from the "spirit that helpeth our infirmities, making intercession for us with groans unutterable." The testimony of sacred Scripture is abundant to the efficacy of prayer on the part of the upright in heart; while the sacrifices of the wicked are an abomination to the Lord. "Wisdom is justified of all her children." Rejoicing in the habitable part of the earth, her delight is with the sons of men. "If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth liberally and upbraideth not."

"Our Elder Brother."

On a winter night I was standing on the corner of Summer and Washington Streets, Boston, waiting for a car. It had been, and was still, very rainy, wet, and generally uncomfortable for all who had to be out of doors. Suddenly I heard a feeble voice behind me cry the evening papers for sale.

I turned to look, and there in the dark recess of a doorway, were two little forms, shrinking and shivering in the cold and wet. One was a boy about four or five years of age, I suppose; and the other one, who proved to be the former's brother, was about seven or eight, I should think.

I noticed this poor, little fellow, the elder one, was crying bitterly! His eyes were red, and his wizened face and cheeks were wet with many tears!

I don't think I ever saw such a woe-begone, distressed and frightened look in a child's face before! They were both poorly clad, and evidently the children of poor and severe parents.

I asked the older one what he was crying for and what was the matter? He said that his little brother had dropped the papers in the flooded street, and that now they were no good; he had them stuffed into his pocket as he showed me, and the poor little waif looked as if all hope and life had forever flown from the horizon of his existence!

Poor little fellow! I shall never forget those wet and tearful eyes, with their agonized and pleading and despairing look! And then his little brother told the secret in these words, "When we go home, he'll get a licking!" "Why!" I said, "If you dropped the papers you will be the one to get the whipping." But he replied, "He'll get the licking. He has offered to take it for me." Yes! Here was a case of the elder brother willingly taking the punishment of the guilty, though himself innocent!

After a little talk I found that the wet papers would occasion a loss of "ten cents!" I found a ten cent piece in my pocket, and gave it to the elder brother.

O! how that poor little faded face brightened up! And right away I thought of the words of our Lord, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me!"

Then I asked who it was that died on the cruel cross to save us? and he answered, "Our Lord!" then I said, "I give you these ten cents in his name; and you will try to love Him and keep his commandments, won't you?" Bright and cheerful came now the quick response, "Yes, sir!"

I bought a paper from the younger one, and then took a passing car for home; and while riding, I was deeply moved, even to tears myself, thinking of those poor little waif newsboys, and of that forlorn elder brother, who was dreading the whipping that awaited him when he got home that cold, wet, and stormy night; and it all made me think of "Jesus!"—S. Blodgen in Church Union.

For "The Friend."

The Diary of Abigail W. Hall.

As a reader of "The Friend," I am much interested in the above-named diary; and think it well that those left in possession of her MSS., allowed them to be thus early after her decease, forwarded for publication.

The Editor of the "Selections" will, it is hoped, continue to guard between the two extremes, of inserting too much of what may seem to some the more severe discipline of the cross or discouraging portions of the memoranda, and too little thereof. Should not the different classes of readers be remembered in such published experiences? For while, no doubt, there are some who are or have been passing through similar exercises as A. W. H. records of herself, to whom the fears, the weariness, the painfulness, the "mourning like doves in the valley," will be not the least interesting; there are others who will most relish the brighter pages of the journal, and would not have brought much to notice "the perils," the "watchings and fastings often, in hunger and thirst," to be experienced, in measure, by every Christian traveller, feeling "as strangers and pilgrims" in a foreign clime; at the same time remembering, that the Apostle Paul gloried in the things concerning his infirmities.

Would it be right in such delineations of the religious character and growth in grace of individuals, to leave out of view the hardships to be endured, the baptisms, deep wadings, and painful experiences, especially when these are set prominently forth as lessons or way-marks in the heavenly pilgrimage? for it is as "we suffer with Christ," that we "shall also reign with Him." Is it not a faithful record of these prominent traits and points, that gives variety and individuality to such Journalists? Thus, Jeremiah among the ancient prophets; Isaac Penington among the early Friends; and Thomas Scattergood—called "the Jeremiah of his age"—among the more recent of our Society; give a variation and spiciness that is agreeable and pleasant; while all may be of the "diversities of gifts" we are to profit with, "but the same Spirit."

By these few suggestions or remarks, the writer would encourage the Editor or Compiler of said "Selections," in his, no doubt, difficult and laborious task; appreciating, somewhat, the difficulty of pleasing the critical taste or preference of all.

Better do it at once.—It was a whimsical plan, that of my dear old grandmother. If ever she found a hole in a towel or tablecloth, she pinned it up, with a label appended, "must be mended;" and it was then committed to a drawer in her wardrobe, probably never to be thence removed so long as my grandmother lived. Now, it occurs to me there are many more things in the world which we all agree must be mended, besides my old grandmother's towels and tablecloths. We each have our individual failings, which must be mended. Let us look to them, and instead of imitating the example of my grandmother, as we are sadly too much disposed to do, let us begin to mend the moment we have decided what must be mended.—People's Journal.

For "The Friend."

Through Heights and Depths.

To every child of God there must come some days of blighting sorrow; some days when the dark clouds shut out our sense of his loving Providence; days wherein mothers, weeping for their children, refuse to be comforted, because they are not, and strong men are bowed under a heavy load of care.

"There is no flock, however watched and tended
But one dead lamb is there;
There is no fireside, howsoever defended,
But has one vacant chair."

We sometimes question vainly why the fairest earthly flowers are plucked to bloom in heavenly fields; or why the helpless, clinging thing, should be "floating down in the dark march of Death." We learn great lessons slowly. But to the faithful, believing, trusting soul there is no surer truth than this,—"In the hereafter we shall know."

Words of comfort fall, how often, cold and lifeless on the hearts already broken. To these dwellers in the valley how dark the world does seem. The mighty ministration of the dew is full of refreshing to everyone of the countless myriads of thirsting grass-blades. The slow comfort and the sure healing of opened wounds by the Comforter, who is a physician of value, is no less proof that the process is divine. The man of sorrows came to be a burden bearer. Blessed is the thought, that every stricken soul has an especial friend in Christ!

"Ye are of more value than many sparrows." I wonder if ever yet, any among the uncounted multitudes of men, have had greater cause for casting away all hope than Job had?

He was poor, forsaken, wasted by sickness, friendless, outcast, tempted in all things; yet hear, from out of these depths, his words, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in Him." That freighted word, so full of meaning, "trust, trust in Him!" Lord, increase our faith in thee. Or that fathers' despairing cry, "Lord, I believe, help thou mine unbelief."

O, let us walk more faithfully in the footsteps of Christ's companions, more earnestly follow after Him in the way of his teaching, and we may yet, through faith, obtain sight of those heights, where we can exclaim in the fullness of assurance, "Now I know that my Redeemer liveth, and because he lives, I live also."

Let this be an individual work with us, and then we do already know of the establishment of a kingdom wherein there is no more night and no more grief. Then there may be ups and downs, tribulation, trials and cares in our heavenward journey but we may be assured that beyond these "heights and depths" the orbit of our lives can never go.

"Here is the sorrow, the sighing,
Here is the cloud and the night;
Here is the sickness, the dying,
There are the life and the light!"

G. G. M.

The anointing within is the great and only ordinance of the saint's preservation from Anti-christ's power: for, if they step forth but so much as into a prayer against Anti-christ, out of this, they are caught in his snare,—and are serving him in that very prayer, which they may seem with great earnestness and zeal to put up against him.—I. Penington.

Touching Trust Funds.

The very first unauthorized touch of a dollar of trust funds, under any circumstances, is poison. It is like the prick of the dissecting-needle to the doctor who is conducting a post-mortem. The whole moral sense becomes poisoned.

An officer in one of our banks many years ago purloined a sum of money—not very large—to enable him to pay for his small and modest house. He was a man of most exemplary private life. He told me that he had not a thought of keeping the money, but fully expected and intended to return every dime. But every thing went against him from the moment that he touched that fatal money. Having been detained from his teller's desk for just one day the discovery came, and with it the wreck of his character. The touch of a trust-fund, even with no intention of theft, had been deadly poison.

We can imagine the distress of a man who is conscious of the deception he is practising and of the danger that yawns beneath him. Each day he hopes to make a fortunate turn in his speculations, and to be able to replace the purloined money. But the rope swings farther and farther off from him every day, as he stands with outstretched hands on his dizzy ledge of rocks. Providence, which never deserts a true and loyal Christian, deserts him. He dies a thousand deaths in the dread of detection, yet excuses himself constantly by the artful plea, "When I can I will return the money."

This whole terrible business of tampering with trust-funds has been a subject of close and careful observation with me for many years. I have made some study into individual cases. They are all alike; they all prove that any man, who with even the most sincere intention to replace it, ever lays his finger on one dollar of trust-funds commits moral suicide. With the tenderest pity do I write these sad lines in regard to my ruined friend in Portland, but the lesson ought to be solemnly studied and heeded by every Christian in the land, as well as by every man of business.

"Reville him not, the Tempter hath

A snare for all;

And pitying tears, not scorn and wrath,

Beit his fall."

T. L. Cuyler in Evangelist.

The Puzzling Sum.

One morning before breakfast I asked my son of eleven years to work out the following apparently simple arithmetical sum which I had seen in a newspaper: How many times can the number six hundred and twenty-nine be taken from eight hundred and eighty million seven hundred and eighty-eight thousand eight hundred and eighty-nine? My boy, being fond of ciphering, sat down at once, with a rather small piece of paper before him, but as he began the sum in subtraction, I stopped him. Suggesting that he had better be provided with a sheet of ampler dimensions, I laid down a large piece of brown manilla paper in the place of the other.

At the end of a half hour, when breakfast was announced, the youthful cipherer remarked that the sum would be a longer one than he had expected. Nevertheless, when the meal had been finished, he eagerly took up his pencil again and worked at the problem diligently until I was ready to leave the house for the day. He then said that he reckoned the sum would take him two or three hours to finish. "Yes," I replied, "longer than that; so I think thou had better, before proceeding much further, ascertain how long it is likely to take thee to get through with the task in the manner adopted and at the rate thou hast progressed." Explaining how this could be done, I left him—still subtracting, for he seemed to have a preference for that plain way of doing the thing. Upon my return in the evening, having asked him whether he had reached a solution of the question, he responded, "Why, it would take me about two years to do!" I told him that if he had continued at it twelve hours a day, and subtracted the number three times in every minute, he would have been employed one year and four months in the occupation; yet now, if he would divide six hundred and twenty-nine into the larger figures, he would very quickly find how many times the one could be taken from the other. The answer was found to be one million four hundred thousand three hundred and a fraction. He naturally wondered that he had not thought of that plan before.

Well, this little circumstance has its moral for finite mortals—even for those who may seem to have acquired a very extensive and varied fund of knowledge. Compared with what is apprehended by that "high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity," and whose ways are said to be "past finding out," the wisdom of man is but as the very small dust of the balance. Problems also there are in the moral world unknowerable or incomprehensible by man, which it were well to leave until revealed by Him "that hath the key of David," and who would have us "walk by faith, and not by sight."—Josiah W. Leeds in The Student.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Birds Killed by Electric Light Towers.—There have been published numerous accounts of birds, which, when flying at night, have been attracted by the lamps in Light-houses, and have been killed by striking against the lanterns. An account from Decatur, Ill., dated 29th of last Ninth Month, estimates that nearly 1000 birds were killed in a similar manner by coming into contact with the towers erected for illuminating that city with electric light. Among these were the following species:—Redstart, Rose-breasted Grosbeak, Indigo Bird, Black and Yellow Warbler, House-wren, Maryland Yellow Throat, Acadian Fly-catcher, Scarlet Tanager, Cat-bird, and Olive-backed Thrush.

The Scarlet Ibis.—A specimen of this bird in the Zoological Gardens at New York shows a strong dislike to the note of a Whooping Crane. One day recently, the Crane whooped away for nearly half an hour, pursued the while by the Ibis, which struck at him with his bill after every note.

The Ibis shows considerable ingenuity in its native haunts in obtaining cray-fish on which it feeds. When the weather is dry these burrow three or four feet beneath the surface until they come to moist earth. Coming upon one of these burrows, the Ibis tumbles the earth back into the aperture, and when the cray-fish comes up to repair damages he is seized and devoured.

Formation of Peat-beds.—At the end of the glacial period, over the north-eastern part of this country there were vast numbers of small, shallow lakes left, dotting the country here and there. When the frozen mass of ice and snow gradually receded, these were filled with clear cold water; but the water and the earth about were utterly devoid of life. Soon the southern breezes brought spores and seeds of plants, then animals came. The water began to be filled with life, and sediment to be formed on the bottom; then the moss Sphagnum took root on the banks of these lakes, and, according to its habit, began to grow out on the surface of the water, dropping sediment as it went; and year after year growing thicker and filling in more and more, until, centuries having passed, the lakes became transformed into swamps of peat. This was the way our swamps were formed, and we have them now in this same process of formation. In Ireland the far-famed peat beds are examples. In New England alone there are 2,000,000 acres of peat swamp.—Scientific American.

The Great Wall of China.—This was built 213 years before the Christian Era, of great slabs of heavy stone, laid in regular courses some twenty feet high, and then topped out with large, hard burned bricks, filled in with earth, and closely paved on top with brick. It was 25 feet high by 40 thick, 1200 miles long, with room on top for 6 horses to be driven abreast. Twelve hundred miles of this gigantic work, built on the rugged craggy mountain tops, vaulting over gorges, spanning wide streams, netting the river archways with huge bars of copper, with double gates with swinging doors and bars set thick with iron armor,—a wonder in the world before which the old time classic seven wonders, all gone now save the great pyramid, were toys. The great pyramid has 85,000,000 cubic feet; the great wall 6,350,000,000 cubic feet.—Milling World.

Imitation Coffee.—The N. Y. Tribune states that an imitation of coffee is made of a low grade of flour, shaped like the coffee-bean and baked brown. This is mixed with the genuine article, and the mixture sold at a reduced price. It has the advantage of not being unwholesome to use—but nevertheless is a fraud on those who suppose they are buying coffee only.

An Anthracite Colliery.—The description given by the Coal Trade Journal of the new "Woodward Colliery," near Wilkesbarre, now being developed, will convey some idea of the magnitude of the operations connected with coal mining. The main shaft is 12 feet by 55 in size, and is sunk to the Red Ash vein, which it reached at a depth of 1040 feet. The air-shaft is located about 100 yards from the other and is 10 by 37 feet. Both of these shafts are timbered.

Two immense ventilating fans, of about 40 feet in diameter are to be constructed for these shafts. Over 30 cylindrical boilers will be required to furnish the power for the vast amount of machinery of the mine. The trestle-work from the mouth of the shaft to the breaker is nearly 600 feet long, and at one point over 130 feet high. The breaker will be 100 feet wide, will consume 1,150,000 feet of lumber; and have a capacity of 3,000 tons per day. The colliery will furnish employment for 1200 hands.

Vertigo of the Kajak.—This is a curious disorder that sometimes attacks the Esquimaux of Greenland. While sailing in his kajak upon a perfectly smooth sea, a man will be suddenly seized with a feeling that his boat is tipping to one side. He jumps to the other side to preserve the equilibrium, but this only makes matters worse, and he abandons himself to anxious and even frenzied attempts to keep the boat from tipping. He can no longer fish, and his trouble does not cease till he gets in sight of shore or another boat. It seems more like an hallucination than a true vertigo.

Relief of Croup.—The operation of tracheotomy, says Science, by which an opening is made with the knife into the windpipe for the relief of membranous croup and diphtheria, seems likely to be superseded by intubation of the larynx. In this new operation a small tube is inserted through the mouth into the windpipe, and all necessity for a cutting operation is thus avoided. It is claimed by the advocates of this method of treatment that it is far easier to introduce this tube than to perform tracheotomy, and that more lives are saved than by the old operation.

Toad as a Fly-catcher.—The toad seizes its food so quickly that it takes a sharp eye to follow the movement. It would be hard to determine just how many flies it will devour in the course of 24 hours, but a fair estimate can be made. Two summers ago, an aged toad took up its quarters by the kitchen-door. A convenient craney in the brick pavement was its home; but it sallied out often, even in broad daylight, to feast upon the innumerable flies. Once, watch in hand, I timed it with the following result: In three minutes it captured 29 flies, supposing that it never missed its aim. The toad looked like a child's rocking-horse while thus engaged, and no wonder, for once in every six seconds it leaned forward, shot out its tongue, and then came back with a flop to its original position.—Abbott's Rambles about Home.

The Cat-fish and her Young.—Unlike the majority of our fishes, who know nothing of their young, the cat-fish guard theirs with much solicitude and often brave great dangers to extricate such of their young as may have fallen into trouble. In thus caring for their offspring, they remind one forcibly of a hen and her chickens. The old fish scratches the mud, or rather roots it up, with as much earnestness as a hen does the dunghill; and the young fish crowd about her head, as eager for something edible as are the chicks for worms or seeds.

In order to test the affection for their young, possessed by this fish, with a scoop-net, I captured nearly an entire brood, and put them into a large glass globe, which I covered at the top with fine sieving. Placing the globe with its contents in the water, I was delighted to find that the parent fish evidently recognized its offspring, swam boldly up to the glass and was brought to a stand-still by the unseen barrier which separated her from her young. So long as I watched the bewildered fish did not cease her efforts to break through the mysterious something that prevented her young from escaping. I left the globe in the water through the night, and found early the next morning that the faithful parent was still at her post. As the confinement was proving fatal to some of the young fish, I released them. No sooner was the globe emptied than the whole brood surrounded the parent, and quickly swam away in very compact ranks.

I subsequently repeated the experiment, and placed the glass globe containing the brood of young cat-fish on the bank of the stream from which they were taken, and in full view of the parent fish, which was greatly excited by being deprived of her charge. This fish at once recognized that her young were not in the creek, although they were swimming in water. After a variety of restless movements it left the creek and made its way to the base of the globe containing her young, a distance of about two feet. Here she remained for nine minutes, quietly watching her brood, and then returned to the water. In a few moments she returned, having recovered from the effects of exposure to the air. I now liberated the young cat-fish; and they immediately clustered about their parent and followed her into deep water.—Abbott's Rambles about Home.

—The Ragged Schools of London.—These schools, designed for the instruction and help of the most degraded classes of the London poor, were commenced nearly fifty years ago, and now number 170. Of these, 109 are taught on First-days, with an average attendance of about 20,000. In connection with them are other institutions for the relief and uplifting of the poor; such as Sewing Schools, Mothers' Meetings, Day Nurseries, &c.

As examples of the excessive overcrowding to which many are subjected, it is stated that one room, 12 feet by 6, was occupied by seven persons—father, mother, and five children; a garret 12 feet square, by father, mother, and seven children; and in one cellar were found a father, mother, and three children, and four pigs. Much of the want and wretchedness which abound, is due to the use of intoxicating drinks. So impressed was the late Dr. Guthrie, of Scotland, with the extent of the evils that flow from this cause, that he declared, "I believe that these intoxicating stimulants have sunk into perdition more men and women than found a grave in that deluge which swept over the highest hill-top, engulfing a world of which but eight were saved."

—Lord Brougham on War.—Lord Brougham declared, "I abominate war as unchristian; I hold it the greatest of human crimes. I deem it to include all others—violence, blood, rapine, fraud, everything which can deform the character, alter the nature, and debase the name of man."

—Intercollegiate Games.—President McCosh, of Princeton College, has published an open letter, proposing that the Eastern Colleges unite in framing some regulations to prevent the abuses which have grown up in connection with the public games in which the students of one college contend with those of another. These are attended with the same gambling, drinking and general demoralization as horse-races; and in addition, there is at times manifested by the players a degree of rough treatment of each other, almost amounting to brutality, which is very disgraceful.

—Timely Cautions.—In view of the liberty indulged in by many, and the unusual temptations spread before people on the occasion of public holidays, the Ledger, of Philadelphia, in its issue for Twelfth Month 25th, inserted among its editorials several cautions to its readers, which some of them would do well to remember at other times also. Among them are the following:

"And Satan came also—he always comes where there's drinking and carousing."

"Drink not of the egg-nogg that tempts your eye with its golden hued foam in the big punch-bowl, or in the slender glass—which tempts your olfactory and your palate with its odors and its flavors. It is a gay deceiver. It is a seducer of the worst grade. While you are trifling with the glass it has generated a fog in your head, beclouded your wits, twisted your tongue and unsteadied your legs. Beware, trust it not."

"Hilarity is the order of the day and the night; but not that sort of hilarity which consists in getting heated up with whiskey or beer, or other wicked stimulants, then getting into rows, and then getting into the clutches of the police."

"Good things to put in your stockings—steady feet; but they will not be steady—if you put into your stomach what will make your head heavier than your heels."

THE FRIEND.

FIRST MONTH 8, 1887.

A writer in one of our "exchanges," some weeks ago justly condemned the way in which error is often "insinuated and placed before the minds of men, in the garb of truth."

In illustration of his subject, he quoted from another paper the Chautauquan, a passage which says that in many a case of shipwreck, the sailor who helps the women and children to escape and remains behind to die, is "not far from the kingdom of God," and "it may be that there stands near him One whom he knows not, but soon shall know, 'in form like unto the Son of God.'"

This, the critic regards as mere sentiment, and akin to that kind of oratory "that sends men straight to heaven because they died on the field of battle in defence of their country."

It is undoubtedly true that there is in the world a great deal of what may be called sentimental religion, which places the hope of salvation on something less trying to human nature, than the terms laid down by our Saviour, of repentance, bearing the daily cross, and experiencing the great work of regeneration. Neither the exercise of that natural benevolence, which leads men to great exertion and self-sacrifice for the sake of others, nor anything else, can be a substitute for the "washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost," which is shed on man abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour. Man's salvation is effected by his coming under the influence of the Divine life and power of Christ, by which old things are done away, and all things are made new and of God. But, as he thus becomes a partaker of the Divine nature, he will feel somewhat of the same unselfish disposition which was manifested so eminently by the Redeemer of men, and which will cause him practically to love others, even as himself.

Therefore, while we consider it a serious error to suppose that such a self-sacrifice as has been mentioned, would procure salvation; yet it is so contrary to the natural selfishness of the human heart, that where it is seen, it gives some ground to hope, that there has been a submission to the power of Christ inwardly revealed, and that this is one of the fruits of the blessed change which He has wrought in the heart.

It is with satisfaction we have noticed in some of our exchanges, especially in those which belong to what is called "the religious press," a renewed protest against the publication in the daily papers of the demoralizing details of divorce suits and other cases which show the abominations that exist in some classes of society. While a knowledge of the general fact that such evils do exist may be useful in putting persons on their guard against exposing themselves, or permitting those in whom they are interested to be exposed to influences which may tend to blunt their finer feelings and render easy a descent into the paths of vice; it is undeniably true that a familiarity with such incidents, and the filling of the mind with circumstantial descriptions of them, have a debasing effect upon the reader, lower his moral tone, and destroy to a large extent that loathing and horror of vice which is felt where purity reigns in the heart.

We greatly regret that the publishers of any papers which claim to be respectable, should so ignore the heavy responsibility which rests upon them for the influence they exert, as to become the tools of Satan in the manner alluded to.

But we wish especially to impress upon our readers the duty which rests upon them to bear a faithful testimony against these evils, by refusing to read or admit into their families, or to encourage in any way papers whose columns are contaminated with such corrupting details. We do not suppose there is much need for this caution in the circles where "The Friend" goes, but there may be some whose attention has not been directed to the subject, and who might profitably exercise a more watchful care. We will not insult any of them by the suggestion that they may take a secret pleasure or interest in such reading themselves—a thing which it is scarcely possible for any one to do, and at the same time observe the advice of the Apostle to the Philippians,—“Brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things.”

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The public debt statement for Twelfth Month, shows a decrease of $9,358,202. Total debt in the Treasury, $44,915,791.

The Chicago Railway Age reports that during the year 1886, over 8000 miles of new railway tracks were laid with steel rails.

What is said to be the heaviest European mail that has ever been despatched from New York was that carried by the steamship Eider, which sailed from that port on Twelfth Month 22nd, for Bremen via Southampton. It consisted of 255 sacks of letters, and 560 sacks of newspapers and other printed matter, sample packages, &c., a total of 815 sacks, of which 575 were made up at the New York Post-office.

An arrangement has been effected with the Sioux Indians at the Fort Peck Agency in Montana, by which they concede all title to their land, except that retained for the reservation. The reserve will contain about 1,500,000 acres. The Indians will receive for their land $1,650,000, in ten annual payments of $165,000 each.

The Charleston News and Courier says, that the number of manufacturing establishments in South Carolina has increased from 1230 in 1860 to 3242 in 1886. The capital invested has increased from $6,931,756 to $21,327,970. The number of hands employed is 33,378, in 1886, against 6904 in 1860, and 8140 in 1870. The value of the products is $29,951,551. The cotton mills give employment now to 4889 persons. It is estimated that the value of agricultural and garden products for 1886, was $44,109,501, and the value of the corn alone was nearly half the value of the cotton crop.

The Chattanooga Tradesman publishes returns from every town and city in the Southern States, showing an extraordinary growth of new industries, and definitely projected industries in the South during the year 1886. In publishing the table, the Tradesman says: “Among the most important features of the industrial revival of the past year are the large number of furnaces set up in Alabama and Tennessee, the erection of steel and wrought iron mills in Chattanooga, the organization of coal mining companies in Alabama, Tennessee, North Carolina and Kentucky, the establishment of large stove factories in Alabama and Tennessee, and the extraordinary development of the lumber business in every Southern State.”

A telegram from Pittsburg says that Carnegie Brothers & Co. have decided to erect a new steel rail mill at Braddock, and work on the structure will be started within thirty days. The new plant will cost upwards of a million dollars, and will give employment to a large number of men. The company's works will then have a capacity of 400,000 tons of rails per annum, or about one-third of the entire production of the country.

The “Citrus Fair of Northern and Central California” is now in progress in Chicago. Included in the exhibit are watermelons, nuts, dates, oranges, olives, limes, lemons, and various kinds of semi-tropical fruits, which ripened in the open air in Twelfth Month. The oranges are pronounced “equal to any produced in the world.” There are ten boxes of raisins, nine from Placer County, California, and one, of the best growth, from Spain, and experts are challenged to pick out the Spanish box from the others.

The Judges of twenty counties of Texas, comprising the drought-stricken district, were in session at Albany, in that State, on the 30th of last month. They report that in the aggregate 27,900 persons are in actual need of food and clothing. “They will make an official report and publish an appeal to the Legislature and ask the endorsement of the Governor. They will also make an appeal to the charitable people for immediate relief.”

The deaths in this city last week numbered 452, which was 62 more than during the previous week, and 96 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the whole number 240 were males and 212 females: 65 died of consumption; 41 of pneumonia; 22 of heart diseases; 21 of croup; 20 of old age; 16 of marasmus; 15 of convulsions; 15 of casualties; 14 of inflammation of the brain, and 11 of typhoid fever.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½'s 110½; 4's, registered, 128; coupon, 129; 3's, 101; currency 6's, 124 a 134.

Cotton was in limited request at 9½ cts. for middling uplands.

Petroleum was quiet, but steady, at 6½ cts. for 70 Abel test in barrels, and 8½ cts. for 110 test in cases.

Feed was firm under light supplies, but demand was slow. Quotations—Bran, western winter, spot, per ton, $17.50 a $18; bran, spring, spot, $16 a $16.50; red middlings, $16 a $17; white middlings, $18 a $20.

Flour and Meal.—Flour was quiet, demand being restricted to the immediate requirements of the home trade, but prices were well supported under light supplies. Sales of 125 barrels Pennsylvania family, at $3.85; 250 barrels Ohio, clear, at $4.25; 375 barrels Ohio and Indiana, straight, at $4.40 a $4.50; 375 barrels winter patent, at $4.75 a $5; 375 barrels Minnesota, straight, at $4.40 a $4.50; and 625 barrels do., patent, at $5 a $5.25. Rye flour moved slowly at $3.25 per barrel for choice.

Grain.—Wheat was 4½c. higher.—No. 2 red closing at 93 cts. bid and 93½ cts. asked. Rye was dull at 57 a 58 cts. per bushel. Corn ruled steady, with 46½ cts. bid, and 46½ cts. asked. Oats have advanced, No. 2 white closing at 38 cts. bid and 38½ cts. asked.

Beef cattle were ½c. to ¾c. higher, at 3 a 5½ cts.

Sheep were ¼c. higher, at 2 a 5½ cts.

Hogs were ¼c. higher, at 6½ a 7 cts.

The receipts were: Beesves, 2100; sheep, 6000; hogs, 7100.

FOREIGN.—Goschen has, it is officially announced, accepted the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer. Lord Hartington fully approves of Goschen's course and the latter's adherents say that it is purely as a Liberal-Unionist that Goschen joins the Government, which relies upon Unionist support for success.

The shipping statistics of the port of Liverpool for 1886 show a decrease of 100,000 tons. The coastwise trade shows an increase, the falling off being in the foreign trade.

The Marquis of Bath has agreed to sell his Monaghan estates at 17½ years' purchase on a basis of a 17½ per cent. reduction from the judicial rents, or at a reduction of 42½ per cent. from non-judicial rents, provided payment be made in one year. The Marquis will cancel all arrears of rent, and evicted tenants will be reinstated. The Marquis of Londonderry, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, offers to sell his Irish estates to the tenants. The terms of sale are not mentioned. Lord Templemore has offered to sell his estate in Donegal at twenty years' purchase on a basis of the present rental.

It has been decided that De Brazza shall be permitted to return to the French Congo country and there dispose of the grant made by the Chamber of Deputies in the manner he may deem best.

Consul Tanner, of Chemnitz, reports that the beer production of Germany in 1885 was 1,100,000,000 gallons, enough to make a lake more than one mile square and six and a half feet deep, or it would make a running stream as large as some four rivers.”

The Berlin syndicate which is called the Rothschild group has decided against further Russian loans, a decision of international importance, amounting to the absolute prohibition of a Russian war loan.

Dr. Blowitz, the Paris correspondent of the Times affirms that he has information from an undoubted source that Russia and Germany signed a direct alliance a fortnight ago. “The Czar,” adds the correspondent, “was decided in taking this course by the attitude manifested towards Russia by Count Kalnoky, Austrian Minister of foreign affairs, and by the expectation that Floquet would be made Prime Minister of France. This shows,” concludes the correspondent, “that the reported alliance between Russia and France was but a chimera.” Dr. Blowitz says that, by the terms of this new alliance, Russia binds herself to remain neutral in the event of a war between France and Germany, and Germany binds herself to remain neutral in the event of a war between Russia and Austria.

The Vienna press is becoming convinced that Russia is determined on war. Reports of increased Russian armaments are continually coming to hand from various sources. The latest intelligence of this kind is to the effect that 300,000 Russian troops have been ordered to mass in Kieff, and that the occupants of 10,000 houses have received official notification that soldiers will soon be billeted on them.

The Neue Freie Presse plainly hints that the best thing Austria can do is to submit to Russia's wishes in order to avoid a conflict. The Tupblatt and other papers bitterly deplore the fact that “Austria is compelled to abandon her Balkan programme because she has been left in the lurch by Prince Bismarck, who has made peace with Russia.”

It is semi-officially stated that the Russian Government maintains the same attitude towards Bulgaria it adopted at the time of General Kaulbars' recall from that country. The return of Prince Alexander to the throne of that country, it adds, might, however, cause the Czar to renounce all endeavors to effect a pacific settlement of the crisis in Bulgaria, and have recourse to military occupation of the country.

Romania will not join a Central European alliance, but will preserve armed neutrality until an opportunity offers to make the best alliance, if serious Bulgarian complications arise.

A military commission is at present engaged in translating the words of command used in the Bulgarian army from the Russian language, heretofore used, into Bulgarian.

The removal of the snow which fell in the late storm in Germany has revealed an appalling loss of life. Many travellers were overtaken by the storm. Fifty bodies have been found in Saxony, thirty in Thuringia, and forty in Southern Germany. It is estimated that the total loss of life will be nearly 200.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

DIED, at the residence of her nephew, Nehemiah M. Sutton, near Tecumseh, Michigan, Twelfth Month 2d, 1886, ELIZABETH SATTERTHWAITE, widow of the late Samuel Satterthwaite, in the 95th year of her age, a member of Tecumseh Particular Meeting.

—, suddenly of apoplexy, Twelfth Month 10th, 1886, JANE R. LUKENS, widow of the late Jacob T. Lukens, in the 78th year of her age, an esteemed member and overseer of Horsham Particular, and Abington Monthly Meeting, Pa. This, our dear friend, was a diligent attender of our religious meetings; and her “adoring was that of a meek and quiet spirit.” And although the call was sudden, we believe the language applicable, “Blessed is that servant, whom, when his Lord cometh, shall find watching.”

—, on the 26th of Twelfth Month, 1886, at the residence of his brother-in-law, Thomas H. Whitson, BENJAMIN F. COOPER, in the 78th year of his age, a member of West Grove Preparative and New Garden Monthly Meeting of Friends. Though of small natural endowments of mind, a cheerful child-like spirit was a pleasant trait in the character of this dear friend. His submissive spirit during his illness of several days; the calmness that attended his mind in his lucid intervals, in which he seemed aware his time would be short; and the happiness he evinced in his feeble way at times during his illness; together with the feeling of comfort in being with him; have left a lively hope with his friends that he was prepared, through the mercy of our Heavenly Father, who is mindful of the least of his children, to enter into a mansion of rest.

Seventh Mo. 21st, 1843. More stillness this morning than has been experienced of late. May He, who alone can still the "winds and waves," be pleased yet further to manifest his power; that so I may be enabled once more to celebrate his name, and sing as on the banks of deliverance. Received, last evening, another sweet little gospel message from my dear friend T. Kite, which I feel altogether unworthy of. It was as follows: "Again remember me affectionately to A. Williams. Tell her it is nothing new for the disciples of Christ to have many afflictions in their passage to the land where sorrow is unknown. Tell her, though she already knows it, that the doctrine preached by Paul and Barnabas at Lystra, Iconium, and Antioch, is the doctrine which is according to the truth of the gospel. It is recorded of them, that in those places they confirmed the souls of the disciples, 'exhorting them to continue in the faith; and that we must, through much tribulation, enter the kingdom of God.'"

30th. [After a supplication in their meeting by Thomas Kite, our Diarist subjoins:] O, thou who hearest and answerest prayer, be pleased to have respect unto the petition that was poured forth, especially on behalf of those who, although bowed down to the very ground under weaknesses and infirmities, have no ability to approach thee other than in tears and sighs.

Eighth Mo. 2nd. This morning, previous to leaving, T. Kite had a religious opportunity with the female-teachers. A word of sweet encouragement flowed, commencing with: "Why sayest thou O Jacob, and speakest O Israel, my way is hid from the Lord, and my judgment is passed over from my God," &c.; with a belief, that as there was a continuing to wait on the Lord, the strength of some present would be renewed, and they would experience a being "touched with a live coal from off the altar; their iniquity taken away, and their sins purged."

9th. Another day to be accounted for; (a remark dear T. Shillitoe so often makes through his journal) I have endeavored to keep pretty much in my own room in the quiet, and although I have not been able to feel much of the arisings of life, yet humbly hope I have been preserved from sinning and grieving the Holy Spirit. Have enjoyed this evening a sweet little season of retirement and reading with a dear precious child; whose best welfare feels very near my heart. The good Spirit is secretly striving with her, and may He carry on his own work, for He is able. Yea, He has begun, and He can carry through, if she only keeps fast her hold! which, that she may be strengthened to do, is my secret prayer for her.

15th. Three days since last note. There have been seasons during each of them, when living desires have arisen that daily preservation may be experienced. Oh what an unwearied adversary we have to contend with! laying his baits it seems at every corner, and when he cannot cause to sin in word or action, he does it in thought; yea, thoughts that my very soul hateth am I tempted with! And for want of an establishment am not always able to withstand; and thus pierce myself through with many sorrows.

Ninth Mo. 10th. This has been a day of quietness; wherein strength has been given once more to prostrate myself in secret at the footstool of mercy; interceding that the will of my Heavenly Father may be done more and more by and through me. That the path wherein He would have me to go, might be more clearly made manifest, both as relates to my spiritual and temporal life. Lead where thou wilt, do what thou wilt, only be pleased to be with me, and take not thy Holy Spirit from me, hath been the secret travail and exercise this day.

24th. The language of my burdened soul this morning is, (if I dare adopt the language) "If this cup may not pass from me except I drink it, thy will be done." The sufferings, the mental sufferings passed through of latter times, and particularly when meeting day comes round, it seems as if I could hardly live under. Could I only see the will and design of my Heavenly Father in thus afflicting and bringing low, I think I could the better bear up under it. But all seems hid; yea, at times, and greater part of the time, even his face. All I ask is, a little evidence that these are necessary baptisms, portioned by Him, and that He will carry through to his own praise, and the rejoicing of my poor soul.

Tenth Mo. 29th. Three weeks have elapsed since last note; which time has been spent with my friends at home. Afresh introducing into a near and tender sympathy with them in their various exercises and strugglings; and particularly so with our dear mother. I want her relieved from the burden of cares that rests upon her; but can see no way, unless the Lord make a way. And O! I fear it will be by taking her unto himself; the very thought of which makes me tremble. A selfish feeling I know; but, like the poor old patriarch formerly, my life seems bound up in hers. Be the change sooner or later, and whether spared or not to see it, may there be an increasing concern so to live, that when done with time, there may be a re-uniting in a never ending eternity.

During my absence from this temporary home, some seasons of favor dispensed will ever be had in remembrance. I have felt so altogether unworthy of the very least of the Lord's mercies, that all within me has been humbled under a sense of it. The secret aspiration has again and again arisen, that no necessary baptism may be withheld, however humiliating to the creature, in order that the great work may be perfected.

Eleventh Mo. 8th. There has never been, since my stay at Westtown, such a general time of colds throughout the family as at this time; so that many are hardly able to keep about. My desire this morning and in the night has been, that it may all tend to show through whom it is we live, move, and have our being. Were we more sensible of this, fruits of gratitude would more often appear.

17th. We have had, within the few days past, several cases of scarlet fever; and although, except in one instance, it has seemed of a mild form, yet we can't help feeling alarmed, knowing the ravages this disease often makes in families, especially among children. The one instance I alluded to, seems relieved from that complaint; but she is now laboring under another, we hardly know what. Her chest and lungs seeming very much affected. We have been watching by her night and day for the past week. I don't know whether I am deceived, but it appears to me death is approaching. I have tried, when sitting by her, to feel the awfulness of it in a true sense. How I have craved that the suffering scene might be sanctified to us.

18th. At four o'clock this morning the scene above alluded to closed; and the precious immortal spirit was released from its suffering tenement of clay. I can but believe that through great mercy, the precious lamb has found acceptance. And moreover that all the sufferings she passed through, were not meted out alone for her purification, but for us also who were eye and ear witnesses of the solemn scene. When a little ability has been granted, my secret petition has been, Be pleased, O Heavenly Parent! to bless and sanctify the whole of it to us. Give us more and more to see and feel, that 'tis through Thee alone we live; and that our lives and all we possess are in thy hands; and that thou canst bless and blast according to thy good pleasure.

23rd. I was forcibly struck with the following remark, dear Daniel Wheeler makes in his journal: "Few indeed of our actions, however specious in appearance, are wholly divested of self in some shape or other, when examined in the pure mirror of truth; such is the depravity of the human heart in its natural state."

28th. Daily since last note has my little diary been brought to mind; but have not felt as though I could pen one word; and it is not now through the abundance I have to say, or a time of abounding, that another entry is about to be made: but as one more little seal to the goodness of my Heavenly Father; whose eye of compassion is still towards his poor erring child, though she may know it not. Through my dear friend T. Kite, a sweet little gospel message was sent from Him, I verily believe, who still continues, both immediately and instrumentally, to speak to his creature man. It was as follows: "What seemed to spring in my heart to revive in thy remembrance, was the language of Paul to Timothy, his son in the Gospel; 'I know in whom I have believed, and that He is able to keep that which I have committed unto Him against that day.' If thou hast been strengthened, as I believe thou hast, to commit the keeping of thy soul in well-doing unto Him, who remains to be a faithful Creator, mayst thou lay hold on the confidence which the holy apostle felt, and trust in thy God. He is able and willing to keep thee; He keepeth covenant with the night as well as with the day. In the hour of thy need, whether it be the day in which thou must more conspicuously appear as a fool for Christ's sake—a spectacle to angels and to men; or whether it be a day of outward trouble, or inward baptism, or whether it be the day of surrendering up thy account to thy final Judge, remember He is able to keep that which thou hast committed unto Him against that day. Be thou faithful unto death, and He will assuredly give thee a crown of life."

30th. However unworthy of the very least of the Lord's mercies, and surely I was never more sensible of it than during our silent sitting together this morning. He still condescends to remember his poor child, struggling along under manifold infirmities; and has given me this day to see and feel the weight of them. My soul doth magnify and praise his ever-blessed name, for anointing my eyes to see, and giving ability to feel; and more than that, enabling me to lift up my heart in prayer unto Him, that He would be pleased, through whatever process He may see meet, to purge and purify, till all is made clean and meet for acceptance.

Memories of the Prairies.

The first winter that we spent in Iowa was a very pleasant one. The fall was dry and almost full of mellow Indian-summer days; and Winter's approach so gentle that we never knew just when he took the sceptre from Autumn's hand. The nights grew more frosty, and the beautiful days were a little cooler, but we scarcely perceived the change from day to day; once there fell a very light snow-storm, just enough to decoy some of us boys out for a rabbit-hunt, but not enough to enable us to follow their tracks with any degree of certainty or success. The streets and roads were smooth and dusty until Christmas day, when, on the following night, there fell the smoothest and hardest sleet that I have ever seen. The next day was fair and very cold, and dawned upon a world of crystals.

For several days all out-of-door business was paralyzed, and not a horse was seen on the streets. It was amusing to watch the domestic animals attempt to move about in their usual way. Pigs, dogs, cats, and even chickens made ludicrous failures to cross the streets, and door-yards; but the boys had rare sport indeed. Putting on their skates at their own door-steps, they glided over the streets and highways as smoothly as upon a frozen river, often racing for miles out into the country, working their way as best they could up the gently rising hills and shooting down the slopes almost as swiftly as arrows. The public square in Salem (then without trees) served as a skating rink for weeks. When the sleet gradually wore away, the roads became dusty again. The weather continued steadily cold, with very few cloudy or inclement days, and no storms through that whole beautiful winter.

But there are other phases of winter weather in Iowa. The winter of 1856-7 was of extreme severity. A deep snow fell about the first of Twelfth Month, and a high wind piled it into great drifts. A few days of calm cold weather followed with the mercury from ten to twenty degrees below zero. Then came a day or two of chilly east wind, a little more snow; and the wind changing quickly to the north-west blew a gale that sent the snow whirling high into the air, and drove it into every possible crack and crevice of out-houses and dwellings. These storms almost invariably continued three days, grinding the snow into finest powder, and packing it into drifts so hard and high that even horses and cattle walked freely upon them, passing over fences from field to field at their pleasure. Where they were wished to be restrained, trenches were cut in the drifts. Gates were useless, roads and high-ways were blockaded, and all travel was turned into crooked courses, away through fields and across lots, anywhere that a way was found or could be easiest made among the crystal barriers; and many a laborious day was spent in opening roads and pathways, only too often to be immediately filled higher and harder than before, for storm followed storm with but short intervals, through that cold winter.

The severest of them all began on the 21st of Twelfth Month, 1856. The morning was unusually fair and pleasant, but a little after noon a haze gathered over the sky that soon thickened into a heavy cloud, and by the middle of the afternoon snow was falling very rapidly, and continued for two or three hours with scarcely a breath of air to sway the feathery flakes as they softly hurried down. Then a breeze sprang up from the north-west that soon quickened into a gale, and we were in the midst of the greatest snow-storm that we have ever seen sweep over the plains of Iowa. The newly fallen snow was caught up by the wind, and thickened the air till an object could not be seen at a few paces distant. The temperature fell rapidly, and a fearful night gathered over the prairies. That pleasant First-day morning had lured many from home, and numerous instances of suffering and death came to our knowledge. One instance I will relate:

A man of my acquaintance in Johnson County, with his wife and child were visiting at a neighbor's a mile away. When the storm began they started home in the face of the wind, but on the open prairie were blinded and bewildered. Their horses plunged through great drifts and the merciless tempest beat the snow into and through their closest wrapped garments. The father and husband took a part of his own clothing to add protection to his wife and child, and drove his exhausted team on and on until they flourished and fell in impassable drifts. Then cutting them loose to care for themselves, he turned his attention to his family, but found them perishing. When they were past the need of his care, he struggled on through the snow until he saw a light, towards which he made his way, sometimes crawling on his hands and knees; and finally exhausted and freezing, he came to the door of a cabin, whose unfeeling inmates refused to let him in, or to get up and care for him when he had, with frozen hands, effected his own entrance. They were foreigners, and may not have understood him as he plead for assistance, or told his sad story. When morning came they found their ill-treated guest almost dead, and giving the alarm to near neighbors, he was taken home and cared for, and though his life was spared, his hands and feet were so badly frozen that he was lamed and maimed for life. The sleigh was found about two miles from home, and from the trail that could be followed, it was seen that they had passed quite near by it, then on into the blinding storm.

Another family of my acquaintance in Linn County were in imminent danger of suffering a like fate, but chanced upon a small new house, yet untenanted. They went in, taking their team in with them and made themselves as comfortable as possible until morning. The storm continued violent through the following day, but the snow beaten fine as crystal dust, was carried along in whirling streams and broad sheets nearer the surface of the earth, and the upper air was comparatively clear.

It is difficult for one now, amidst the houses and barns and orchards and groves and fenced fields, that beautifully cover our broad prairies, to conceive of the steady, blinding, merciless fury of a snow-storm, in those early days, when an unbroken plain stretched away to and beyond the western horizon, without an impediment to break the force of the wind. On these open prairies, low, transverse, wave-like ridges would form across the current of the wind, and the pulverized snow would run in streams and sheets and pour over their crests, almost like some white liquid, ever building them higher and cutting them down and moving and transforming them, until the storm's fury was spent, and the wind ceased, and cold and calm the great plain lay in almost unspotted beauty and grandeur.

Many a vexing race have I seen between some unlucky wayfarer and his truant hat, and in one instance that I remember, the hat was the winner and was never recovered.

These severe winter storms found many a pioneer but poorly prepared to protect himself or his stock against the inclement weather, and much suffering was the consequence. It seems to me that a fearful accountability rests upon those who in their zeal to gain wealth, gather around them more dependent animals than they can properly care for and make comfortable. We have no right thus carelessly to become the agents of suffering and misery to helpless creatures. The mercury frequently falls to thirty degrees below zero, and I once saw it frozen just a little solid lump in the bulb of the thermometer. But that morning, as is usually the case when such extremes of cold are reached, was clear and calm, and seemed quite pleasant compared with wintry weather of much higher temperature. Yet one is frozen wonderfully easy at such times.

For "The Friend."

Promiscuous Sentiments.

When Christ was personally among men, he said to his followers that "from the days of John the Baptist until now, the kingdom of Heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force." But is the now here spoken of a perpetual now? Does the force and violence always continue under the peaceable reign of Christ?

Must we not still press into the kingdom and be led by the Father's love until "the soul is redeemed from all deceit and violence?" And must we not obey the voice of duty that leads us?

It requires earnest heed to distinguish the voice which speaks from God and for God, and the one which speaks from the reasoning faculties of man. How are we to know the voice of the Lord, or of the true Shepherd from the voice of the stranger? The word of the Lord appeared to Moses amid the thunderings of Sinai. But we are not now under the outward law, but under the law of the Spirit of life as inwardly revealed. And this living Word often appears to us in a still small voice after the earthquake and whirlwind and the fiery zeal of man have subsided. It is, then, in the silence of all the fleshly reasonings of man that we can best hear the voice of the Lord, and be able to distinguish it from the voice of the stranger. But we must first have an ear to hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches. And in our devotions we must open that ear to heavenly things, and close it against all earthly sounds, though ever so enchanting to the outward ear. For I believe the voice comes to all as a messenger of light unto salvation. And though it may at times be small as a grain of mustard seed, yet happy are we if we hear and obey. For if we wait for louder calls or better opportunities, the light may be withdrawn, and our path left in darkness. The call to a small duty which we may have to-day, if rejected, may appear with less force to-morrow.

If our numerous churches were branches of the living church of God, would there not be more of a living attendance at our meetings, and would we not more often hear the voice of God, either silently or in a living ministry? Let the empty benches in many of our meeting-houses answer. But in order to fill the empty benches, and to keep up the form of Godliness, many inventions are resorted to, which operate on the impulsive or animal part, so as to content the audience with the mere shadow of religion instead of the substance. But this only gives us a name to live while we are dead. If Satan is transformed into an angel of light, as we are plainly told that he is, how can those who are transformed as ministers of righteousness be distinguished from the true ministers except by the voice of the Lord, through the true light which makes manifest the hidden things of darkness? For if our worship is conducted without the true light, how can we see the depths of Satan, as they speak? Or how can we shun his allurements which often seem designed to hurry us forward in the strength and activity of man, and cause us not only to deceive ourselves but others also who are depending on us as way-marks to the kingdom?

It takes a heavenly light to enable us to see heavenly things. And it requires a heavenly wisdom to enable us to understand the mysteries of the invisible world. For this world by its wisdom knows not God nor the deep things of God, as they are spiritually only discerned. And while we have the true light, the Spirit in the church harmonizes with the living members of the church and does not contradict the true interpretation of the Scriptures. For it all springs from the same fountain.

Does not "the God of this world blind the minds of them that believe not, lest the light of the glorious gospel of Christ should shine upon them," and they should be turned from darkness to light, and from his power to the power of God? How are Antichrist's transformations discovered if not by the light within? We may talk much about Christ and honor Him with the lips, but not come to Him by the drawings of the Father. And we may be like the Jews who waited in expectation for his appearance, but when He came they rejected Him. Man, as man, is a fallible being, but God's light and grace and truth are infallible. And so long as we are governed by his spirit and wisdom and power, so far our teachings, whether by word or example are infallible, and no farther. But we have this infallible treasure in earthen vessels. And unless the vessel is pure when the gospel stream passes through it, there is danger of its becoming so tinctured with impurity as to minister death instead of life to such as receive it and drink of it.

The true light that we have after the eye has been anointed, enables us to see ourselves as we really are. Not as Goliath who went forward in his own strength, defying the armies of the living God. But did Goliath stand against the smooth stone? And is there not something like a vaunting spirit now insinuating itself amongst us which might be compared to Goliath, almost ready to defy the aged veterans of the cross. And do not some of the boasting ones say in effect, as the Babel builders did, "Go to, and let us build us a city and a tower whose top may reach to heaven, and let us make us a name;" but is not this Babel building ending in confusion; and is not the hasty zeal which springs from it, "like a morning cloud and as the early dew that soon goeth away;" and is not the latter end of such as are led away by it, worse than the beginning?

Extracts from Journal of James Cresson of a Visit to Barbadoes in 1785.

First Month 4th, 1785. This morning about ten o'clock, left the ship, after having a solid parting season with the captain and all the hands; who, I believe, were sorry at our leaving them, there being evident marks of contrition and brokenness of heart amongst them, which bowed and humbled my spirit before the Most High under a sense of it, and thankfulness was begotten in me towards them for their great kindness towards us. We had our chests, &c., taken to our friend John Luke's, where we have taken up our quarters under a sense of great weakness and poverty; but O the Lord's mercy is over all his works. Delivered a few of our letters to-day, and had some friendly discourse and a little sitting with our kind host, which I believe tended to mutual edification; but we find things in this island at a very low ebb, and are informed that all the meeting-houses belonging to Friends that were on the island are blown down, that things appear difficult and discouraging; but my great desire is that we may step along with circumspection and care, and move just as fast as our Great Leader shall point out to us.

5th. Am pretty much indisposed this morning; desire to be kept in the patience; have nevertheless taken a walk and beheld the ruins, in part, of a hurricane they had in the year 1780, which is at present awful to behold, and having been informed how it was with them at the time—it was indeed truly tremendous. They say four thousand were killed: some whole families crushed in the ruins. In one house fourteen persons, it is said, were buried. Many houses have been rebuilt, but there are many remain as the storm left them.

They had some years ago a fire which did great damage. These calamities and signal judgments have left them in less affluent circumstances, which has a tendency, I am told, of bringing them off of some of their excesses. They also had, on the twenty-sixth day of last month, a severe shock of an earthquake, which alarmed them very much it is said; but it is much to be lamented these awful and signal judgments have but little effect as to true humiliation and contrition of spirit. Had this evening a sitting in the family, wherein something to edification was spoken.

6th. This morning am in a state of poverty; nevertheless, desirous to move forward and not to loiter away time unprofitably. Made some attempt to be informed of the state of Society—as to the descendants of Friends—which we did not now come at; but had some information how the meeting-houses, and the land belonging to them, are at present situated. See very little prospect of their being secured to Friends without the possessors could be prevailed upon to let equity have place before the law; as by a statute law they have in the island, they have the power of holding them, which evidently appears is for want of timely care in those who had the trust in that behalf.

Went this afternoon to view the ground where Friends' meeting-house stood in Bridgetown. The house we find was about forty by thirty-five feet in bigness, with buildings adjoining to it to accommodate a tenant, which are now in part standing and occupied by a descendant of Friends, whose name is Joseph Gibson, cousin to John Luke, who has been in it twelve months. The whole lot appears to be at least one hundred and fifty feet in front and two hundred feet deep, and may be, if there is a willingness to do it, secured to Friends.

We afterwards went to see the burying ground, which is in a ruinous situation, being overgrown with weeds and the wall in a very shattered condition.

7th. Have been this and yesterday morning to bathe in the sea, as it is said to be very useful. As I was going with John Luke's son Joshua, my companion not with us, I had some conversation with him how we might be accommodated with a place to meet in, and with respect of conveniency of our getting in the country, and am informed there is no way but by hiring of horses at fifteen shillings per day, as he says they have none in town, and they are scarce on the island, as they use the cow kind for their teams, ten and sixteen in a team; and in the town their blacks porter things about on a carriage much like our drays. Feel ardently desirous not to loiter away time, [but] find it best to move with caution. Seklon breakfast till about ten o'clock, [as] there is little to be done till after that time.

This morning had a view of the Monthly Meeting books of the island, from the year 1715 to the year 1760, when they dropped their Quarterly and Monthly Meetings. Made a list of what Friends in the ministry visited the island in that time, by their minutes.

It is mostly near three o'clock when we dine, after which, this day, went to see the widow and children, that are at home, of Augustus Miller, viz: Elizabeth and Sarah (her son Moses being married, [and these] three being all [that are] living). Had a refreshing opportunity with them in which, I believe, the Lord's holy presence was among us, to the tendering of our hearts together, praised be his great name; for I am fully persuaded there is yet a seed in this island which is groaning to be delivered. Oh, saith my spirit, may the Lord in his goodness arise for the help of it. Our friend John Luke, is very kind to us, and his only son and child, Joshua Luke, who is about thirty-three years of age, is very courteous to us, and ready to wait upon us to any place in the town. (He being single, lives with his father.) There is great cause to be thankful in that we have found so kind and friendly a reception, [so] that I am this evening bowed in awful reverence and fear for the Lord's manifold mercies and favors from time to time vouchsafed to us.

8th. This morning feel my spirit contrited, and my dear wife and children and friends whom I have left behind, brought very near to me, with desires that they may feel the Lord to be near and be preserved from every hurtful thing, [and] from every thing that will in anywise tarnish the beauty of Zion. Oh that Zion may become the beauty of nations, and Jerusalem (that quiet habitation) may become the praise of the whole earth.

The room which is our common sitting room, in which we breakfast and dine at our friend Luke's, is, I think he says, sixty feet in length and twenty feet in breadth, and the whole house nearly one hundred feet front. I noted this in part to show that his house was big enough to contain a pretty many people.

Although I think, through adorable goodness, I have often to drink of the refreshing streams of Shiloh's Brook which runs softly; I also have many stripped and baptizing seasons, in which things seem to be hedged up on every hand.

Faithfulness in Little Things.

"Where are the clean-handed ones to be found amongst us? Alas! alas! both ministers and elders are examples of shaking hands with the worldly spirit! Some may be plain in their dress, but look at their children, their houses, their tables, their equipages, and way of living; there is more of self-gratification than self-denial in all these things. Oh, it knocks down all they preach, or else hampers them and ties their hands. Well, we must not look out at others, let them do as they may; let us cleave close to the dear Master, and look at the pattern which He has shown us is consistent with his Spirit, which ever was and ever will be opposed to the worldly spirit. Oh, we want an increased attention to little things amongst us; it was in this way our dear ancients grew and thrived, by minding the day of small things, giving up to little feelings of doubt, of hesitation, or reproof, or inclination with regard to every thing; instead of which we smother and quench all, and then say—we don't see, or we feel easy with this or the other. If we shut our eyes we can't see. Oh, how do I long after more of this attention to little pointings, this pliability and subjectiveness of spirit! Let us crave it for one another, for this is the way to growth and fruitfulness."—Extract from a letter written by a Friend in England in 1839.

The Beginning.—"Give me a half-penny, and you may pitch one of these rings, and if it catches over a nail I'll give you three pence."

That seemed fair enough; so the boy handed him a half-penny and took the ring. He stepped back to the stake, tossed the ring and it caught on one of the nails.

"Will you take six rings to pitch again, or three pence?"

"Threepence," was the answer, and the money was put in his hand. He stepped off, well satisfied with what he had done, and probably not having an idea that he had done wrong. A gentleman standing near him watched him, and now before he had time to look about and rejoin his companions, laid his hand on his shoulder:—

"My lad, is this your first lesson in gambling."

"Gambling, sir?"

"You staked your half-penny and won six half-pence, did you not?"

"Yes, I did."

"You did not earn them, and they were not given to you; you won them just as gamblers win money. You have taken the first step in the path; that man has gone through it, and you can see the end. Now, I advise you to go and give his threepence back, and ask him for your half-penny, and then stand square with the world, an honest boy."

He had hung his head down, but raised it very quickly, and his bright, open look as he said, "I'll do it," will not soon be forgotten. He ran back, and soon emerged from the ring, looking happier than ever.—Morning Star.

THE OLD YEAR.

Farewell, Old Year, thy dying wail
Grates harshly on my ear;
With sadness deep, I see thee fall,
And drop for thee a tear.
Thy lovely spring once virgin fair,
Thing of the past must be;
Thy swallows sporting thro' the air,
We can no longer see.

Thy forests tall, with mantle green,
Have faded from the view;
Thy summer bright, in rapture seen,
Has lost its brilliant hue.
Its crops matured, of golden grain,
Were garnered for our bread;
Be praise to God—our glad refrain
While this fair earth we tread.

Thy autumn fruits we gladly hail,
And bless the lavish hand,
That countless blessings without fail,
Bestowed on ev'ry land.
Farewell thy seasons! they have fled
With all their joy and woe;
Old Time their dirges each has read,
Proud victor here below.

Thus spring and summer, autumn sere
Have quickly pass'd us by;
For gracious gifts may we revere,
The God who reigns on high.
The ripened maize nods o'er the plain,
And fruit of ev'ry kind;
Ten-thousand more unusing remain,
By searching we will find.

The Old Year passes thus away,
He silent rolls sublime;
Old eighty-six departs this day,
And seals his book of time.
Farewell Old Year—ring out ye bells,
His dying dirge proclaim;
He wails and dies—but record tells
His noble deeds of fame.

The Old Year's gone—we hail the New
With thankful hearts once more;
But duty's path with joy pursue,
And Nature's God adore.
May plenty crown the new-born year,
And peace extend her reign;
Till grateful nations far and near,
Shall sound the glad refrain.

THE FAMILY MEETING.

We are all here—
Father, mother,
Sister, brother,

All who hold each other dear.
Each chair is filled; we're all at home!
To-night let no cold stranger come!
It is not often thus around
Our old familiar hearth we're found;
Bless, then, the meeting and the spot;
For once be every care forgot;
Let gentle peace assert her power,
And kind affection rule the hour.

We are all—all here.

We're not all here!

Some are away—the dead ones dear,
Who thronged with us this ancient hearth,
And gave the hour to guiltless mirth.
Fate, with a stern, relentless hand,
Looked in, and thinned our little band.
Some like a night flash passed away,
And some sank lingering day by day.
The quiet grave-yard—some lie there;
And cruel ocean has his share.

We're not all here.

We are all here!

Even they—the dead—though dead, so dear—
Fond memory, to her duty true,
Brings back their faded forms to view.

How life-like through the mist of years
Each well-remembered face appears!
We see them, as in times long past;
From each to each kind looks are cast;
We hear their words, their smiles behold;
They're round us, as they were of old,
We are all here.

We are all here—

Father, mother,—

Sister, brother,—

You that I love with love so dear.

This may not long of us be said,
Soon must we join the gathered dead,
And by the hearth we now sit round
Some other circle will be found.
Oh, then, that wisdom may we know,
Which yields a life of peace below;
So, in the world to follow this,
May each repeat, in words of bliss,
We are all—all here!

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 113.

WORLDLINESS.

"Be not conformed to this world" is a Scripture injunction which remains to be of standing obligation to the Christian. There is one form of this worldliness which often attracts the unwary; and that is the indulgence in those kinds of amusements which are calculated to wean the affections from our great Creator, and which expose the individual to many temptations to evil.

The Testimony of the Monthly Meeting of Philadelphia respecting Daniel Stanton, a valuable minister, who deceased in 1770, states:—"He was of late deeply exercised in consideration of the evils of the horse-races, stage-plays, drunkenness, and other gross enormities, encouraged and increasing in this city; closely exhorting our youth against those pernicious and destructive devices of the enemy of mankind; and, under the awful sense that God will judge and punish the wicked and evil doers, he was often fervent in public supplications, that the Lord would lengthen out the day of his merciful visitation."

In the Journal of D. Stanton, he mentions that in 1766, "A weighty concern attended Friends at our Monthly Meeting, on account of a company of stage-players, that came to the city in order to erect a theatre to exhibit their pernicious diversions; to prevent which, and declare our testimony against their proceedings, in a thing of so bad a tendency for corrupting the minds of the people, leading them from the fear of the Lord into vanity, Friends agreed to address our Governor, John Penn, requesting him to interpose with his authority to prevent the same." Accordingly, a committee waited on the Governor, who was then at Shrewsbury, but obtained no redress from him. D. S. adds, "Yet I trust that Friends and we were clear, in thus discharging our duty to God and man in this respect."

I met some time ago in one of the public papers with a sad illustration of the folly of wasting life in a round of such amusements. I have no means of testing the accuracy of the narrative, but there is nothing improbable in its statements. A wealthy young woman in the South, who had been a thoughtful girl, anxious to help all suffering and want, and to serve her God faithfully, married a resident of New York, and entered into the whirl of fashionable life. She and her husband soon seemed to have no object before them but enjoyment; and an almost constant round of excitements occupied their time. Some years ago she was returning alone from California, when an accident occurred to the railroad train in which she was a passenger, and she received a fatal internal injury. She was carried to a wayside inn and there, attended only by a physician from a neighboring village, she died.

The doctor said it was one of the most painful experiences of his life. "I had to tell her that he had but an hour to live. She was not suffering any pain. Her only consciousness of hurt was that she was unable to move, so that it was to wonder she could not believe me.

"I must go home," she said, imperatively, 'to New York.'

"Madame, it is impossible. If you are moved, it will shorten the time you have to live."

"She was lying on the floor. The brakemen had rolled their coats to make her a pillow. She looked about her at the little dingy station, with the stove stained with tobacco in the midst.

"I have but an hour, you tell me?"

"Not more."

"And this is all that is left me of the world. It is not much, doctor," with a half smile.

"The men left the room, and I locked the door, that she might not be disturbed. She threw her arms over her face and lay quite a long time, when she turned on me in a frenzy. "To think of all that I might have done with my money and my time! God wanted me to help the poor and the sick! It's too late now! I've only an hour!" She had not even that, for the exertion proved fatal." The doctor added, "No sermon that I ever heard was like that woman's despairing cry, 'It's too late!'"

But life may be wasted, not merely in trifling or sensual amusements, but in any course of conduct which conflicts with our Saviour's command, "Seek first the kingdom of Heaven and the righteousness thereof." Who can but pity Cardinal Mazarin, the great minister of Louis XIV. It is recorded of him, that when he was near the end of life, a courtier, loitering without leave in the apartments of the sick statesman, heard a slipped foot dragging itself with difficulty along the carpet of an adjoining room, and hastily hid himself behind some tapestry. He saw Mazarin creep feebly in, and gaze around, little suspecting that he was himself being watched. From all sides shone on him the art treasures he had collected—the only objects except wealth and power, he cared for. He looked on them long and regretfully; his eye wandered from picture to picture, from statue to statue, till at last his anguish vented itself in words. "I must leave all that. What pains it cost me to acquire these things! I shall never see them where I am going!" The courtier, Count Louis de Brienne, whose ears caught that dying groan, remembered the speech, and when Mazarin was dead, put it in print, unconsciously as a warning to all those who lay up treasures for themselves, but are not rich toward God.

That the Light of Christ leads those who obey it out of worldly amusements, is shown by the experience of Thomas Chalkley. In his Journal he says, "I remember that, unknown to my parents, I had bought a pack of cards, with intent to make use of them when I went to see my relations in the country. At the time called Christmas I went to see them, and on my way went to a meeting at which a minister of Christ declared against the evil of gaming, and particularly at cards; and that the time which people pretend to keep holy for Christ's sake, many of them spend mostly in wickedness, sports and games. From this meeting at Wanstead I went to the house of my relations, where the parson of the next parish lodged that night, who used to play cards with them sometimes, and the time drawing near that we were to go to our games, my uncle called to the doctor, as he called him, to me, and to my cousin, to come and take a game at cards; at which motion I had strong convictions upon me not to do it, as being evil. And I secretly cried to the Lord to keep me faithful to Him; and lifting up my eyes, I saw a Bible lying in the window, at the sight of which I was glad. I took it, and sat down and read to myself, greatly rejoicing that I was preserved out of the snare. Then my uncle called again, and said, "Come, doctor, you and I, and my wife and daughter, will have a game at cards, for I see my cousin is better disposed." Then he looked upon me, and said, 'he was better disposed also.' So their sport for that time was spoiled, and mine in that practice forever; for I never, as I remember, played with them more, but as soon as I came home offered my new and untouched pack of cards to the fire. And of this I am certain, the use of them is of evil consequence, and draws away the mind from heaven and heavenly things; for which reason all Christians ought to shun them as engines of Satan; and music and dancing having generally the same tendency, ought, therefore, to be refrained from."

An anecdote is told of a young woman, who on her way home from a religious meeting remarked to a companion, that she could not give up the world. A person who heard the remark, told her that if that was the case, she need not attend meetings any more. She might as well attend places of amusement, and be as happy as she could in this world, for it would be the only heaven she would ever have. God had marked out the path of self-denial which all must walk in, who would reach the abodes of blessedness and peace; and if she would not walk in that path, but decided to keep the world, she had better enjoy it while she could; for it was a pity to lose both worlds by being undecided. This view of the matter so impressed her mind, that under the convicting power of Divine grace, she was enabled to forsake her worldly amusements, and give up her heart to the Lord without reserve.

When Dr. Samuel Johnson visited his friend David Garrick, at Hampton Court, the latter showed him his fine house, gardens, statues, pictures, &c. "Ah! David, David," said the Doctor, "these are the things which make a death-bed terrible." Not that the possession of the comforts and conveniences of life is wrong in itself, but whenever the affections and thoughts become absorbed by these things, then the commands of our Saviour are violated, and our treasure is laid up on earth instead of in Heaven.

The feelings of Dr. Johnson on this occasion were probably similar to those of a visitor at the house of a ministering Friend in Philadelphia many years ago, where there was much evidence of luxury and display. In the course of conversation she intimated that she had but little to say in the way of public ministry. "No marvel," thought her visitor, "whilst thou hast so much of the world's glitter about thee. Where is self-denial, simplicity, and the daily cross?"

It requires greater nobleness to have a high standard for one's self than to have it for some one else. It requires greater nobleness to perceive and to emphasize one's own shortcomings than to give prominence to the shortcomings of others. Hence, he who is noblest-minded, and whose nature is most refined, and whose training in well-doing is complete, is ever quickest to see his own mistake, and promptest to apologize for his error.

For "The Friend."

The Late Elizabeth W. Levick.

[The following affectionate tribute to the memory of a beloved mother, by her son, appears to the Editor to contain matter of sufficient interest to some of our readers to justify its insertion in the columns of "The Friend."—Ed.]

Philadelphia, Twelfth Mo. 30th, 1886.

My dear friend,—The simple announcement of the death of my dear mother which appeared in "The Friend" of Twelfth Month 18th, was thus written because of my objection to long obituary notices, often of young persons, which however interesting and grateful to the feelings of near relatives, cannot be so to the general reader.

And yet when the subject of the notice has reached, or has passed four score years and ten, and the life has been characterized all the way along as that of the humble, earnest Christian, it seems as if some more notice should be taken of that life and of its close than is found in the mere record of the age and time of death. Such was the case with my dear mother, and such the case with other aged Friends who recently have been removed from among us.

The twelvemonth just ending has indeed been very fatal to the older members of our Society. Stoddell Stokes in his 99th, my mother in her 98th, Lydia Shipley in her 97th year, and other dear friends who were in age between eighty and ninety years, form a long list of deaths in our little community, and bring now our own generation to the rank of the oldest.

These dear Friends, if not all of them publicly active in the affairs of the church, were strongly attached to its doctrines, and were useful members of the society in which they lived.

But two generations removed from those who witnessed the settlement of these provinces, they had in their character much of that quiet energy which marked their ancestors. From the children and grandchildren of these early Friends they received the guarded education which influenced their long and useful lives.

My mother often spoke very gratefully of the careful training and teaching of Benjamin Kite, whose pupil at the Friends' Charter School she was for many years: of Hannah and Susan Jackson in the old Pine Street Meeting House School, and of Ann Bedford, Ann Gilbert and Elizabeth Pritchard, three English Friends who were much esteemed as teachers at that time. Especially did she love to speak of her old master, Benjamin Kite, whose care in teaching his pupils to commit to memory selections from the best English poets was a source of pleasure to her through life, as it was to her grandchildren and great-grandchildren in her extreme old age.

Were I asked what was the secret of her long and happy life, I would say it was to be found in her implicit faith in the loving kindness and tender mercy of her Heavenly Father. Whatever happened—losses, sickness, death—she never questioned the wisdom or the love of the great Disposer of Events.

At four-score blindness came, but it was borne without murmuring; and when by the Divine blessing, her sight was restored, she gave God the praise. Sudden death came to beloved children, but the words, "The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away blessed be the name of the Lord," were, in each instance on her lips, as they were the language of her heart.

Thus loving her Creator and His creatures—trusting Him always, four score years and ten and nearly ten more were passed, marked by some little physical weakness, but leaving unimpaired her mental powers.

And when at last she fell asleep, it was to a peaceful sleep, without fear,—for, at death, as in life, she knew in Whom she trusted.

Sincerely thy friend,

JAMES J. LEVICK.

Weather Predictions.—Our atmosphere, instead of being level and at rest, is ever moving in great waves from 500 to 1,000 miles apart across the United States with a general easterly course. The summit of the wave we call the area of "high" barometer; the hollow between two crests we call "low." The storm comes as the pressure diminishes, and clearing weather, often with strong north-westerly gales, as the pressure increases.

These "storm centers" or areas of "low barometer," or "low pressure," generally make their appearance just east of the Rocky Mountains, near Helena, in Montana, and move either due east across the great lakes, in which case the storm does not extend south of the Ohio River; south-east, crossing the whole country to the Atlantic, in which case the storm is general; or else southerly to Texas, easterly across the Gulf States, and then northeasterly along the Atlantic coast. The same is true of the "high pressures" and "cold waves," which originate in the same regions and follow the same course.

These all cross the country with varying velocities, taking from two to five days from the Rocky Mountains to the Atlantic. The velocity may vary from hour to hour, or the course may be deflected, or the storm may expend its force before reaching the ocean. Therefore we are constantly dependent on the telegraph to inform us from time to time how the storm is advancing.

Our weather, then, comes from the west, not from the east, and if we know what sort of weather they are having in the Mississippi Valley today we may know what to expect in New York or Washington to-morrow or next day. So that, with the aid of the weather map or the reports from the West we may foretell the weather for one or two, sometimes for three, days ahead with considerable certainty, so that from 75 to 90 per cent. of our predictions will be verified.

At times, either on sea or land, a warning of an approaching storm may save property to an amount greater than the whole annual expense of the Bureau, to say nothing of life and comfort. But beyond this no man living can do anything more than guess what the weather will be for a month or three months or even a week ahead.—J. W. Chickering in Christian Advocate.

Setting the Sea on Fire.—The shores of the Caspian abound in naphtha springs extending for miles under the sea, the imprisoned gases of this volatile substance often escaping from fissures in its bed, and bubbling up in large volumes to the surface. This circumstance has given rise to the practice of "setting the sea on fire," which is thus described by a modern traveller: Hiring a steam barge, we put out to sea, and, after a lengthy search, found at last a suitable spot. Our boat having moved round to the windward, a sailor threw a bundle of burning flax into the sea, when floods of light dispelled the surrounding darkness. No fireworks, no illuminations are to be compared to the sight that presented itself to our gaze. It was as though the sea trembled convulsively amid thousands of shooting, dancing tongues of flame of prodigious size. Now they emerged from the water, now they disappeared. At one time they soared aloft and melted away; at another a gust of wind divided them into bright streaks of flame, the foaming, bubbling billows making music to the scene. In compliance with the wishes of some of the spectators, our barge was steered towards the flames and passed right through the midst of them, a somewhat dangerous experiment, as the barge was employed in the transportation of naphtha, and was pretty well saturated with the fluid. However we escaped without accident, and gazed for an hour longer on the unthought spectacle of a sea on fire.—Moscow Vedomosti.

Feeding Refractory Children.—A boy six years old, and the petted and indulged only child of his parents, became ill with diphtheria, and after several days' illness, when regular and careful feeding and stimulation had become of the utmost importance to support him against the prostration caused by this dreadful disease, he absolutely refused to take any more food. Water he would take, but the moment a cup of milk was presented to him his teeth would clench, and no amount of coaxing or urging or bribing would induce him to open his mouth.

In this emergency, the physician in charge adopted the following plan: While one attendant held the boy's head well back on the pillow and another held his arms, the doctor twisted a piece of writing-paper into a funnel and introduced the small end of it into one of the nostrils. Through this he poured the milk, a tea-spoonful at a time, until a half tea-cupful had in this way been introduced and swallowed.

The device was a double success; it not only fed the child, but it conquered him. He found that taking his food did not depend on his will. When the time for feeding again came he was willing to drink it as he should, nor was any further difficulty experienced in this particular during his illness. The suggestion of the funnel was enough to overcome any hesitation at any time thereafter.—Christian Advocate.

The Old should Avoid Over-exertion.—The disease which caused the death of the late Erastus Brooks at the age of 72, was brought on by straining himself while helping to move some rocks on his estate. His experience confirms the oft-repeated lesson, that elderly people should guard against violent and unusual exertion. A young man may do with safety what would be attended with serious risk in one further advanced in years.

Bayard Taylor on kindness to Animals.—In the first place animals have much more capacity to understand human speech, than is generally supposed. Hindoos invariably talk to their elephants, and it is amazing how much the latter comprehend. The Arabs govern their camels with a few cries, and my associates in the African desert were almost amused whenever I addressed a remark to the big dromedary who was my property for two months; yet at the end of that time the beast evidently knew the meaning of a number of simple sentences. Some years ago seeing the hippopotamus in Barnum's Museum looking very stolid and dejected, I spoke to him in English, but he did not even move his eyes. Then I went to the opposite corner of the cage, and said in Arabic, "I know you, come here to me!" He instantly turned his head toward me; I repeated the words, and thereupon he came to the corner where I was standing, pressed his huge, ungainly head against the bars of the cage, and looked in my face with a touching delight while I stroked his muzzle.

quiet speech exercises upon the savage dog. A distinguished English poet told me that he was once walking in the country with Canon Kingsley, when they passed a lodge where an immense and fierce mastiff, confined by a long chain rushed out upon him. They were just beyond his reach, but the chain did not seem secure the poet would have hurried past, but Kingsley laying a hand upon his arm said, "Wait a moment and see me subdue him!" Thereupon he walked up to the dog, who, erect upon his hind feet with open jaws and glaring eyes, was the embodiment of animal fury. Kingsley lifted his hand, and quietly said, "You have made a mistake; you must go back to your kennel!" The dog sank down upon his fore feet, but still growled angrily; the Canon repeated his word in a firm voice, advancing step by step as the dog gave way. He continued speaking grave reproof, as to a human being, until he had forced the mastiff back into his kennel, where the latter silently and perhaps remorsefully, lay down.

The extent to which a horse also may be taught to understand speech, is not generally known. The simple fact that he likes to be talked to makes him attentive to the sounds, and I am convinced that in a great many cases he has an impression of the meaning. I have at present a horse who had served his country during the war, and came to me only after its close. His experience while on scouting service made him very suspicious of any grey object, as I soon discovered; he would shy at a fallen log in a thicket, a glimpse of a mossy rock, or a laborer's coat left in a fence corner. By stopping him whenever this happened, and telling him, in an assuring tone, that there was nothing to fear, he was very soon completely cured of the habit.

The affection and fidelity of the horse have always been admitted. My first acquaintance with these qualities was singular enough to be related. When a boy of fourteen, I was walking along a lonely country road, with a companion of the same age, and came upon an old grey horse, standing in the middle of the track, over a man who was lying upon his back. We hastened up to give assistance, but presently saw that the man, instead of being injured, was simply drunk. He had tumbled off, on his way home from the tavern, and a full bottle of whiskey, jolted out of his pocket in falling, lay by his side.

The fore feet of the horse were firmly planted on the side of his neck, and the hind feet on each side of his legs. This position seeming to us dangerous for the man, we took the animal by the bridle and attempted to draw him away; but he resisted with all his strength, snorting, laying back his ears, and giving every other sign of anger. It was apparent that he had carefully planted himself so as completely to protect his master against any passing vehicle. We assisted the faithful creature in the only possible way, by pouring the whiskey into the dust, and left him until help could be summoned. His act indicated not only affection, involving a sense of duty, but also more than one process of reasoning.

My horse had a playful habit of snapping at my arm when he was harnessed for a drive. I always talk to a horse before starting, as a matter of common politeness. Of course, I never flinched, and his teeth often grazed my sleeve as he struck them together. One day, more than a dozen years ago, he was in rather restless spirits and snapped a little too vigorously, catching my arm actually in his jaws. I scarcely felt the bite, but I was very much surprised. The horse, however, showed such unmistakable signs of regret and distress that I simply said, "Never do that again!" And he never did. From that moment he gave up the habit of years; he laid back his ears, or feigned anger in other ways, but he never again made believe to bite.

—The Tract Repository.—David Heston has published his report of this useful periodical for the year 1886. It was originally and especially designed for the benefit of the colored people of the South; and the monthly issues are sent to them at a subscription price of seven cents a year. "This amount the colored people were advised they could pay if they found it convenient to do so; but if not, and they desired it, it was agreed to charge the subscriptions to the Tract Repository Fund, which was set apart for this purpose. While nearly all appeared leirous of having the paper sent them as heretofore, the wish to have their subscriptions paid from the Fund was also quite general."

The report further states:

"Cheering evidences continue to come to hand from time to time that the seed sown in giving circulation to The Tract Repository has not been in vain, but that decided good has resulted in some instances, especially among the children and young persons in whose hands it has chiefly fallen.

"Will our friends still co-operate by contributing the funds necessary to enable the publisher to send out an edition of 10,000 copies? The paper can be placed before probably 50,000 colored people each month. The average monthly edition during the year was 9120 copies. The circulation has been mainly confined to South Carolina, North Carolina, Virginia, Arkansas, Georgia, Florida, Texas, Alabama and Maryland, in the order named is to quantity, South Carolina receiving much the largest number of copies. Scattering copies have also been sent to nearly all the States, both to colored persons and to those of our friends who are interested in distributing the paper in their respective neighborhoods.

"The Receipts and Expenditures for the year have been as follows:

—Laws Affecting Marriage.—At a meeting of Presbyterian ministers in Philadelphia, it was reported that the number of divorces granted in that city had increased from 187 in 1881, to 274 in 1885. To correct the evils growing out of the present laws on his subject, it was proposed to make an effort to repeal all laws allowing divorce for any offence except marital infidelity; and in such cases the guilty party not to be allowed to marry again during the life of the plaintiff. In lieu of divorce for cruelty, separation for a limited time to be substituted, with a provision for the support of the wife by the husband.

—Decay of Family Life.—The Christian Advocate quotes the following paragraph from an English paper: "The attention, sympathies, and energies of the family are all claimed by engagements that take them from home. Almost every night brings a meeting of some kind. Concerts, lectures, classes, emperance meetings, missions in endless variety and exhausting continuity, crowd every evening in the week. The members of the family go divergent ways, as their various pursuits and hobbies lead them. They meet only at hurried meals. Their life knows no repose, and their very happiness becomes dependent upon external excitement. An evening without an engagement, finding them with a home pursuit, is felt to be tedious and all but unportable." On this it makes the comments:—"The description of the state of things of London applies to thousands of families in this country. Let it be carefully read, and the happier they will be who do not find it a description of their ways of living. Wise will those be who, finding it a true description, at once lay the ax of common sense at the root of such a poisonous tree."

—The Negro Population of Kansas.—J. L. Hulbut in writing to the Christian Advocate of the effects of "prohibition" in Kansas, says: "I was especially impressed with the improved condition of one class, the colored people, who were dropped down upon Kansas so suddenly and so strangely in 'the Negro exodus' a few years ago. They came literally in want, without money, without clothing, without shelter, and without food. In nearly all instances the first meals which they ate in Kansas were provided by charity. But for the first time in the life of many of them they found work at fair wages, paid every week. Some of them have been idle and improvident, but at least ten thousand of them now own the little houses in which they live. Any one who will ride through the suburb of Topeka, where several thousands of them dwell, and compare their past and present condition, cannot fail to see one benefit of Prohibition."

—A Race of Turkish Christians.—In the beginning of the year 1886, Dr. Porjakow found two old decayed grave-yards with numerous grave-stones, many of which bore a cross and other chiseled inscriptions, near the ruins of a fortress in the north east of Kokand, and west of the Chinese frontier. Some of the tombstones, and photographs and copies of the inscriptions were forwarded to St. Petersburg. A report upon them to the Royal Academy of Sciences at St. Petersburg, says that the inscriptions are in the Syria-Nestorian language, and bear dates from the beginning of the ninth to the middle of the fourteenth century. They are regarded as proving that at that early date the Nestorians had succeeded in converting to the Christian faith the Turkish population which dwelt in those remote regions.

—Westtown Boarding School.—This school was opened, as expected, on the 4th instant, and the scholars assembled very promptly. At the meeting of the Committee in charge, held on the 7th instant, the number of students expected for the present session, was reported to be about 225, nearly all of whom were then at the school. As the session will be seven weeks shorter than usual, owing to the delay in opening, special arrangements had been made to prevent a derangement of the classes, by increasing the hours devoted to recitations, shortening exercises, and omitting the public examination at the close of the session; as well as by making a slight curtailment in the studies to be gone over during the session.

Additional subscriptions to the Building Fund, since the last stated meeting of the Committee, of over $36,000 were reported. The whole expenditure involved in the erection of the new buildings thus far is about $210,000. It is probable that about $90,000 more will be required for the completion of the improvements. Towards this, there are money and subscriptions of about $55,000, leaving a balance of $35,000 yet to be raised. It was thought to be very desirable to proceed promptly with the removal of the old building, and the erection of the girls' wing (who are now crowded into the central new building); but the authority given by the Yearly Meeting did not authorize the incurring of indebtedness, or encroaching on the invested funds of the institution. So, a minute was made authorizing the Building Committee to enter into a contract, and proceed with the work as fast as the resources at their command would justify. It was hoped that as the building progressed the needful funds would be provided by the continued liberality of the friends of the school.

THE FRIEND.

FIRST MONTH 15, 1887.

The discussions which of latter times have been going on in some parts of the Society of Friends about the introduction of "Ordinances," show the wisdom of that caution which has long been felt in the more conservative portions of it, against encouraging and fully opening the way for the visits of ministers who are not soundly attached to its primitive doctrines and testimonies. This caution may have seemed to some in time past, as narrow-minded and intolerant. But the course of events has fully justified it, and indeed emphasized the importance of greater care in this respect than has heretofore been exercised.

The Star and Crown of Indianapolis in its issue of Eleventh Month 17th, argued earnestly against that "toleration" which would permit "revolutionizing teachers to sow seeds of disunity. It says:—"To unsettle in the Scriptural faith of the church, it is not necessary that the teaching should be public. The most subtle, and often the most effectual, is the private teaching in the homes of those whose confidence and Christian sympathy have been won by public preaching, apparently clear from these innovations." "The church that allows [toleration,] when an attack is made upon its standard doctrines may prove suicidal to its own interests."

These remarks of the Star and Crown are directed against those who advocate the introduction of the outward "ordinances" (so called) into our Society. We believe them to be just and true; and that some parts of the Society of Friends, have suffered loss from the visits of persons who were disposed to urge upon those with whom they came in contact, views of doctrine or practical measures not in harmony with our principles. But is the line of argument of the Star and Crown to be confined to "ordinance" advocates? Is it not equally applicable to that class of revival preachers, who teach other doctrines contrary to those maintained by Friends in the beginning?

The Western Friend for the Eleventh Month, regards the effort to introduce the use of the outward ordinances into the Society of Friends, as merely "the last act, the finishing touch, the culmination of the system of doctrine, which has been substituted for the original faith of Friends." We believe this view is correct; and that there has been a gradual departure by many from the fundamental doctrine of our Society, which was a belief in the inward manifestation of the Spirit of Christ, as that which alone reveals to the soul its true condition, raises it into spiritual life, gives power to forsake evil, and effects its practical redemption from the pollutions of sin.

If this is so, how unwise is it to permit the advocates of doctrines more outward and less spiritual, to sow the seeds of change and of disunity, without check or restraint!

We hope there are yet preserved in every branch of the Society of Friends, even in those bodies which have sanctioned measures and preachers not in harmony with its principles, many individuals to whom the Truth is precious, and who mourn over the weakness and degeneracy so apparent. Some of these may feel that thus far they have done what was required of them in opposing the innovations that have been made; but there are others who may have lost strength through a false tenderness and an unwise toleration of what ought to have been openly resisted.

We believe this was the case years ago in Canada, where at that time there were many elderly Friends who appeared to be attached to our doctrines and testimonies. But instead of exercising that restraining authority which the Truth would have given them, they permitted visitors from abroad to mislead their young people, and sow the evil seeds which after a time produced the bitter fruits which have since developed there.

That the ministry which produced such fruits was a spurious ministry is evident from the text laid down by our Saviour himself: "Men do not gather grapes of thorns"—neither do fig trees produce thistles. Even true words do not make a true ministry, if they are uttered in the will of man and without the anointing power of the Lord, which only can enable anyone to minister in the life and power of Truth. If this were abode in and kept to, these troubles would not spring up, for the Holy Head of the Church is not the author of discordant views, but of peace in all the churches, where his dominion and power are established. It is by being baptized by the one Spirit into the one body, that the members come to be settled on the one sure Foundation.

But where a ministry is permitted, which springs from the will and reason of man, which takes up certain views of doctrine, and then searches the Scripture for texts to support it; in such cases the true Guide having been lost, confusion and discord are likely to be the result.

We have received from Nathan Pinson, of Danville, Ind., a short account of an aged Indian woman, of whom, he says, many readers of "The Friend" [in the West] have some knowledge. The remarkable age to which she is said to have reached, renders her case one of interest. The letter of N. P. states—

"We notice in the columns of the Baxter Springs News, (Kansas,) a notice of the death of an "O-tawa" Indian woman aged one hundred and nineteen years. She was generally known as Grandmother King. She said she could remember when the unfortunate whites, when captured by her race, were burned at the stake.

In company with some others, I had the pleasure of conversing with Grandmother King about two months ago, at her own house. She was then in delicate health; she was aware her end was near at hand, and seemed entirely resigned to her lot. She said she prayed every morning and every night, and asked an interest in our prayers."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—On the 4th instant, an express train and a freight train on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad collided about two o'clock in the morning, on a curve about seven miles from Tiffin, Ohio, and both trains were wrecked. The telescoped cars caught fire from the stoves, and many of the passengers, who were not killed outright, were burned to death. Seventeen persons lost their lives.

Representative Tillman of South Carolina, has introduced a bill in the House of Representatives, to prevent the destruction of human life by fire in railroad accidents, forbids the use, in mail or passenger cars, of any stove or heating apparatus containing inflammable substance, except illuminating gas. The bill also requires the cars to be heated by steam and lighted by gas or electricity, and to carry saws, hammers and other tools for wrecking purposes. It provides for the punishment of railroad directors who neglect to observe its provisions.

The German ship Elizabeth, from Hamburg for Baltimore, was wrecked on the Virginia coast, near the Little Island Life-saving Station, fourteen miles south of Cape Henry, before daylight on the morning of the 8th instant. Two life boats were sent out to the vessel and took the crew on board. On the return to the shore both boats were capsized and all the occupants were drowned, except two of the life savers. One of these is not expected to recover. The latest estimate of the number lost is 27.

Earthquake shocks were felt at Summerville, S. C., on the 4th, 5th, and 10th instants. At Charleston, on the same State, on the 4th and 10th. At Patge, Texas, on the 5th, and at Westminster, Maryland, on the 2d, 3d and 4th instants.

It is feared that large numbers of cattle in Montana have been killed by the intense cold.

A despatch from Leavenworth, Kansas, says Attorney General Bradford has compromised the case brought under the Prohibitory law against Jacob Law, a saloon keeper. Law has agreed to close his place and remove his stock. It is said to be the first successful closing of a saloon in that city.

After several days' trial, a jury at New Bedford, Massachusetts, on the 8th instant, under the Civil Damage act, gave John O'Connell a verdict of $6300 for the sale of liquor to his wife. O'Connell's son and daughter testified to the purchase of liquor for their mother from Fifth to Eleventh Month, 1854. A physician testified that during that time she was at the point of death with delirium tremens. The wife and mother testified that every day she drank from a pint to a quart of whiskey, even during her serious illness. The law permits the recovery of $100 for every sale.

In the Missouri Legislature, on the 7th instant, a concurrent resolution was introduced in both branches providing for the submission of the question of the prohibition of the sale of intoxicating beverages to a popular vote.

John Roach, the great ship-builder, died on the morning of the 10th instant, in New York, aged 70 years. He was a native of Ireland.

It is stated that a grower of cranberries in Camden County, N. J., gathered ten thousand bushels of berries during the past season from his bogs in Waterford.

The receipts of the Philadelphia Post-office for the year ending Twelfth Mo. 31st, 1886, were $1,695,097.63, and the disbursements, $360,586.47. The receipts for 1886 show an increase of $130,620.06 over 1885. The receipts from the money order business for 1886 were $3,968,268.73, making the total receipts $5,664,367.36.

According to the returns made to the Board of Health, the deaths in Philadelphia from First Mo. 2d, 1886, to First Mo. 1st, 1887, numbered 20,003, a decrease of 1001 from 1885. Of the total number 4860 were under 1 year of age, 7 from 100 to 110 years, and 1 from 110 to 120 years. There were 79 deaths from alcoholism, 427 from Bright's disease, 495 from cancers, 328 from casualties, 2835 from consumption of the lungs, 837 from convulsions, 681 from cholera infantum, 770 from diseases of the heart, 93 from drowning, 626 from typhoid fever, 639 from inflammation of the brain, 1417 from inflammation of the lungs, 830 from marasmus, 775 from old age.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 409, which was 43 less than during the previous week, and 35 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing 209 were males and 200 females; 67 died of consumption; 46 of pneumonia; 20 of crop; 18 of inflammation of the brain; 18 of bronchitis; 21 of diseases of the heart; 16 of debility; 16 of apoplexy; 14 of convulsions, and 11 of typhoid fever.

Cotton was quiet but firm, at 9½ a 9¼ cts. for middling uplands, the latter for time sales.

Petroleum was dull and unchanged, at 6½ cts. for 70 Abel test in barrels, and 5½ cts. for 110 test in cases.

Feed supplies were fair, with a limited inquiry at former rates, viz: Bran, western winter, spot, per ton, $17 a $17½; bran, spring, spot, $16 a $16.50; red middlings, $16 a $17; white middlings, $18 a $20.

Flour and Meal.—Trade in flour was slow and prices less firm. Sales of 125 barrels Ohio, clear, at $4.25; 250 barrels do., straight, at $4.50; 375 barrels winter patent, at $4.90 a $5; 125 barrels Minnesota, clear, at $4.25, and 500 barrels do., patent, at $5.15 a $5.25. Rye flour sold in a small way at $3.25 per barrel for choice.

Grain.—Wheat was quiet, No. 2 red closing at 91½ cts. bid and 91¼ cts. asked. Rye was dull at 57 a 58 cts. per bushel. Corn was steady; No. 2 mixed closing at 43½ cts. bid, and 46 cts. asked. Oats reflected no material change; and No. 2 white closing at 35½ cts. bid and 35½ cts. asked.

White potatoes, per bushel—Early Rose, choice, 55 a 58 cts.; Early Rose, fair to good, 48 a 53 cts.; White Stars, choice, 53 a 55 cts.; White Stars, fair to good, 45 a 50 cts.; Burbanks, choice, 53 a 55 cts.; Burbanks, fair to good, 45 a 50 cts.; Hebrons, choice, 50 a 53 cts.; Hebrons, fair to good, 45 a 48 cts.; Mammoth Pearl, choice, 50 a 55 cts.; Mammoth Pearl, fair to good, 45 a 48 cts.; Peerless, as to quality, 45 a 50 cts.

Beef cattle were unchanged, viz: extra, 5½ cts.; good, 5½ a 5½ cts.; medium, 4½ a 5 cts.; common, 3 a 4½ cts.

Sheep were unchanged, viz: extra, 5½ cts.; good, 5 a 5½ cts.; medium, 4½ a 4½ cts.; common, 3 a 4 cts.; lambs, 4 a 7 cts.

Hogs were ¼c. higher, viz: 7 a 7½ cts. Milch cows were dull, at $25 a $60. Fat cows were unchanged at 2½ a 4½ cts. Milch calves were active at 5 a 8 cts.

FOREIGN.—The composition of the new British Cabinet is announced as follows: Lord Salisbury, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; W. H. Smith, First Lord of the Treasury; G. J. Goschen, Chancellor of the Exchequer; Edward Stanhope, Secretary of State for War and the Colonies; Henry Holland, Secretary of State for the Colonies. There is no change in the other Cabinet offices.

Negotiations between Joseph Chamberlain and John Morley are tending toward an agreement on the Land Bill on the basis of Chamberlain's former proposals to limit the operations of the bill to the purchase of the smaller holdings, thus requiring a total capital guaranteed by the Imperial Exchequer, of £25,000,000. The differences as to the functions and powers of the proposed Irish Parliament continue.

The fifty-six men who were arrested in Ireland last summer for resisting the collection of rent and eviction on the Clanricarde estates at Woodford, County Galway have been sentenced to various terms of imprisonment ranging from twelve to eighteen months. The Judge who delivered the sentence censured the Inspectors of Police and the two Magistrates for allowing the rioting, and declared that no Chief Secretary for Ireland or Under Secretary and no Inspector General should be justified in giving orders to the police for assisting the Sheriff in making evictions or carrying out the processes of laws for the collection of rents due.

The receipts of the French Treasury for 1886 show a decrease of 32,000,000 francs, as compared with the receipts of 1885, and a deficiency of 71,000,000 francs as compared with the amount estimated in the budget for 1886.

French engineers have under consideration a plan of constructing a ship canal from the Mediterranean to the Persian Gulf. It would shorten the route to Asia by three days, and open up a new country to trade.

A despatch from Vienna, dated the 4th instant, says Russia has suggested as a basis for negotiations between the signatories to the Berlin treaty for the settlement of the Bulgarian question, that the Bulgarian Regent resign; that two new sobjranje be elected for Bulgaria only; that two Zankoffites be admitted to the Bulgarian Cabinet; that Prince Nicholas of Mingrelia be proposed to the new sobjranje for the Bulgarian rulership, and that an ordinary Provincial Assembly be convoked for Roumelia.

Advices from Vienna say that the influence exercised by Prince Bismarck is having the effect of smoothing the relations between Austria and Russia.

Tunis, First Mo. 7th.—The village of Djemel was severely shaken by an earthquake to-day. A number of houses fell down and seven persons were killed and a number hurt.

During last month 700 cases of cholera and 352 deaths were reported in Buenos Ayres, South America.

A telegram from Lima says that, in consequence of the closing of Peruvian ports against vessels from Chili (on account of the cholera), the wheat supply from that country has ceased, and in order to meet the demand for wheat the municipality have been authorized to take steps to have the necessary supply brought from California.

A Special Meeting of the Indian Committee occurred on the 14th instant, at 10 o'clock.

Twelfth Mo. 17th, 1843. In our meeting this morning, I sat, I suppose, for half an hour in great poverty of spirit; "I abhorred myself," truly I may say, in dust and ashes, feeling as "a worm and no man." Still through all, my eye was turned towards Him, who is the alone helper of his people: when finally strength was once more given, secretly to plead for a deepening in true vital religion; and that I may be prepared, through whatever suffering necessary, to bear my portion in the church militant, if it be only a silent sufferer with the Lord's suffering seed, which truly is in suffering in this day of treading down. So that I feel as though I could say with the mournful Prophet formerly, "Oh! that my head were waters, and mine eyes a fountain of tears, that I might weep day and night for the slain of the daughter of my people." At the close of our meeting we were made to feel very sad, feeling death was again about entering our dwelling. One of the little boys who had been ill for the last two weeks with scarlet fever, was taken increasingly ill, and to all appearance his end just at hand. About half an hour after meeting closed, he was quietly released from all his sufferings, which had indeed been great. I humbly trust to him the change has been a happy one. His bereaved parents are much to be felt for; neither of them with him at the time. This unexpected blow has cast a gloom over our little world. Would that it might so dwell with the dear children, as well as the rest of us, as to stimulate to fresh diligence to be found making our calling and election sure, before we, too, be summoned hence to be seen of men no more.

24th. Our friend William Evans, attended our meetings both morning and afternoon. In both of which he was engaged in testimony; powerfully so, I thought, particularly in our morning meeting. His concern seemed principally for the children; and a very awakening all went forth to some among them. Surely here could not have been one present but must have felt it. In our afternoon meeting, several of our precious testimonies were revived, and excellent counsel given, particularly respecting the use of the plain language, bringing forth many Scripture passages to show it was the language of our blessed Lord and Master, and his apostles.

30th. Some hovering of good this morning.

Keep quiet, oh my soul, with thy eye singly staid on Him, who remains to be the alone sure helper of his people. May it please Him, in his boundless love and mercy, more and more to anoint my eyes to see the way wherein He would have me to go, both as relates to my spiritual and temporal life. If I do know my own heart, there is a willingness to be anywhere and anything He would have me to be. I am sensible my outward path here is an easy one to the creature; and if there has been a settling down at ease under it, lay thy hand, thy chastening hand, more and more heavily upon me. Spoil every pleasant picture, that thou alone may be exalted.

First Mo. 21st, 1844. Oh thou, who alone knowest the secret travail and exercise of thy depending ones, look with an eye of compassion on thy poor child, who does desire above every thing else to be found serving thee faithfully; and in the way which is most consistent with thy blessed will, whether it be in doing or suffering, for thy name's sake. Anoint mine eye to see, both spiritually and temporally, the way wherein thou wouldest have me to go, and I will follow if it only bring me out of this Egyptian darkness. Thou hast been pleased, this day, in thy matchless love and mercy, once more to enable me to lift up my cry unto thee, with secret sighs and tears. Be pleased, moreover, to have respect unto the vocal supplication that was poured forth this morning, to which, I humbly trust, many of our spirits could say, amen. Dear Sarah Emlen fervently interceded, that our hearts might be purified, so that acceptable prayer might arise. That every thing which was defiling might be cast out. That He would enter with the whip of small cords, and would overthrow the table of money changers, &c. Then, oh! how sweetly did she plead for the little fearful ones whose hearts were poured out as water, and who were afraid of offending either in thought or word; that He would turn his hand upon such, and raise up a David as from the sheep cote, and a Deborah to stand as a mother in Israel.

25th. Week-day meeting has just closed. It was held in silence. During which, a little ability was afforded secretly to crave a further manifestation of the Divine will concerning me. I have felt of latter time, as if my little labors here, at Westtown, were nearly done. But, that it may please my Heavenly Father to grant a clearer evidence, is my secret petition by night and by day.

Second Mo. 6th. Since last note, I have proceeded so far in the concern above-mentioned, as to inform the Superintendents, and my sister teachers, as well as friends at home, that my prospect is to leave this place the coming spring, if way should open with the Committee. Since this subject has been pressing heavily, it has appeared to me as if this would be a right step.

12th. Four committee Friends, viz: William Evans, Joseph Snowden, Hannah Warrington and Elizabeth Pierson, left this morning. Their company and labors have tended both to comfort and encourage. In our morning meeting H. Warrington was constrained to call upon the children in a very feeling manner to give heed to the reproofs of instruction, which are the way to life. To those who were endeavoring to attend to this witness for Truth in their own breasts, a very encouraging language flowed. Saying that as there was a following on, they would know their "peace to flow as a river, and their righteousness as the waves of the sea." A solemn warning went forth to those, who were time after time slighting those gentle reproofs, and turning a deaf ear. These were reminded that the Lord's Spirit would not always strive with man, and to such as had wandered far astray, a precious invitation was extended to return, while the arms of their Heavenly Father were open to receive them. In our evening collection, when addressing some of the visited ones, she desired them to remain in a waiting state; so as to be ready, like Mary, when the Master came and called, to "rise up quickly." In our afternoon meeting, dear W. Evans was drawn to speak comfortably to a state or states present, quoting: "Why art thou cast down, O my soul! and why art thou disquieted within me? Hope thou in God, for I shall yet praise Him, who is the health of my countenance and my God." He seemed to think there was no need to be cast down or disquieted; that these were necessary baptisms, to preserve from a form without life: with more very encouraging. After which, a very solemn warning went forth to a worldly, miserly spirit; to some who were worshipping, as it were, their gods of silver and gold. Representing that these perishing things had the uppermost place in their affections, and that their earth had got above the heavens. These, he said, were poor; but they were not the Lord's poor. They had made themselves so; and were shown what such a state would inevitably land in, if not turned from. It was a very solemn communication, and O! saith my soul, may it not return void; but accomplish that whereto it has been sent. Whether or not, the Lord will be clear, and his poor servants.

19th. Attended Concord Quarterly Meeting, in great weakness: having no strength to approach the mercy seat, till near the close of the last meeting; when the fountain of the great deep was broken up, and tears were poured forth, accompanied with silent secret intercessions, that the great work of the soul's salvation may be keeping pace with the day; and that I may know more and more a travelling in spirit with the true travelling seed. Can I not in sincerity appeal unto thee, O Heavenly Father! that there is nothing I desire more, than the prosperity of the blessed Truth in the earth. Therefore, if in any way I can be instrumental in advancing it, do by and through me as consistent with thy blessed will. It must be alone by and through thee, for thou only knowest the limited capacity of thy poor child. But, praised be thy ever worthy name, thou often works through very poor and feeble instruments. Therefore fit me, oh dearest Father, for the smallest stone in thy building. Had the company of our friends, Dougan and Asenath Clark, from Carolina, now on their way to England on a religious visit.

Both were engaged acceptably in testimony in our first meeting. In the last meeting our dear friend, Sarah Eulen, in a weighty manner, laid before us a concern, which had rested upon her mind for years, to pay a visit, in the love of the everlasting gospel, to Friends and others of Great Britain and Ireland. Stating that it felt very awful to lay it before her Friends in her present delicate state of health. A very precious covering pervaded the meeting after our friend opened her concern; and after a season of stillness, much unity and sympathy were expressed. Elizabeth Stroud, from Wilmington, said the language that had arisen in her mind was, "Loose her and let her go," then would her "light break forth out of obscurity, and her darkness be as the noon-day." I understand that when she opened it in the men's meeting, D. Clark revived something similar; quoting our Saviour's words when He called Lazarus forth out of the grave, who came bound hand and foot in grave clothes: "Loose him and let him go," which seemed to be the prevailing feeling in both meetings. She produced a certificate from Chester Monthly Meeting, which was endorsed by this.

My Favorite Swamp.

On the 4th of Tenth Month, I again wandered into the tangled mass of vegetation which clothed this retreat. One or two slight frosts had occurred, but not sufficient to injure any but the more delicate plants; or to affect the foliage of the trees. Yet I observed a maple in full leaf, on one of the branches of which the leaves had changed to red, contrasting prettily with the general green of the tree. This change is connected with the decay of life in the leaf. Shortly before its fall, a delicate layer of cells starts from the side of the leaf stem and as it grows separates the leaf from the general circulation of sap in the plant. This arrests the vital functions of the leaf, which ceases to absorb carbonic acid, decompose it, appropriate the carbon, and give out the oxygen it contained—the process which is going on during its period of life and growth.

The oxygen of the surrounding air now acts on the green matter of the leaves, no longer protected by the existence of life; and it is changed into yellow or red, by a process of slow combustion. This often takes place in one limb of a tree before others are affected—as was the case in the maple I saw. In evergreens, such as Pines and Spruces, no transverse cells are formed to cut off the leaves from the general circulation of the plant.

Most of the Golden-rods (Solidago) had passed the time of their greatest beauty, but there were still some of them, of which the poet could say:

"When I the sunshine of thy bloom behold,
And pluck and bear thee home with fond caress,
I am the richer for thy lavishness.
Thy Midas touch hath turned the land to gold
For me to have and hold."

The ripened seeds of many had taken the place of the yellow blossoms, and these had an interest of their own, as well as the fruit of several other species of compound flowers,—Asters, Wild Sun-Flowers, &c. Where the florets had once stood, closely packed in the common envelope, now were to be found the seeds similarly packed side by side, each with its crown of silky plumes, such as every one is familiar with in the thistle, and dandelion, and which aids the wind in scattering the loosened seeds over the land.

Similar to the down of these plants, but more abundant, silky, and beautiful, were the long tufts attached to the seeds of the Milk Weed or Wild Cotton (Aselepias), contained in the pods of the orange-flowered species (A. Tuberosa), and of a pink species (A. incarnata). Remembering the wishes of one of my young friends, I gathered a number of the pods, the contents of which she intended to form into globular clusters of silky plumes, beautiful to behold.

Equally curious were the long, slender, curved pods, which hung in pairs, like diminutive elephant's tusks, from the end of the branches of another plant bearing a milky juice—a species of Dog-bane (Apocynum). I had never met with them before; and was interested on opening one to find it filled with slender seeds, and a fine, silky down similar to that in the Milk Weed pods.

The leaves of this Apocynum were also of peculiar interest, from the manner in which the veins or ribs on the under side stood out from the body of the leaf, and from the transparent hairs which lined them, and which the microscope showed to be tubular.

After emerging from the swamp, a glance at my clothing showed that there are other ways besides parachutes of down, by which seeds may be widely distributed. Adhering to the cloth were scores, perhaps hundreds, of seed-vessels, mostly the flat pods of the Desmodiums, (which grew abundantly in that place) which are thickly clad with fine hooks which take so firm a hold of the fibres of wool, that they will remain fastened to it for days, unless forcibly removed. There were a few also the seeds of the Beggar's-ticks, (Bidens). In these, the plumes which crown the seeds of the Golden-rod and Thistle, are changed into two arms or spear-like projections, armed with sharp reversed points. So it is easy for them to penetrate, but more difficult to withdraw.

Late as the season was, the swamp was not altogether destitute of flowers. The small white star-flower (Aster) was there; and the beautiful closed Gentian (Geniuna saponaria) showed its clusters of large blue flowers at the summit of the stems, and in the axils of the leaves.

Several of the leaves of a pin-oak tree on the border of the woodland were dotted with small round balls of the size of a large pea. They were almost woody in texture, and on being cut open, were found to contain in the centre the grub of a gall-fly, which provides for its offspring by stinging the leaf of the tree where its eggs are deposited. This causes a diversion of the sap from its natural course and produces a swelling or gallnut in which the young insect passes the earlier stage of its existence, fed by the juices of the plant; which thus provides it both house and nourishment.

For "The Friend."

A Call to Prepare for Death, and sincere desires for the welfare of the Militant Church, and Zion's Travellers.

All flesh is as grass; the grass withereth and the flower fadeth, but the truth of the Lord endureth forever, and his tender mercies are over all his works. It is by and through Him that we live, and move, and have our being. Hath He not frequently caused the alarm to be sounded, "Prepare to meet thy God, oh Israel." The all-important query ariseth, Do we heed the alarm? Do we experience our day's work to be going on with the day? Are our houses set in order, having our lamps trimmed, and oil in our vessels, with our lights burning, and we awaiting the signal for the dissolution of these houses of clay; and humbly trusting that we may be permitted to enter a house prepared for us, not made with hands, eternal in the heavens, in that blessed enclosure whose walls are salvation, and whose gates are praise; in that city that needeth not the light of the sun by day, nor of the moon and stars by night, for the Lord God and the Immaculate Lamb are the light thereof; and that we may have a right to the tree of life, which is in the midst of the Paradise of God.

Whilst meditating, the fire burned within me, and the language of David, the great Psalmist of Israel, seemed applicable, "Lord make me to know mine end, and the measure of my days: what it is; that I may know how frail I am."

God so loved us that He gave his only begotten Son a sacrifice for our sins; and not for ours only but for the sins of the whole world. And it is unto Him that every knee must bow, and every tongue confess: for there is no other name given under Heaven, nor amongst men, whereby we can be saved, but by the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth.

Strait is the gate and narrow is the way that leadeth unto Life. It is the path the vulture's eye hath never seen, the lion's whelps have never trod, nor the fierce lion passed thereon. It is the path that leads to true peace; all true believers walk in that path, let them belong to what sect they may. Many, very many, are the alluring enticements to draw the hearts of the children of men away from the true fold; the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, the pride of life, and riches "especially." They who sow to the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption. They who sow to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting: sow to the Spirit, not to the flesh. As we bear the cross and deny the flesh, we shall be able to receive the second man Christ Jesus, who is King of kings and Lord of lords. They who have become possessors of a very great abundance of the things of this world, are in danger of having their spiritual eye blinded therewith, and of neglecting to procure for themselves Heavenly treasure—the true peace—comparable to which the riches and honors of this world are but dirt. It is for these, in a great measure, that sorrow has arisen in my heart, in reflecting that some who have no apparent need are daily laboring for that meat that perisheth, instead of laying up for themselves incorruptible treasure in Heaven. For so the soul becomes dry and barren, and their spiritual eye becomes dimmed, and they are not able to discern the things that belong to their peace.

I believe there are many, scattered up and down, who are of the true fold, and know the voice of their Divine Master, who have gone mourning on their way, and whose locks have become white with age. For such as these the prayer of my heart goeth forth, that the remaining days of their pilgrimage may be crowned with peace, and that the great Shepherd of Israel will enable them to sing praise unto his ever excellent, worthy and adorable name, on the banks of deliverance; and that they may become as pillars in the house of the Lord our God, who may go no more out. The Lord will not leave nor forsake any of his flock who put their trust in Him.

Let none of us be found trifling with Omnipotence, for God will not be mocked. We cannot serve two masters, we will love the one and hate the other, or cling to the one and despise the other: we cannot serve God and Mammon. Then let us in humility try to serve God, and seek his honor only.

I trust it is under a feeling sense of my own unworthiness, these lines are written. Great weakness and prostration of soul I have experienced whilst engaged herein; and I think I can truly say I have nothing to depend upon for support but the Divine Arm of Him in whom are the issues of life and death, and through whom his dependent children are enabled to look upon Jerusalem, a quiet habitation, none of whose cords shall ever be broken, nor any of the stakes thereof removed. And my sincere desire is that our hearts may be filled with his Divine love and grace, which is sufficient for all.

A LOVER OF THE TRUTH.

9th. First day of the week. Arose this morning with a sense of the Lord's goodness. We had told our friend, John Luke, we [were] desirous to have a meeting to-day at his house as the most convenient place at present, which he readily made offer of, and sent, I believe, to most of the descendants of Friends that are in town, and some in the country. Most of [those] in town and some from several miles distant, with some others, attended, though there [were] but very few of us all together. I believe it was a time of profit, and that the living presence of the great Master of our assemblies was among us, for which I was truly thankful.

11th. [We] meet with some trials and exercises, and difficulties are thrown in the way of our getting in the country. Being disappointed [these] two days from going to Spightstown and its neighborhood, we this afternoon went to see the family of James and Thomas Polegum [and] drank tea with them, after which we had a satisfactory time with them, and I believe discharged ourselves as faithful stewards towards them; which I feel a daily engagement I may be enabled to do wherever my lot may be cast; for I find as I go along, the great Master furnishes us with a little to drop here and a little there, which at least seems to be received in the goodwill it is intended, and which yields peace to my own mind, [so] that I have cause to speak well of his excellent name who is God over all, worthy in Himself and in his Son forever.

12th. This day a meeting at the house of John Luke, which was much larger than the last, and I believe the power of the Most High was witnessed to be among us. I had considerable service for me; to the Lord's name be the praise. We went to dine with Valentine Jones, the Secretary of the Island, where were a number of persons of fashion who dined with us, and by the help of the great Master I was made willing to be as a fool among them, and opening to their view, in the ability then given, the abuse there is of the good creatures which the Almighty hath given us for the sustenance of these poor tabernacles; in which I had peace, and believe it gave no offence to the company, for which I was thankful. There was among those present a Church of England parson, who behaved very civilly. He was also at the meeting in the morning. I think there is still cause of encouragement to attend to duty.

13th. We have for several days past been disappointed in going to Spightstown. I write things down as they occur.

The hurricane they had in 1780, in the Tenth Month, continued one whole night, and was so violent that it blew the clothes off the women and left many quite naked. They mostly left their houses and huddled together, black and white, in the best manner they could; being in many cases obliged to hold by bushes or shrubs to prevent being blown away. There was one case of a wooden house, with all the family six in number, being blown into the sea and never heard of afterward.

14th. Went down to Spightstown by water, being about three hours in going. Dr. Joseph Gamble Jackman having come from there to accompany us down to his house. Joshua Luke son of John, also went with us there; and likewise to accompany us to [those] places we might incline to go to on any part of the island.

After we had dined with Dr. Jackman, we went to see the ruins of Friends' meeting-house near Spightstown. There is, we find, about fourteen acres of good land, the property of Friends, and the remains of a good stone house about fifty feet by thirty feet, wall two feet thick or near it; an apartment adjoining that a family used to live in, of fifty feet by twenty; and also a good kitchen. Also a large stone stable to put Friends' horses in, and a large burying ground well walled in, which is going to rack for want of care. The whole now claimed and possessed by a Thomas Whitney, a lawyer, who married one of the Callender family, and is pulling down the remains of the building and carrying the stone away to build other houses with. In this burying ground we were shown the place where Charles Pemberton, the son of Israel and Mary, is laid, who went there for his health. The grave is flat with the ground.

This evening had an opportunity in Dr. Jackman's family. I believe I have been made willing and able, through Holy Help, to support the testimony in all company, to the Lord's honor and mine own peace, which I esteem a great favor.

15th. Went this morning to the house of Joseph Collins, one and a half miles from Spightstown, who is a professor with Friends, and one of the present trustees of their estate. He appears very kind and candid; but says he has had nothing to do with the Trust though he was appointed; having not seen the writing on that behalf [it] being in the hands of John Luke, who has all the papers of Friends belonging to the whole island in his hands. He says he paid into the hands of John Luke, in or about the year 1763, the sum of five hundred pounds; who also has in his hands, with that and other money paid by the father of Dr. Jackman and some others, fifteen hundred pounds, the property of Friends, for which he has received interest from 1763, aforesaid.

We had a satisfactory time in Joseph Collins' family, to the great Master's praise be it spoken. He often being near to help and make way for us.

16th. Went this afternoon to the widow Gibson's, sister to John Luke, which is about seven miles, where we met with a kind reception. Here are a few Friends who meet at her house every First-day morning. After supper my mouth was opened by way of encouragement to them. I have daily to admire the Lord's goodness in thus opening the way for us. Being fatigued went to bed early and had a refreshing night's sleep, which is a renewed favor.

18th. Renewed desires are begotten to move under the great Master's directions neither too fast nor too slow; but that I may diligently attend to the state of things on this island, and proceed from day to day accordingly. Had this morning a seasonable opportunity in the widow Gibson's family, to the tendering of the hearts of those present, and to my great comfort and consolation. Went afterwards to see the family of Benjamin Buck, a Friend who lives about half a mile from the widow Gibson. An honest man, his wife also a tender-spirited woman, though not brought up among Friends. We had a satisfactory opportunity with them; finding as we go along, through the Lord's help and power, that we have bread to break from house to house in singleness of heart, I believe to his praise and our own peace.

What One Woman Did.—Some years ago, a young Englishwoman, named Beilby who had studied medicine to fit herself for usefulness as a missionary at Lucknow, India, was sent for by the wife of the native Prince of Punna, who was ill. Punna was a long distance from Lucknow, and the journey was a dangerous one; if she went, she would be separated by more than a hundred miles from any white man.

Her friends urged her to refuse. The Englishwoman was young and timid, but she knew her duty; she went, remained two months, and cured the patient. When she was about to return, the Ranees sent for her and begged her to go in person to Queen Victoria, with the message that Indian women, not being allowed the attendance of men physicians, died in great numbers every year for want of care. The Ranees brought paper, pen, and ink, and, with tears, besought her to write her petition to the Queen to send to them women doctors.

"Write it small, Saheba," she begged, "for I shall put it in a locket and hang it about your neck, and you must wear it until you put it into the hands of the great Ranees herself."

Beilby returned to England the next year, obtained an interview with Queen Victoria, and placed the locket with the message in her hands. The Queen was deeply touched, and empowered Lady Dufferin, the wife of the Viceroy of India, to form an association for sending out female medical aid to the women of India.

Many women doctors have been sent out by the association, and Indian women are now being educated as physicians and nurses. An estate of fifty acres, with large buildings, has been given by a native prince as a hospital for Hindu female patients.

Had the timid missionary refused to undertake the perilous duty to one woman, these great blessings—which are but the beginning of help and hope for all the women of India—probably never would have come to them.

Sow the seed, however small it be, of good deeds. Only God knows what the fruit will be. —Youths' Companion.

Kindness Saved Him.—We'll call him Jim, for I do not remember his name. He had lost all respectability, and was a common gutter drunkard. His family had disowned him, and would not recognize him when they met him. Occasionally he would get a job at the stables where Dr. Davis kept his horses. One morning the doctor laid his hand on his shoulder and said:

"Jim, I wish you would give up the drink."

There was something very like a quiver of the man's lips as he answered:

"If I thought you cared, I would, but there is a great gulf between you and me."

"Have I made any gulf, Jim?" Think a moment before you answer."

"No—you—haven't."

"If you had been a millionaire, could I have treated you more like a gentleman?"

"No, you couldn't."

"I do care, Jim!"

"Say it again, won't you?" There were tears in the man's eyes now.

"I do care, Jim," with a tender little emphasis on the Jim.

"Dr. Davis, I'll never touch another drop of liquor as long as I live. Here's my hand on it." This was 15 years ago, and "Jim" is to-day respectable and respected.

For "The Friend."

Reminiscences of Hannah Batty.

While travelling on a religious visit she had an appointed meeting in a village among those not of our Society, in a locality not now recollect. Many of other denominations were in attendance. She was soon brought under deep and unusual exercise of mind. At length she arose and repeated the text, "I am for peace, but when I speak they are for war," adding, "I am for peace, I am for peace; lay down your arms; lay down your arms!" She then continued in substance as follows: That since she sat down amongst them, from the impressions which had so strongly and so unusually arrested her mind, she was led to believe there were some present who had come to that meeting in a spirit of controversy, and were ready and willing to cavil at the truths that might be uttered, rather than to be benefited and instructed on so solemn an occasion as that of meeting to perform acceptable worship to their Father in Heaven. But they might well be assured that nothing but a sense of duty to our gracious Heavenly Parent, and the value of the immortal souls of her fellow-men, for whom Christ died, could ever have induced her to leave her home, her family and friends and call them thus together.

But she believed there was also another class who had assembled for the purpose of worshipping "Him who liveth forever and ever; who made the earth and the seas and fountains of waters and man in his own likeness and image for the purposes of his own glory." Towards these her spirit had gone forth in the love of the everlasting gospel of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ. She continued to enlarge in a tender, weighty and impressive manner for a considerable length of time, claiming the earnest attention and full appreciation of her large audience. Then as is believed, she closed with solemn and fervent supplication on behalf of the assembled company of every class and of every name.

After meeting, her hearers gathered around her, many of them in brokenness and tears, expressing their thankfulness for her visit, and telling her that should she ever again travel in their vicinity, to remember them. Their hearts and their houses would be open to receive her.

Similar to this meeting, though in some respects different, was one held in Hindsbury, a small village not very far from Hannah Batty's residence. Persis Hoag, when visiting friends in Starksboro, felt a concern to hold a public meeting in that place. Hannah was dipped into sympathy and unity with her in her prospect. She was well known in that vicinity, and the meeting was appointed for both of them, and was held in one of their meeting houses, being largely attended by the public and people of different persuasions. They were both earnestly engaged in testimony and religious service. Many in the audience were tendered and the preachers were informed that should they ever think it their duty and place again to visit them, they might be assured of a cordial welcome.

We may feel assured that a ministry which reaches the witness for the Truth in the hearts of its hearers, is a living, gospel ministry.

THAT LINE FENCE.

Selected.

Old father Smith came home in a miff
From his field the other day,
While his sweet little wife, the pride of his life,
At her wheel was spinning away.

And ever and anon a gay little song
With the buzz of her wheel kept time;
And his wrathful brow is clearing now,
Under her cheerful rhyme.

"Come, come, little Turk, put away your work,
And listen to what I say;
What can I do, but a quarrel brew
With the man across the way?"

"I have built my fence, but he won't commence
To lay a single rail;
His cattle get in, and the feed gets thin—
I am tempted to make a sale!"

"Why John, dear John, how can you go on!
I'm afraid it will be as they say."

"No, no, little wife, I heard that strife
In a lawyer's hands don't pay.

"He is picking a flaw, to drive me to law—
I am told that he said he would—
And you know, long ago, law wronged me so,
I vowed that I never should.

"So what can I do, that I will not rue
To the man across the way?"
"If that's what you want, I can help you haunt
That man with a spectre gray.

"Thirty dollars will do to carry you through,
And then you have gained a neighbor;
It would cost you more to peep in the door
Of a court, and as much more labor.

"Just use your good sense—let's build him a fence,
And shame bad acts out of the fellow."
They built up his part, and sent to his heart
Love's dart where the good thoughts mellow.

That very same night, by the candle light,
They opened with interest a letter:
Not a word was there, but three greenbacks fair
Said—the man was growing better.

HYMN FOR THE NEW YEAR.

Selected.

I take my pilgrim staff away,
Life's path, untrdden, to pursue,
Thy guiding eye, my Lord, I view;
My times are in thy hand.

Throughout the year, my Heavenly Friend,
On thy blest guidance I depend;
From its commencement to its end
My times are in thy hand.

Should comfort, health and peace be mine,
Should hours of gladness on me shine,
Then let me trace thy love divine:
My times are in thy hand.

But shouldest thou visit me again
With languor, sorrow, sickness, pain,
Still let this thought my hope sustain,
My times are in thy hand.

Thy smile alone makes moments bright,
That smile turns darkness into light;
This thought will soothe the grief's saddest night,
My times are in thy hand.

Should those this year be called away
Who lent to life its brightest ray,
Teach me in that dark hour to say,
My times are in thy hand.

A few more days, a few more years—
O, then a bright reverse appears,
Then I shall no more say with tears,
My times are in thy hand.

That hand my steps will gently guide
To the dark brink of Jordan's tide,
Then bear me to the heavenward side:
My times are in thy hand.

THE SECRET OF THY PRESENCE.

Selected.

When winds are raging o'er the upper ocean,
And billows wild contend with angry roar,
Tis said, far down beneath the wild commotion,
That peaceful stillness reigneth evermore.

Far, far beneath, the noise of tempests dieth,
And silver waves chime ever peacefully;
And no rude storm, how fierce so'er'er it dieth,
Disturbs the Sabbath of that deeper sea.

So to the heart that knows thy love, O Purest!
There is a temple, sacred evermore;
And all the babble of life's angry voices
Dies in hushed stillness at its peaceful door.

Far, far away, the roar of passion dieth,
And no loving thoughts rise calm and peacefully;
And no rude storm, how fierce so'er'er it dieth,
Disturbs the soul that dwells, O Lord, in thee!

O rest of rests! O peace, serene, eternal!
Thou ever livest, and thou changest never;
And in the secret of thy presence dwelleth Fullness of joy, forever and forever!

—Harriet Beecher Stowe.

One Kind of Reading.—How few persons who can devote but an hour or half an hour a day to reading and study, take due thought as to how they can make the most of their little leisure. They read in a desultory way whatever comes to hand, and think that if they had more time for books, they would soon become much better informed.

But the half hour a day, if used in the wisest manner, would make a vast difference in one's mental growth as the months and years glide by.

An incident occurs to me that well illustrates this. A pretty maiden-hair fern, growing in a flower-pot, was given to a young girl, hopelessly ill with spinal disease. It proved a thing of beauty and of inexhaustible interest, as the delicate graceful fronds came up, one by one, and slowly uncurled. There was a little pot beside the fern, and under its spreading fronds, in which grew an aloe. By-and-by, the sick girl noticed in the little pot some tiny ferns, scarce an inch high, quite unlike the maiden hair. Whence came they? Her interest was aroused. She was no botanist, but she wanted to learn something about ferns. She could use her eyes for reading but five minutes at a time, and not more than twice a day. A book on ferns came to her, and another and another. Friends, knowing her interest in ferns, brought them to her fresh and green from the woods or sent her pressed specimens of rare varieties gathered in distant lands. Sometimes a visitor would read to her from one of her precious books, but only for four or five minutes. "I cannot remember more at a time," she would say, "and you have read enough for me to think about for a long time."

It is now some years since the maiden-hair fern was given to her, and she has become an authority as to the species and culture of ferns, and is an enthusiast in regard to them. It is true that she has become educated in one direction only, and is not particularly well informed in other respects. But is it not a great gain that she should talk about her ferns and their wonderful methods of reproduction, awakening her listeners' interest and teaching them many things worth remembering, rather than to dwell chiefly on her pains and privations? It is many years since she was able to step out of doors, but when you are with her you do not think of her as an invalid, so interested and interesting is she.

The growth of cryptogamous plants would not be a matter of absorbing interest to all persons, but the habit of reading thoughtfully and carefully what we read, and of retaining it in memory, is a great factor of mental growth.—Boston Transcript.

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 114.

DIVINE GUIDANCE.

It requires care that people do not imagine that every idea that may be suggested to their mind is a Divine impression; and, on the other hand, that they do not reject those feelings which are mercifully given for their guidance and help. Even the humble and sincere soul may for a time be in doubt what step to take where there is danger in either course; and this very doubt, and the conflict of mind it involves, may be part of that humbling discipline which our Father in Heaven sees to be good for it to pass through; but in due time it will experience the fulfilment of the promise, "Light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart."

That the Lord's servants are sometimes led in a manner for which they do not see an adequate reason, is shown in an anecdote preserved of George Richardson and Solomon Chapman. When they were engaged in a religious visit in Ireland, George felt a strong impression that it would not be best to hold a meeting in the meeting-house in a certain neighborhood, but that he must visit Friends in their families, going from house to house. As there was no known reason why a meeting should not be held, Solomon rather objected to its omission, because then other persons not members would be passed by, who often attended the meetings of Friends. But George's judgment was clear, and Solomon yielded. It was believed afterwards, that if the meeting had been held, the house could not have borne the pressure of the people, but would have fallen upon them. The roof was very heavy, and some of the timbers much decayed, so that it fell on the evening of a Seventh-day, when there was no unusual wind or other exciting cause, the evening before the time when Friends were expecting to meet in it, to hold their usual First-day meeting.

The following incident is told by J. D. Hampton, who listened to Joseph Hoag's relation of it, in his father's house in 1841.

When Joseph Hoag was on a religious visit in the Southern States, he felt it right to have a meeting in a neighborhood where he was a stranger and Friends were not very well known. A full and attentive audience assembled.

When the meeting had settled into stillness, it was soon made manifest to him that he should speak of slavery and the evils thereof. At this he was almost ready to flinch, as he had good reason to believe that most of his audience were slave-holders.

While thus pondering the subject, and knowing the magnitude of it, he had some misgivings whether he should be able to treat the subject as it should be treated, and asked his Lord and Master to excuse him from speaking on that subject, lest he might not be able to do it justice, and the truth suffer by it. But the query came immediately, "have I ever required anything at thy hands that I did not enable thee to perform;" to this he could not say nay. So he concluded that it would be safest for him to watch the pointings of his Master in this matter, as on other occasions. At the proper time he arose to his feet and took the subject of "Slavery and the Evils Thereof" as his text. After the meeting closed, many of the slave-holders gathered about him, giving him an invitation, here and there, to dine with them; and, as he could not go with them all, he accepted the hospitality of one, to whose home the others followed to the number of twelve or fifteen. After they were all seated in his stately parlor, Joseph began to talk upon the subject on which he had preached, continuing his conversation for about thirty minutes, not giving any one an opportunity to say anything; and, just as he closed, the landlord made his appearance and announced that dinner was ready. All repaired to the dining room save one, a lawyer. The landlord gave him a pressing invitation, saying there was provision for all, now in waiting. The lawyer replied: "I can't eat with that preacher." "Why?" asked the landlord. The lawyer said there was something about him that he couldn't comprehend. "I was at his meeting, as you know, and did not not like his subject, nor the manner in which he treated it, and so I concluded I would trap the old man by watching his discourse and taking note of such points as I thought he would not be able to answer. I followed him here for that purpose. To make it more effectual I have made known my intentions to no one. Here I have twelve questions arranged respecting his sermon, and, while we were all in this room he has answered them. I can't eat with him; there is something about him I cannot comprehend." J. W.

Vulgar Anecdotes.—If a young man has had his education among low associations, unless he has great care, the things he has heard and learned in such places will cling to him and follow him all his days; he may come to occupy a high position, but unless he is so thoroughly changed that he loathes the things that he once loved, and unless he is watchful against his besetments, he will from time to time find himself indulging in the same evil propensity to which he was formerly addicted. Thus it has sometimes come to pass that persons in very high positions, who ought to be examples to those around them, have forgotten the injunction, "Let no corrupt communication proceed out of your mouth," and have defiled the memories of others with things which could do no good, but which might do much harm.

It is related that General Grant was once sitting in his tent with officers around him, when a general came in in much glee and said,

"I have a good story to tell; there are no ladies present, I believe."

"No," said General Grant, "but there are gentlemen present."

The man's countenance fell; the good story was never told. Some Christians could learn a good lesson from the great commander's remark. They might learn a still better lesson from the great Apostle's words—"Let no rotten communication proceed out of your mouth."—The Christian.

All true progress is through conflict. The progress of an intelligent belief in the Bible as a result of divine revelation, and as a divinely inspired work, is no exception to this general rule. A century ago the Bible was adhered to by very many with a blind acceptance of traditional renderings of its text and its teachings; while, on the other hand, it was, by very many, rejected and sweepingly denounced as a mass of errors unworthy of serious consideration. But largely in consequence of deliberate attempts, both scientific and critical, to prove the Bible untrue, the Bible has gained in both popular and scholarly confidence to an utterly unprecedented degree. And now the Bible is accepted and trusted by a larger proportion of intelligent scholars than ever before since the original writing of its earliest pages. No better proof could be given of the inspired authorship of Genesis, than is shown in its increasing lustre, under the vigorous rubbings of merciless critics and uncompromising scientists.—S. S. Times.

For "The Friend."

A plain Quaker father, proud of his lofty son: a plain Quaker mother proud of her pretty daughter; and if not pretty, willing to make her attractive through the medium of dress, are I believe objects which the Lord contemns.

Parents sorrowing for these things are happier in their sorrow, than the proud are in their pride. Knowing that the carnal mind is at enmity with God, the true-hearted can take no pleasure in their children's finery; if they cannot prevent it, they will take anxious pains that their own hands are clear.

The Fold and the Door.—For the greater part of the year, it is not necessary that the sheep should be housed in Palestine. When protection from the weather is essential, the shepherd erects a light booth for himself, and a larger one for the sheep; but in cases where there need only be protection from wild animals and from robbers, it is the usual thing to construct an enclosure of thorn bushes, or of rough stones surmounted by thorns, within which the sheep are led. The door is simply an opening in the enclosure, and when sheep and shepherd are safely within, this is closed by branches of trees. The shepherd keeps watch near this door during the night. The thorn enclosures are generally secure against wild animals, but they are not so secure against the ingenuity of robbers, who, if they get an opportunity, will quietly open a hole in the enclosing wall, and get the sheep away through that. Not to enter by the door is a characteristic of Oriental thieves, from the Nile to the Ganges. When a tent is to be attacked, the common method is to approach it under cover of the darkness, cut a hole large enough to crawl through, and then silently to enter and as silently to retire with the booty. Bolder robbers will occasionally dig through the walls of a house in the same way. The experience of a British officer in India affords a curious illustration of the skill of Oriental thieves. During the officer's absence in the evening, a man crept quietly up to the tent without attracting the attention of the sentry on guard, cut an opening in the rear of the tent, and began to collect his booty. While he was engaged in this process, the officer returned. The Hindoo instantly fixed himself, silent as a statue, close to the tent wall, with arm drawn up and hand slightly extended. The officer came in, and proceeded in the half darkness to prepare for rest. Noticing the extended hand of the thief, and mistaking it for a pin of some sort, he hung his helmet and his coat upon it. The thief stood silently holding the helmet and the coat until the officer was asleep, when he retired as he came, taking the helmet and the coat with the rest of his booty. Next morning the hole in the tent and the missing "pin" told the whole story.—S. S. Times.

What strong testimonies we have to the integrity of the New Testament! Versions made from the original Greek in the second, third and fourth centuries in widely distant lands, and which are still in existence. Manuscripts going back to the fourth, fifth and sixth centuries; the extant works of Christian writers, who in all parts of the Roman Empire, from the middle of the second century, made the most extensive use of the New Testament and give us numerous quotations. All these witnesses testify to the same great truths, and their divergences from each other are generally of small moment; and from the comparison and combination of the whole testimony we can in almost every instance detect the specific errors of each witness, and fix with a wonderful degree of exactness the contents of the original documents for which they are vouchers. For the integrity of what writing of the Augustinian age have we so many witnesses?—Prof. Harman.

A Genuine Love Story.—A young clergyman and his bride were invited guests at a large party given by a wealthy parishioner. In all the freshness and elegance of her bridal wardrobe the young wife shone among the throng, distinguished by her comeliness and vivacity; and when, during the evening, her young husband drew her aside and whispered to her that she was the most beautiful woman in all the company, and that his heart was bursting with pride and love for her, she thought herself the happiest wife in the world. Ten years later the same husband and wife were guests at the same house, where was gathered a similar gay company. The wife of ten years ago wore the same dress she had worn on the previous occasion; and, of course, it had been altered and re-made, and was old-fashioned and almost shabby. Toil and care and motherhood and pinched circumstances had taken the roses out of her cheeks and the lithe spring out of her form. She sat apart from the crowd, careworn and preoccupied. Her small hands, roughened with coarse toil, were unloved. A little apart the ten-year husband stood and looked at his wife, and as he observed her faded dress and weary attitude a great sense of all her patient, loving faithfulness came over his heart. Looking up, she caught his earnest gaze, and noticed that his eyes were filled with tears. She rose and went to him, her questioning eyes mutely asking for an explanation of his emotion; and when he tenderly took her hand, and, placing it on his arm, led her away from the crowd, and told her how he had been thinking of her as she looked, ten years before, when she was a bride, and how much more precious she was to him now, and how much more beautiful, for all her shabby dress and roughened hands, and how he appreciated all her sacrifice and patient toil for him and their children, a great wave of happiness filled her heart, a light shone in her face that gave it more than its youthful beauty, and in all the company there was not so happy a couple as this husband and wife, their hearts and faces aglow from the flaming up of pure sentiment that transfigured and ennobled and glorified all the toils and privations they had endured.

Natural History, Science, &c.

The Lick Telescope Lenses.—The most extraordinary precautions are being taken in the care of the great lenses ground by Alvan Clark for the Lick Telescope which is to be erected in California. The lenses were ground in Cambridge, Mass., and the problem of transportation across the continent, as described in the Boston Transcript, is solved as follows: "The two lenses will first be wrapped separately in fifteen or twenty thicknesses of cloth drawn very tight. The cloth will be cotton, and in order to make it soft and perfectly free from grit it will be washed many times and thoroughly beaten. Next to the cloth will come a thick layer of paper. A box made of wood and lined with felt will contain the glasses when so prepared, the felt lining of the box coming next to the paper. The lenses with their coverings will be packed tightly in this box. The shape of this box will conform to the shape of the lenses. The felt will be attached with glue, so that no nails will be anywhere near the glass. Outside of this wooden box, and enclosing it, will be a strong steel box, about the shape of a cube.

The wooden box will be tightly packed into the steel box with curled hair. To enclose this steel box will be still another steel box or chest, and the inner steel box will be kept from touching it by a large number of spiral springs covering the whole interior of the outer steel chest. This outer chest will be packed with asbestos, to render it fire-proof, and both of the steel boxes will be made air-tight and water-proof. The outer chest will be suspended by pivots in a strong wooden frame, and a contrivance has been adopted for turning the chest one-quarter around every day during its progress to California. This is to prevent any molecular disarrangement in the glass and avoid the danger of polarization, it being feared that the jarring of the train will disturb the present arrangement of the molecules unless the position of the glass is daily changed, and all lines of disturbance thus broken up. The glass will be insured for its full value—or rather its cost—$51,000, and all the precautions mentioned are taken to prevent any accident to it. It would probably be impossible to replace it, as Fell, who cast it, and the elder Clarke, who ground it, are both old men.

Peacemakers Among the Warring Birds.—A resident of Memphis, Mo., erected on his lawn a large bird-house, intended as the summer-house of a flock of martins. It was a three-story affair, and three varieties of birds inhabited it—martins, bluebirds and sparrows. The numbers were about equal. The mixture of breeds did not appear to cause discontent for a long time. Each bird nation gathered sticks and straw and other material for nests, and harmony prevailed for weeks.

One day, however, this gentleman's family discovered that there was something wrong with the inhabitants of the airy house on the lawn. There was unusual commotion, a squalling, pecking and fluttering which denoted trouble in the hitherto happy family. A close watch brought the further discovery that the martins and bluebirds had joined forces and were making a mighty effort to drive the sparrows off the premises.

The sparrows battled pluckily for their home, but were in the end doomed to defeat and an ignominious flight.

Opposite the lawn, in a neighbor's yard, stood several large oaks. A small colony of bluejays had pre-empted homes here. The sparrows on being forced from their homes and nests took refuge in the oaks. Their advent was followed by bird chatter, and chirp, and squall, participated in by both sparrows and jays. The noise attracted the family, and now two households were watching with interest the actions of the winged tribes.

Shortly the sparrows, seemingly escorted by a number of the jays, returned to the lawn and house. This was followed by a convention of bird music, in which the jays took the prominent part. By and by, the bedlam of voices ceased, and the jays did the talking or chirping. They soon returned to the oaks, leaving quiet and peace on the lawn. The three bird colonies worked all summer without further jar or disagreement. Did the jays act the part of peacemakers?—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Vegetables in Japan.—A paper on this subject, prepared by the Japanese Commissioner at the New Orleans Exposition, says that there is no vegetable so extensively used in Japan as Radishes. They are mostly cylindrical in shape, and the largest reach six inches in diameter and a yard in length.

Burdock roots are greatly esteemed, and require deep cultivation. Taroes (Colocassia) of the Arum family are very extensively grown, and are used as potatoes in this country. The Calladium which is grown in America for its ornamental leaves, belongs to the same family and is profitably cultivated in shady places, as orchards. Its annual production is estimated at 6 or 7 million bushels. They taste like potatoes, but are more mealy. Japanese Yams, and a species of Lily are grown for their roots and tubers. Onions in Japan are cultivated like Celery, and have long, white, tender stalks. Among Peas and Beans, the most important crop is the Soy bean, the annual product of which is about 11½ million bushels. The reason that the Japanese consume more pulse than any other people, is the demand for nitrogenous food, which abounds in beans, and supplies the place of meat, which is but little used.

The young shoots of ferns and bamboo are used as asparagus; the roots of the Lotus or African water-lily, of the Arrow-Head, and a species of rush are collected for food; and the shoots of the Water-Shield (Brasenia peltata) which grows in our New Jersey ponds, and are thickly covered with a transparent gelatine, are regarded as delicacies.

Gapes in Chickens.—This disease is caused by little parasitic worms which collect in masses in the wind-pipe. Dr. Walker in a paper in the Bulletin of the Buffalo Society of Natural History, says that the fowls swallow the embryos of these parasites in the earth-worms which they eat. The embryos are liberated from the intestines of the earth-worms, and work their way through the wind-pipe into the lungs. When they are mature, they attach themselves by their sucker-like mouths to the mucous membrane of the wind-pipe and its branches. In about seven days more their eggs mature, and are coughed up by the fowl. After they pass into the soil, they are hatched in about 3 weeks, and taken in their food by the earth-worms, thus completing the circle of their existence. Dr. Walker found that any locality where the gapes prevails can be rendered safe for fowls by destroying the infected earth-worms in the ground with common salt. He regards it as probable that similar parasites such as the lung-worms of calves, hogs and sheep, may have the earth-worm as their original host.

Discovery of Anthracite Coal.—Anthracite was discovered in Pennsylvania in 1790, by Nicholas Allen. This Allen had come down from the Lake Champlain lumber region, and opened an inn on the summit of the Broad Mountain. For a time he led a wandering existence, hunting, fishing, and lumbering, while his wife attended to the wants of thirsty travellers. In one of his hunting excursions, he camped out at the foot of the Broad Mountain, at a spot where a coal vein cropped out, and, upon lighting a fire, was astonished at the immense heat it threw off. He also saw that some of the black stone had become red hot. He dug some of it, and carried it home, when his wife, more practical than himself, pronounced it coal. They saw the coal crop out in abundance, and visions of fortunes that might be realized out of it flashed through their minds simultaneously. So disposing of their effects they loaded two large covered wagons with the coal, and set out for Philadelphia, with the intention of marketing it there and discovering its true value. They drove along the banks of the Schuylkill, sleeping in the open air at night. At Pottstown three of their horses died, and the coal was dumped into the river. Wearied and disheartened, the pair returned to the old place at the summit of the mountain, and shortly afterward Allen laid his faithful wife to rest over the coal vein that proved their ruin, and turned his face toward the

—A Grateful Acknowledgment.—A New Year's wish from Charleston, (S. C.) is sent out by the Councils of that city, which unanimously drafted the following: "At the close of this year, memorable by our sudden and terrible affliction from mysterious visitations of earthquake, the Corporation of the City of Charleston, in grateful memory of the blessed bounty that came from all parts of this land, and even beyond the seas, for the needy sufferers in this stricken city, send to each and all these generous givers this city's heartfelt gratitude and glad greetings in new hopes of the new year. Families in more than 2000 homes restored, the multitude of the poor fed and sheltered, the orphan, the sick, the aged, and the needy, in their rebuilt hospital and places of refuge, will always cherish this gracious and universal giving, and in the heart of this city the memory of it shall be precious as a charity, the fruit of which is on earth and its growth in heaven. To all our brothers, far and near, who have been touched by our woe, our heartfelt wish is that, even unto us in this human spring time of peace and good will, so unto them may come, in God's good providence, the charities that soothe and bless."

—The Religious World in 1886.—In a review of the religious movements of the past year, The Independent says it "has been to the Churches one of peace and prosperity; of larger fields, larger force and larger funds; and of a growing spirit of Christian fellowship and Christian unity." The additions to church membership appear to have been larger than usual.

"The way has been opened toward a union of the Free Baptists, the Christian Connection, and the Christian Union denomination." The Episcopal General Convention of this country has made a declaration in favor of Christian union, and in Canada Episcopal, Presbyterian and Methodist committees are inquiring for some common ground.

"An important event in the history of the Roman Catholic Church in this country was the promulgation of the decrees of the Baltimore Plenary Council, by which the Church becomes in reality a national Church, administered according to canon law and not as a missionary organization. The decrees provide for a strictly Catholic education for Catholic children by means of parochial schools, and for a great central university. They also condemn Sabbath desecration and the saloon business, and encourage total abstinence societies."

In Great Britain a struggle for the disestablishment of the Church of England seems to be approaching. On the Continent the Reformed Churches are showing increased life, in the reaction from Rationalism. In France the old Huguenot Church has been active and zealous. Nearly all lands are now open to laborers in the cause of Christ, and converts are increasing in India, China and Japan. So that "The note of the watchman standing between the old year and the new, and looking both ways, is not a note of discouragement or despair."

—Football.—The brutal manner in which this game is often played, is shown by the following extract from the London Lancet: "Scarcely has the football season got into full swing ere our attention is again directed to the very dangerous nature of the game by a sad fatality. Daniel Houghney, a married man, while playing in the Football Cup tie-match, on Saturday last, near Glasgow, between his club, the Mearns Athletics, and the Howood Club, was struck in the abdomen by the knee of an opposing player. Houghney was carried off the field, and died on the following day. It was also stated that three other players of the Mearns Club were injured. We are not acquainted with the particulars of this sad case, and do not know whether the play was unduly rough; but we do not hesitate to say that football nowadays too often degenerates into a species of free fight. The number of broken legs and other accidents already sustained this season bears tribute to this."

early records of the Baptist Church at Broadmead, England, which cover the period when Friends suffered so severely for their religious principles, have been published; and show that the Baptists of those days had much to endure from the intolerant spirit manifested by the authorities. Yet they resorted to some stratagems to shield themselves from the informers, which their more bold and straightforward cotemporaries were not easy to adopt. The records say:—"At our own meeting, to prevent spies that might come into our room as hearers—and yet that no strangers might be hindered from coming into our meeting, whether good or bad, to hear the Gospel—we contrived a curtain to be hung in the meeting place, that did enclose as much room as above fifty might sit within it; and among those men, he that preached should stand; that so, if any informer was privately in the room as a hearer, he might hear him speak, but could not see him, and thereby not know him. And there were brethren without the curtain that would hinder any from going within the curtain that they did not know to be friends; and so let those would come into our meetings to hear, without the curtain. And when our company and time were come to begin the meeting we drew the curtain, and filled up the stairs with women and maids that sat in it, that the informers could not quickly run up. And when we had notice that the informers or officers were coming, we caused the minister to forbear and sit down. Then we drew back the curtain laying the whole room open, that they might see us all. And so all the people began to sing a psalm, that at the beginning of the meeting we did always name what psalm we would sing, if the informers or the officers came in. Thus still when they came in we were singing, that they could not find any one preaching, but all singing, which means the Lord blessed, that many times when the mayor came they were all singing, that he knew not whom to take more than another. And so when the mayor, Hellier, or the other informers had taken our names, and done what they would, and carried away whom they pleased, and when they were gone down out of our rooms, then we ceased singing and drew the curtain again, and the minister would go on with the rest of his sermon until they came again—which sometimes they would thrice in one meeting disturb us—or until our time was expired."

"Brother Gifford's people took this course. A company of tall brethren stand about him that speaks, and having near his feet made a trap door in the floor, when the informers come they let down the speaker into a room under."

THE FRIEND.

FIRST MONTH 22 1887.

We are pleased to see in the Christian Worker of Twelfth Mo. 30th, 1886, a thoughtful communication from Dr. Richard H. Thomas of Baltimore, replying to an article previously published in that paper, which favored the employment of regularly supported "pastors" in the Society of Friends.

R. H. Thomas states, that in the early Christian Church, "the freedom of every member to preach in the meetings for worship, as he might be led by the Spirit, the need of no other preparation for the ministry but that given by the Lord, the entire compatibility of following what are erroneously called secular pursuits with the duties of ministers, were not only allowed but maintained as the doctrine of Christianity." The growth of a clerical class as distinguished from the laity, was a later development. The introduction of stated "pastors" into our Society, as has been proposed, he believes "must kill out, sooner or later, the freedom of the ministry among us." On this subject he remarks:

"A thoughtful minister of another denomination told me that the present movements in the Society of Friends in regard to the ministry were of peculiar interest because, making allowances for changes in time and place, we seem to be re-enacting on a small scale the struggle that went on in the early centuries of Christianity. In that struggle formalism and stated methods of worship, and the assumption by the ministers of special rights and privileges triumphed, and the original freedom and spontaneity of worship was lost. Shall we see the same result come about amongst us? At least, let us know whether we are tending, and go forward with our eyes open to the inevitable results that await us. This is not theorizing; it is the simple statement of fact. That we have not in a very few years of occasional trials of the new system seen the final legitimate result is not surprising. The bulk of our meetings are still largely on the old lines. But are we never to look forward, are we never to learn by the experience of others? And when we see one invariable result wherover the system of stated pastors has obtained, what right have we to say the result with us will be different? There is no danger, we hear. But there is danger, and we already see the buds that will soon ripen into fruit. What else does the distinction already drawn in some places between the ministers and laity mean? What does the increasing substitution of pulpits in the place of galleries point to—the adoption of the clerical dress, the styling of our ministers "Reverend," the arrangement before the meeting opens as to who shall speak; are all these for nothing?"

"Finally, has it never occurred to us that wherover we find a church with a system of stated pastors, they do a church whose members need, or think they do, the use of the outward symbols of baptism and of the supper? If we educate our members to depend on the outward ministrations of a man they will come to rely on external things, and we shall be opening the door to those very practices we are now trying to shut out. Our principles are consistent with themselves, we cannot discard one without endangering all."

To this, we would add, that not only is the freedom of the ministry endangered by this scheme (of which the Editor of the Christian Worker, in the same issue states he is in favor, thinking it "to be the mind of the great body of Friends,") but still more certainly and immediately will our doctrine as to the authority and qualification for the right exercise of the ministry be departed from. In truth, the whole plan belongs to a different church system from that of Friends, and we do not see how it is possible for it to grow up among a people who really retain their confidence in the principles we profess.

We have received from R. Barclay Murdoch, publisher, of 461 Eglinton Street, Glasgow, Scotland, a copy of a new edition of Part I. of the "Spirit of Prayer," by William Law.

William Law was born in 1686, and died in 1761. He received a University education and was ordained a clergyman in the Church of England, but he felt it his duty to resign that office, and lived a retired life. He was a voluminous author. The present treatise evinces that he held deeply spiritual views of the practical work of religion, closely approximating to those of the Society of Friends. The benefit derived from its perusal in early life, appears to have been a leading influence in promoting its republication at this time.

Connected with the sound practical advices contained in this little book, are certain speculative views held by its author, as to the Divine purpose in creating man, the condition of Adam before the fall, &c.; on the correctness of which we will not venture an opinion—remembering what Moses of old said to the children of Israel, "Secret things belong unto the Lord our God; but those things which are revealed belong unto us, and to our children forever."

Since writing the above, we have met with a letter written by John Rutty, in 1756, from which the following is taken:—

"Among the books that have lately fallen in my way, I much value some of those written by William Law; but I fear this excellent man has a little blocked up his way by adhering so much to Jacob Behmen; and as to his account of the transactions of the angels before the fall, I could wish he had never meddled with it."

At a recent examination by the Presbytery of Troy of a person who had been invited to assume the charge of a congregation in that city, the candidate was asked, whether, if he should become convinced of any truth contrary to the Confession of Faith, he would preach it. He replied, "O, yes, but I would leave the Presbyterian Church first."

Such a course is honest and straightforward, and would command the respect even of those who might not unite in the doctrinal views adopted by the preacher.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—In the House of Representatives on the 13th instant, the Ways and Means Committee ordered a favorable report on Breckinridge's bill to abolish unnecessary customs districts and ports. It abolishes 60 districts, leaving 75 in all, and it is estimated that a saving of $100,000 annually will be effected by the bill. Among the districts to be dispensed with are Bridgeton, Burlington; Great Egg Harbor, Little Egg Harbor and Newark, in N. J.

General W. B. Hazen, Chief Signal Officer, died in Washington on the evening of the 16th instant, aged 56 years. He had been suffering for some time from a constitutional disease, but the immediate cause of his death was a severe cold contracted at the President's reception to the Diplomatic Corps.

The gross mineral output of Montana last year is stated at $24,000,000, of which there was $3,500,000 in gold, $7,000,000 in copper, and $13,500,000 in silver. Governor Swineford, of Alaska, arrived in St. Paul on the 12th, on his way to Washington. He says the white population of Alaska has more than doubled in eighteen months.

Two Catawba Indians were in Columbus, S. C., recently, as representatives of their tribe, seeking redress for sequestration of their territory, which they claimed had been reduced to less than 800 acres.

The Superior Court in Cincinnati has rendered a decision affirming the constitutionality of the Dow liquor law, and declaring that it applies to wholesale dealers. The case will be appealed to the Supreme Court.

There is fear of a coal famine in Chicago, less than 1000 tons being now stored on the South Side of that city, against 60,000 tons a year ago. Meantime the demand has increased twenty-five per cent. According to an Associated Press despatch, a prominent coal merchant says the trouble is caused by the inability of the railroads to handle the amount required.

It was said in New York last week that "at least 10,000 workmen have been thrown out of employment, and that 30,000 persons are suffering as a result of the strike of the 3000 coal handlers." The retail price of coal for all sizes, except pea, advanced to $8 per ton in Brooklyn and New York. This price is not likely to continue, as the Long Island Company, at Hunter's Point, are offering to sell at $4.75 per ton.

On the 13th instant, more than 223,000 cubic yards of limestone and slate rock on the bank of the Canadian side of the Niagara River, near the Horseshoe Falls, fell with a crash that was heard and felt for miles around. The break has made a considerable change in the appearance of the bank, and has exposed the dark chasm behind the fall. The mass of rock that fell was sixty feet wide by over one hundred long and one hundred and seventy feet deep. The fall from the main rock has left a perpendicular wall. The tremendous weight of ice which has accumulated during the past three weeks, with the steady frosty weather and low water, was the cause of the break.

A correspondent of the Voice, writing from Atlanta, Ga., says that Mayor Hillyer, on retiring from office on the 3d instant, used the following language: "Allusion has been made in print to alleged prosperity in other cities where the liquor traffic is still tolerated. I assert confidently that Atlanta has prospered more than any of them in our State, and I think it highly probable that Atlanta has, during the last two years, advanced and increased more in houses built, and population, and in the general elements of prosperity, than the five of the next largest cities in Georgia that hold on to the bar-rooms, put together. Is there any other city, where they have bar-rooms, that has a surplus of over $225,000 in the treasury on a clean balance sheet, at the end of the year, and can sell 4½ per cent. bonds at par?"

Dr. William Perry died on the 11th inst., in Exeter, New Hampshire, aged 98 years. He was a member of the 1811 class in Harvard, and became one of the most eminent physicians of his day. He was the sole survivor of the passengers on Fulton's first steamboat ride down the Hudson, 79 years ago.

It has been reported to President Bowditch, of Albany, that the toboggans on the club chute have been timed at the point of greatest speed, which is when they leave the chute and strike the ground, and found to attain a velocity of ninety-three miles an hour. The timing calculations were carefully made and repeated again and again by a civil engineer. If they are not fallacious, the toboggan is the fastest of vehicles and outstrips even the iceboat.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 418, which was 9 more than during the previous week, and 66 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing 217 were males and 201 females; 57 died of consumption; 56 of pneumonia; 33 of diseases of the heart; 20 of debility; 19 of croup; 13 of marasmus; 12 of apoplexy; 12 of obstruction of the bowels; 11 of paralysis, and 11 of typhoid fever.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4's, 110½; 4's, 127½; 3's, 100½; currency 6's, 125 a 134.

Cotton was quiet but steady at 9½ cts. for middling uplands.

Petroleum was dull and unchanged, viz: 6½ cts. for 70 Abel test in barrels, and 8½ cts. for 110 test in cases.

Feed was quiet and weak. Quotations: Bran, western winter, spot, per ton, $17 a $17.50; do., spring, spot, $16 a $16.50; red middlings, $16 a $17; white middlings, $15 a $20.

Flour and Meal.—Demand for flour was of a hand-to-mouth character, but prices were steadily held. Sales of 125 barrels Penna. family, at $3.80; 125 barrels Penna. roller, straight, at $4.25; 250 barrels Ohio, clear, at $4.25; 125 barrels do., straight, at $4.50; 375 barrels winter patent, at $4.75 a $5; 125 barrels Minnesota, clear, at $4.25, and 375 barrels do., patent, at $3.15 a $5.25. Eye flour was sold in a small way at $3.15 a $3.20 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat closed irregular, No. 2 red left off at 92½ cts. bid and 92½ cts. asked. Rye was steady at 57 cts. per bushel for No. 2 Pennsylvania. Corn was quiet, closing at 45½ cts. bid, and 46½ cts. asked for No. 1 red. Oats were dull, No. 2 white closing at 38½ cts. bid and 38½ cts. asked.

Beef cattle were in fair demand at 3 a 5½ cts.

Sheep were ½ c. lower, at 2 a 5½ cts.

Lambs were dull, at 4 a 7 cts.

Hogs were active and ¼ c. lower. Western, 6½ a 7 cts.; country, 6 a 6½ cts.

FOREIGN.—Lord Idlesleigh died suddenly in London on the morning of the 12th inst. He faintly while ascending the stairs of Lord Salisbury's official residence in Downing Street, as he was about to make a visit. He was taken into the Prime Minister's room and almost instantly expired. Death was occasioned by heart failure.

G. Goschen has issued an address to the electors of the Exchange Division of Liverpool. He maintains that he is still a Liberal, and that he rallied to the support of the Government under the influence of deep conviction that the duty of men of all parties was to close up their ranks in the face of the common danger threatening the existence of the United Kingdom.

W. H. Smith, First Lord of the Treasury and Conservative leader in the House of Commons, has sent a circular to supporters of the Government asking them to make every effort to attend the opening of Parliament as they will be invited to proceed directly to the consideration of questions of grave importance.

A series of evictions was begun on the Winn estates in Kerry on the 11th inst. As the tenants were evicted their houses were burned. Intense excitement prevails in the district, and it is probable that there will be bloodshed.

The rent agitation has reached serious proportions. In Limerick the Sheriffs dread to take part in evictions owing to the menaces of the tenants. The latter are removing their stock and other belongings in order to prevent their seizure. There were 200 farmers engaged in this work on the 17th, near Murroe. The French Government has decided to increase this year's extraordinary military credit from 50,000,000 francs to 80,000,000 francs.

Notwithstanding the strenuous efforts made by Von Moltke and Bismarck to prevent it, the fate of the Army Bill was settled on the 11th by the Reichstag adversely to the Government, and action was immediately taken to dissolve the Chamber. On the re-assembling of the Reichstag, Von Stauffenberg's amendment, limiting the duration of the bill to three years, was voted upon, and the amendment was carried, the vote being 186 to 154.

Emperor William is much affected by the vote and the dissolution, and hopes "the bill will pass in the near future."

The Austrian Cabinet have decided to increase the budget for the War Department by over $5,000,000. The Minister of War will call out several classes of the Reserves in 2d. Mo. instead of 4th Mo. as was intended. Large contracts have been made for military equipments.

An important political and military agreement has been made between Austria and Roumania, with the approval of Germany.

Russian trains pass Wilna daily laden with materials to be used in increasing the fortifications at Warsaw. The Russian Government intends to construct fourteen new forts at Warsaw before spring.

Recent observations are said to indicate the existence of a submarine volcanic crater between the Canary Islands and the coast of Portugal. From a cable-laying steamer in latitude 39° 25' north, longitude 9° 54' west, the water was found to measure 1300 fathoms under the bow and 800 fathoms under the stern, showing the ship to be over the edge of a deep depression in the ocean bottom. It is well known that great inequalities are found in the bed of the sea off Lisbon, and these are thought to be due to a submarine chain of mountains.

Henry Longstreth, No. 723 Sansom St., Philada., has received a few copies of George Pitt's travels Around the World, which will be sent to any part of the country, post paid, on receipt of one dollar.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE.

Near Frankford, (Twenty-third Ward,) Philadelphia.

Physician and Superintendent—JOHN C. HALL, M. D.

Applications for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board of Managers.

DIED, in KENNETT Square, Pa., on the 29th of Sixth Mo. 1886, MARGIE A., only daughter of Sharpless and Margaretta J. Mercer, in the 20th year of her age, a member of London Grove Monthly and Particular Meeting. This dear child bore her long illness with much patience, and though remaining entirely conscious to the last, said comparatively little to those about her; but the calmness and childlike faith, in which she lay awaiting her early dissolution, brought to mind forcibly the promise of Holy Scripture, "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee; because he trusteth in thee."

—, at his late residence, Rahway, N. J., 10th of the Eighth Mo. 1886, MATHIAS E. THORNE, in the 58th year of his age, a member of Rahway Particular and Rahway and Plainfield Monthly Meeting of Friends.

—, from home, suddenly, of heart disease, Twelfth Mo. 8th, 1886, at the residence of her son-in-law, ELL Sharpless, near Moorestown, New Jersey, SARAH A., wife of Ezra Engle, in her 69th year, an esteemed member of Lower Evesham Monthly, and Easton Particular Meeting. She was a woman of meek and quiet spirit, strongly attached to the principles of the gospel, as professed by our religious Society; a diligent attendant of her meetings, manifesting an ardent desire that they might be sustained in their primitive purity; and she gave evidence that she was prepared to be gathered into the heavenly garner.

—, after a short illness, at his residence in Plymouth, Montgomery County, Pa., First Mo. 1st, 1887, JOSEPH ALBERTSON, in the 52nd year of his age, an esteemed member of Plymouth Particular and Gwynedd Monthly Meeting.

—, on the 2nd of First Mo. 1887, at the residence of her son Clayton Willis, near Cardington, Ohio, CYNTHIA, widow of Joel Willis, in the 82nd year of her age. This beloved Friend, after a long life of usefulness, made a peaceful close, expressing a desire to depart and be forever at rest. She was devotedly attached to the doctrines and usages of the Society of Friends.

Third Mo. 2nd, 1844. I have been wanting since our meeting last Fifth-day, to make allusion thereto, yet hardly know how to do it; fearing I should not be able correctly to pen the solemn truths which were sounded amongst us. About the middle of the meeting, our dear friend Sarah Enlen arose, laid off her bonnet, walked along the aisle till she came to the fourth and fifth benches of boys from the back row; upon standing at the end of these, with a hand on each, and her back turned towards the girls, she thus remained, it seemed to me two or three minutes of profound silence, when she commenced nearly thus: "I believe it is in the authority of my dear Lord and Master Jesus Christ, that I am constrained to come and stand thus before you on this side the house. How has my spirit been grieved this day, with the lightness and frivolity of some of your spirits! I have been made to fear that the vials of the Almighty are ready to be poured out on the heads of some of you, for your irreverence towards Him. You have dishonored your exercised teachers and turned into contempt their labors;" with more not remembered. Then proceeding: "Though you are now young, your bones full of marrow, and veins full of blood, which is your life, yet ye may suddenly be brought low. Have ye not seen instances of which in this very house?" She then set forth the awfulness of a death for which we are unprepared; even to be brought before Him, whose eyes are as a flame of fire, and the hand writing on the wall appearing against you! She believed one more visitation was extended; and how pathetically did she plead with them to join in therewith! saying, "Can ye bear with me? I am a mother myself; and from the very depths of my spirit, I feel for you." After something further she returned to her seat, when great stillness prevailed for I suppose about fifteen minutes, when she knelt and interceded nearly thus: "We have all need of mercy, and that our sins and transgressions may be forgiven. But O! dearest Father, more especially would we intercede with thee for the wayward, the untoward, the disobedient, and, may we not say, hardened sons, spare these, O Lord, a little longer. Lengthen out to them the day of thy grace, that they be not cut off. Some of us this morning have been made to believe that for some present not many days, perhaps not many hours, are allotted for the great work of regeneration to be effected. Bow thy heavens, O Lord, and come down! cause their hearts to melt as wax before Thee! that so they may receive again the impression of thy image, which has been defaced by iniquity. Inspirit them, we pray thee, with a desire for thy saving grace! make them to cry out from the inmost recesses of their hearts, 'what shall we do to be saved!'" And then concluding with very fervent petitions that the impression which had this day been made, might fasten as a nail in a sure place, by the Master of assemblies! and that we might all yet unite together in worshipping thee in the silence of all flesh! The meeting closed under a covering of great solemnity: and which lasted for some time after. Not a whisper was to be heard among the girls: many of them being much affected, and several wept aloud. May it not be as the morning cloud or early dew; but, on the contrary, may all profit by it.

Fourth Mo. 2nd. The second day of our Examination: at the close of which I am looking towards resigning my services here, and once more returning to my home; where I hope to be permitted to remain, should life be continued, a comfort and support to my dear mother; be the time longer or shorter that she is spared to us.

Fifth Mo. 1st. Almost one month has elapsed since last note. Am now at home, where I have been for the last three weeks.

19th. Meeting day; and again enabled to pour out my heart in tears. It seems sometimes when thus assembled, as if my eyes were as a fountain unstoppered. And oh! the pleadings which accompany for the life of the poor soul! Lead where thou wilt, do what thou wilt, only save alive.

Sixth Mo. 9th. A precious quiet feeling attends this afternoon; and a good meeting I had this morning. A door of access was opened, and the poor heart enabled to pour itself out: although the evidence is still withheld that my prayers and tears will ever prove availing; nevertheless felt this day afresh encouraged to struggle on; humbly trusting, that as the eye is kept single, the body will be more and more filled with light.

13th. On first gathering into stillness in our little meeting this morning, all strength seemed taken away, and great heaviness overspread, so that for a little time I could see nothing before me but a struggle for life. Whilst musing on my situation with great sadness of heart, access was given to the banqueting house, whereupon tears flowed, till it seemed as if there was no restraining them. I could have wept aloud, my heart seemed so broken. While thus weeping and pleading, Ezra Comfort arose and revived the appeal of poor Hagar, when in her cast-off condition: "Thou, God, seest me." He believed our afflictions were often seen, and prayer heard, when we knew it not, &c. It had a comforting effect. But oh! may it please my Heavenly Father, ere long to grant a little evidence that my sighs are heard, and tears had in remembrance! In looking around, far and near, can see none who travel just the same path I do; and often is the query raised, why is it thus with me?

but I have thought this day, what matter if only enabled to land safely at last? Have remembered that the children formerly, were to "come with weeping," and were to be "led with supplication." Believe I may say, I have experienced of latter time what this hath been; and should the following blessed experience be known, all passed through will be nothing:—"I will cause them to walk by the rivers of waters, in a straight way, wherein they shall not stumble."

16th. First-day. During our silent meeting this morning I strove to keep under religious exercise; though found it harder than sometimes. What a busy enemy we have to contend with! nothing short of Divine help can enable us to withstand his assaults.

23rd. Comforted once more in our silent sitting together this morning, in being enabled to approach the mercy seat, and there to pour out my troubles. I saw and felt my situation, and when access is thus given, oh how my poor life is pleaded for! and to-day the life of my people. May He, who hath apportioned a lone path, for I can see no one travelling with me, (notwithstanding many there are, who are journeying heavenward) be pleased ere long to speak the word only, loose the bonds and set the captive spirit free. Have been sweetly comforted this afternoon, while sitting by the side of my dear and only brother, in believing there is with him a deepening in best things, and how did my heart leap within me for joy! May it please our Heavenly Father to make us all a united band, marching forward towards the heavenly Canaan.

Eighth Mo. 8th. A secret condemnation attends for omitting my little notes. It seems to be something required of me, thus to pen them, whether it is for my own encouragement, or for some similarly poor, tried, tossed soul when I am removed hence! That I leave, while peace attends the little sacrifice. Since last note I have attended some favored meetings. In one of which our dear friend, Joseph Edgerton, who certainly is one of the favored of the Lord, after a time of silence arose, and life arose with him, which all must have been sensible of. My spirit was humbled as in the very dust; while gratitude flowed to Him who was pleased thus to remember the dust of Zion, and to satisfy her poor with bread. There is that handed forth in this day, which is not bread; and it don't satisfy, nor never will. May He who still remains able to feed his people, continue to do it either immediately or instrumentally; but let it come from Thee, dearest Father! for nothing short thereof will satisfy the cravings of an immortal spirit. How often is the little petition poured forth in the secret of my soul, when assembled with my friends for the solemn purpose of worship, that every offering may be restrained that is not of the right preparing. I fear that a day of deep suffering is awaiting this people! but oh! will not a seed be preserved, which shall be accounted to the Lord for a generation?

20th. My time and attention has been so taken up for this week past, it seems as though I hardly had a minute to call my own; a very larg: family, much company, and my little school (about a week since, opened one here at home for a few children round, not large, from 16 to 20), but enough to keep me busy with our other cares.

Ninth Mo. 15th. Thou knowest, O dearest Father! that I love thee. Thou knowest how precious thy cause and testimony are to me! being bound up, may I not say, in my very life; or rather my "life is bound up in the lad's life." To know that Joseph lives, and not only lives but will rule and reign and be the governor of the whole land, is what I travail for; and, oh! if it stand good in Thy sight, rejoice the heart of thy poor child like Israel of old, in that, ere I die, the acknowledgment may be, "It is enough."

Second Mo. 2nd, 1845. Wean me more and more, O Heavenly Father! from every thing here below. Thou hast been pleased, in thy inscrutable wisdom, since my last entry, to remove a prop, Thomas Kite, which I have leaned and depended too much upon. But praised be Thy ever worthy name, thou hast given me to see and feel this day, that thou remainest able to support and sustain all that come to thee singly and with the whole heart.

Fourth Mo. 13th. The first of next month, we expect to open a boarding school for girls. It feels a very great undertaking. Cannot see how I am to get along; yet leave it with Him who has promised (if I am not deceived) to go before and open the way.

Fifth Mo. 8th. Attended our Quarterly Meeting at Germantown. Had the company of several dear friends not members of our Quarter, among whom was S. Hillman, who was lively and instructive in testimony in our last meeting, and in supplication in the first. In her communication she alluded to the removal of testimony-bearers from amongst us, there having been two deaths within the past year, ministers of this Quarterly Meeting, viz: Alice Knight* and Elizabeth Robeson.† She comforted us in the belief, that the mantle of the departed Elishas would be cast on some present; and that there would be raised up in this place, a Deborah, who should stand as a mother in Israel. That it may be so is the prayer of my soul.

For "The Friend."

Memories of the Prairies.

Grain and fruit were produced in great abundance by the new and rich soil of Henry County. In the fall of 1853, corn sold in Salem at from ten to fifteen cents per bushel, and apples and peaches could scarcely be disposed of at all. I remember seeing a load of fine looking peaches offered for sale in town, but no purchasers could be found. They were then offered freely to any who would come and get them. A few small baskets full were taken away, and the balance were shovelled out on the street. There were no easy and quick means of transportation from there at that time; and what were taken away to the newer countries north and westward, were bruised and perishing before a market for them was found. I think peaches have never been so abundant in this place since that season; and in the greater portion of Iowa all efforts to raise them have been unsuccessful.

* Alice Knight resided at Frankfort, Pa., and was a member and minister of that Monthly Meeting. She died there the 24th of Sixth Month, 1844, in the forty-fourth year of her age. For obituary of her, see "The Friend," vol. xvii, p. 336.

Apples, too, were produced in over-abundance that season, and hundreds of bushels rotted upon the ground in the fine young orchards around Salem. I have never found pears plentiful, or seen quinces grown in Iowa.

In the spring of 1854, we moved into Linn County, making the journey of near one hundred miles in open wagons. The country through which we passed was a succession of broad, rolling, beautiful prairies, interlaced with belts of timberland mostly occupying the more broken and hilly districts along the numerous streams that chequer Eastern Iowa. Some towns and settlements through which we passed had been occupied a dozen years or more, but much of our way was through new and sometimes unsettled country. I remember crossing one great prairie (in Washington County, I think) that stretched away to the distant horizon, mile after mile of grassy billows, without one tree or shrub as large as a riding whip, and without a sign of human habitation or presence save the narrow wagon road along which we travelled in our monotonous course. The wild grasses were springing up in their early beauty; but few, if any blossoms had yet appeared on the prairies; mile after mile, like scenes surrounded us, save perhaps, that here or there, one ridge rose a little higher than another; and here or there, one hollow between two grassy billows was cut a little sharper or deeper than its fellows; and here our road would lead us along the ridge top, and again would follow a while the valley.

While crossing this wild prairie, I had my first and only experience with a "joint snake," a reptile of which I had heard many stories. One of the teamsters and I had gone a little way from the road to pick some of the white gum from a cluster of the brown old stalks of "rosin weed," when he called me to see a "joint snake" that he had just struck with his whip. It was a pale looking striped reptile, much resembling the common garter snake, but lighter in color, and had been about 14 or 15 inches in length, but it was now broken into four pieces, but not of equal length, the head piece being nearly as long as the other three combined. It was making lively endeavors to hide itself in the short grass, while the other pieces were wriggling around in quite a remarkable manner. They were all plump and square-ended, as a broken pipe-stem, except one that had been mashed and somewhat mutilated by the stroke of the whip. There was little sign of blood, and no internal organs visible. The old driver repeated the strange story that I had often before heard, that these pieces would, if not killed separately, get together again, and be as good a snake as ever, but now as the wagons were getting some distance in advance of us, we had not time to make very extensive observations on this interesting subject; so the old man put an end to the hopes and sufferings of the head portion and we hurried away.

Of course there is no credit due to the story alluded to, but it owes its origin to some strange peculiarities of this creature, and I presume that the facts are that it is a snake with a short body and comparatively long tail, which is very frail or brittle, similar to that of some species of lizards and that it is only this portion that is broken to pieces by accident, while all the vital organs remain in the body connected with the head. Rattlesnakes of a small dark-colored variety are quite numerous on the newly settled prairies and along the brushy borders of the timber. They seldom exceed two or three feet in length, but are as venomous as the larger varieties, and are only less dangerous because less powerful, and that is almost balanced by their more sly and wily dispositions. Accidents frequently occurred by them in the new country.

A friend of mine once went to a spring that bubbled up among the grass in a low place on the prairie, to quench his thirst. Kneeling down, he placed one hand on either side, and stooped forward and drank from the little pool; then glancing backward under his breast he saw one of these ugly beasts coiled in the grass, ready to strike its deadly fangs into his body at any moment, but he displayed such agility in rising and getting away, that he escaped unharmed.

Another young man, a cousin of mine, sat squarely down upon one that lay unseen in the grass beside him, and when it raised its quivering tail closely between his knees with its well known but never welcome music, he too, displayed such great activity that he escaped unhurt, but the early settlers were not always so fortunate, and numerous instances of their being bitten occurred.

A much larger variety, marked with brighter yellow, inhabits the timber-lands, and were numerous about the stone quarries and rocky hills bordering the rivers, but seldom, if ever, venture on the prairies. Their rattle can be heard to a distance of two or three hundred yards and when sounded amidst the thick ferns or brushwood of some deep hollow, or in the shadows of night, I think it the most terror-inspiring sound I have ever heard. Another very ugly, though I believe harmless, snake that inhabited the prairies, was the "hissing adder." They attained a length of two or three feet, and when molested would raise their heads six or eight inches from the ground, flattening out that part of the body raised up, into a broad thin sheet, and make a loud hissing noise. It was said that they blew poison into the faces of their foes in this way, but I never saw any evidence of the truth of the story. "Blue racers" and "black snakes" find shelter both in the timber-lands and grass of the prairies; and a number of other varieties are more or less numerous; but the largest of all the prairie reptiles was the "bull snake," which sometimes attained to quite a formidable size and appearance, but I believe was entirely harmless. It made a loud blowing noise. It was an object of special terror to cattle, and many an unpleasant accident has occurred by the running away of ox teams when one of these ill-looking creatures appeared in the grass or by the roadside. All these varieties have almost or altogether disappeared as the advancing settlements have taken possession of their old time abodes.

After the "joint snake was disposed of, our wagons rolled on over nature's monotonous but ever beautiful meadows, slowly approaching the distant timber line that lay to our right, bending away almost in front of us, and at its edge, scattered all along were the houses and barns, and fields of the pioneer settlers. In one place in front of us quite a group of houses appeared, and when the question was asked, "what town that was," our driver said it was "Stringtown," and so it proved to be, for it was nothing more than a portion of the same scattered settlement here viewed for a distance from its end. Thus the buildings seemed grouped together, and were easily mistaken for a village.

A dozen miles before reaching Iowa City our road lay for some distance along the summit of a high ridge, overlooking on the one hand the deep and partly wooded valley of the Iowa River, which flowed at the foot of a steeply descending slope and less than a mile away; and, on the other hand, a beautiful undulating expanse of prairie and timber lands interspersed, was spread out below and before us as far as the eye could reach. The ridge along which we travelled was wooded with a straggling forest in which hardy looking oaks predominated. Here our road wound along through a group of ancient mounds, the monuments of that strangely far away people, the "Mound Builders." I think there were about twenty in this cluster on the crest of the hill. They were small, perhaps not more than three to four or five feet high and ten or twelve broad, but half way down the hill slope towards the river, on a "bench" of the hill, there was one or two much larger ones. Some of the largest trees in this vicinity stood upon these mounds, proving their antiquity, and showing the situation to have been a high prairie ridge when they were built. Farther up the river, where a still higher crest overlooks the city. I have been told there are a few yet larger mounds. These, and one on a hill in Jones County, are all the "Indian mounds" I have met with in Iowa.

[The following communication has been received from a Friend residing in North Carolina; and it is published because it seems to be the expression of an honest concern for the promotion of truth and righteousness.—Ed.]

For "The Friend."

Dear Friends,—This day I am seventy-three years old, as it pleased the great Shepherd of Israel; and I have felt a motion of spirit to write a few lines to you, of encouragement to stand fast to the first principles of ancient Friends; for they did take hold of the everlasting truth as it is in Christ Jesus our Lord, and held it to it through much suffering, looking to Jesus whom they knew to be the Author and Finisher of the saint's everlasting faith—the faith that works by love and purifies the heart, and makes it a fit temple for the Lord's heavenly presence to dwell in.

It does my soul good to believe that you of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting know there is but one faith that is saving, and that it is the gift of God. It is all a spiritual work from first to last, for the battle is the Lord's, and his is the victory over every appearing of our adversary, and to Him be all the glory, for unto Him alone it is due, who alone is worthy for evermore, world without end.

Now dear Friends, I feel to say to you, the meetings in the name of Friends hereaway seem very much changed, not known from others in dress and address, and doctrine also in general. The love of the world and its vain fashions, seems to have got the victory in the hearts of a majority of those professing to be Friends. A sorrowful thing, in truth, it is. They seem to admire outside work, as though the shadow of forms and ceremonies were paramount to the substance; forgetting that Christ is the substance of all spiritual and saving religion. When the angel spoke to John to rise and measure the temple, he was not to measure the outward court, but to leave it out; so we see that pure religion is an internal work of the soul in the heart that humbly submits to the operations of the Holy Spirit, showing the exceeding sinfulness of sin. Now this is godly sorrow that works a repentance not to be repented of, if patience is abode in. This is very different from the sorrow of the world which worketh death.

Here the preachers call up mourners to a bench, as if that was the only place to find the dear Master. Now this is one of the world's fashions and ways to deceive the simple of all ages. My spirit mourns over such work. O, may the good Lord in mercy help the people in general to discern, to distinguish between the voice of the True Shepherd and the voice of the stranger! When Christ puts forth his own sheep, He goes before them and they follow Him; and all true ministers sent by Him heed not the voice of the stranger, but preach as the Lord told Jonah, "Preach the preaching that I bid thee." But those sent by men speak to please men, because of advantage, and care not for the flock, but will flee when danger comes, because they are hirelings, and care not for the flock. But the Lord's true ministers ever hold their Master as their all in all; and these preach his gospel, the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth—to the Jew and also to the Gentile,—for therein is the righteousness of God revealed unto us.

The love of the world and the deceitfulness of riches seem to occupy the minds of a vast number of professors in this age of the world, who are unmindful of what was said to the man who was about to pull down his barns and build greater, "thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee;" then whose shall these things be which thou hast provided. So is every one that is not rich towards God—solemn thought indeed.

Pride seems to be the crowning sin of this country at the present day; and I much crave that we all would remember, that a proud man cannot be a happy man, and pride goeth before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall; and that pride and fullness of bread were the sins that caused Jerusalem's overthrow. Oh, dear reader, whosoever thou art, remember that humility goes before honor, and there is no true honor but what comes from God. Then

Be humble, learn thyself to scan,
Know pride was never made for man.

Oh that the whole world might soon come to the enjoyment of a meek and quiet spirit; then all wars and bloodshed would cease, from the rivers to the ends of the earth; then we would be prepared to love our neighbor as ourselves; then the wilderness would blossom as the rose, as saith the Prophet, neither would any thing hurt nor harm in all the Lord's holy mountain.

Now I am impressed with the feeling that many, very many, have left-off the watch, and have taken their flight from Christ, either on the Sabbath day or in the winter. His people ever have been, are now and ever will be a tried people; yet He never will leave nor forsake them if they will cleave to Him. They may have to pass through deep waters, yet his promise is to be with them. His promises are yea and amen. The baptism of the Holy Ghost and fire is what all his children must experience before they can attain unto that eternal life prepared for the people of God. Listen, oh reader! "Eye hath not seen nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God has prepared for them that love Him." We were all created for a purpose of his own glory; and his creatures must often think in their getting along in this world of sorrows, that it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps. Hence we see the great need of waiting on the dear Master in all our movements; and then He will strengthen us to bring honour to his great and worthy name. He then will show us the beauty of holiness, and will teach us how to worship Him in the spirit and in the truth—the only true worship of the great Father of lights, the true light that lighteth every one that cometh into the world. God is Light, and in Him is no darkness; if we walk in the light as He is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth us from all sin.

There are at this day many of different religious persuasions who have gone out under the name of ministers of the Gospel of the meek and blessed Jesus. The Scriptures tell us, "No man taketh this honor to himself, but he that is called of God as was Aaron." From this we see that the Lord's ministers must be chosen by Him, the Minister of ministers, qualified, anointed and appointed, sent forth with a commission from Him. Then their words will not return void, for this is the Lord's work and not man's. His chosen ones cannot receive pay, for they have received their ministry of the Lord Jesus freely; and they minister freely as the great Master said, "Freely ye have received, freely give." This is what He told his disciples when He sent them out; and when they returned, He said, "Lacked ye any thing, and they said, nothing, Lord." He has ever been their sufficiency. He says, "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world."

But I fear some professed ministers are seeking after filthy lucre, perhaps, more than the maintaining of the blessed Truth, and the good of their hearers. Such preachers neither go into the Kingdom of Heaven, nor suffer them that were entering to go in. Oh what a solemn reckoning there will be at the judgment of the great day when all the hidden things of darkness will be brought to light!

Now my mind seems to turn to Water Baptism, so much used of late even by many bearing the name of "Friend." Yet there is but one faith, one Lord, one baptism which is that of the Holy Ghost and fire, that consumes every thing that defiles the heart, and thus makes it fit for the Lord's holy presence to dwell in.

Now a few thoughts on the Sacraments, so called, that had its name from a military phrase not to be found in all the Scriptures of Divine truth. It never can affect the immortal part—a shadow only—not the substance, for Christ is the substance of all. Verily, "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you," meaning spiritual life. This eating and drinking is a partaking of the mystical flesh and blood of Christ in the soul. When we all meet in one spirit, with a single eye to the Lord, we are often made to sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus.

Now, unto Him who is able to keep his children in the truth, be everlasting praises, who alone is worthy, world without end.—AMEN.

Twelfth Month 26th, 1886.

19th. Had this day an appointed meeting at the widow Gibson's, which was small. [The attenders] were mostly of the descendants of Friends. * * * It being a very rainy morning [is] supposed to have hindered many of the neighbors, and horses being very scarce among them. It was to me a laborious barren time at the beginning, but was made willing to become a fool, and through Divine help to discharge myself faithfully among them on this subject—that Jerusalem is slain and Judah is fallen, for * * * their doings have provoked the Lord. This was the cause of the fall of the Jews, and is also applicable to the situation of Friends on this island; but that the Lord is still willing to help the little remnant that are left if they are faithful to build up the waste places of Zion, and to repair all the breaches. The meeting ended, I hope, to some satisfaction. I may say at least it was to the peace of my own mind.

20th. Rode this morning to where the meeting-house called the Spring, stood, two and a half miles from the widow Gibson's. There is now said to be twenty-eight acres of the best kind of land belonging to it. The house forty feet by forty feet, built of stone, the walls two feet thick, but shattered almost down by the hurricane. There lives here a brother of John Luke, whose name is William Luke. His wife and several children [and] some of his neighbors being present, we had a seasonable and satisfactory time in his family. We find that John Luke pays the tax for this land and holds it. Went to dinner with Benjamin Buck, who had invited us and sundry of his neighbors to dinner with him this afternoon. We had a meeting with them, which was I believe to the Master's honor, as we discharged ourselves according to the ability given to the tendering of some hearts. Returned to the widow Gibson's to lodge, who is very kind and tender of us. Also her son Rowland is a tender-hearted man.

21st. Had this morning, previous to leaving them a solid opportunity in the family, to the tendering of their hearts; to the Lord's praise be it spoken, who is never wanting on his part as there is a single eye kept to Him. Rode to Bridgetown in time for dinner at John Luke's. Went in the afternoon to places where lived descendants of Friends. One which is Moses Miller, who not being at home, went to see the place where Friends formerly had a burying ground, which is called Pilgrim, having been possessed by a Friend of that name; but is now the place of residence of the Governor of the Island. There is no mark of a burying left but one stone, which shows the place—no walls or enclosure.

23d. Had to-day two meetings in Bridgetown, at the house of John Luke, which were pretty large, particularly in the afternoon, at which were several hundred people of the fashionable kind, and though we feel ourselves very weak and little, yet by the Lord's assistance we are made able to do our duty among them, having some very close and hard things to us, for to deliver.

24th. Went with dear companion to breakfast with Joseph Gibson, a nephew of John Luke, who I think a very tender-spirited man. His wife also, though not like a Friend in appearance, is a very tender-spirited, kind and affectionate woman. Oh that there were among them some that would be as nursing fathers and nursing mothers, that so the pure plant might be watered, and might, through the Lord's power, be seen to grow and flourish among the descendants of Friends on this island; for I may say to his praise that there is great tenderness in some. * * * I believe they are truly rejoiced at our coming among them. The widow Gibson with several of her children were at the meeting with us yesterday, she not having been in town I think she said for two years.

Went this afternoon to John Luke's plantation, about five miles from Bridgetown, on our way to where the Thicket meeting-house stood, where we lodged.

25th. This morning we set off from John Luke's plantation for the Thicket, where we had sent a letter desiring to have a meeting as near the place where the meeting-house stood as was most convenient. At ten o'clock this morning, the letter was sent to one Ralph Weekes, who is a descendant of Friends, but has been educated in the way of the Church of England, whose grandfather had formerly been clerk of that

Monthly Meeting; but for want of keeping his place had married a rich widow in 1707, and on the day of his marriage was baptized, as they call it. But during his life [he] kept the meeting-house in good order for the reception of Friends, and at his own house entertained them. We were shown the cleats that Friends used to hang their hammocks by for want of bedding, there often being so many. But lamentable is the degeneracy, at present there not being one in all that Parish, as they call it, that professes with us. We did not hold a meeting there. We dined with Ralph Weekes, who entertained us kindly, and went with us to show us the ruins of the [Thicket] meeting-house, which was about forty-five feet long and twenty-five wide, and about seven acres of land belonging to it. He also went with us to Friends' burying ground, near three miles off, at a place called St. Philips, being near a church (so called) of that name. This is a large burying place, and has been formerly kept in good order, but is now in a very ruinous situation. Here is a number of vaults which are large and dug out of the solid stone, belonging to the Weekes and other families that formerly were Friends, which are very curious and worth going to see. But oh it is sorrowful that there is now none of the honorable stock of Friends left, but what are entirely gone from every appearance of the simplicity of the pure truth. * * * We had something to deliver at the table of Ralph Weekes' which appeared to be kindly received, and which yielded peace to our own minds. May the Lord's name be praised. He wanted us to appoint some future day to hold a meeting, which he said should be held at his house, for which he was very pressing and assured us that we should have, as he termed it, a large congregation; but we told him we could not at this time engage to come at any time as we did not know but we might be clear, but that if it should be that we should still desire to have a meeting, we would give him proper notice. Took our leave of the family and returned to lodge at John Luke's plantation.

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 115.

DIVINE CARE AND PROTECTION.

There are many remarkable instances on record of the care which He, without whose notice not a sparrow falls to the ground, extends for the help and preservation of those who place their trust in Him. An article in the Cynosure relates the manner in which a teacher who was imbued with religious feeling, took advantage of a severe disease, which had caused the death of several of her scholars, to impress upon the survivors the importance of looking unto the Lord, who alone can control all events. Gathering the frightened survivors, she opened the Bible and read to them the 91st Psalm: "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty. There shall no evil befall thee, neither shall any plague come nigh thy dwelling." All were hushed into quiet hopefulness with the sweet words of assurance of the Psalmist. Then the recitations followed as usual.

Of course, there could be no assurance of exemption from physical disease, yet it remains an eternal truth, that no evil shall befall him who dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High—who lives in communion with his God and Saviour. To such an one, all the occurrences of life, "work together for good."

William Tallack relates of the late Endre Dahl, a well-known and greatly respected Norwegian Friend, that when a young man, he came to England in 1843. After a considerable stay at Newcastle, he took passage in a small vessel bound for Norway, and found that he had a very ungodly and scoffing band of companions on board. In crossing the German Ocean, they were run down in the night by a much larger ship on her way to England. The smaller vessel began to sink, and, but for the vigorous assistance furnished by young Dahl, the little company on board must have gone with her, as the captain of the other ship pitilessly pursued his course and left them to their fate. They managed, however, to get into their boat, which was a leaky one. They had only one oar to row with, and a pair of boots to bale out the water. E. Dahl in this extremity was able to maintain a confident trust in God, and a profound peace. His companions who had previously ridiculed him, now relied upon him for comfort and guidance. He exhorted them to turn to the Lord.

When morning broke, the ship which had run them down was a mere speck on the distant horizon, and quite beyond the reach of any such poor signals of distress as the men in the boat could make. But as the day passed on it became evident that the ship had completely reversed her course, and was again approaching them. By-and-by she came up to them, and took them all on board, shortly after which the little leaky boat sunk beneath the waters. Endre Dahl could not refrain from expressing to the captain of the ship his sense of the cruelty he had at first shown in sailing away, and leaving them to their fate; but he also asked him why, after proceeding so long on his way, he had at length come back to their rescue. The captain confessed that he hardly knew why he had returned, for he had fully resolved to take no further trouble in the matter. But a mysterious impulse to rescue them had, after all, come upon him so strongly that he felt impelled to yield to it, and accordingly did so. The earnest prayers in the boat, and the strong faith reposed in God by the leader of the little party, had been responded to by the Highest.

An interesting incident is related in the S. S. Classmate that occurred in the Highlands of Scotland years ago, when inns were not numerous, and wayfarers were accustomed to ask lodgings at the houses by the wayside. At a lonely part of a highland road a weaver had his home. He was a very good man, and one who had real faith in God. He was poor, but hospitable, and kindly entertained belated strangers who asked to tarry for the night. But he was sometimes imposed upon by worthless characters, who rose early and made their escape with what they could most readily carry off. His wife frequently said to him that if he took in people he knew nothing of, after the way he had been doing, they would be ruined by their depredations; but he felt the necessity laid upon him, in his circumstances, to fulfill the Scripture command "to entertain strangers," and, although he wished to discriminate, he could not think of giving up the practice.

A person presented himself at his door shortly after he had suffered at the hands of dishonest guests; and he, wishing to satisfy himself and his wife of the man's goodness of character, said, "Well, now, you are a stranger to me; what security do you give that you are such a person as I ought to entertain?" Without a moment's hesitation the man answered, "The Lord." "That's quite enough," said the good man, opening the door wide to the wall. "Come in, come in. I receive you in the name of the Lord." And so the stranger admitted was hospitably treated, and, after worship was shown to bed; but he was a thorough rogue, and before the day dawned he had left the house with a web the weaver had got ready on the previous evening to carry to his employer.

When the weaver and his wife got up the next morning, and found the fellow gone, his wife was in great perplexity, and, in her anxiety, gave way to upbraiding her husband, saying, "Now, you see, it is just as I said; we shall certainly be ruined by this foolish practice of yours. What are we now to do? The web's away, and how are we to live until you weave another?"

It was a dark day to her, but not so to him; for he said, "I got a good security, and I keep the security, and I am sure it will be all for the best. It was for the Lord's sake I received him; and although he has proved himself unworthy of our hospitality, yet Jesus is worthy, and we shall yet lose nothing by it."

As the thief was crossing a hill, shunning the usual road, God enveloped him in a misty covering. He wandered long upon the hillside, this way and that, and at last got to the foot of the hill, and, knocking at a cottage, he asked if they would keep him for the night. The good man of the house recognized the voice and said to him at once, "Come in, and down with the web!" The thief was thunderstruck, while the man said, "When you next intend to play similar pranks, mind not to give your security!" Down fell the web, and the thief, in consternation, took to his heels.

The explanation of the matter is, that the thief got bewildered in the mist, and instead of going down the farther side of the hill, he came down the same side, and knocked at the very cottage door from which he had set out in the morning with the poor man's web.

The Rochester Democrat describes as follows, a remarkable occurrence, on a New York express train that was running west from Albany:—

The engine's headlight threw a strong reflection in advance, but the storm was so blinding it was almost impossible to distinguish anything even at a short distance. Under such circumstances instinct necessarily takes the place of sight. All seemed to be going well, when, in an instant, the engineer reversed his engine, applied the air brakes, and came to a full stop. Why he did so we could not tell any more than any of us can account for the dread of coming disaster and death, and to the wondering inquiry of his fireman he simply said: "I feel that something's wrong." Seizing a lantern, he swung himself down from the cab and went forward to investigate. Everything appeared to be right, and he was about to return to his engine, when his eye caught sight of a peculiar appearance at the joint of the rail next to him. Brushing the accumulated snow away, he looked a moment, and then uttered an exclamation of horror. The rails on both sides had been unspiked and would have turned over the instant the engine touched them. What inspired this attempt at train-wrecking is unknown, but it was presumed the confederates of some prisoners who were on the train hoped, in the confusion of an accident, to deliver their friends.

Engineer John Donoboe, of Albany, to whose wonderful instinct was due the salvation of the train, when asked by the writer why he stopped his engine, said:

"I can't tell why, I only know I felt something was wrong."

There is peace, there is joy, there is fullness of satisfaction in seeking and serving God, and here is none in seeking and serving aught else in the universe.

For "The Friend."

How sweet to breathe the breath of heaven!
And feel the calming influence given,
Of Him who reigns above;
'Tis like the dew from Hermon's hill
That on the tender plants distil
Refreshments from God's love.

Tho' night's dark clouds around us spread,
In solemn silence, as the dead;
The still small voice is nigh,
To free our minds from earthly care;
And, on the wings of heart-felt prayer,
To waft them to the sky.

O grace divine! How can there be
A stronger proof that 'tis from thee
All heavenly blessings flow?
The unction from the Holy One,
Will give the prayer, "Thy will be done,"
And make a heaven below.

Our blessed Lord, while here with men,
Taught his disciples, even then,
The prayer that still is given,
And will remain till time is run,—
"Thy kingdom come, thy will be done,
On earth as 'tis in heaven."

Where is his kingdom here to be?
If not in hearts from sin set free,
And Satan's power left fall?
We then would own Christ's saving power
To rule and reign each day and hour:
"And crown Him Lord of all."

Our songs of praise would then be said,
More from the heart than from the head;
And, if in words at all,
Would rise in holy anthems high
To Him who reigns above the sky,
"And crown Him Lord of all."

But earthly sounds may mortals please,
And not the ear of Him who sees
As never man can see.
For man is clothed with cumb'ring clay,
Until the great eternal day,
Shall set the captive free.

Then, we shall know as we are known,
And find, that earthly sounds alone
Will give no lasting charm;
Nor raise the soul from earth to heaven,
Where no enchantments need be given
To soothe, or to alarm.

AMEN!

Selected.

BY F. G. BROWNING.
I cannot say,
Beneath the pressure of life's cares to-day,
I joy in these;
But I can say
That I had rather walk this rugged way,
If Him it please.

I cannot feel
That all is well, when dark'ning clouds conceal
The shining sun;
But then, I know
God lives and loves; and say, since it is so,
Thy will be done.

I cannot speak
In happy tones: the tear-drops on my cheek
Show I am sad;
But I can speak
Of grace to suffer with submission meek,
Until made glad.

I do not see
Why God should e'en permit some things to be
When He is love;
But I can see,
Though often dimly, through the mystery,
His hand above!

I do not know
Where falls the seed, that I have tried to sow
With greatest care;
But I shall know
The meaning of each waiting-hour below,
Sometime, somewhere!

I do not look
Upon the present, nor in Nature's book,
To read my fate;
But I do look
For promised blessings in God's Holy Book:
And, I can wait.

I may not try
To keep the hot tears back—'but hush that sigh
"It might have been!"
And try to still Each rising murmur, and to God's sweet will Respond, "Amen!"

Tender lights on sky and sea;
Milk-white blossoms on the tree;
Lull of storms and tempest bleak;
Faint bloom on a wan young cheek,
"Spring, the blessed spring is nigh!"
Said my darling, hopefully.

Violets' breath and primrose rays;
Sunshine threading leafy ways;
Gentle steps that, weak and slow,
Through the woodland pathways go,
"It were sad in spring to die,"
Said my darling, wistfully.

Glorious summer, crowned with flowers;
Dreary days of golden hours;
Sunset-crimsoned hills afar;
Dewy eve, and silver star,
"Strength may come with by-and-by"
Said my darling, patiently.

Growing fruits and ripening grain,
Languid days and nights of pain,
Fields so golden, earth so glad,
And a young life doomed! " 'Tis sad
Through the bright days here to lie,"
Said my darling, wearily.

Sighing winds and falling leaves,
Yearning love, that vainly grieves;
Patient eyes, with farewell gaze
Greeting the wan autumn days,
"Happy world, fair world, good-by,"
Said my darling, tenderly.

Wailing storms and weeping skies;
Soft wings spread for Paradise;
Solemn whispering accents thrilled
With the awe of hope fulfilled,
"Life! O blissful life on high!"
Breathed my darling, rapturously.

Wreathing snowdrifts, far and wide,
Mantling o'er the lone hillside,
Purer than that stainless veil—
Like a folded lily pale,
While the moaning blast goes by,
Sleeps my darling, peacefully.

Chambers's Journal.

"Golden vials full of odours, which are the prayers of the saints." Rev. v. 8.

The word vials is rendered in the Revised Version, as "bowls." A writer in the S. S. Times says, "The article was a broad, flat vessel, used for drinking, or for pouring out libations in worship or sacrifice; but sometimes used for ointments or even for cinerary urns. Our museums present abundant examples of these "phials," or bowls, with or without a foot or standard, and with or without handles at the sides. In the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York are a number of them in silver, of a most curious manufacture and decoration, and probably at least as old as 500 B. C. As the Greek classics and inscriptions say, they were given as votive offerings in vast numbers. Of those found by Di Cesnola in the vaults of the temple at Curium in Cyprus, the fragments showed that here had been hundreds, if not thousands. But as silver does not endure unchanged like gold, only a few remain. The inscriptions on some of them, however, show that they were royal presents at the shrine. At Delphi, the famous Greek shrine, there must have been enough of them to furnish an army. Aristotle says that silver was the material of these bowls, as water is of fog and rain. But the golden bowls with the incense denote something extraordinary. Silver bowls gilded, of most exquisite workmanship, may be seen in the Metropolitan Museum of Art, along with some in bronze and in pottery; along with one golden one. All came from the temples and tombs of Cyprus. Doubtless, also, the divining bowls of a later period, such as were found in Mesopotamia by Layard, would come under the general classification. Two of this sort, inscribed within in a kind of Hebrew character, were brought by Dr. W. Hayes Ward, from Babylonia, as one of the indirect results of the Wolfe Expedition. The bowls of this passage, therefore, present to the Oriental mind the most excellent and beautiful oblation and libation.

Eskimo Clothing.—F. Schwatka says that reindeer skin forms a principal part of the clothing of all the Eskimo tribes from the Atlantic to the Pacific. He thinks it makes the warmest clothing known to the world, and the warmest bedding also. He found when at North Hudson Bay, and the thermometer fell to 30 or 40 degrees below zero, that he could not sleep comfortably warm under two buffalo robes and some blankets, but when he procured a sleeping-bag made of two large reindeer skins, the cold nights were no longer to be dreaded.

Agricultural Suggestions.—The Independent suggests that there is a wide field of valuable labor open for agriculturist colleges and others interested, in the introduction and development of vegetables, fruits and animals. If we compare the wild strawberry with some of the new varieties, or the original tuber of the potato with the large and mealy forms now cultivated; it is easy to imagine that many of our wild fruits and vegetables may by careful cultivation be correspondingly improved. Among the plants which it mentions as worthy of being tested, are the Dewberry, Walnut, Persimmon, Wild rice, Wild plum, Huckleberries, Cranberry and American Lotus.

In speaking of animals, it says: "Let Georgia introduce and breed the beautiful milch goat of Damascus, and Mississippi the magnificent, the royal white ass of Aden; let Florida test the enormous buffalo of southern Mesopotamia, and Louisiana that of the humped oxen of India, while Dakota shall see what can be made out of our American bison; let Maine breed the horns out of the moose, and New York out of the elk, and see if we cannot have a better animal than the reindeer for draft or food; let Montana reduce the mountain sheep to civilization; and let our common deer be raised for market in the pastures. The ostrich is already domesticated in California, but why are not the emu, the Persian bustard, the Yucatan turkey, and fifty kinds of partridges, geese and ducks domesticated?"

Angora Goats.—Gilmore, of California, has a flock of 200 Angora goats, which he keeps on Mount Tellac, where they contentedly graze by day and camp for the night, at an elevation of about 10,000 feet. These goats take care of themselves and each yields about four pounds of mohair a year. This material is used largely for railway car cushions. Seven years ago there was not a single mohair factory in this country; now there are about forty of them.

Soda Locomotives.—A remarkably practical application of a well-known scientific fact has been recently made in the Soda-Locomotive.

These engines are now used in the St. Gothard Tunnel, Berlin, and other European cities, and are now to be put into operation in Minneapolis, where steam engines are forbidden on the streets. When caustic soda is exposed to the action of steam, an intense heat is caused. The caustic soda is thus used instead of fuel. The boiler is heated at the central station by superheated steam, after which the heat is kept up by allowing the exhaust steam to play upon the soda, the heat thus being formed keeping the water in the boiler at the required temperature. When the soda is all saturated, which occurs in about six hours, it is submitted to the action of superheated steam, which removes all the moisture from it, leaving it ready for use again. The locomotive is the invention of a German engineer.

Salt in Gas-pipes.—A natural gas company furnishing Washington, Pa., with the gaseous fuel, found their main pipe obstructed. It was at first supposed to have been closed by water freezing in the pipes, but, on investigation, it was discovered that the bore was entirely filled by crystalline salt, which had been deposited from the brine flowing with the gas. The mass extended a distance of forty feet.

Effects of Cold.—James Neill, a Methodist minister, recently described a terrible experience, which he underwent while riding circuit in Schuylkill and Carbon Counties, Pa., years before.

"While on this circuit I had an experience on the mountains, from the effects of which I have never fully recovered. One winter's day I left Mauch Chunk for an appointment in the mountains. In the valley, the thermometer registered 16 degrees below zero, and when I reached the plateau it touched 20 degrees below, with the wind blowing 20 miles per hour. Presently I experienced sharp piercing pain throughout my body, and every nerve was affected. In a short time the pain ceased in the lower extremities, and gradually passed upward until I was entirely free from suffering. I congratulated myself that I was getting along so nicely, and spoke encouragingly to my hardy and faithful pony. In a few moments I felt sensations of intense happiness, a thousand rainbows danced before my vision, seraphic songs of sweetest melody sounded in my ears, and I felt that I was being borne upward on wings of delight, when suddenly I felt a severe shock and realized that I had fallen off my horse to the frozen ground. The shock of the fall recalled me partially to my senses, and I realized that I was freezing to death. I attempted to move my feet and arms, but could not. With an effort born of desperation, I succeeded finally in dragging myself a few yards over the hard ground. The time occupied probably five minutes; it seemed as many weeks to me. My pony seemed to comprehend the desperate situation, and came and rubbed his nose in my face; the warm breath was on my cheek. The exercise of crawling revived me a little, and I finally succeeded in getting into an upright position, leaning heavily against my pony, who now slowly started onward. After going a short distance I met the farmer and his son, who were expecting me at their home, and, who, becoming alarmed at my prolonged absence, started out to see what was wrong. When I was taken into their house, I swooned, and when I again awoke, I was standing in a barrel of spring water, and again relapsed into insensibility. I did not wake again until next morning, when I found myself in bed with my boots on. Upon asking why this was done, my host replied that he had rescued a number of men from freezing, but that I was nearer death's door than any he had ever seen, and had my boots been taken off the flesh would have come off with them."—Christian Advocate.

The Skunk.—C. C. Abbott in his Rambles about Home describes some of the habits of this animal as observed by himself. One trait is the marvelous quickness with which it can bury itself in soft ground. In the autumn of 1881, he met one in an open meadow, which immediately ran to a clump of trees and in less than one minute tunneled so far beneath the roots as to be out of sight. He relates another instance in which one that was hard pressed buried itself so quickly a to escape. "It did not throw out the dirt behind it as it progressed, but wormed itself through the loose earth, much as a mole does. I subsequently determined that the skunks, in this case, reached a depth of four feet and tunneled a distance of nearly twenty."

Frogs, birds' eggs and snakes, he says, seem to be their chief articles of food. To these should be added the grubs of beetles and other insect which they seek in their subterranean hiding places. In some parts of the "Pines" of New Jersey, the small round holes which they make when thus engaged, are quite numerous. When a snake is discovered it is seized by the tail and vigorously shaken till it is disabled, before being eaten.

Abbott describes a combat which he witnessed between a large skunk and a black snake which he thought was fully five feet in length. The skunk had evidently seized the snake by the tail and it had turned and enveloped the assailant in its coils, completely encircling both neck and body. The head was so far free that the skunk could give the snake nip after nip, though it could not get a strong enough hold to disable it. "Rolling over and over, hissing and snapping, the snake nearly concealed by the long hair of the skunk, the two creatures presented a strange spectacle. He struck the combatants a blow with a stick, when the snake relinquished its hold and slowly retired in a disabled condition; and its enemy laid motionless and dying, having been strangled.

Flying Squirrel.—This beautiful little animal makes its home in the cavity or hollow of a tree from which, as twilight approaches, it emerges and indulges itself in playfully scampering over the surrounding branches. From its smallest size it is not able to take such long leaps from limb to limb as the larger gray squirrel; but running up the trunk to an elevated point, boldly springs into the air, and stretching out the membrane which joins the front and hind limbs on each side, so as to form a widely extended surface it sails in a gradually descending line to another tree. As it nears the point at which it aims, it slightly ascends, so as to alight with the head pointing upwards. The extreme distance to which it can thus sail has been estimated at about 30 yards, but it does not often take such an extended flight.

This squirrel not only has the power of changing the direction of its flight so as to use the momentum acquired in ascending a limited distance, but it can alter its course in mid-air. Fifty years ago, they were common in the woods of Chester County, Pa., and were favorite pets of the scholars at Westtown. I well remember seeing some of the boys in pursuit of one of the animals in the woods that then covered the ground near the present swimming pond. The squirrel had taken its flight from one tree to another at a moderate distance; but when part way there it discovered a boy who had climbed the trunk t immediately altered its course, and alighted on a third tree considerably to one side.

Flying squirrels often take possession of the attic rooms of houses, or of openings in the porches, and thus become semi-domesticated animals. In the woods, they occasionally build nests of leaves among the branches of the trees, instead of resorting to the hollow trunks. C. C. Abbott in his "Rambles about home," suggests that this may be a modern habit, which scarcely existed 100 years ago. But the first nest of a flying squirrel, that I remember to have found, was one of leaves, which nearly 60 years ago, I saw in the branches of a young tree by the side of a cart-path that ran along a piece of woodland. The mother, frightened by my too close inspection, sprang from the nest and scattered on the ground a brood of very infantile and helpless young, which awoke feelings of compassion. After gathering them together, and placing them where I thought she might see them, I passed on, hoping that her maternal instincts would lead her to timely care for her offspring. J. W.

—The Morality of Fox-hunting.—A writer in the Public Ledger of Philadelphia, refers to a description of a fox-hunt published a few days before in that paper, in which it was stated, that a fox that had been trapped for the purpose was set free from a fox, and chased and killed by 35 men on horseback, and 34 hounds. He says:

"The right of man in his domain over nature to kill animals for his use and comfort may not be a matter of dispute, and when he kills without inflicting unnecessary pain, this right will not be denied, but when the animal is first trapped, kept in distressing confinement for a time, then let loose to undergo a cruel death struggle (for it can hardly be called a struggle for life in which its chances are so small) there is manifestly a wanton disregard of the natural claims of the brute creation.

"Who is there with an average degree of moral perception, that can look upon such a scene as described in your paper without a blush of indignation, and the wish that the fox might have the power to turn upon his pursuers and put them to flight? Such sport, if necessary for the entertainment of those concerned in it, is a sad commentary on their ambition, and one might let them enjoy their level of taste without remonstrance were it not for the people that should be protected from the deteriorating influence of such exhibitions."

—The Charity Ball.—An announcement has been made of a ball to be held in Philadelphia, the proceeds of which (that is the money received for tickets of admission, less the cost of music, refreshments, and other expenses) are to be divided between four benevolent institutions. Our friend Josiah W. Meads, has on former occasions borne a faithful testimony against this scheme of dissipation and folly, in which persons may be tempted to join, and smother the voice of conscience by the weak plea that they are thus contributing to charitable objects. He has renewed his protest the present season in an article in the Christian Statesman, published also in pamphlet form. In this he takes the position, that invitations maintained by professedly Christian people, ought not to receive the proceeds of an entertainment, which does not deserve the countenance of a Christian community. The concluding paragraph of the pamphlet is as follows:

"Now, the words of the Apostle Paul upon this matter of giving, are clear, brief, and to the point, or he says: He that giveth, let him do it with simplicity. Will the managers of the Germantown Hospital, and those of the other three prospective beneficiaries of the Ball, stand upon firm Christian ground in this matter, or will they be willing to accept, with gracious thanks, a gift which will not have been given with anything like 'simplicity,' seeing that it will be the price of a sensuous entertainment, and a liberal flung out, as it were, at the heels of the giddy votaries of fashion."

—Postars among Friends.—"To us it looks as if there will be little left to preserve in our Society, if our practical testimony to the headship of Christ is lost sight of, as it inevitably will be if regular postars become the rule."—The Interchange (Baltimore.)

—The Burnham Industrial Farm.—Frederic G. Burnham, of Morristown, N. J., has conveyed to an association incorporated under the laws of New York, a farm located in Columbia County of that State, to be used as an industrial Reform School for Juvenile Offenders. The gift of the donor includes a fertile, well-watered farm of 580 acres, lying on Queequey Lake, with numerous buildings and shops, and stocked with cattle, horses, oxen and farm machinery. The Independent says: "The objects of the Corporation are to receive boys, between the ages of seven and sixteen years, by commitment of any committing magistrate in the State of New York, for vagrancy, truancy, &c., or by a written act of the parents or guardian, or by transference from other charitable institutions, to train them in honest and industrious habits; and, finally, to place them in situations where the surroundings will be wholesome, and the training they have received will give a fair start in any honest life.

"It is proposed to teach the boys the common branches of an elementary English education, and to give them such an industrial and manual training as will fit them to support themselves, as in farming, cattle-raising, fruit-growing, gardening, and, as far as practicable, a variety of trades."

—Club Life.—"We do not wonder that women and good men inveigh against 'club life,' as it is now seen in our great cities. Clubs are the rivals of the home, and dangerous rivals. Then they have an array of positive temptations from which the wary only escape. In the uncovering of some troubles in the 'Union Club' of New York it was discovered that 87,000 drinks had been taken at the bar of the establishment, in addition to the vast quantity of wines and liquors ordered by the bottle. Here is the place where many rich men's sons step on the inclined plane which runs sheer down to ruin."—Selected.

Faith—The foolish virgins in the parable had what is commonly called faith. They had a good deal of it. They had no fears as to their final salvation. They came to the door, saying, "Lord, Lord, open unto us."

This is precisely the character of a very large proportion of what passes for faith at the present day. The main ingredients of it is a feeling of security. It serves as an anodyne to the conscience, it stifles conviction, drives away fear, and makes its possessor feel safe, even when standing upon the verge of eternal death. The faith of the foolish virgins does not lead to the sacrifice required to obtain the grace necessary to carry one through. It takes things easy, under the plausible excuse that there is time enough yet. But the faith that will finally save, leads to sacrifices and self-denials. It takes up crosses, and bears reproaches. It "counts all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus, our Lord."—The Earnest Christian.

THE FRIEND.

FIRST MONTH 29, 1887.

We have received from Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston, a copy of The Pioneer Quakers, by Richard P. Hallowell, author of The Quaker Invasion of Massachusetts. Like his former work, the present one vigorously defends the early members of the Society of Friends in New England, from the persistent charges against them, brought forward by the apologists for the cruelties practised upon them by the intolerant rulers and ministers of the Puritan settlers in that country. In this respect the present volume is very satisfactory. Although many of the facts stated in it have been before published, yet it seems to require "line upon line and precept upon precept," to remove from the popular mind the oft repeated calumny, that the laws against Quakers enacted by the Massachusetts colonists, were rendered necessary by the extravagant conduct of some of the early Friends. We are glad to see the author so skillfully using his weapons in defence of historical truth; and wonder whether the time will ever come when professed historians will cease to reiterate unfounded charges.

The earlier part of the volume is devoted to a general view of the rise of the Society of Friends, and their distinguishing characteristics. In this portion of the book the writer speaks of the labors of George Fox, and of his doctrine of the "Inward Light." We wish the author had more clearly brought to view the close connection which George Fox ever made between this Divine Light, Spirit or Grace, and our Saviour Jesus Christ. He speaks of it in his Journal as the "Divine Light of Christ"—"the Grace of God, and the Truth in the heart which came by Jesus"—and says, "I saw Christ died for all men, was a propitiation for all, and enlightened all men and women with his divine and saving Light."

"The Light of Christ" is the favorite expression of the early members of our Society, when referring to this fundamental doctrine of religion; and this is a more satisfactory term than simply the "Inward Light"—a phrase which is correct in itself, but does not so clearly point out the spiritual nature of this blessed manifestation of the will of God; nor its connection with Him of whom it was declared by the Apostle John, that He "was the true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world."

We have received a communication from Isaac Larrance, of Plainville, Ohio, calling attention to the numerous accidents, involving severe wounds and even loss of life, which have occurred from the careless handling of firearms. He emphatically condemns the practice of pointing a gun or a pistol towards anything which is not intended to be shot, even if the weapon is supposed to be unloaded. This caution is certainly a judicious one, for a load may have been introduced into it without the knowledge of the person handling the weapon; or he may have laid it away in a loaded condition, and have forgotten that fact.

I. Larrance mentions several cases of injury and death which were caused by the accidental discharge of fire-arms; and his statements are confirmed by the reports in the daily papers, which frequently bring to view similar instances.

And here we will remark, that very often it would be better to apply a remedy nearer to the root of the trouble, by banishing fire-arms from our families, and making their presence the exception rather than the rule. There is, we suppose, a reason in many cases, on farms, for keeping a gun, especially in the more thinly settled sections of the country, where domestic animals are liable to be destroyed by the attacks of their wild enemies. But the possession of such an instrument is open to this objection, that it often encourages a love of hunting, which, when followed merely as an amusement, blunts the natural sensibility of feeling. It drew from the amiable Cowper the exclamation,

"Detested sport,

That finds its pleasure in another's pain."

Still stronger is the objection to owning or carrying pistols; for the principal use of these is to destroy the life of a fellow man; and that is totally foreign to the Spirit of Christ, who commands us to love our enemies, and to do good to them that hate us. Such implements should be banished from every household.

The proper exercise of the discipline of our religious Society, even when it is rightly carried to the extreme of cutting off a delinquent from membership, is one of the means of its preservation. But no rules or regulations, and no degree of care in their enforcement, can take the place of a sincere devotion to the Lord's cause, and a close walking in spirit with the blessed Head of the Church. These constitute the life of our profession; and no outward formality can supply the deficiency if these are wanting. Where these are present, there will be found a true concern for the spiritual welfare of the flock, which will exercise its appropriate influence.

These thoughts are by no means new, but they have afresh been brought to remembrance by a letter in which the writer describes a Monthly Meeting, held many years ago in the house at Sixth and Noble Streets, Philadelphia. The letter says:—

The subject under discussion, and the final conclusion to issue a Testimony of Disownment, was the case of two young women who had joined another religious society.

After the matter was decided, our dear Friend, Sarah Hillman [a beloved minister of that meeting] arose; and while she agreed with the judgment of the meeting, "that further labor in these cases would be unavailing," she queried in a most touching and feeling manner (and I think with tears) whether we as a meeting, and overseers of the flock, had before it was too late, done all that we could or ought to have done, to keep these dear young people from going out from amongst us. Her language and great concern for these young women, and that overseers and other exercised Friends should discharge their whole duty to the members, made a great impression on my mind.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—On the 21st instant, Senator Colquet, of Georgia, presented a petition from the Women's Christian Temperance Union of the District of Columbia, charging the Commissioners of the District with "disregarding the purity, safety and moral interests and rights of the people," and asserting that, "in direct violation of law, they have been, for months past, permitting and protecting gambling halls, pool rooms, and drinking establishments, as well as dens of vice." The petition gives numerous particulars, and charges that "a house owned by one of the Commissioners is used as an office by the agent of the Louisiana State Lottery, and that Frank Humm, the President of the Liquor Dealers' Association, is a bondsman of one of the Commissioners." It therefore "prays for a thorough investigation of the facts, and for the proper enforcement of law and protection of homes within the District." After some discussion, the petition was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The Inter State Commerce bill has passed both Houses of Congress. In the lower House the vote stood, yeas 219; nays, 41.

The Senate is now debating a Retailatory Firsherries bill against the Dominion of Canada.

The number of beggars in the streets of San Francisco has grown so large as to attract the attention of the local press.

Earnest efforts have been made in Boston to break up the fraudulent firms who advertise "work for women" and entice poor women into buying yarns and other materials at extravagant prices on the promise that when worked into finished articles the latter would be purchased at a high price by the advertisers.

The Lexington Journal, (Me.) says: "A veteran Maine school teacher remembers a school in which he had seven vulgar, profane and vicious boys, whose aim in life seemed to be to torment the teacher. This teacher recently visited the State prison in Thomaston and found three of those boys. Four others are in the reform school.

The number of cigars upon which tax was paid in this country last year, was 3,510,898,588, which is equal to fifty-eight and one-half cigars to every person in the country, placing the population at 60,000,000. The number of cigarettes on which tax was paid last year, aggregates 1,310,961,350, an increase of 252,212,112 over the preceding year, while the increase in cigars consumed during the same period was 151,925,855.

Olive trees are being cultivated for the oil in some parts of Mississippi.

A vein of silver has been discovered in Glenridge, Essex County, New Jersey. A load of ore was assayed and yielded about $20 worth of silver.

In New York city, during last week, there were reported 18 cases of small-pox, with two deaths, against 6 cases and 1 death last week; 128 cases of diphtheria and 49 deaths, against 111 cases and 41 deaths last week; 651 cases of measles and 68 deaths, against 641 cases and 72 deaths.

According to the New York Tribune, there are now 14,160 newspapers and periodicals published in the United States. Of these 700 are religious and denominational papers. About 600 newspapers are published in German, and forty-two in French. The Polish, Finnish and Welsh papers have the most unpronounceable names; as for instance the Deienvsivta and the Przejscie Ludu, of Chicago; the Yghdagsblaett in Sanomat, of Ohio; and the Y Wawr, of Utica, N. Y. One paper is published in Gaelic, one in Hebrew, one in Chinese and one in Cherokee.

There were 385 deaths in this city last week; 195 males and 190 females, being altogether 33 less than last week. Of these 54 died of consumption; 52 of pneumonia; 19 of diseases of the heart; 17 of convulsions; 15 of debility; 14 of cramp; 11 of old age; 11 of paralysis; 11 of apoplexy; 11 of Bright's disease and 10 of bronchitis.

Cotton was quiet at 9½ cts. for middling uplands.

Feed.—Bran was firm but quiet; middlings were plentiful and dull. Quotations: Bran, western winter, spot, per ton, $17 a $17.75; do, spring, spot, $16 a $16.50; red middlings, $15 a $16; white middlings, $15 a $17.

Petroleum was quiet but steady at 6½ cts. for 70 Abel test in barrels, and 8½ cts. for 110 test in cases.

Flour and Meal.—Trade in flour was slow and unsatisfactory, and prices were weak. Sales of 125 barrels of Pennsylvania roller, straight, at $4.25; 125 barrels Ohio, clear, at $4.25; 375 barrels Ohio and Indiana, straight, at $4.40 a $4.50; 375 barrel winter patent, at $4.75 a $5; 250 barrels Minnesota, clear, at $4.25, and 500 barrels do, patent, at $5 a $5.25. Rye flour was dull at $3.10 a $3.15 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat was firm and advanced, No. 2 red closing at 92½ cts. bid and 92½ cts. asked. Rye was quoted at 56 cts. per bushel. Corn was without activity, No. 2 mixed closing at 46 cts. bid, and 46½ cts. asked. Oats were dull, No. 2 white closing at 37½ cts. bid and 38½ cts. asked.

Beef cattle were in poor demand and ¼c. lower, at 3 a 5½ cts.

Sheep were dull, at 3 a 5½ cts. Lambs were lower, at 4 a 7 cts.

Hogs were firmer. Western, 6½ a 7½ cts.; country, 6 a 6½ cts.

FOREIGN.—The London Daily News professes to know that there is extreme danger of war. It says the Government is alarmed on account of its having heard that Germany is likely within a few days to ask France to explain the meaning of the French military movements on the frontier.

The police and bailiffs have been engaged in evicting tenants at Glenheigh, County Kerry, Ireland. On the 22nd, twenty-three men were arraigned before the Magistrate at Killorglin for obstructing the work of the Sheriff during the past week in making evictions. Immediately after the arraignment a mass meeting of citizens was held to express sympathy with the prisoners. Several of the speakers openly denounced the evictions as tyrannical and barbarous. On the 24th, the magistrates before whom the Glenheigh tenants were tried acquitted the prisoners. The hillsides for miles around were ablaze with bonfires in honor of the event.

A writ has been served upon John Dillon to recover from him the amount of his recognizances, already pledged, in the Government actions against him for agitating in favor of the plan of campaign, the ground being alleged continuance of the agitation. Dillon will resist the writ, and thus the whole issue will become one to be tried before a jury.

W. E. Gladstone has prepared a resolution affirming the general principle of Home Rule, which Chamberlain and Trevelyan will be asked to accept on the resumption of the Gladstonian-Unionist conference. If the Radical-Unionists accede to the resolution, it will be proposed in the House of Commons at the earliest possible moment in the coming session.

The census of France for 1886 shows a total population of 38,218,903, against 37,672,048 in 1881. The population of Paris has increased only 75,000 against an increase of 280,000 recorded in 1881.

The French Budget Committee of the Chamber of Deputies has, by a vote of 18 to 6, rejected the amendment, budget presented by Dauphin, Minister of Finance, providing for an issue of bonds to the amount of 375,000,000 francs, redeemable in 66 years, to meet the temporary needs of the Government. Dauphin is consequently expected to resign, and a Cabinet crisis is imminent. The present Ministry was formed on the 11th ult.

The destructive power of the new explosive, discovered by Capt. Locard and Hironard, connected with the French Government gun factory, at Bourges, is reported to be one hundred times that of ordinary gunpowder, or ten times that of nitro-glycerine. An ordinary shell, falling on the roof of a building, bursts and shatters everything in its immediate vicinity. The melinite shell is intended to strike the ground at the foundations of the building, and once there it explodes and shoots everything into the air, reducing beams and joints to an almost impalpable powder. The new explosive gets its name from its resemblance to honey (mit) "War is cruel and you cannot refine it!"

On the 20th instant, a meeting of Belgian Generals was held at the Ministry of War to discuss the subject of the mobilization of the army. All expressed the opinion that war on the Belgian frontier is inevitable, and that hostilities will probably begin in a short time.

The Kreuz Zeitung says that the candidature of Prince George, of Leuchtenberg, for the Bulgarian throne is approved everywhere. The Bulgarian Regency, it says, must resign, leaving the election of a Prince to a new Sobranje, in which event Russia will accept the ruler chosen.

The Russian Official Messenger states that the Emperor of Russia has authorized his representative at the Hague, Count Kappist, to accept in his name the King of Holland's gift of the house in which Peter the Great lived at Zandam in 1697. This house was visited by the Emperor Paul in 1781 and the Czar Alexander II., while Czar Nicholas, in 1839.

It is stated that Italy has declared its seventeen universities open to women. Switzerland, Norway, Sweden and Denmark have taken similar action.

Despatches received in London from Brisbane, the capital of Queensland, state that that colony has been swept by a fearful cyclone, accompanied by a rainfall of such extraordinary copiousness that 20 inches of water fell in a short time. The result has been disastrous floods. In the city of Brisbane some of the thoroughfares are submerged to a depth of 20 feet. The city is entirely cut off by the floods from its suburbs. The reports say that many persons have been drowned.

The tail of a comet was seen in Melbourne on the evening of the 20th instant.

The U. S. State Department has received despatches from Buenos Ayres, saying that the deaths from Asiatic cholera in that city in Eleven Mo. last were ninety three and that business is virtually suspended there. The death-rate in Rosario has sometimes reached fifty per day.

Eighth Mo. 2nd, 1845. Since last note, I have been absent from home. No memorandum kept during the time, except the following, penned the morning I left Cape Island, Seventh Mo. 10th. "Having for several years past, suffered much with pain in my back, and for the last year been under the doctor's care, who advised sea bathing, and my friends also urging it, I yielded; being very desirous, if it could be so, to be restored to health. It was a trial to go, being aware of having many things to encounter which would be hard to bear. This morning we leave, after a trarriance of two weeks. Whilst here I saw and felt much which saddened."

10th. At our Quarterly Meeting on Fifth-day last, we had the company of several friends from the city, viz: William and Elizabeth Evans, E. Mason, R. Shober, and an aged female Friend named Hutchinson,* who all ministered to us. Wm. Evans in a very close manner. Elizabeth explicated very feelingly and pathetically for the children. It was a favored opportunity.

19th. Attended Concord Quarterly Meeting, a very large gathering, a number of strangers were present: William and Elizabeth Evans, Samuel Bettle, Elizabeth Pitfield, Sarah Hillman, and two or three others; Ebenezer Roberts, also, from New Jersey, with a minute. It was an interesting meeting. Our dear friend, Sarah Emlen, returned the certificate granted her more than a year ago, to pay a religious visit to Friends in England and Ireland; which service she has performed, she told us, "to the relief and peace of her own mind." During her sojourn here she was, to use her own words, brought very near to the grave; there seeming but a step between her and it. At which time (when giving in her account in the men's meeting) she said, many in her own land—one here and another here—were brought before her, for whom inter-

* This, no doubt, was Margaret Hutchinson; a minister of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia for the Southern District; and of whom a lively Memorial is on record. She was born in Scotland, in the year 1763; and educated in the principles of the Presbyterians, her parents being members of that Society. With them, she removed to Philadelphia in 1775. She was received into membership with Friends about her twenty-third year; exercised the gift in the ministry conferred upon her, for fifty-six years; and departed this life in the eighty-seventh year of her age—testifying just before the close, "Death is shorn of all its terrors."

cessions were poured forth. Some of the young men in an especial manner, who would walk as they pleased, say and do as they pleased, &c., comparing some present to the tall oaks of Bashan; and some who were sitting in the seat of the scornful, &c. Another class, also, she sweetly addressed; those who, if faithful, would have to come forth as with the two barley loaves and a few small fishes, and which would be found sufficient to refresh the multitude. Said, how her spirit had rejoiced over the new born babes already brought forth in our Zion! with more, though not lengthy. Throughout there was very little preaching, considering the number of ministers present.

24th. Be pleased, O Heavenly Father! to deal with me as thou seest best. All I ask or desire is, to be further and further instructed in thy school: that all I do and all I say, may be to thy glory.

28th. Monthly Meeting held at Gwynedd. A little quickened and made alive under the ministry of Robert Scotton; who travelled under a weight of exercise on our behalf, that there might be a willingness to bring our deeds to the light, and have them made manifest, &c. A concern also was expressed that faithfulness to all that was made manifest, might be lived up to. For, if not, no advancement would be made, &c. A part that struck me very forcibly was, when speaking of bringing our deeds to the light, he included our words even before they were uttered, as well as after, to try them. Were this closely attended to, how many idle words would be spared! I never felt more forcibly the awfulness of the account which is to be rendered for all such. "Set a watch, O Lord, before my mouth; keep the door of my lips," is the secret prayer.

Ninth Mo. 5th. Being on a little business in the city, attended Arch St. Meeting. We had the company of William Evans and Sarah Hillman. Near the close of the meeting William arose and so preached that I do not remember ever to have heard a more feeling communication. The burden of it was, to encourage to patience under suffering, quoting, "No affliction for the present seemeth to be joyous," &c. His faith seemed to be strong that there were those present who would be brought through victorious, if they held fast their faith and confidence, and did not give back or wrest themselves of the Divine hand. That although the enemy was permitted to buffet and sorely grieve them, there was a power above every power; and as He was looked unto and relied upon, He never would leave or forsake such—those who had none in heaven or in all the earth they desired before Him, &c. William seemed very sure if there was a holding out to the end, the blessing would come; concluding with: "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life."

Tenth Mo. 9th. Prostrated and laid very low; yet sweetly comforted in being enabled once more to approach the mercy seat, and there to pour out my troubles—secret hidden troubles—known to none but the Searcher of hearts, and to whom alone I am looking for an enlargement.

May I not be too anxious; but keep my eye steadily fixed on Him, who will, I humbly trust, in his own time, make a way for my deliverance. A word of encouragement was landed through our friend Ezra Comfort reviving the promise: "Blessed are those that hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled," &c.

19th. At our meeting we had the company of our dear friends, James and Sarah Emlen; who are paying a little visit around amongst us. A word of encouragement flowed through dear Sarah for us, very sweetly. She revived the testimony, No man can redeem his brother, or give to God a ransom for his soul. We may be made each others helpers in the Lord; yet through Him alone we look for redemption. Her concern seemed to be to drive us from man, and from a dependence on man; and then to comfort us with the remembrance that his ear is open, and to Him we may go and pour out our troubles. She touched upon the low state of things amongst us, saying: The waters are very low, hardly ankle deep; yet seemed very sure they would by and by arise as the everlasting patience was kept in. Her faith seemed strong that there would be a little remnant preserved, as we were concerned to build upon Christ, the corner stone; assuring us that no matter how much out of sight we might be, if we only formed a part of the true Church! &c.

Eleventh Mo. 6th. Quarterly Meeting. At which we had the company of our dear friends Sarah Emlen and Sarah Hillman; both of whom had a word of encouragement to hand forth. S. Hillman spoke of the account we have of Naaman the Assyrian; who was so unwilling to go wash in Jordan; but was looking for some great thing to be done to heal him of his leprosy. She had something very encouraging respecting the low state of our poor Society; believing there would be raised up unto Abraham, children gathered from the east, west, north and south. Such as could say with Amos: "I was no prophet, neither was I a prophet's son; but I was an herdsman, and a gatherer of sycamore fruit: and the Lord took me," &c. Dear Sarah Emlen followed, and faint would set her seal to the foregoing. She entered deeply into feeling with the afflicted and mourning children; believed the day was coming in which the hearts of such would be turned to their exercised parents, and the "hearts of the fathers to the children." That the day called for "afflicting" ourselves; and not only we, but the Church had an enemy to contend with. She spoke of the vessels of silver and gold that were carried away captive into Babylon; of the mourning and fast that Ezra called the people to, on account thereof, by the river Ahava; and believed the tears and prayers of such would be regarded. She advised to keep quiet, and to keep our exercises to ourselves. Saying that, however our trials might seem at present, they would be light in a day fast hastening, if they only worked out for us the far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, even to be found worthy to sing the song of Moses and the Lamb: "Great and marvellous are thy works," &c.

Twelfth Mo. 14th.—First-day. I fear there was not that earnestness to wrestle for the blessing there ought to have been, on first gathering into silence at our meeting to-day. I thought there seemed some ability vouchsafed; but for want of keeping close to it, with the eye single, I was left to struggle with my soul's enemy. Oh! when will I learn to cast all care and every burden on the Lord, for He alone is to be depended on.*

First Mo. 1st, 1846. Thou hast been pleased, O Heavenly Father! to grant a continuation of thy mercy to a poor unworthy child, in sparing a little longer even to know the dawning of a new year; whilst many during the one past, even those who have been near and dear, have been summoned to their long homes. These shocks have been felt; and thou knowest that many and deep have been the breathings, that ere the tender thread of my life is cut, a preparation may be experienced therefor; all sins be washed away; and a new song be put in my mouth. Oh, for more weightiness of spirit; more deep inward travail of soul! Thou knowest, O righteous Father! that of ourselves we can do nothing; and that it is only as thou art pleased to breathe upon us, as it was in the beginning when man became a living soul, that these dry bones can be made to live. When thou seest meet to do thus for thy poor child, my soul shall praise and magnify thy ever worthy name. Till then strengthen me, I pray thee, "to sit alone and keep silence."

4th. A feeling of quietness attends this afternoon, from being enabled once more to draw near the mercy seat, and there pour out my tears; secretly interceding that they may be had in remembrance.

11th. Our dear friend, Ezra Comfort, appeared greatly exercised and wonderfully helped to relieve his mind; for which favor my soul bowed in secret humble gratitude; desiring that the word may not return void, but accomplish that whereunto it was sent. It appeared to be a renewed call, almost like a last one, to some present; to whom, he believed, not as many years of mercy would be lengthened out to them as they had seen. The fruitless fig-tree was spoken of, which was spared a little longer. It felt to him that our Saviour was weeping over some present, as He did over Jerusalem formerly, saying: "How often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not! Behold your house is left unto you desolate." That this may not be the awful situation of any present was the burden of his exercised soul. Don't know when I have sat under ministry that felt more solemn.

For "The Friend."

Searching among Old Logs.

There is one class of the Fungi, which is apt to escape the notice of most observers, excepting those whose studies lead them to investigate closely the obscurer forms of vegetable life. I must admit that until within a few weeks, I was almost entirely ignorant of them; for the brief description contained in botanical works had left no permanent impression on the mind. But a present from a kind friend, who is an enthusiastic student of these Fungi, of a box containing a dozen or more species neatly mounted on cards, was like unlocking a door into a new department of nature's museum.

The Slime Moulds are generally found on decaying wood or leaves. During their period of growth, they are small masses of slimy or mucilaginous matter, found on rotten logs, or other vegetable matter, especially in moist woodland; and spreading over the substance which gives them support. In this state neither cells nor any other organs are discernible in them; yet they are living bodies; and the mysterious principle of life enables them to grow and spread. When the period of growth has past, the jelly-like mass gathers itself together, and develops the spores or seed, from which another generation is to spring. In the specimens before me, the spores are contained in capsules of various shapes, colors and sizes, but all very minute; and these are mostly mounted on thread-like stems. That a mere film of mucilage should have the power of thus changing its form, and becoming a mass of little egg-cases, each packed with spores capable of growth, may be no more wonderful than many other of the processes which we see going on in the animal and vegetable world; but few things have so strongly impressed me with a sense of the marvellous power which the great Author of the Universe has bestowed on the principle of life.

The weather had for weeks been so dry in our section of the country, as to be unfavorable to the growth of most species of the Fungi; but a day's rain having moistened the ground, I was tempted out on the afternoon of the 29th of Tenth Month. A small log by the side of the lane was noticed, and turned over in search for Slime Moulds or other Fungi. The insects which had taken refuge beneath it formed an interesting group. At one point lay coiled in a spiral a large hairy caterpillar. A small spider came forth from his retreat in a hollow of the log, to inquire into the cause of the disturbance. Another spider, small of body, but with immensely long, slender legs (which is known among children as "Daddy long-legs") stood quietly looking on. A brilliant beetle, whose polished wing-cases shone with metallic lustre, hid himself in one of the recesses of the log. A beautiful little mite, clad in scarlet velvet, slowly crawled over the exposed surface; and a slender red ant, ornamented with a black band in the centre of its body, and with its abdomen ending in what looked like a small polished cone of black horn, seemed uncertain whether to stand its ground or to move off. The pointed termination of its abdomen was so suggestive of a sting, with which some species are armed, that I prudently left it undisturbed. The most numerous of the living creatures were the Wood Lice, curious little things, which have the power of rolling themselves into a ball. The back is covered with a series of transverse plates, like those on the tail of a lobster. Indeed these animals, although living on the land, are classed with the Crustacea, the same family that the lobsters and crabs belong to.

Under another log was a large Hornet, which had there sought quarters for the winter. Unlike the bees, which lay up a supply of food for the season when there are no flowers, and occupy the same homes from year to year, the wasps and hornets on the approach of cold weather, desert their skillfully constructed habitations. The males and neuters perish, but some of the females survive the winter, hidden beneath old logs and in other protected places; and in the spring emerge and commence the formation of a new colony. The largest of these thus spring from a single female. I carefully replaced the log, and left my hornet undisturbed; and it may be, that a ramble next summer will disclose the paper house of which she will lay the foundation.

In one of the rotten logs which were turned over during the afternoon, were thin, thread-like fibres of an orange color, branching, and penetrating the decaying wood. When examined under the microscope, these fibres were found to be composed of a mass of irregularly arranged threads, and resembled skeins of badly-tangled yellow silk. These branching tubes are a characteristic of the Fungus family, and are regarded as the vital and growing part of the plant. What form of fructification would develop from this orange spawn there was nothing to show.

Berkeley remarks that the "rapidity with which spawn penetrates, and the depth to which it enters, is often quite surprising. The most solid timber, in a few months, when exposed to the weather and in a damp situation favorable to the development of Fungi, will sometimes show unequivocal traces of spawn. I have seen, for instance, elm trunks which were perfectly sound when felled, penetrated by the end of the second year with spawn to within a few inches of the centre. The growth of dry-rot is unfortunately familiar to all, and instances occur in which its spawn not only enters the wood, but penetrates solid structures of brick."

At the end of the lane, a path led across a field into a small tract of woodland, where the description of the poet was partly applicable—

"The dead leaves strew the forest-walk,
And wither'd are the pale wild flowers;
The frosts hang blackening on the stalk,
The dew-drops fall in frozen showers;
Gone are the spring's green sprouting bowers,
Gone, summer's rich and mantling vines;
And autumn, with her yellow hours,
On hill and plain no longer shines."

—On one of these "dead leaves," which had fallen from an oak tree, the substance of the leaf seemed to be disorganized in spots. On placing a portion of the leaf under a microscope, the cause of the destruction of its tissue became apparent; for it was covered with a felt of the delicate tubes of a Fungus, which had been nourished at the expense of its host. For "The Friend."

"Also of your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things, to draw away disciples after them."
—Acts xx. 30.

In its early days the Society of Friends had many besetments, chiefly by persecutions from without, with a few instances of those in membership who gave trouble. But from whatever source the wrong came, those devoted servants of Christ were diligent in their endeavors to clear the truth, not only by preaching the word, as ministers of Christ, but also by putting forth publications by which truth and error were presented in plain contrast.

More than half a century has elapsed since some persons in membership adopted Unitarian views, and put them forth so adroitly that many were drawn away, and a fearful schism was the result. The body that remained firm to truth's principles were careful to put forth documents giving, with a true balance, the doctrines ever held by Friends, and the testimonies resulting therefrom.

But a few years more passed, when the attention of the watchmen was turned to the insidious introduction of other views at variance with Friends' principles, and calculated to draw the unwary from the path of safety and usefulness. Some of the propagators of these questionable views were persons of influence and voluminous writers, who presented many truths, but interspersed with them, ideas which gave sanction and currency to error. The attempts which were made to check the progress of error were not fully successful. Many who were sound in the faith themselves did not apprehend there was any ground for the alarm which had been sounded.

Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting foresaw the danger, and after having bestowed labor through the Meeting for Sufferings, in 1847 put forth publicly "An Appeal for the Ancient Doctrines of the Religious Society of Friends." The preparation of this Appeal involved much care and research on the part of those upon whom the burden rested. The prejudice which had obtained place in the minds of many Friends against the acts of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, was a hindrance to the free circulation of the Appeal, and of other documents that were issued by that meeting. Yet the action taken in reference to the said questionable works were a check to their free circulation; inasmuch as they could not be appealed to as authority, or the authors considered as exponents of Friends' principles. As a consequence, comparatively few Friends had access to the said works, or to the documents which had been put forth to refute them.

Had all the Yearly Meetings taken the precaution that Philadelphia did, it would have saved much suffering and loss to the Society. When the alarm was sounded from several quarters, there were many sound Friends who thought that Friends' principles were so well understood as to be proof against any such contagion; and out of deference to London Yearly Meeting, which furnished certificates for a minister to travel in America on religious service, whose writings had given uneasiness; and in the absence of full evidence in the matter; and with the consideration that London Yearly Meeting was the responsible party; no action was taken by most of the Yearly Meetings. This non-action served as a negative license for the dissemination of the questionable views.

Dolier Street Tracts, Dublin, were made a means for the wide dissemination of similar views. A class of professed revivalists who claim to be Evangelists, have industriously propagated the same ideas. These ideas have invaded to a greater or less extent various religious bodies; and they are the real principles of "fast Quakerism." Faith was chiefly dwelt upon, with little or no mention made of repentance. The way was opened for vocal religious service, without the necessary divine limitation and guidance, and the large amount of vocal offering that was made was considered by some to be due to a revival of primitive religious zeal. Others viewed those things with an honest suspicion, but feared to take action lest they might "hurt the oil and the wine." The hope was entertained that the effervescence would subside, and leave a healthy revival. The root error of the movement was clearly seen by only a few, and the defection increased in volume until it obtained the ascendancy in many meetings, and those who remained firm to Friends' principles were brought into deep sufferings; many of their names were cast out "as evil for the Son of man's sake." They were accused of being hinderers of the Lord's work. Some of the most faithful ministers and elders were deprived of their right, as members of the Select Meeting. And the discipline has been so changed in many places as to make the office of elder subject to revision every three years.

A separation took place in Ohio Yearly Meeting; and the true body was rejected by the greater portion of the Yearly Meetings, and consequently became much isolated and as it were out of sight for a time. But during the last few years, the real status of the two bodies in Ohio is becoming more generally seen; the one in its extreme departures, and the other for the true catholic spirit which it is manifesting in connection with the maintenance of Friends' principles and testimonies.

At the time of the establishment of Canada Yearly Meeting, and for the several following years, the members generally maintained an attachment to Friends' principles. But the pressure that was brought to bear, chiefly by persons from other Yearly Meetings, had an effect on the minds of the younger members and a few of the older ones. The defection took root first in Pelham Quarterly Meeting, and the contest between truth and error became severe in Norwich Monthly Meeting. The new views were promulgated by preaching and the profuse distribution of the "Dolier Street" Tracts, and their advocates tried, by every means in their power, to commit the Monthly Meeting to an official acknowledgment of their views and practices. After many months of painful controversy, those who desired the changes organized a separate Monthly Meeting. It became the duty of Norwich Monthly Meeting, for the clearing of truth, to issue a Testimony setting forth the causes which had led to the separation; and contrasting these erroneous views with the truth as ever held by Friends.

Some of these errors are the following: "That our Lord Jesus Christ, in shedding his blood on Calvary, wrought out complete salvation for mankind; consequently, all that is needful is for men to believe therein and appropriate it to themselves; or, as often expressed, to 'accept Christ's finished work.' That we are not to wait for, or expect, an inward sense of pardon and acceptance with God, but to believe what is recorded in the written Word, and to trust hourly and momentarily that the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin."

According to the above sentiments, the inward work of regeneration is excluded; and therefore they become a broad inlet to the inconsistencies so prevalent in these days.

Similar attempts were made in other parts of Canada Yearly Meeting, especially at West Lake, to introduce errors in doctrine and practice, and a season of sore conflict was the result.

At the Yearly Meeting in 1880, the revised discipline of New York Yearly Meeting of 1877, was presented, and a strong attempt made to impose it upon the meeting. The clerk went so far as to make a record declaring it adopted by the meeting; when, according to his own evidence, his ruling was according to a majority vote. A part of the members would not acknowledge the ruling of the clerk, and a separation followed; first in the subordinate meetings, afterward in the Yearly Meeting.

When the said revision of 1877 was presented to Canada Yearly Meeting, it was known to but few of the members. On comparing it with the previous Discipline, that of 1859, it appeared that the doctrinal part and some other portions, had been re-written and formulated in a manner, so ambiguous or defective, as to give license to the preaching of various doctrinal opinions which are not in accord with the views accepted by the Society of Friends.

The disciplinary part also is changed in very many particulars; so that the reader may understand the strait through which Friends of Canada had to pass, and the fortitude that was necessary to maintain the right. ADAM SPENCER.

Yearly Meeting Correspondence.

My experience has been, in the hearing of epistles read from other yearly meetings, and the answers to them from London Yearly Meeting, that it was such a dead sort of formal business, I could not feel I had part or lot in the matter. The same sense and feeling has very much been mine from year to year in listening to the London Annual Epistle. I do not speak for others, or pretend to be the judge of their experience, but simply give my own. From this, I believe that very little good is the outcome of this correspondence, but often, I believe, it has been productive of much injury in the promotion of unsound teaching. Because of this, I sincerely hope the desire of some to re-open correspondence between Philadelphia and London Yearly Meetings, will be frustrated. My own conviction in the matter is this, that London Yearly Meeting is in no condition, in a spiritual sense, to help Philadelphia Friends; neither, on the other hand, do I believe there is at present a channel open by which London Yearly Meeting would be likely to be benefited by anything that might flow from here to them.

In the early Church there were those who were laid under a concern to write to the Churches. It was so in the early days of our own body. Such writing was under the sense and weight of Truth resting upon their Spirits, the true authorization for such writing. Brotherly greeting, in simplicity and in love, is the outcome of a united exercise for the promotion of the Truth upon the earth. Where this exists, there is a sense of being true-yoke fellows in the bonds of the gospel of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ. A fellow-feeling brings near together, but a worldly spirit mars the work of Christ in the Church as it does in the individual; and when natter of policy doth dictate, and worldly prudence governs, to whom to write, and what to write, there is little hope of profit in spirit arising to any from such a correspondence.

I would we should remain in isolation as a people rather than be drawn into an unsavory correspondence, dictated more by a polished intellect than by spirituality of mind and purity of heart, which the work of God's spirit alone can produce. We have need to cease from the many exercises that man doth form for himself to satisfy the unrest of his own unhallowed nature. There are so many voices, we have need to be still to hear the still small voice of the Spirit of Truth in our own souls.

It is with me, therefore, to say to my fellow-believers, be not drawn aside into the many entanglements tending to draw from an humble, self-denying walk. The path to the kingdom has not grown broader; neither is it the flowery path that many would make it to appear. It is a path of peace, because the tranquilizing power of God's grace is known to keep the soul in peace. Nevertheless, the path to the kingdom is a tribulated one. It is not too narrow for the lowly ones, but too narrow for the high-minded.

The meek the Lord teaches of his way, and these He guides in judgment. To this seat of judgment may we more and more each one gather, that our spirits may be quickened in God's holy fear. Then will our light shine brighter and brighter, and as a people set upon a hill we will not be hid. The work of our hands will God establish, and that more and more, so that God in us and by us will be glorified. People will indeed flow to the arising of the Saviour's life wherever it is seen in any, and kings and great ones to the glory of his power. Therefore, to this may we take heed, for without it we can do nothing.

It is a blessed thing that this, the redeeming, saving power of God, is not at the disposal of man, but that man must become willing to wait the will and pleasure of the Supreme One, who will not give his glory to another, or his praise to the graven images of men's devising. Likenesses of the true may be made, but the day of the Lord shall try every man's work; then, only that which is the work of his own finger will stand the ordeal of trial, and of sifting, and of proving, which will come upon all men to prove them.

Stand still and see the salvation of God, was the command to Israel of old, when the Lord was about to work a wondrous deliverance for his people which He had chosen out of all the families of the earth. The Lord can still work for those who trust in Him, and can deliver them out of the hands of all their enemies both outward and inward.

Therefore, I exhort to faithfulness to God in all things, and obedience to his holy Will, in which is the rich blessing of peace in time, and joy unceasing in eternity, to the soul who honors and obeys the heavenly voice of the Saviour, and is willing to follow Him in the path of regeneration and newness of life. This is the portion of God's children; happy are they who know it.

May the number of these within our borders be multiplied, and may the savor of their life and conversation be, to draw unto and into that secret inclosure, where God the Father is known, and the Saviour's power felt by the Eternal Spirit.

O, that every unhalloved thing may be removed, that the pure light of God's holy countenance may shine in, upon and through us, to the glory of the holy and eternally unchanging One; and our establishment and settlement in time and for eternity upon the rock immovable—Christ Jesus. Even so. Amen.

CHARLES W. THOMSON,

925 So. Fourth St., Phila.

Though I could not join in meeting together at set times, to read and comment on the Scriptures in an intellectual way; yet I believe they should be read privately, and in families, with reverent sobriety daily; with a word, sometimes, to see the children are attending to it, and understand the simple statement. Too much comment is unprofitable, and likely to lead into intellectual speculation.

I wish Friends, both older and younger, were more interested in reading the approved writings of Friends, which are published in the "Friends' Library." I think it would be profitable reading for all, not only as giving a knowledge of the doctrine and history of Friends, but as encouraging good order and stability under trials and difficulties; we may sometimes rejoice in great difficulties, when we remember how willingly the righteous have suffered. Jesus said, "I am the way, the Truth, and the Life, no man cometh to the Father but by me." The way and the truth remains the same, though there be few that find it. May the number be increased and united, is what I would seek after.

First Mo. 10th, 1887.

He [Ambrose Rigge] bore his sickness with much patience and resignation to the Divine Will, and his love and esteem of the pure Truth abode with him to the last, declaring a little before his departure "If Friends kept to the root of life in themselves they would be the happiest people in the world." He departed this life the 30th of Eleventh Mo., 1704, aged seventy years or upwards and a minister forty-nine years.—Gough's History.

THE BOOK OF THE YEAR.

Of all the beautiful fancies
That cluster about the year,
Tiptoeing over the threshold
When its earliest dawn is here,
The best is the simple legend
Of a book for you and me,
So fair that our guardian angels
Desire its lines to see.

It is full of the brightest pictures,
Of dream, and story, and rhyme,
And the whole wide world together
Turns only a page at a time.

Some of the leaves are dazzling
With the feather-flakes of the snow;
Some of them thrill to the music
Of the merriest winds that blow.

Some of them keep the secrets
That make the roses sweet;
Some of them sway and rustle
With the golden heads of wheat.

I cannot begin to tell you
Of the lovely things to be,
In the wonderful year-book waiting,
A gift for you and me.

And a thought most strange and solemn
Is borne upon my mind—
On every page a column
For ourselves we'll surely find.

Write what we may upon it,
The record there will stay,
Till the books of time are opened
In the court of the Judgment Day.

And should we not be careful
Lest the words our fingers write
Shall rise to shame our faces
When we stand in the dear Lord's sight?

And should we not remember
To dread no thought of blame,
If we sign each page that we finish
With faith in the dear Lord's name?

GIVE THANKS.

Give thanks! for the changeful seasons,
For the promises of spring,
For the perfume and the fruitage
That the summer blossoms bring;
Give thanks! for the autumn harvest,
For the ripened fruit and grain;
Give thanks for the winter's season,
When the days are short again.

Give thanks! for the harvest garnered;
Then the tired earth can rest,
And we'll gather round the fireside
With the dear ones we love best.
Give thanks! that the Master knoweth
When the thirsty soil needs rain,
Give thanks! that our choicest blessings
Are the undergrowth of pain.
Give thanks! that the hungry birdlings
Are well-fed from Nature's yield,
That no care for food or raiment
Have the dowerets of the field.
Give thanks! that the earth is lovely,
Give thanks! that each life is blest
With its trials or its blessings,
For He knoweth which are best.

THE OTHER SIDE.

We go our ways in life too much alone,
We hold ourselves too far from all our kind;
Too often, we are dead to sigh and moan;
Too often to the weak and helpless blind;
Too often, where distress and want abide,
We turn, and pass upon the other side.

The other side is trodden smooth, and worn
By footsteps passing idly all the day.
Where lie the bruised ones that faint and mourn
Is seldom more than an untrodden way;
Our selfish hearts are for our feet the guide,
They lead us by upon the other side.

It should be ours the oil and wine to pour
Into the bleeding wounds of stricken ones;
To take the smitten and the sick and sore,
And bear them where a stream of blessings runs.
Instead, we look about, the way is wide;
And so we pass upon the other side.

O friends and brothers, gliding down the years,
Humanity is calling each and all,
In tender accents, born of grief and tears!
I pray you listen to the thrilling call;
You cannot, in your cold and selfish pride,
Pass without guilt upon the other side.

Clemens of Alexandria compares those women that curiously trick and trim up the body, but are negligent of the soul within, to the Egyptian temples: "Look upon their outside, and they are most splendid and magnificent, encompassed with delicate groves, built with large entries and stately porticos surrounded with several sorts of pillars; the walls both within and without set off with stones of several countries, curiously wrought and carved; the Temples themselves garnished with gold, silver, amber, and all the glittering precious stones that India and Ethiopia can afford; but enter within them, and inquire for the deity that is there worshipped, and you shall be gravely showed behind a curtain, a cat or a crocodile or a serpent of the country, or some such ill-favored beast, which is the residential or tutelary deity of that place. And just such do those women seem to me, who trim themselves with gold, and are taken up with curling their hair, painting their faces and blacking their eyes, coloring their locks, and other undue arts of softness and luxury, beautifying the rail and fence; but if a man look within the veil and covering of the temple, what is under all this gayness and finery, he shall not find the image of God dwelling there."

Our duty, our interest, our advancement, in the Divine life, consist not in comprehending in theory, but following in obedience, and in the simplicity of little children.—J. Thorp.

DIVINE INSTRUCTION.

The great and blessed doctrine that our Saviour, who came into the world to redeem man from sin, visits the hearts of all by his Spirit, and shows unto them how they should walk to secure the Divine favor, so lies at the foundation of all practical religion, that it is illustrated by almost every incident of a religious nature, and is thus being perpetually brought into notice.

Some two years ago, I was listening to the remarks of a friend, who told us of a conversation he had had many years before with a man in England who was probably a sea captain. He was speaking of barbarous people among whom he had travelled, among whom he said there was no trace of religion at all. After some time, my friend asked him, whether these degraded people seemed to know the difference between actions as to their being right or wrong—for example, between telling the truth and lying; being honest or stealing, &c. "Oh, yes," said the Captain, "they know all about that." In their further conversation, the question was put, as to how these people came to know the difference in the moral character of their acts? After a little thought, as if it were a subject new to his mind, the Captain replied, "It must be from the Divine Spirit, you know."

It was interesting to observe the testimony thus borne to the truth of the Apostle's declaration, that "The Grace of God, which bringeth salvation, hath appeared unto all men;" and teaches them to "live soberly, righteously and Godly." This teaching is often present and effective in the minds of those who might be supposed almost incapable of appreciating it, from want of mental development; and who are quite unable to form any clear intellectual conception of many points of theological dogma. As an instance of this, may be mentioned the case of a young man of feeble intellect, who desired to become a member of a religious body in New England. He presented himself to the church committee. The first question put to him was:

"Do you understand the doctrine of the Trinity?"

"No; I can't say I do."

"Can you give the committee a definition of regeneration?"

"I don't think I can."

"Well, what do you understand by foreordination?"

"Take plenty of time to answer," said a kind hearted old deacon, thinking the candidate was confused.

"I don't know much about it," said the young man.

"Can't you give us some opinion respecting God's decrees?"

"I'm afraid not," he replied.

"Well, then," said the minister, a little impatiently, "what do you know?"

Promptly came the answer, "I know that I am a sinner, and I know that Christ died to save me, and I want to join the church to get more help from Christ and his people."

Every member of that committee felt rebuked, and one of them said afterwards, "I learned from that moment to respect the spiritual knowledge of the humblest man or woman, and not to think so much of that knowledge which comes from the head alone."

The late John B. Gough, widely known as a public lecturer, especially on Temperance, gives his own experience as follows:

"I remember once, when confronting some of these knotty problems,—such as the origin of evil, and the eternity of sin,—I went to my dear friend, Dr. Wm. M. Taylor, of New York, and asked him to give me some light. Putting his hand on my shoulder, he said, "John, lay these things on the shelf. We shall see light by and by, when He shall reveal to us the deep things of his wisdom." So I have come to the conclusion that my great aim must be to bring my will into submission to His, in perfect harmony; believing that all I do not know now, I shall know in His right time, who knows the end from the beginning."

The teachings of the Holy Spirit of Christ are often immediately given to the mind; at other times it pleases Him to shed a Divine light on the words of Scripture, or to bless some incident that may have fallen under our notice.

Ann Haseltine, who became the wife of the pioneer missionary, Judson, is spoken of as a beautiful girl, educated at Bradford Academy, and characterized by great vivacity of spirit, and intensely fond of society. One morning, just as she was leaving her toilet, her eye accidentally fell upon the text—"She that liveth in pleasure is dead while she liveth." The words struck to her heart, and she stood a few moments amazed, as though some invisible agency had directed her attention to that verse, and this was blessed to the arresting of her soul to a higher purpose in life, even to great purposes she did not then dream of.

Many of the controversies amongst Christians on religious subjects grow out of attempts to understand and explain by the powers of natural reason, things which are beyond its limits. Speculations of this kind have confused and bewildered the minds of many. David Ferris relates that when he was about 8 years of age he was informed that the Divine Being was self-existent; without beginning and without end; and not being able to understand how that could be, he says, "I sometimes thought so intensely on the subject, that I became much bewildered. At length, it was shown me, that the proposition was too high for my comprehension; and I received something like a reproof for searching into things beyond my capacity. From that time I was fearful of prying into such deep mysteries."

In his lively narrative of his religious experience, David Ferris instructively shows how the Spirit of Christ, which had thus taught him in his childhood, continued to guide him, and became "a leader and teacher to direct and instruct me in the way to rest and peace. As I was obedient, He led me to forsake my vain course of life, and all those youthful delights and sensual pleasures which were displeasing to my dear Lord and Master." "But if at any time, I acted in my own will, I lost my strength, and found no acceptance nor benefit by my performances; by which I gradually learnt that I could do nothing acceptably without the immediate assistance of the Spirit of Christ, the Redeemer." "I clearly perceived that all right understanding in spiritual concerns must proceed from the immediate revelation of the Holy Spirit; and that we could not come to the knowledge of God, nor of anything relating to his kingdom without it."

Of thyself thou canst not do anything towards thy own salvation: but in the power of Him that worketh both to will and to do, thou may'st do a little at first: and as that power grows in thee, thou wilt be able to will more, and to do more, even until nothing become too hard for thee. And when thou hast conquered all, suffered all, performed all; thou shalt see and be able, understandingly to say, thou hast done nothing; but the eternal virtue, life and power, hath wrought all in thee.—Isaac Penington.

The Story of Africa.

"Well, I used to think no one could do two things well at once, but that boy seems to have managed it and no mistake."

So spoke an English traveller who was inspecting one of the great cotton mills in the west of Scotland, not far from Glasgow. And well might he say so. The lad whom he was watching—a pale, thin, bright-eyed boy, employed in the mill as a "piecer"—had fixed a small book to the framework of the spinning-jenny, and seemed to snatch a brief sentence from its pages every time he passed it in the course of his work.

"Ay, he's jist a wonder, yon laddie," answered the Scotch foreman, to whom the visitor had addressed himself. "We ca' him 'Busy Davie' here, for he's aye read-readin like any minister; but he does his wark well for a' that."

"And does he really understand what he reads?" asked the Englishman, looking wonderingly at the young student's book, which was a treatise on medicine and surgery that would have puzzled most lads four or five years older than himself.

"I's warrant he does that," replied the Scot, with an emphatic nod. "There's no a quicker chiel than Davie i' the hail mill."

And then the visitor passed on to look at another part of the works, and forgot all about "Busy Davie" for the time being.

But he was suddenly reminded of him two hours later, when the mill hands "knocked off" for dinner. Coming back across the yard when his tour of inspection was over, the traveller caught sight of a small figure in a corner by itself, which he thought he recognized.

A second glance showed him that he was not mistaken. There sat "Busy Davie," holding in one hand the big oatmeal "hannock" that represented his dinner, and in the other a soiled and tattered book without a cover, which he was devouring so eagerly that his food remained almost untouched.

The Englishman stole softly up behind the absorbed boy, and glancing over his shoulder at the book saw that it was one written by himself a few years before, describing the most perilous of all his journeys through the wild region beyond the Orange River in South Africa.

Just as the visitor came up, the little student, quite unaware that the author of the book was standing beside him, read half aloud one of the more exciting passages, following the lines with his roughened forefinger:

"The progress of our party was necessarily very slow, as we could only march in the mornings and evenings, and the wheels of the wagons often sank up to the very axle in the loose sand. In some places the heat was so great that the grass actually crumbled to dust in our fingers. More than once our supply of water ran out altogether, and men and beasts staggered onward over the hot, dusty, never-ending plain, with parched tongues and bloodshot eyes, silent and despairing."

At the thought of these difficulties, which he himself was one day to meet and overcome as few men have ever done before or after him, the boy's thin face hardened into the look of indomitable firmness which was its habitual expression in after-life. But it softened into a smile the next moment, as he read as follows:

"In several of the places where we camped, our chief food was a species of large frogs, called by the natives, 'mattlemetto,' which was kind enough to assist us in our hunts for it by setting up such a tremendous croaking that we could easily find it, even in the dark."

Here the boy turned over a leaf and came suddenly upon a startling picture of a man lying prostrate on the ground, with a lion's fore-paw planted on his chest, and its teeth fastened in his shoulder, while several negroes, with terrified faces, were seen making off as fast as possible in the background.

"How would you like to travel through a country like that, my lad?" asked the explorer. It would be rough work, wouldn't it?"

"I wad like weel to gang there, for a' that," answered the boy, "for there's muckel to be done there yet."

"There is, indeed, and it's just fellows of your sort that we need to do it," said the traveller, clapping him on the shoulder. "If you ever do go to Africa, I'll be bound it will take more than a lion in your way to stop you."

The whole world now knows how strangely those lightly spoken words were fulfilled twenty-eight years later, when that boy did actually come alive out of the jaws of the hungry African lion, which had broken his arm with its teeth, to finish those wonderful explorations that filled the civilized world with the fame of Dr. David Livingstone.—Harper's Young People.

For "The Friend."

We love to gather evidence from sources outside of the Society, in support of the testimonies Friends are called upon to bear before the world. Editorials in "The Friend" of First Month 15th and 22d, remind of the expressions of John B. Gough, in respect to preaching the gospel of Christ. He says: "Having depicted the sins and sorrows of a great city, a gentleman said to me, 'You have revealed to us a state of things which is fearful, an amount of moral evil that is perfectly appalling. What do you consider the remedy for all this moral evil?' I said to him, as I would say to you or any one: 'The only remedy for moral evil is the power of the gospel of the grace of God!' He replied, 'Why don't you preach the gospel, then?' I said: 'The reason why I do not preach the gospel, according to your idea of preaching it, is that I have such an idea of the awful responsibility that rests upon any man who dares to stand between the living and the dead to deliver God's message to dying men; that unless I felt it in the core of my heart, 'Woe is me if I preach not the gospel,' with my sense of the requirements for the office, and with my views of it, I should not dare to occupy the position.' Then he said: 'You are preaching something else instead.' 'Oh, no!' 'Is not drunkenness a moral evil?' Yes. 'Is not the power of the gospel of the grace of God the only remedy for moral evil?' 'Yes.' 'Now, by the total abstinence movement we do not pretend to do more than the one thing. Drunkenness is a moral evil produced by a physical agency. Remove the agency, and the moral evil ceases, so far as drunkenness is concerned.'" He shows the work of the total abstinence or prohibition movement, to be that of removing the cause, and rescuing humanity from the blighting influence of strong drink; thus preparing them for church membership—and Christian lives.

His view as to the strength of the church militant, may give some encouragement to the small and scattered flocks, who are earnestly striving to maintain the testimonies and "faith once delivered to the saints." He says: "The strength of the church of Christ, I believe, consists not so much in its numbers, its wealth, or its popularity, as in its purity." Then, we say, in the language of Scripture, "Fear not, little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom," if ye continue "steadfast, immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord; forasmuch as ye know your labor shall not be in vain in the Lord."

Marshallton, Pa., First Mo. 24th, 1887.

Time to Quit.

The South Bend Sun tells of a man who once received wholesome instruction concerning this matter. He was a prominent professional gentleman, living in the city, who one morning stepped into a saloon to get his customary drink. After passing the ordinary salutation with three or four loafers who were hanging about the place, he went up to the bar and called for whisky, which was handed to him. As he filled the glass and was raising it to his lips, a miserable, wretched, drunken tramp stepped up beside him and said,

"Say, Squire, can't you give me a drink out of that bottle?"

Not wishing to be annoyed by associates of that class, the gentleman roughly told him to go away and mind his own business. The tramp angrily replied that he need not be so cranky about the matter, for before he got to drinking he was just as respectable as he was, and wore as fine clothes as he did, "And what is more," he said, "I always knew how to act the gentleman."

The gentleman stood for a few moments eyeing the man from head to foot, noting with deep disgust his blood-shot eyes, his bloated face, his long unkempt hair, his filthy, ragged garments, and his mismatched boots, after which he said,

"Then it was drinking that made you an outcast from society and the miserable man you are?"

"Yes," said the tramp.

"Then it is time for me to quit," said the gentleman, and pouring the glass of whisky on the floor, he turned and left the saloon, never to enter it again.

Earthly treasures are very apt to take up the mind and to draw it from heaven; and because Christ would have his children to be in heaven with Him, in tender love He adviseth them not to lay up for themselves riches or treasures on earth.

If it be said, we lay it up for our children, it may be said also, it is the same snare for them as to the parents, and sometimes a greater; and when it is gotten, it is liable to many casualties, and creates a great deal of care and trouble; wherefore Christ tenderly adviseth to seek after and lay up another treasure, of another nature, in another, a safer and better place, which will not be liable to the like casualties of the former treasure and place; and urgeth us to it with this great reason, "For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also."—Thomas Chalkley.

"There was Much Grass in the Place."—It all depends upon the season in which one comes to the north-eastern shore of the lake of Gennesaret as to whether or not he will find much grass there.

The note of time ("now the passover . . . was at hand") shows that our Lord was there in the spring. At that season, the grass in that region is plentiful and green; a few months later, and it is burned up by the heat, and the country presents a dreary aspect. The remark "There was much grass there," indicates an exception to the general rule. It cannot be truthfully said of many places in the Orient that there is much grass there. In England, and in the well-watered regions of the United States, one of the chief charms of the landscape is the soft carpet of green which covers the soil. In a characteristic Oriental scene, this charm is lacking. The grass may straggle here and there, or at special seasons it may show an unwonted luxuriance in certain places; but the universal carpet of green is chiefly conspicuous by its absence.

A New Use of Photography.—Over 25,000 sheets of "copy" are already prepared for the "Century Dictionary" and their preservation has been a serious problem. It is necessary to keep this large mass of manuscript in the printing-office for frequent consultation in regard to cross-references and the like. But if the manuscript were destroyed, the loss would be irreparable. It was proposed to insure the "copy" for \$150,000, but the insurance money would not have replaced the loss. Finally photography was suggested, and the idea has been successfully carried out. Each sheet of "copy," which is of brown paper, is eight inches by twelve, and bears printed extracts with corrections, interlineations and additions, as well as written paragraphs. Each has been photographed and reduced to a size measuring only $\frac{1}{4}$ inches by 2. All the words upon the positive of this size can be read with a magnifying glass, for every detail is, of course, accurately reproduced. The negatives are preserved, and the entire 25,000 would hardly more than fill a large bureau drawer. These negatives can be enlarged to any size which may be convenient. Should the manuscript now come to grief, these negatives would furnish a ready means of reproducing it in a very short time, and the cost for the whole 25,000 will not exceed \$300.—The American.

Cold-water Treatment.—The report of the German Miners' Union describes the methods employed to restore to life the persons who were rendered unconscious by the suffocating gases in an explosion at Camphausen. In some cases, where all other means had failed, this was effected by placing the patients in a warm bath, and rubbing the body to quicken the circulation and then allowing a jet of cold-water to fall on the chest and abdomen. This was in every case followed by a deep-drawn breath, and the breathing power increased by successive applications, till consciousness was restored.

Snail Gardens.—In Vorarlberg, the collecting and rearing of the large garden snails, which are so injurious to vegetation, forms a peculiar branch of agricultural industry, and amounts even to no inconsiderable trade. Whole cargoes of these snails are sent from Arlberg to the South Tyrol, where they are consumed as dainties. The mode of procedure in collecting and feeding them is as follows:—

In various parts of Vorarlberg, the snails are collected by boys and girls, and carried to the feeding places, which are commonly in the neighborhood of the dwellings of the owners. These snail gardens have usually an extent of from one to three hundred square fathoms of dry garden ground, and are quite divested of trees and shrubs, and are surrounded on all sides by a stream of running water. The stream, at its exit, is made to pass through a wooden grating, in order to prevent such of the snails as happen to fall into the water from being washed away. The grating is examined once or twice a day, generally morning and evening, and the snails found there are replaced in the interior of the garden; this is necessary, as they would otherwise collect into too large quantities, and would become weak and sickly by remaining long in the water. In the interior of the garden, little heaps of pine twigs, generally of the mountain pine, mixed loosely with wood moss, are placed on every two or three square fathoms, for the purpose of protecting the snails from cold, and especially from the scorching rays of the sun. When the pine twigs become dry, and lose their leaves, they are replaced by fresh ones.

Every day, and particularly in damp weather, the snails are fed with the kinds of grass found most suitable for them, and with cabbage leaves. In harvest, at the return of cold weather, they go under cover—that is, they collect under the heaps of twigs, and bury themselves, if the ground under these has been previously dried, two or three inches below the surface, and there they seal themselves up for the winter; when this is completely accomplished, they are collected, packed in suitably perforated boxes lined with straw, and sent off.

Careful foddering, and a good harvest season, are essential to the thriving of the snails; and even in spite of this a great many are lost. Wood snails are larger and more savory, but are more subject to casualties. In each garden there are generally fed from 15,000 to 40,000, and these are sold at about three florins per 1,000. This manner of making use of the snails is of double advantage—freeing, on the one hand fields and gardens from burdensome guests, and affording, on the other, to those so employing themselves, a considerable source of profit.—Chambers' Edinburgh Journal.

What is Catgut?—The Shoe and Leather Reporter thus answers: "For many years the only article used under this name consisted of the intestines of sheep, cut and twisted. As the Italian sheep are the leanest of those accessible to market, and as the membranes of lean animals are known to be tougher than those of animals in high condition, the best catgut has come from Naples and had vicinity.

"There is no historical record concerning the use of the intestines of cats for strings of this sort, but from the fact that their name from earliest times has uniformly been applied to this article, it would appear altogether probable that the strings did first come or were supposed to come from that source. The chief use of catgut for many years was for the strings of harps and guitars; it was manufactured from the viscera of sheep. The membranes of smaller animals are sometimes used for the covering of whips, and such purposes, but sheep still furnish the strings or musical instruments. The process of preparing is quite curious. The membranes are ordinarily exposed to the power of burning sulphur, and then slit and twisted into cords of different sizes as wanted. Musical strings, whip cords, hatters' cords, strings of clocks, &c., are the chief uses on the list. They are then dyed, stretched on frames, and dried in a very high temperature."

Germination of Wheat in Ice.—During the latter part of the summer of 1884, or possibly the year previous, many of the pieces of ice taken from the ice-house used by the families of the teachers at Westtown Boarding School, Chester County, Pa., were found to contain plants of wheat. In each case, the seed had embedded itself in the block of ice, and having germinated, the roots had forced their way downward into the clear ice for distances of six or eight inches, while the plumule had grown two or three inches in an opposite direction mostly between blocks, or into very soft ice. The plants had a healthy look, except, of course, there was little or no color in the plumule. The ice was rather soft when harvested, and was covered in the ice-house with sawdust. The grains of wheat were probably gathered from the bottom of the wagon and thrown in with the ice.

The circumstance led to a reference to some authorities on temperatures at which certain seeds may germinate. Edwards & Collin published in 1834 the results of a series of experiments which gave 44.6° Fahr. as the minimum temperature for the germination of "winter wheat, rye and barley." De Candolle succeeded in germinating two seeds of mustard at 32°, but no record of wheat having been germinated at so low a temperature, is found. The length of time occupied by the wheat in germination may have exceeded that allowed by experimenters, or this may have been a particularly hardy variety of wheat.

—Annexation of Burmah.—The London Friend, in a review of the foreign policy of the British Government during 1886, says: "From Burmah the news throughout the year has been little else than a constant story of strife with the natives, of the need for increased troops, and of bloodshed and suffering from disease and disaster, divided not very unequally among the contending parties; except that on the British side it has been mainly Indian troops who have perished in a quarrel in which they have not had a shred of interest. The course pursued by Russia in Bulgaria, the kidnapping of her prince and the undisguised attempt to deprive her nation of freedom, has excited great indignation in England; but though the history of Bulgaria, her progress in civilization, and the character of her late prince, awaken a wealth of sympathy which Burmah fails to excite; yet, as a matter of justice and right, it would be hard to prove that the action of England in one country was not as black as that of Russia in the other."

—Cheering Statistics.—The same Journal gives some interesting statistics, showing that in Great Britain, there is a marked decrease in the quantity of alcoholic drinks consumed, and in the number of commitments for crime; and a growth in habits of thrift and economy, as shown by the increased deposits by the working classes in saving banks and mutual societies.

—The Sanitarium Association of Philadelphia.—This association has for a number of years carried on its useful work of relieving the sick, enfeebled and convalescent children of the poor of Philadelphia, at Point Airy, the southern end of Windmill Island, in the Delaware River, opposite the city. As its operations extended, and the number of patients increased, the ground occupied became insufficient, and was further diminished by unusual tides which washed away a portion of the island. It was concluded to remove the establishment to Red Bank, on the eastern shore of the Delaware, a short distance below the city, and a tract of 83 acres was there purchased, containing suitable buildings and a park of 12 acres. For the necessary repairs to the buildings, wharf, &c., and for the purchase of an additional steamboat, which will be necessary, about $27,000 are needed, for which the managers appeal to the benevolence of the public.

Among those to whom contributions may be sent, is our friend Samuel M. Bines, No. 119 S. Fourth St., Philada.

—Pennsylvania Seamen's Friend Society.—The 42d Annual Report of this Society, for the year ending Fifth Month last, shows that 614 boarders were received during the year at the Sailor's Home, a boarding house supported by the Society in Philadelphia, where the seamen are comfortably accommodated, and shielded from many temptations. Fifty-two loan Libraries had been placed on board as many vessels; and tracts and bibles have been distributed as heretofore.

—Formal Prayers.—The newspapers state, that an English vicar recently discharged a parlor-maid because she refused to attend family prayers. She sued him at law, and obtained a judgment for her year's wages, having shown that she could not go to the prayers in a spirit of devotion and faith.

—A Sensible Decision.—The Sophomore Class of the University of Pennsylvania recently passed resolutions declaring that the class would have no bowl fight at the University this year. We are glad to observe this breaking off from a foolish custom, and hope it may be followed by the abolition of other foolish practices which have grown up in several of our colleges.

—A Reminiscence of Slave-times.—"While practising law a number of years ago," said Judge Tourgee, "I had a peculiar will case. An old lady who was a slave-holder, dying, bequeathed her colored man, John, and her dusky maid, Jane, who sustained to each other the relation of husband and wife, to the trustees of the church, 'to be used as far as possible for the glory of God.' I was curious to know what course was taken, and upon investigation found that after meditation and prayer, the trustees sold their legacy at auction, and with the proceeds sent a missionary to China."

—Life a Failure.—A gentleman of high standing, a lawyer, a politician, a man of talents, and as the world estimates, a man who was successful in all his undertakings, was suddenly arrested by disease, and soon brought to the close of life.

As it was evident that he could not live but a few days, he was asked by a friend how he felt as he looked back upon his past life. And the answer, coming from a man of sense and thought, with eternity full in his view, was striking and memorable. "With all its success, I now see and feel that my life has been a failure! I have not gained one of the great ends for which life was given, and now it is too late to gain them!"

THE FRIEND.

SECOND MONTH 5, 1887.

Our readers may remember that in "The Friend" of Twelfth Mo. 18th, was published a communication received from our friend Joseph Morris, of Cardington, Ohio, with a few editorial comments thereon. This article has stimulated a Friend in eastern Indiana, who knew not J. Morris personally, but sympathized with his feelings, to write to him, expressing his own views of the situation of things in our Society. The letter has been forwarded to us by its recipient, with a suggestion as to its publication in our columns. In printing it, the Editor feels somewhat of the same hesitation as was expressed in the former instance, "because of its commendatory language towards the body to which he belongs;" but he is influenced by the consideration that it may tend to the encouragement and help of some who often feel pressed with a sense of the extent of the departures from our principles that exist, and of their own inability to check the tide of error—as well as of the weaknesses that exist among even the advocates of the truth. He heartily unites in the desire expressed in the letter, that Philadelphia Yearly Meeting "may remain humble, watchful, uncompromising in the principles of the Gospel." Especially desirable is it, that all who labor in the Lord's cause, for the maintenance of sound principles, and the spread of righteousness in the earth, should feel that without Divine help they can do no good; and that they continually need, for their own safety, to be kept in a humble, watchful condition, looking for daily supplies of spiritual food, and giving all the praise of his own works to Him to whom it ever belongs.

Ind., Twelfth Mo. 24th, 1886.

Joseph Morris,—dear friend,—On reading thy article in "The Friend" of Twelfth Mo. 18th, 1886, I have been afresh reminded of the firm stand which Philadelphia Yearly Meeting has taken and maintained, from the beginning, against the innovations in doctrine and practice which have been creeping into our meetings, until in many places the distinguishing views and practices of Friends have become nearly obliterated.

The position of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, it seems to me, towards the different Yearly Meetings is a very similar one to that occupied by the church in Philadelphia toward the other churches of Asia at the time St. John wrote his Revelation.

"I know thy works: behold I have set before thee an open door, and no man can shut it; for thou hast a little strength, and hast kept my word, and hast not denied my name. Behold, I will make them of the synagogue of Satan, which say they are Jews, and are not, but do lie; behold, I will make them to come and worship before thy feet, and to know that I have loved thee. Because thou hast kept the word of my patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation, which shall come upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth. Behold I come quickly: hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown."—Rev. iii. 8, 9, 10, 11.

Now it seems to me that Philadelphia Yearly Meeting ought to be encouraged by every loyal Friend, wherever situated, to continue in the faith, doctrines, testimonies and practices of original Friends; and continue from time to time to disseminate those principles by sending out epistles and documents setting forth the primitive principles and doctrines of the Society, and thus be a means of eventually gathering together into one fold, all that are in bonds everywhere. In the Providence of God, Philadelphia certainly has a great work to do. May she remain humble, watchful, uncompromising in the principles of the Gospel, that she may be instrumental in settling and establishing the shattered and reeling Society on the true foundation.

Very truly thy friend.

In another part of our columns will be found an article by our friend Charles W. Thomson, giving his views on the question of the resumption of epistolary correspondence between London and Philadelphia Yearly Meetings—which he does not think likely to be productive of benefit to either of those bodies at the present time. As his residence, excepting for a few months past, has been within the limits of London Yearly Meeting, he has had more opportunities for knowing the situation of things there than have fallen to the lot of our readers generally.

Without entering fully at this time on the general subject of the interchange of epistles by Yearly Meetings, we will simply state our own belief, that but little spiritual good will flow from such epistles, unless they are the offspring of a living concern for the promotion of the kingdom of Christ, and are something more than merely formal salutations.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—In the U. S. Senate on the 31st ultimo, resolutions of the Massachusetts Legislature were presented, concerning the treatment of American fishing vessels in Canadian waters, declaring itself in favor of retaliation to the extent of denying to Canadian vessels in American ports the right to purchase supplies, and the eventual exclusion of all Canadian products by land or sea, until the offensive legislation and action of the Canadian authorities are discontinued.

The internal revenue collections during the first six months of the current fiscal year were $57,503,503, being a decrease of $1,054,340 as compared with the corresponding period of the previous fiscal year. There was a decrease of $3,222,844 in the collections on spirits, an increase of $683,881 on tobacco, an increase of $1,112,461 on fermented liquors, and an increase of $71,052 from miscellaneous sources. The total collections from oleomargarine since Eleventh Month last, amounted to $293,109.

The total value of the exports from the United States during 1886, was $713,289,666, against $688,249,798 in 1885. The total value of our imports last year was $663,417,210, against $587,868,675 the preceding year.

The circulation of the standard silver dollar is steadily decreasing. The amount outstanding on the 25th ultimo—$58,634,237—is over $2,000,000 less than the amount outstanding on the 1st ultimo.

The total number of immigrants who arrived in the United States last year was 386,755, against 326,151 in 1885.

A despatch from Tahlequah, Indian Territory, gives a very interesting interview with a man named Johnson, of the Osage Nation, in regard to the condition and progress of the Osage Indians. He says it is impossible for the Osages to be paupers, for every head of an average family of six, draws about $1000 a year annuity. This is simply the interest on their invested funds. A large portion of them have nice farms and plenty of stock; in fact, some of them are getting really wealthy. All they ask is to be let alone, and that their treaties be observed, and they will solve what the white people call a problem, and show to the world that Indians can become civilized.

On the 27th ultimo, the Senate of Michigan, by a vote of 22 to 10, concurred in a resolution from the House providing for the submission of a Prohibition amendment to a vote of the people.

The brewers at Des Moines, Iowa, have again closed their retail bars, finding "that, while a State could not interfere in a cause that had been transferred to the Federal Court, there was nothing to prevent its beginning another cause like it. So every glass of beer sold was claimed to be a new offence and ground for a new action by the State." Be encouraged friends of Prohibition in Iowa.

According to the New Jersey Asbury Park Journal, there were but two places along the New Jersey coast of any importance, twenty-five years ago—Long Branch and Cape May. Then the total valuation on the seaboard was less than $7,000,000, while the last report of Controller Anderson gives the astonishing valuation of over $100,000,000.

It is reported that the police of Wilkesbarre, Penna., have discovered a "regularly organized gang of robbers, the oldest of whom is 11 and the youngest 5 years of age." They are about twelve in number, and six of them have been arrested. They are said to have robbed at least fifty merchants, and their pilferings are believed to aggregate $5000.

On the 27th of last month, the great strike ordered in support of the coal handlers in New York was begun. Twenty thousand men—coal shovelers, longshoremen, freight handlers and others—went out along the river front in New York city, and about thirteen thousand more joined the strike in Jersey City and Brooklyn. Day after day the number of strikers has increased, until it is thought about 50,000 longshoremen, coal-handlers, freight handlers, &c., are idle. Many new men, however, have been employed by the companies, and others are expected to be on hand in a short time.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 420, which was 35 more than during the previous week, and 22 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing 217 were males and 203 females; 65 died of consumption; 48 of pneumonia; 25 of diseases of the heart; 26 of old age; 17 of convulsions; 15 of inflammation of the brain; 13 of apoplexy; 13 of Bright's disease and 12 of debility.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½'s, 110½; 4's, 128½; 3's, 100½; currency 6's, 125 a 135.

Cotton was in limited request by the spinners, at 9½ cts. for middling uplands.

Petroleum was quiet but steady at 6½ cts. for 70 Abel test in barrels, and 8½ cts. for 110 test in cases.

Flour and Meal.—Flour was dull and weak to sell. Sales of 125 barrels Ohio extra, at $3.10; 125 barrels of Pennsylvania family, at $3.75; 375 barrels Ohio and Indiana, straight, at $4.40 to $4.50; 625 barrels winter patent, at $4.62 a $5; 125 barrels Minnesota, clear, at $4.25, and 625 barrels Minnesota patent, at $5.10 a $5.25. Rye flour was quiet at $3 per barrel for choice.

Grain.—Wheat was firm and higher, No. 2 red closing at 92½ cts. bid and 92½ cts. asked. Rye was nominal at 50 cts. for No. 2 Pennsylvania. Corn was firm. No. 2 mixed closed at 46½ cts. bid, and 46½ cts. asked. Oats were quiet; No. 2 white closing at 37½ cts. bid and 38½ cts. asked.

Beef cattle were fairly active at 3a 5½ cts.

Sheep were active, and ¼c. higher, at 3 a 5½ cts. Lambs, at 4 a 7 cts.

Hogs were active and ¼c. higher. Western, 7½ a 7½ cts.

The receipts were: Beaves, 2000; sheep, 10,000; hogs, 8500.

FOREIGN.—The following is a forecast of the Queen's speech which was read at the opening of Parliament on the 27th of last month:

England's foreign relations are friendly. Affairs in Southeastern Europe are in a fair way of settlement, but England must insist upon the observance of the treaty of Berlin. In Burma and Egypt there is gratifying improvement. Grave anxiety is caused by the force of Ireland. The system adopted there of combining to state tenants to evade just debts may compel further legislation, and the Government will not hesitate to ask additional powers if necessary.

On the 28th, United States Minister Phelps had a hour's conference with the Marquis of Salisbury at the Premier's request, to discuss the Canadian Fisheries question. The conference was most cordial on both sides. Lord Salisbury expressed himself gratified at the general tone of the American press and people in the dispute, and he assured Minister Phelps that England and Canada were equally desirous of an amicable adjustment of the whole case.

The election for member of Parliament for the Exchange Division of Liverpool to fill the vacancy caused by the death of David Duncan, was held on the 26th, and resulted as follows: Neville, Gladstonian, 3217; Goschen, Conservative and Unionist, 3210. The defeat of Goschen is felt by the members of the Carlton Club to be a great party disaster.

The British ship Kapunda, which left London on the 11th of Twelfth Month last, for Fremantle, Western Australia, with emigrants, came into collision, near the coast of Brazil, with the British bark Ada Melbourne. Both vessels sunk, and 304 persons were drowned. Some who were saved have arrived at Bahia, Brazil.

The municipal Council of the city of Cork has adopted a resolution declaring that, instead of the Irish people subscribing to the Queen's Jubilee, it would be more fitting for the Prince of Wales to send relief to the Irish people in distress.

Germany has made arrangements to at once erect barracks at various points along the French frontier, "thus answering France" as the despatch from Berlin giving the intelligence says, "with barrack for barrack."

A telegram from Montreal says that "all the leading Canadian papers, irrespective of party, agree that Canada's position is impregnable on the fishery question, and urge the Dominion Government to uphold Canada's rights at all hazards. At the same time the hope is expressed that the United States Government will not take the course which recent legislation indicates until every means of coming to a fair and friendly settlement is exhausted."

NOTICE.

The next meeting of Friends' Teachers' Association of Philadelphia, will be held at No. 140 North Sixteenth St., Philadelphia, on Seventh-day, Second Mo. 12th, 1887, at 2 P. M.

Prof. Wm. H. Payne, of the University of Michigan, will address the Association.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

Until further notice the stage will connect with the 7.02 and 9.03 morning trains from Broad St., to convey passengers to the School; and at other times when timely notice is sent to J. G. WILLIAMS, Supt.

DIED, at her residence in West Branch, Iowa, MARY J., wife of William W. Penrose, Twelfth Month 25th, 1886, in the 40th year of her age, a member of Springdale Monthly Meeting of Friends held at West Branch. She was the daughter of Samuel and Hannah Smith, formerly of Chesterfield, Ohio. Soon after her marriage, in 1868, she was deeply impressed with life's responsibilities, and the necessity of a change of heart to be prepared for the duties devolving upon her. She was an affectionate wife, and tender, patient mother, concerned to set a right example before her family, and sought to lead her children to Christ in their earliest years. Her sickness was of three months' duration, and from the first she believed it would be her last. I required a struggle to be resigned to leave her husband and six children that needed her maternal care; but He who had hitherto helped her, enabled her to give them into his care: while she was with them she was faithful to train and discipline them, and now "she, being dead yet speaketh." She had always felt "shrinking from the pains of dissolution as physical suffering, but the fear of death was all taken away, so that in the last moments she exclaimed, "If this be death it is an easy thing to die."

Second Mo. 6th, 1846. Our Quarterly Meeting, held at Germantown. William Evans and Ezra Comfort both ministered, though differently led. Uncle E.'s concern seemed to be, to warn of the danger of going to work in our own will and time; being very active, and thinking we were doing a great deal of good. But all would not do, if there was not a dwelling and keeping in the fear of the Lord. Fear God and keep his commandments; for this is the whole duty of man, &c. William's was an encouragement to the fearful, the timid ones, who were afraid to take one step without Divine help. Said, there was a danger of being too fearful. Even when little services have been shown and required, there has been a holding back, with a looking to others who we think are more fit! No advancement could be made while this was our situation. For we were to remember that all, even the most favored instruments, had a beginning; and it was by being faithful in the little that these were helped on. All have gifts committed unto them, and all were encouraged to be faithful thereto; and they would know a growth in the Truth. That although seasons of trial and proving may be meted out, and we left, as it were, in thick darkness, yet as faith and confidence were abode n, a way would be made, &c. I may acknowledge that dear William's communication sank deep; but whether I was of the class addressed, I know not.

9th. Quieted and comforted this afternoon in looking over the leaves of dear J. Barclay's life. In many of his notes and memorandums, thought I could read the lines of my own experience, and of others. Oh, how my soul coveted after them!

26th. Our Monthly Meeting, held at Gwynedd. While feeling my helpless condition, dear Robert Scotton arose with: "The Lord, whom we seek, shall suddenly come to his temple, even he messenger of the covenant whom ye delight in," &c. "But who may abide the day of his coming? and who shall stand when He appeareth? or He is like a refiner's fire, and like fuller's soap. And He shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver; and He shall purify the sons of Levi, and purge them as gold and silver, that they may offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness." From this, our dear friend was strengthened in a very plain manner to show us by what means alone we could be fitted to offer acceptable offerings unto the Lord: declaring that the fire and the soap must be endured. He was also led into a tender feeling with some present among the children, who had made precious beginnings in the Truth, and who were now undergoing the ministration of condemnation. Which season, such were tenderly encouraged patiently to endure, when they would be brought through in the Lord's time, which must be waited for. Although such might feel as though they were doing very little for the good cause, and were very much out of sight, these were, he seemed to think, bearing their part of the burden, though they were not sensible of it. His faith seemed very strong that there would be those raised up to support our precious testimonies. Methinks, I never sat under a more encouraging communication, and I do know that a willingness lives in my heart, when prepared and sanctified, to stand forth for them, in whatever way my Heavenly Father may see best. This I have not been able to see as yet. And may I be preserved from being too anxious; be willing to live one day at a time, and that to the Lord.

Fourth Mo. 5th. Through hard struggling a little quietness attained. Ezra Comfort, near the close of our meeting, was led in a very clear manner to testify to the goodness and mercy of the Lord. He set forth that precious fellowship, which is felt and known alone through Him. "The children of the Lord are all taught of the Lord, and great is the peace of his children." "My peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you, not as the world giveth give I unto you." He seemed exercised, fearing there were too many, up and down, who were contenting themselves with living good moral lives, &c., &c. This would not save. He warned us of a day that was fast hastening, when every man's work shall be proved, &c. When life reigns, how the soul can rejoice! Be pleased, O Heavenly Father! to preserve a seed which shall be accounted to thee for a generation.

Fifth Mo. 17th.—Have been comforted and instructed this afternoon, in reading the early life of Joseph Pike; with the ministration of condemnation he passed under, not for months only, but even years. I could but believe, that my troubles bear a faint resemblance to his, though not so heavy. He held out to the end; and that I may be strengthened to do so, is the secret prayer.

Sixth Mo. 8th. Don't know when I have been more tried, than during our silent sitting together this morning. My thoughts wandering far and wide and no centering them on anything good. How oft did the silent query arise, Why is it thus with me? Oh that I were as in years past, when light shone upon my path, &c. Near the close, Ezra Comfort arose and addressed in a very pointed manner a state similar to this. He showed why they were not permitted to feed with the flock of Christ's companions; saying it was for want of more watchfulness, even a watching unto prayer. Said, the Lord's face was not hid in anger; but that we might be made sensible of our own impotency, and more carefulness and faithfulness be sought. Then, he believed, there would yet be a feeding and lying down in the green pastures, or words to this effect. I felt the force of the words preached; and, it may be, there were other poor souls present did too. But I wish not to get from under them.

12th. A precious quiet seemed to overspread our little gathering this morning; and once more was my heart alive to the feeling of it.

Seventh Mo. 23rd. Since last note I have been visited with sickness. But am again restored, or nearly so, to my usual health. This is a fresh call for gratitude to the Author of my being, in that He was pleased to spare me a little longer; that so the great work of sanctification and purification may be perfected. Was fresh convinced this day, while silently gathered with my friends, how utterly unable I am of myself to perfect this. Oh for ability to petition for strength! Give me more and more to see and feel, O Heavenly Parent! my lost and undone condition, and the need I have of a Saviour. 'Tis this alone that will bring me, or any rightly, to plead with Thee. There are seasons, when I do feel my condition, but too seldom: therefore, Heavenly Father, bring me low and keep me low, till a change be wrought—a heavenly change—even from a state of nature to a state of grace.

Eighth Mo. 16th. At our little meeting this morning, we had the company and labors of a dear friend from the city, Rachel Thornton. The language of sweet encouragement flowed to the hungering and thirsting children. Quoting, "Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled." She seemed very sure this time would come to some present, if faith and confidence were abode in; with much more very comforting.

Eleventh Mo. 12th. Our week-day meeting. We had the company of our friend, Robert Scotton; who ministered in a close searching manner. After quoting the Scripture concerning the Galileans, whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices, and those eighteen upon whom the tower of Siloam fell and slew them, he was concerned that there might not any of us settle down in what we might have attained to, or be feeding on manna gathered yesterday; which, if we did, would prove like that formerly which "bred worms and stank." He said our daily bread must be labored for, as much for the soul as for these poor bodies. He encouraged to faithfulness and obedience, with a language very impressive. I do desire to take his concern home into my own bosom; there is such a disposition alive in me, to feed on some good act said or done, that oftentimes I am made to blush when brought rightly to see and feel what a poor weak thing I am.

19th. In our week-day meeting at Gwynedd, held in silence, my heart was poured out before the Lord, who alone knew the secret travail of my soul. May I more and more seek an acquaintance with Him, who remains to be the alone sure bread of life. There are seasons when the appeal can be made, "Thou knowest all things;" thou knowest that I love thee! And when, O Heavenly Parent, thou hast fully tested this love, be pleased yet more and more to manifest thyself.

Twelfth Mo. 6th. My meeting this morning was a precious one. Felt as though I could adopt the language, "It is good for us to be here."

First Mo. 10th, 1847. Upon first taking my seat in meeting this morning, my mind seemed in a very unsettled state. I was alive to my situation, without being able to help myself. After a patient struggle, help came, and I was enabled to center down in quietness; to draw near, and, with fresh confidence, to approach his sacred footstool, and plead for life. Oh that the Lord may incline, ere long, unto the pleadings of his poor child, however unworthy of his notice and regard.

31st. Our First-day meeting. My soul secretly travailed under the weight of manifold sins and transgressions; which I fear still stand recorded against me in the Lamb's book of life. Oh! what sacrifice would I not make, for a clear evidence of forgiveness and acceptance! I have been pleading for this for years; but fear I have not been asking aright, or my tears would be had in remembrance.

Third Mo. 18th. Our week-day meeting. We had the company of our dear friends Gerard and Samuel Cope; who were on their way to the city to attend (at least Samuel) the Meeting for Sufferings. Samuel was led near the close, to put up a petition on our behalfs. Oh how he pleaded for us! yea even for the lukewarm, and those who through the weakness of the flesh, are unable to maintain the watch; that watch which our blessed Master enjoined upon his poor disciples. The burden-bearers also were very sweetly remembered.

For "The Friend."

A Microscopical Exhibition.

A microscopical exhibition in the hall of the Academy of Natural Sciences, in Philadelphia, on the evening of the 9th of Twelfth Month, presented many objects of great interest to the spectators, and opened to the mind of one interested in natural objects glimpses into wide fields of study and research.

Most of the working naturalists connected with the Academy, devote their leisure time principally to the pursuit of some one branch in the unlimited range of subjects that Nature offers to her votaries; and, outside of their special line of study, many of them do not claim to possess more than a general knowledge of natural history.

More than one hundred microscopes were arranged on the tables in different parts of the Hall, each furnished with some object for examination. Some of the most beautiful of these were the mineral crystals of various shapes—among them, those of gold reminded the observer of the feather-lines of crystals, which may often be seen in winter diverging from a needle of ice.

Not less interesting were the thin sections of the stalks of plants, such as those of the Blackberry and Fern, showing the curious arrangement of their cells and tubes.

One of the botanists had arranged a series of objects which instructively illustrated the development of the fern. He commenced with a faint dot on the back of a fern leaf, in which the minute spores, commonly called seeds, lay packed together. Then some of these spores were shown in a loose condition. Then came the slender, thread-like bodies which are produced after these spores have vegetated. These are of two kinds, and correspond to the stamens and pistils of flowering plants. It is from their union with each other, that the young ferns are developed; as, in the higher orders of plants, the absorption of the pollen by the pistil is essential to the maturing of the seed from which a new generation of plants is to spring. The last stage in the cycle of the fern was a young plant which had commenced to shoot forth a stem, and plainly indicated by its appearance the family to which it belonged.

One beautiful slide contained some of the transparent needle-shaped crystals, which are so abundantly diffused through the substance of many species of sponge.

Another slide, though less beautiful, was of equal interest, as furnishing an illustration of one of the low and minute forms of insect life. It contained a specimen of the itch-insect, which burrows in the skin, and produces the annoying irritation attendant upon the itch. As mounted on the microscopic slide, it was an ill-favored insect, with projecting arms and feelers. It is about one-sixtieth of an inch in length. After burying itself in the skin, it burrows, and forms winding galleries, which are pierced with small openings at intervals for the admission of air.

Of all the numerous objects exhibited, that which attracted the most observers (as was shown by the line of persons waiting their respective turns) was the circulation of the blood in a living salamander. It was a young specimen, and sufficiently compressed between plates of glass to keep it from moving, yet not enough to interfere with its vital functions. It was so arranged, as to be bathed in a slowly flowing stream of water from an elevated jar; and the part placed beneath the microscope was the branchiæ or gills, through which the blood was rapidly moving, being purified by the air dissolved in the water which flowed around them. The animal was so nearly transparent that the circulation was very distinctly visible.

Several of the microscopes were devoted to the exhibition of a minute form of vegetable life, belonging to the Algae, or Sea Weeds. They are found adhering to plants and other objects, both in salt and fresh water; and on the surface of damp rocks and walls, garden paths, &c., and are widely diffused over the world. They exist in countless myriads, though mostly so small as to be invisible to the naked eye. They consist of a cell of vegetable material, which rapidly decomposes; but this is covered with a silicious shield, composed of two pieces or valves, which is very permanent. These plants increase chiefly by division, the plant splitting into two lengthways; one of the old valves being retained, and a new one secreted by each half. From this habit of growth they are termed diatoms from a Greek word, which means "cut in two."

Their silicious shields are found in great abundance in a fossil state, Tripoli stone is almost entirely composed of them. There is a stratum of diatomaceous earth, 18 feet in thickness, underlying the city of Richmond, Virginia; and many similar deposits are found in different parts of the earth.

The rapidity of the dividing process, by which new diatoms are formed, is astounding. Professor Smith, the author of a standard work on these plants, has calculated that the progeny of a single diatom, in the course of a month, may amount to one thousand millions. By their rapid growth, and the indestructible character of their remains, they become of great importance both in a physical and geological point of view. They color vast tracts of the ocean, and form a large part of the ooze which covers its bed. It has been estimated that, excluding the coarse sand, one-fourth of the finer part of the mud of the Thames is composed of their remains. They abound in the newly formed ice of the Polar Regions and form submarine deposits of great dimensions.

Minute as they are, the diatoms are very favorite objects with microscopists, from the beauty and great variety of form which they exhibit. Some are circular in their outline; others exhibit radiating points, or projecting spines; others are elongated ellipses, or triangles, or imitations of different mathematical figures; and they are most curiously ornamented with lines and dots symmetrically arranged. A writer on this subject says, "The imagination can scarcely picture a form of beauty which does not find a counterpart among these most wonderful of Nature's medallions."

So small are some of the diatoms that they are used as tests of the powers and qualities of microscopes—only instruments of a superior character being able to reveal their presence and structure. Others are much larger, so that they may be seen with an ordinary pocket-lens, adhering to the eel-grass, or other water plants.

A remarkable illustration of patience and skill was shown at the exhibition by a microscopical slide containing 148 species of diatoms arranged in rows on the glass plate. It was the production of C. H. Kain, of Camden, N. J.

On one of the tables at the Academy were placed some instruments to illustrate the polarization of light. The light reflected at a certain angle from a glass plate, passed through very thin strips of mica of different thicknesses, arranged side by side. The spectator looked at these through a lens made of Iceland spar. As thus seen, the mica strips were no longer colorless objects like glass, but each was differently colored. This peculiar property of polarized light is made use of in the examination of crystals, thin vegetable sections, and other colorless objects, such as the transparent creatures found in water. By attaching polarizing lenses to a microscope, the tissues of such objects appear distinctly colored, and far more readily distinguished from each other, than without this help.

A Few Thoughts.

The time comes to earth's pilgrims wherein decision is called for, when the choice of either right or wrong is to be made. At a place where two ways meet, it is of great importance to the traveller to turn in the right direction. Believers in Christ are firstly shown the difference between right and wrong. The inward testimony of the Holy Spirit leads those who submit to it into the narrow way that leads to life. While walking in this way, under the tutelage of a Spiritual Guide, the Holy Scriptures in the experience of the child of God, are found "able to make wise unto salvation through faith in Christ Jesus.

"One thing is needful." This saying is worthy of being emphasized, for it came from Jesus Christ himself, who gave the assurance to the sisters, Martha and Mary, that the choice of the good part should never be taken from its possessor. What a rich possession! Surely "nothing earthly will compare with the soul's calm sunshine and the heartfelt joy," which is the portion of the true believer in Jesus.

But the inspired records declare that "man is born unto trouble as the sparks fly upward." How is it? Is it not, that with a nature prone to err, man becomes oftentimes a willing subject to temptation, and thus, being himself cheated out of happiness, he becomes an agency of evil in the world? How true, that "disobedience brought sin into the world, and death by sin!" Since sin is in the world, producing many dangers, the believer should be warned in season not to delay making a wise choice of good that is set before him. "Procrastination is the thief of time."

The wise king said, "I said of laughter, it is mad, and of mirth what doeth it?" But the Bible does not pronounce it a sin to laugh. The wisdom that is from above finds expression in her children by whom she is justified. Her children seek to be temperate in all things, and to let their moderation appear unto all men. They know that those who dwell in the dark grow pale and sickly for want of sunshine; and that without it the earth would be a dreary waste. Adversity is oftentimes proved to be an instrument in the Divine Hand to bring into a condition of humiliation before the Lord. Humility raises the cry, "God be merciful to me a sinner." This is a blessed experience on the part of high and low, rich and poor. It evidences a preparation of heart to make choice of good, because of promised joy: a desire is then kindled that gives expression like this,—

"O give me, O give me, the wings of a dove,
To adore Him, be near Him, enrapt with his love;
I but wait the summons, I list for the word;
Alleluia—Amen—evermore with the Lord."

THE TEMPLE OF JERUSALEM.

"There is, perhaps, no building of the ancient world, which has excited so much attention since its destruction, as the temple which Solomon built at Jerusalem, and its successor, as rebuilt by Herod." It was David who first proposed to replace the Tabernacle by a more permanent building, but was forbidden, "because he had shed blood abundantly," although his desire was commended, and he was promised that his son should build it after he was gone. Therefore David made preparations, and collected materials for it; but the execution of the task was left for his son Solomon. He, with the assistance of Hiram, king of Tyre, commenced this great undertaking in the fourth year of his reign, B. C. 1012, and completed it in seven years, B. C. 1005. It occupied the site prepared for it by David, on Mount Moriah. "The dedication of the Temple was the grandest ceremony ever performed under the Mosaic dispensation." This Temple was destroyed on the capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, B. C. 586.

The facts and incidents relating to this building, are gathered from the narratives of different writers, as recorded in several of the books of the Old Testament. David's first expression of his desire to build the Temple, with God's approval of his design, and his promise that his son should build it after he was gone, and David's prayer and thanksgiving for these promises, are found in the 7th chapter of 2nd Samuel, and in the 17th chapter of 1st Chronicles. The 21st and 22nd chapters of 1st Chronicles narrate the particulars of the selection by God, and the purchase by David of the site for the Temple, and the erection of an altar thereon. This was at the threshing floor of Ornan the Jebusite, the place where the destroying angel of the Lord paused in his destructive course whilst executing the awful judgment against David for his pride and arrogance in numbering the people contrary to the will of God. "And David saw the angel of the Lord stand there between the earth and heaven, with a drawn sword in his hand stretched out over Jerusalem; and the Lord said unto the angel, 'It is enough; stay now thine hand!'"

The 22nd chapter tells also of David's arrangements and preparations for the house. The 28th and 29th chapters contain his last charge and instructions respecting it, to his son Solomon, with his last prayer and thanksgiving to God.

The 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th chapters of 1st Kings, give an account of the building and dedication of the Temple by Solomon, with his lofty prayer on that occasion, which has been pronounced "the noblest utterance of the creed of Israel."

This Temple stood four hundred and nineteen years, during the reign of twenty kings after Solomon, as we learn from the 2nd Book of Chronicles, many of whom "did evil in the sight of the Lord." We learn from the latter part of the last chapter of 2nd Chronicles, that "Moreover, all the chief priests and the people transgressed very much, after all the abominations of the heathen, and polluted the house of the Lord which He had hallowed in Jerusalem." "And the Lord God of their fathers sent to them by his messengers, rising up continually and sending, because He had compassion on his people and on his dwelling place. But they mocked the messengers of God and despised his words, and misused his prophets, until the wrath of the Lord arose against his people, till there was no remedy. Therefore He brought upon them the king of the Chaldees (Nebuchadnezzar), who slew their young men with the sword in the house of their sanctuary, and had no compassion upon young man or maiden, old man, or him that stooped with age."

"And all the vessels of the house of God, great and small, and the treasures of the king and of his princes, he brought to Babylon. And they burnt the house of God, and brake down the wall of Jerusalem and burnt all the palaces thereof with fire. And them that escaped from the sword, he carried away to Babylon, where they were servants to him and his sons, until the reign of the kingdom of Persia," to fulfil the word of the Lord by Jeremiah, "until the land had enjoyed her sabbaths: for as long as she lay desolate she kept sabbath to fulfil three score and ten years." See Jeremiah's prophecies in the 21st, 25th and 26th chapters; also 32nd chapter, 1st to 5th, and 26th to 35th verses.

The account of Nebuchadnezzar's final siege and destruction of Jerusalem, in the year 586 B. C., is given in the 39th chapter of Jeremiah, and in 2nd Kings, 25th chapter. This was the end of the Temple of Solomon. Its successor is spoken of as the second temple, or the temple of Cyrus, who ordered its erection, or the temple of Ezra, who was high priest at the time of its dedication.

In the first chapter of Ezra we read, "Now in the first year of Cyrus, King of Persia, (that the word of the Lord by the mouth of Jeremiah might be fulfilled), the Lord stirred up the spirit of Cyrus, that he made a proclamation throughout all his kingdom, saying, 'The Lord God of heaven hath given me all the kingdoms of the earth; and He hath charged me to build Him an house at Jerusalem, which is in Juda. Who is there among you of all his people? His God be with him, and let him go up to Jerusalem and build the house of the Lord God of Israel.'"

And the vessels of the house of the Lord which Nebuchadnezzar had brought forth out of Jerusalem and had put in the house of his gods, even those did king Cyrus bring forth by the hand of Mithredath the treasurer, and numbered them unto Sheshbazzar, the prince of Juda. From the second chapter we learn that about 50,000 persons returned to Jerusalem in the year 536 B. C. The third chapter tells of their commencing to rebuild the Temple in the second year of their coming. Then stood up Jeshua and Kadmiel, the sons of Juda, "to set forward the workmen in the house of God." And when the foundation was laid, "they sang together in praising and giving thanks unto the Lord, for He is good, for his mercy endureth forever towards Israel." "Many of the people shouted for joy; but many of the priests and Levites and chief of the fathers who were ancient men, that had seen the first house, when the foundation of this house was laid before their eyes, wept with a loud voice," when they saw how greatly inferior their building must be in comparison with the magnificence of the former Temple, as they remembered it.

Individual Responsibility.

It seems with me, at the present time, to exhort each and every one in membership in the religious Society of Friends, to take due care that we discharge our duties as individuals who are responsible for our several actions; that we may do what is required of us by Him who made us, and gave us the talents which we possess. Whatever they may be, in kind or degree, they are given in sufficiency to perform the part required of each of us; and if we are only faithful, though it may be in the little light given us, a blessed and glorious reward will be ours. If unfaithful, what can we hope for or expect?

There appears to me much encouragement, as well as instruction and warning, in reading the 33rd and 34th chapters of Ezekiel, and also the 2nd and 3rd chapters of Revelations, and my mind has dwelt on our responsibility as professing Christians and members of the Society of Friends. This Society was undoubtedly called into existence more than two hundred years ago, for some special purpose, or purposes; and it is very discouraging to many who may be looking to us of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, to carry on the good work designed, to see so many of us, and even some who appear as ministers, and in other ways claim to represent our Society, so careless of our established practices and testimonies. "Let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall," is an admonition that has need to be heeded to-day, as much as when Paul wrote it; and we cannot hope to prosper as a religious Society, or discharge our several duties, by living as it were on the faithfulness of our fathers, or ancestors. We must discharge our duties for ourselves.

Why do we look for some great or blessed result from the preaching, or faithfulness, of our most esteemed and consistent members? We must do our part, each of us, and if we do, perhaps many of the departures and weaknesses which we now deplore, may, by our small influence and example, be made less and less. "No man liveth unto himself, and no man dieth unto himself." Each and every one of us influences some one. If we do not by words, we may do it by our walk and example before, and among men. "Whoso doeth the will shall know of the doctrine," will be fully proved if we are obedient. It is not so important to us in our individual responsibility, what this or that man or woman may do, as what we ourselves do, or leave undone, and what we have felt was required of us, according to our measure or ability.

We will not be likely to be led astray by any professed minister, if we endeavor, in childlike trust and simplicity, to live in obedience to plainly evidenced Divine requirements; which may and will be clearly shown us in the secret of our hearts, if we honestly and sincerely seek for such light. Our Saviour declared "My sheep hear my voice and they follow me, and a stranger will they not follow, for they know not the voice of strangers."

I hope and trust that in the near approach of our several Quarterly Meetings, we may be led to seek for ability to do the parts assigned each of us, faithfully; whether it be to sit and wait, as at Wisdom's gate, or to raise the voice of encouragement, caution, or warning in obedience to what clearly appears a Divine requirement.

If we are faithful in the little, we will become rulers over more and more, and witness a growth and strength that we will know is not and cannot be of ourselves, but cometh from Him who has enabled and can enable "one to chase a thousand, and two to put ten thousand to flight."

Don't let us foolishly think we can cure or correct the errors or mistakes of others, by neglecting to correct our own. "Cast out first the beam out thine own eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to pull out the mote out of thy brother's eye." B.

First-day Publishing Relinquished.

The action of the editor of a daily paper, as related below, in determining to discontinue issuing his journal on the first day of the week, is a pleasant circumstance to mention, especially as the trend is all the other way. The Christian Weekly says: "We are glad to see that the editorial conscience has not been utterly stupefied by the denouncing pressure of the augmenting cash account, but that it is occasionally asserting itself, as it has recently done in the office of the Globe-Republic, of Springfield, Ohio. Its editor has suspended its Sunday paper at a time when, he says, it is paying better than ever, and is the most profitable issue of the week. He boldly says, however, that if it were paying a dozen times as well it would be suspended, for these convincing reasons, which we wish the editors of other Sunday papers had the candor to admit and the courage to follow:

"The owners of the paper have had both experience and observation as to the publication of a newspaper on Sunday, and they are thoroughly convinced that it is neither morally nor physically right for them to continue the issue of such a paper. Our experience, as well as the experience of all the gentlemen employed by us, proves that a day of mental and physical rest is required by them each week, and that such a day of rest is an absolute necessity; that six days a week of solid work is as much as any person connected with the Republic can endure. We, and those connected with us, have tested the matter thoroughly, and we speak advisedly, and—we think we may say—authoritatively. It is our conviction, also, that Sunday should be observed as a day of worship as well as rest, and we propose to put neither obstacle nor annoyance in the way of those who wish so to observe it."

Ruling with Diligence.—The Illustrated Christian Weekly tells an anecdote of a careful mother, whose little 3 year old child had made a litter by tearing up some paper, and who had been told to pick it all up.

"Just then company was ushered in, and I could but smile to see baby Gertrude's quickness to take advantage of this fact. Mother would forget about the paper, she thought; I thought so too. But we were both mistaken. The littered paper was too small a matter to have staid in the mother's occupied mind, but her child's obedience was above all other considerations.

"Not hearing the little footsteps going in the direction of obedience, my niece got up with a brief, graceful apology and left the parlor. Her eyes were stern now, and her voice, though low, was no longer tender. A look, a tone, quickly admonished the little delinquent, and the mother stood gravely by till the last scrap had been picked up. I think Gerty will go at the first bidding next time. But O, a mother needs every day and hour to rule with diligence!"

EARTH RECEDES.

ALICE CARY'S LAST POEM.

Earth with its dark and dreadful ills,
Recedes and fades away;
Lift up your heads, ye heavenly hills—
Ye gates of death give way.

My soul is full of whispered song—
My blindness is my sight;
The shadows that I feared so long
Are full of life and light.

My pulses faint and fainter beat,
My faith takes wider bounds;
I feel grow firm beneath my feet
The green, immortal grounds.

That faith to me a courage gives,
Low as the grave to go—
I know that my Redeemer lives—
That I shall live I know.

The palace walls I almost see,
Where dwells my Lord and King;
O! grave, where is thy victory?
O! death, where is thy sting?

"TOO MANY OF WE."

"Mamma, is there too many of we?"
The little girl asked with a sigh.
"Perhaps you wouldn't be tired, you see,
If a few of your child's could die."

She was only three years old—the one
Who spoke in that strange, sad way,
As she saw her mother's impatient frown
At the children's boisterous play.

There were half-a-dozen who round her stood,
And the mother was sick and poor,
Worn out with the care of the noisy brood
And the fight with the wolf at the door.

For a smile or a kiss, no time, no place;
For the little one, least of all;
And the shadow that darkened the mother face
O'er the young life seemed to fall.

More thoughtful than any, she felt more care;
And pondered in childish way
How to lighten the burden she could not share,
Growing heavier day by day.

Only a week; and the little Claire
In her tiny white trundle-bed
Lay with blue eyes closed, and the sunny hair Cut close from the golden head.

"Don't cry," she said—and the words were low,
Feeling tears that she could not see—
"You won't have to work and be tired so When there ain't so many of we."

But the dear little daughter who went away
From the home that for once was stilled,
Showed the mother's heart, from that dreary day,
What a place she had always filled.

OUT IN THE SNOW.

BY S. M. WALSH.

Merrily down from the dreary gray clouds
Dances the feathery snow,
Trimming with down the stiff green hedge,
And the frozen ground below.

The evergreens catch on their bristling arms
The snow-flakes soft and pure,
And little brown birds come fluttering down,
Like leaves around the door.

But hark to the laughter and joyous shout
That ring through the falling snow,
As troops of merry-eyed boys and girls
Go skipping to and fro.

How eager the fingers that gather up
The treasures from the sky!
No matter how stiff and red they grow—
The snow-halls merrily fly.

And the very sleds, as they skim along,
Seem to feel the rampant glee
That brightens the eyes of my tiniest boy
As he bounds away from me.

But I put down the ear-laps, soft and warm,
And button the little coat,
Press into their mittens the restless hands,
And muffle the fair white throat.

And out goes my baby—a baby no more,
But a "great big boy" is he,
And the little red mittens scoop up the snow
And toss it back to me.

And I think the snow not a whit more fair
Than the brow on which it falls,
Or the tiny hands that gather it up,
And shape it into balls.

Oh! the dancing eyes! may they ever flash
With as clear a light as now!
And the eager hands—the treasures they grasp
Be ever as pure as snow! —Christian Union.

For "The Friend."

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 117.

The British Friend of Fifth Month, 1885 contains the experience of one of the members of a Women's Temperance Association at Dublin, Ireland, as related by herself, the truthfulness of which is vouched for, and which shows how a faithful surrender to the Divine leadings is often attended with both inward and outward blessings. It is in substance as follows.

"We lived in a flourishing town in the South Riding of Tipperary, and carried on an extensive business as wholesale and retail grocers and wine and spirit merchants. Most of the gentry in the neighborhood were our customers; and our business, which was the principal one in the place, was looked upon as a great public convenience. For some years I had been anxious to serve the Lord. I had abundant means at my disposal, and, so far as earthly things are concerned, all that might be desired to make me happy; yet I was not satisfied. My life was on the whole miserable, an alternation of sinning and repenting. I longed to realize something better. By the help of the Holy Spirit, I was enabled, though not without a struggle, to make a full surrender of all that I had, and all that I was to God. Certain costly articles of dress had long proved a snare to me. I now saw the vanity of such profuse expense, and forthwith proceeded to abolish the idols. This self-denial brought gladness to my heart.

"But another and more trying surrender was soon to be made. The most profitable branch of our business, and that which seemed essential to success in the grocery department, was inseparably mixed up with much that was evil. No drink was consumed on the premises, but the demon was there. I knew what a snare it was in the houses where it went. I knew the desolation it was working in certain families, and when I thought that I was, to some extent, abetting this work of ruin, my soul got clouded. Happily my husband shared my scruples, and became equally anxious to escape from Satan's toils. But what were we to do? If we gave up the wine and spirit business, we saw clearly that most of our customers would leave us altogether; our grocery business would be destroyed, and financial disaster would overtake us. Still, we heard God's voice calling and saying distinctly, "Come out from among them, and be ye separate, and touch not the unclean thing;" and at length we felt compelled to make our choice between disobedience to God and worldly ease, and obedience to Him and the probable forfeiture of earthly goods. Unhappily in our extremity we thought of a compromise. We decided to give up the liquor business for a year or two, but with the mental reservation that if the experiment failed we should commence it again.

"The experiment did fail, just as we expected; and I am sorry to confess that we embarked again in a trade that we were feeling keenly was opposed to the law of Christ. Nevertheless our Heavenly Father did not leave us to ourselves; but from undreamed-of sources rained upon us trials thick and fast. Our hearts were overwhelmed with divers sorrows. We saw the loving hand of our God in it, and at last determined to obey. Through the help of the Holy Spirit, we decided to give up our business altogether, and separate ourselves forever from the accursed thing. We sold out our entire stock at a sacrifice of several thousand pounds. Then with aching hearts, and a sadly diminished exchequer, we went forth literally not knowing whither we went.

"By a wondrous chain of providence, God led us to a most suitable business house in a leading thoroughfare in the city, which for years had remained empty because the estate-agent refused to allow it to be used for the drink traffic. And now three years have gone by and God has never ceased to bless us. We can say from the depths of our hearts we would not go back to the liquor traffic for the bestowal of a kingdom. Since we finally gave up our license my husband and children have been savingly brought to a knowledge of the truth. Rescued from Satan's snares we rejoice together in the sunshine of our Father's love."

In the dealings of our Heavenly Father with his children, it is instructive to notice how one step in the right direction seems to open the way for another, until, through obedience to the pointings of the Divine finger, he who had been walking in the Broadway that leads to destruction is found among those whose faces are turned Zionward. Such a case is mentioned by J. B. Gough in his "Sunlight and Shadow" of an Englishman with whom he had met.

He was a sporting man, and being very popular, he resolved to open a beer-house, which should serve as a place of resort for his associates. One day he noticed a poor woman, with two or three children, whose husband was drinking in his shop, looking anxiously in at the door. The thought of the meanness of selling beer and making money out of the poverty of this family struck him quite forcibly; and the impulse to get out of the miserable business came on him with such power that he said to his wife, "See here, lass, I'll work my fingers to the stumps before I'll keep a box like this; and I'll get out of it." When it was known that he proposed giving up the business, he was advised to advertise and sell it. "No, no;" was his reply, "I give it up because it's bad; and I'll put no man in a bad business for money." To a brewer who offered to put him in a larger and more profitable house, he said, "No, I would not do it for all the world. I'd die first."

At that time he saw no evil in the drink itself, only in its abuse. He therefore secured a house, and took to it several barrels of ale and porter for moderate use: But becoming further enlightened, he went to his cellar and turned the tap of every barrel, telling his wife who asked how she was to care for the children without ale, that she must use porridge instead.

His next good impulse was to go to a place of worship, having never been into one before. The only religious exercise he remembered was part of a prayer by a street preacher. The first sermon he heard was from a passage in Timothy: "Godliness is profitable unto all things, having the promise of the life that now is, and that which is to come." The preacher was neither learned nor eloquent, but his homely phrases were understood, and the effect produced, through the Divine blessing, was shown by the remark, after the discourse: "If it's true what that chap says, it will just suit me. Only think! good for this life and good for t'other. All right now, and all right then. Safe here, and safe there. That's just what I want, and I'll have it."

This was the commencement of a consistent Christian life. His fifteen years recklessness had left him in debt; so he did what every Christian should do,—began to pay his debts. He had seven little children, and was owing one hundred and fifty pounds, without a penny to meet his obligations. He went to his principal creditor, to whom he was indebted seventy-five pounds, and engaged to pay five shillings per week, which he did, never missing a week for more than five years. To another creditor, who had never even mentioned the debt to him, he went, three years after the change in his life, and said:

"I believe I owe thee seven pounds. Now, I've a pig that I've fed instead of feeding the publican, and thou canst have the pig."

"Well, lad," was the reply, "I'll take the pig; and if there's aught over, I'll pay thee the balance."

The pig was killed, weighed, and the balance of three pounds ten shillings was paid over.

On one occasion, an old companion, who did not understand the great change wrought in him, called at his shop to obtain some sporting information, and wished to know who was likely to win in a certain race. He replied that he knew nothing about it, that he had but one more race to run.

"Another race art thee going to run? Another race? Who is it with? Hast thee made another match?"

"Ay; I have made a match with the Devil for eternal life and my own soul, and it will take me all the days of my life to beat him."

When Gough parted with him, he had been a consistent Christian for 29 years, with a family of six sons and two daughters walking with him in the right road. He occupied a respectable position, had been blessed in basket and store, and had been a means of blessing to others.

Possition.—When Mark Guy Pearce was about fourteen years old, having been in school in Germany, he came to London, on his way to the "beautiful wilds of Cornwall," his home. He stayed in London long enough to spend all his money, except sufficient to pay his fare home. He travelled by train to Bristol—the rail only went as far then. He went on board the vessel to carry him home, and thought, when he had paid the money for his passage, that that included all. He was very hungry, and ordered his meals that day.

At the end of the journey, a dapper little steward, with a gold band round his cap came to him and presented him his bill. He told him he had no money. "Then," said he, "you should not have ordered the things you did." He asked him his name. He told him. He took him by the hand, shut up his book, and said, "I never thought I should live to see you."

Then he told him how, when he had lost his father, his mother was in great distress, and the lad's father had been so kind to her that he made a solemn promise that, if he ever had the opportunity, he would show kindness to one of his; so he took charge of him, paid his bill, gave him five shillings, and put him into a boat with some sailors, who rowed him in fine style to the shore. His father met him, and he said:

"Father, it is a good thing to have a good father; and he told him of what had taken place.

"My lad," said he, "I passed the kindness on to him long ago, in doing what I did, and now he has passed it on to you. Mind, as you grow up, you pass it on to others."

"Well, one day, he was going by train, and intended to take a first-class ticket, as he had a deal of writing to do in the train, when he saw a lad at the third-class ticket office, rubbing his eyes to keep down the tears. He asked him what his trouble was, and the lad told him that he had not enough money for his fare by four pence, and he wanted so to go and his friends were expecting him. He gave him a shilling, and the lad went, got his ticket and brought him the change. He told him to keep it, and said he was going to ride with him. Then, in the carriage, he told the lad the story of how he was treated in the boat.

"And now," he said, "I want you, if ever you have the opportunity, to pass it on to others." He got out at the junction, and as the train left the station, the lad waved his handkerchief and said, "I will pass it on."

Sold Himself.—A Correctionville farmer sold a load of corn in that town one day. When it was weighed, he slyly stepped into the scales, and then drove off to unload. When the empty wagon was weighed, he took good care not to be in it, and congratulating himself that he had cheated the buyer in good shape.

The grain dealer called him in, and after figuring up the load, paid him in full.

As the farmer buttoned up his coat to go out, the buyer kindly asked him to smoke with him, and then talked over the crops, and the price of hogs, and the likelihood of the Maple Valley railroad building up that way, until the farmer fairly squirmed in his chair with uneasiness about his chores at home.

At last he could stand it no longer, and said he must go. The dealer quietly said that was not to be thought of; that he had bought the farmer at full weight, and paid him his full price, and that he would insist on doing as he pleased with his own property.

The raiser of corn saw that he had indeed sold himself, in one sense at least. He acknowledged his cheat, and compromised the affair. Now when he markets grain, he does not stand on the scales or sell himself with his load.

A good many boys sell themselves at still a cheaper rate. The boy who lies, cheats, swears or steals, and thus loses his character, his reputation, and his prospects of prosperity in this life and blessing in the next, sells himself to sin and Satan; and though he may not get his pay, the buyer is likely to hold on to his purchase.—The Little Christian.

“Where signs of defection from the holy commandment appear, it cannot be justly imputed either to the want of conviction, or the means of restoration being withheld; but to a deficiency in attending to the Divine principle manifested in every conscience. For ‘The manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal.’ The way to profit by it, is often diligently to retire unto it. As it appears, inwardly, it calls for an inward retirement, and an abstraction from earthly objects, imaginations and attachments. For in the silence of all that is of the flesh, the still small voice of the truth, the Divine Word nigh in the heart, is heard; and by hearing, with due observance, true faith is produced. ‘For faith comes by hearing, and hearing by Christ, the Word of God.’ He is the author as well as the finisher of the true Christian’s faith: the faith of the operation of God, which works by love, to the purifying of the heart, and overcoming of the world. This engages to frequent waiting in stillness upon the Lord, for the renewal of strength.”—London Epistle of 1770.

Natural History, Science, &c.

“Tumble-weed.”—Prof. Bessey, in Botanical Gazette, states that upon the plains and prairies of the west, our common weed, Amarantus albus, grows into a compact plant, whose stout, curving branches give it an approximately spherical form. The autumn winds break the main stem near the ground, and the upper part goes rolling and tumbling before the wind, often for miles. In the east, the species is a tall, straggling herb, remaining rooted long after its death at the close of the season. Its western style of growth must be very effective in the dissemination of its seed over the plains.

Purity of Ice.—The report of the State Board of Health of New York, states that the ice cut on Onondago lake, is too impure to be safely used in contact with food or drink. The sewage of the town of Syracuse flows into the lake, and the water thus becomes contaminated. The report refers to several cases where the use of impure ice has caused dysentery and similar diseases. There seems to be abundant evidence that the act of freezing does not render fit for use water that was before impure.

Fungi.—Among the numerous species of Fungi which live on other plants, many, perhaps most are positively detrimental; but it is stated that a few cases have been observed, in which the host and its guest seem to be mutually serviceable. The young root-points of some of the forest trees, as the beech and the oak, are sometimes coated with a Fungus that seems to help in the nutrition of the trees.

Another case is that of a Fungus associated with some of the Orchids which grow on trees; and which appears to prepare the wood for the use of the Orchids by its decomposing power.

A Grateful Dog.—The Chicago Herald relates the following anecdote, told by a locomotive engineer on the Rock Island Railroad.

“Some years ago, I was running along near Joliet, when I saw a fine big black dog fast under an old farm-gate by the side of the track. He had evidently tried to jump over the gate, and the hinges being broken, it had fallen on him. He could not get out, and was howling so pitifully that I stopped my engine and went to his assistance. He was so grateful that he licked my hand, and wanted to follow me into the cab. I wanted to take him with me, but didn’t dare. After that, the dog, whom I and my fireman named Rocks, used to sit beside the track, and wag his tail when we went by. He got so he could tell my engine as far as he could see it, or hear my whistle. A few months later, we were running along there, behind time, and going very fast. It was just at daybreak, and I was a little surprised to see Rocks on the track ahead of me. He was acting strangely. He barked furiously, and howled, and reared on his hind feet. When we came up a little closer to him, he started and ran a ways on the track, and then turned and sat up and howled again. He did this two or three times, until my fireman and I felt sure that he was mad.

Finally, Rocks lingered too long on the track, and was struck and drawn under the wheels. I heard him howl so agonizingly as he went under, that I immediately shut off steam and stopped the train. My fireman went back to see what had become of Rocks; but he had been all mashed to pieces. My fireman and I were about ready to cry as we started up again; but imagine our amazement when, on turning a curve, a little ways ahead, we saw an obstruction on the track, so placed that we would surely have derailed our train had we struck it at full speed. As it was, we were hardly in motion, and easily stopped before reaching the danger.”

Inflammable Breath.—A case is reported in the British Medical Journal, in which, while blowing out a match, the patient’s breath caught fire. Several such cases are on record. The inflammable gas is doubtless the product of the decomposition of food taken into the stomach and lying there undigested.

Conversation between Birds.—A pair of cat-birds were noticed carrying materials for a nest to a patch of blackberry briars hard by. To test their ingenuity, I took a long, narrow strip of muslin, too long for one bird to carry conveniently, and placed it on the ground in a position to be seen by the birds when searching for suitable materials for their nest. In a few moments one of the cat-birds spied the strip and endeavored to carry it off, but its length and weight, in whichever way the bird took hold of it, and he tried many, impeded its flight. After worrying over it for some time, the bird flew off; not, as I supposed, to seek other materials, but, as it proved, to obtain assistance in transporting the strip of muslin in question. In a few moments it returned with its mate, and then, standing near the strip, they held what I consider to have been a consultation. The chirping, twittering, murmuring, and occasional ejaculations were all unmistakable. In a few moments this chattering ceased, and the work commenced. Each took hold of the strip of muslin at about the same distance from the ends; and, starting exactly together, they flew towards their unfinished nest, bearing the prize successfully away.

I followed them as quickly as possible, and, reaching the briar patch, never before or since heard such an interminable wrangling and jabbering. The poor birds could not agree how to use so long a piece of material to the best advantage. If it had been shorter they might have made it serviceable; but as it was, being neither willing to discard it nor able to agree as to its proper use, they finally abandoned it altogether, and so, too, they did the unfinished nest and the neighborhood.—C. C. Abbott’s Rambles about Home.

Magnets in Milling.—The use of iron wire by harvesting machines for binding the sheaves, has led to frequent damages to flour mill machinery from the pieces of iron which are introduced into it along with the wheat. To prevent this evil, magnets have been introduced into many mills, in the spouts along which the wheat passes, so that their attraction may sift out and detain all the fragments of iron which are mingled with the wheat.

The Emu.—Alfred Bennett, who has studied the habits of these birds, says, that the hen begins laying about the end of Tenth Month, and in about six weeks completes a brood of twenty or more eggs. In the meantime the male bird begins to sit, and the eggs subsequently laid are deposited at his side by the hen. He then stretches forth his foot and draws them under him. He not only hatches the eggs, but does all the subsequent nursing, and has to protect the young from the hen, who would apparently kill the chicks if she could get at them.—Scientific Gossip.

—College Games.—The Independent of First Mo. 13th, states its conviction that all inter-collegiate games should be prohibited, on account of the extraordinary excitement and dangers attending them. It refers to the recent death of a brilliant young man, the particulars of whose case it withholds out of regard to the feelings of his friends, but whose premature death was the direct result of over exertion on special occasions while at college. It says of him, “He was always at the front in all college games and inter-collegiate contests. He was fearless, quick, desperate, in the use of his strength, easily excited, and always determined to win—let the risk and cost be what it might. He was obliged to abandon study some months ago, and leave college. Soon after his days were ended under most painful circumstances.”

When students in our colleges will submit to special training, like professed pugilists, to enable them to win in foot-ball or other games; it is evident that these games have passed beyond the limits of mere recreation and healthful exercise; and should be restrained by those on whom the discipline of such institutions devolves. Especially is this needful, in view of the belief expressed by the same Journal, “that more deaths and damage to body and mind have occurred within five years, resulting directly from wounds, bruises, mental strains, and physical exhaustion, at these inter-collegiate contests than from all the brutal pommeling in the prize ring that has occurred within a quarter of a century.”

—Tithe-System in Wales.—The anti-tithe agitation in Wales has become national, and there can be little doubt that the result will be the disestablishment and disendowment of the Episcopal Church in Wales. The main topic of conversation among the farmers is tithes. The injustice which the non-conformists suffer may be judged from the fact that in Flintshire there are eighty magistrates, and not one of them is a Dissenter, although this is one of the most thorough non-conforming counties in Wales. Sales of property seized in distraint for tithes are constantly taking place, under the protection of a heavy force of police, but there is no violent resistance, only public meetings and speeches. — The Independent.

— War Preparations in Europe.— In speaking of the marked increase in military preparations on the Continent of Europe, the Spectator (London) says: "There is no popular panic anywhere, yet out of seven great Governments in Europe, six are arming as if they dreaded immediate and enormous danger. The French Minister of War has made the completion of further and excessive armaments the condition of his continuance in office. The German Minister of War, in spite of the direct pledge given to the contrary, when the first Septennate was conceded by Parliament, has demanded its renewal, and has antedated it in order to secure 41,000 more men at once. He has, moreover, done this while admitting that Germany can hardly bear the weight of her armaments, and has defended his course by secret statements to the Committee charged with the Bill, the mere rumor of which sent down all the Bourses of Europe. The Austrian Government, always timid about finance, and with deficits already to meet, has asked for and obtained three millions for rapid preparations, chiefly in improved rifles. The Russian Government arms steadily, is supervising its usually weak point, the Commissariat, with rigid exactness, and slowly urges the masses of cavalry with which it will commence operations towards its South-Western frontier. The Government of Italy, always careful of money, declares that it is ready even now, the Minister of War affirming, with calculated indiscretion, that even the 'commissariat arrangements necessary for mobilization have been finally completed.' The Government of Turkey, great because of its supply of devoted men, has collected 150,000 soldiers in Macedonia alone, is stripping Asia Minor and Syria of their Mahometan youth to swell its ranks, is enlisting the whole Mussulman manhood of its European provinces, and finds, God knows how, millions for material of war. And finally, if the Times of Thursday may be trusted, the head of the Government of Great Britain, where war will be unpopular, and where economy is acutely desired, has allowed his able lieutenant (Lord R. Churchill) to resign, rather than not propose the estimates necessary to place the fighting services in a position of readiness for all contingencies. The Governments, in short, of all Europe are arming without any pressure from their peoples."

In commenting on these statements, the Herald of Peace (London) remarks: "The people do not desire war. Why should they? The fact that stands most conspicuously forth, side by side with those prodigious warlike preparations, is the terrible distress that exists among the masses of the people everywhere. In our own country this is brought home to us at this season of the year with appalling distinctness and emphasis. Evidence, which it is impossible to withstand, forces on us the conviction that there are thousands and tens of thousands of the population in a condition of dire suffering. And the bulk of the working-classes are not likely to listen with complacency to demands for unlimited expenditure for the manufacture of murderous weapons, and for training men to the art of homicide, while they see their fellow-men perishing in want and misery around them for want of the common necessities of life.

"We believe the same condition of feeling exists among the working classes in France. And can anybody be astonished at that? In a financial paper called Money, we find the following statement as to that country: 'The Republic is taxed down to the uttermost farthing. * * Her little game in Annam, Tonquin, China and Madagascar has already cost her, in round figures, a milliard of francs and nearly 25,000 lives. This frittering away of life and property has incensed her population so much that another offensive war would mean the fall of any Government proposing it.'

"If we turn to Germany, we find the same sign. Even Count Moltke, who was brought down to the German Parliament to frighten the members into acquiescence in the demand for 40,000 more men, by ominous hints and insinuations of some great impending peril, and by the great authority of his name, was obliged to admit that it was a regrettable thing 'that they were forced to use a large part of the revenues of the Empire for purposes of defence against foreign foes, instead of the internal development of their country.' The tenacious opposition offered to a measure fathered by Bismarck, and placed under the sponsorship of Moltke, as the Daily News says, 'represents one phase of German feeling. The people groan under the crushing load they have to bear, and cry out for deliverance. The quarrel of Socialism with society takes such angry form in Germany, probably because of this oppressive burden.'

"Russia may be said to have no public opinion. The groans of its suffering millions are, therefore, stifled, that they should not reach the ears of Europe. But every now and then we hear how, in spite of repressive laws and a bloody retribution inflicted on the disaffected, the ghastly spectre of Nihilism, by whose devices one Emperor has already miserably perished, is still seen to lift its hideous head and to stalk abroad in the darkness, ready to strike again. And can it be doubted that—while the crushing burden of Russia's gigantic military system, and all the sacrifices and sufferings it entails, instead of being alleviated, is more and more aggravated—this terrible 'wild justice of revenge' will grow more and more desperate.

"Is it not possible to bring the human reason to bear upon this mass of mutual folly and mutual ruin? And how comes it to pass that while, as the Spectator very truly remarks, and as we have shown, there is no panic among the people, and no desire for war, the Governments are nevertheless rushing more and more into this mad race of rivalry in armaments? In our opinion there are two classes who are mainly responsible for this. First there is the military class, unhappily so powerful in all European countries. When we speak of the military class, we do not mean the armies and navies as a whole, for as things now are, these, in many countries of Europe, would be almost synonymous with the nation. But we speak of the military officials, in whose hands the men, who have no voice whatever in the matter, are mere pawns with which they play the game of their own ambition. These military enthusiasts, pondering day and night upon war and the fighting proclivities of mankind, end by seeing nothing else, and picturing to themselves the whole world as intent upon flying at each other's throats. The peoples of Europe, if they want any deliverance from the hideous incubus of militarism which presses the life out of them, must wrest the policy of nations out of the hands of the military class.

"The other class which is 'verily guilty' in this matter are the journalists, as there cannot be a doubt that the kind of European panic which now prevails is largely due to the mischievous influence of the press. We should like to ask this question: Who has authorized anonymous journalists to speak in the name of nations? These people have no more right to be the mouth-piece of the millions of Englishmen, Frenchmen, and Germans, whom they profess to represent, than the three tailors of Tooley-street had to say, 'We, the people of England.'"

There are men who speak contemptuously of "book-learning." They even look down upon all that is to be gained from the study of books, and they count themselves fully furnished for life by their "practical knowledge." Such men are to be pitied. They are not, however, much narrower than the men who think that everything needful is to be learned from books, and who look down upon all forms of practical experience as a means of intellectual attainment.

Everything depends upon this—to know the will of God in the first place, and then to do it.

THE FRIEND.

SECOND MONTH 12, 1887.

In reading the Mosaic narrative of the journeyings of the children of Israel to the promised land; and especially the giving of the Law, with its multitude of rules affecting not only matters of worship but regulating almost every detail of civil society, and private life; it is easy to see the importance of the injunction contained in the Sixth chapter of Deuteronomy:—

"These words, which I command you this day, shall be in thine heart; and thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up, &c."

A knowledge of the Law, to the Jews, included not only a knowledge of the precepts and doctrines of their religion, but also of those rules which governed the descent of property, the settlement of disputes, and all the various matters which are included in the legal statutes of other nations. It was very important therefore, that the instruction of children in these rules should be early begun, and perseveringly carried on, so that their minds might be so deeply imbued with the knowledge that it should ever remain in lively remembrance, as a guide through life.

But it is one of the characteristics of the Christian dispensation—the new covenant which the Lord promised to make with his people—that He would put his law into their minds and write it on their hearts, and they should no longer teach every man his neighbor; and every man his brother, saying, know the Lord, for all should know Him, from the least to the greatest.

The outward Law was a schoolmaster to bring to Christ. Those who have truly received the Saviour into their hearts, and have learned to listen to his voice, to the pleadings of his Spirit, and to follow those impressions and convictions which He makes upon their minds, have arrived at that condition of which the Apostle speaks, when he says, "The anointing which ye have received of Him abideth in you, and ye need not that any man teach you; but as the same anointing teacheth you of all things, and is truth and is no lie."

The truths recorded in the Holy Scripture are profitable for doctrine, reproof and instruction; and it is proper and wise that they should be diligently read, and that we should often meditate upon them. But it should ever be borne in mind, that the Law of the Spirit of Life is now written on the hearts of those who are willing to receive it immediately from the Great Teacher of his people; and that the most important and essential of all the instruction which parents and teachers can give to the children, is to steadily turn their attention to the convictions of Grace, the insinuating of the Light of Christ, the Word nigh in the heart, the ever-present Spirit of the Redeemer who promised to be with his disciples always, even to the end of the world.

All true attention to this Divine Source of all our knowledge of Spiritual things, it is very possible to have the mind well stored with the precepts of our Saviour and his apostles, and yet to be almost totally ignorant of their spiritual force and meaning. Just as thousands may attend at a place of worship, and even take part in the outward performances there, and yet never worship the Father, in spirit and in truth.

The Divine life and power of Christ, acting upon, leavening and transforming the spirit of man, and bringing it into unity with Himself, is the foundation of all true religion. May this truth become increasingly heeded in all our movements; and especially not be overlooked in the education of our children. So shall we be preserved from training up a set of mere formalists—outside professors relying on a knowledge of the Scriptures and a profession of religion, but not knowing its transforming power.

We desire to enter our protest against the effort now being made to increase the number of war-ships of the United States, and to provide torpedo-boats and other means of destruction—ostensibly for purposes of defence. The disputes between this country and Canada as to the fisheries question, have been skillfully used to prepare the way for such an expenditure, by raising doubts of the long continuance of the peaceable relations which have for so many years existed between this nation and the European powers—especially England. But experience shows that military preparation is far more likely to produce than to avert hostilities; and that the money invested in armies and navies and warlike supplies is not only spent without an adequate return, but that those things are the fruitful parents of further expenses; as well as of the demoralization that is the usual attendant on military life.

The United States at this time has no disputes with any people outside of its own limits, that cannot be readily settled by negotiation or other peaceable means, without resorting to any thing like threats or attempts at intimidation. We firmly believe in the truth of the Scripture declaration, that "righteousness exalteth a nation." Its most potent defence against both foreign and domestic enemies is the prevalence among the people of those immutable principles of justice and truth which secure the protection of the great Ruler of the Universe. In proportion as the dependence of our people and their rulers is drawn from a reliance on these principles, and placed on their own strength and their outward means of defence or attack, the disposition will grow to substitute might for right, and to disregard the claims of justice and the law of love in our dealings with other nations; and thus to awaken in them those feelings of ill-will, and desire for retaliation which have often been the underlying causes of war.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The public debt statement for First Month shows a decrease of $9,515,687. Total cash in the Treasury, $450,828,423.

The President has signed the Inter-State Commerce and Electoral Count bills.

The Senate has passed the Direct Tax Refunding bill; also a Railroad Attorney's bill. The latter bill declares: "That it shall be unlawful for any member of either House of Congress to accept employment as attorney-at-law, or payment of services of any kind, in opposition to the United States, in any case to which the United States may be a party, or in which its interests may be concerned, or from any railroad company, if such member shall have reasonable cause to believe that measures specially affecting the interests of such company are pending before Congress, or are about to be so pending during his term of office;" and it provides that "any person who violates the provisions of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and may be punished by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by fine not exceeding $500, or by both, in the discretion of the Court."

The Secretary of War, in a letter to the House of Representatives, states that the aggregate Territorial militia is 195,000, and the aggregate State militia, 7,400,592.

The Senate of Pennsylvania, and that of Alabama, has passed a resolution submitting a Prohibition amendment to the Constitution to the popular vote.

The New York Post says the City of New York has a saloon for every 24 of its registered voters.

A vein of marble, one hundred feet wide, has been discovered on the road from Bodie to Carson, Nevada.

Although Kansas crops are spoken of being a partial failure this year, she is said to have raised 140,000,000 bushels of corn.

An octopus, nine feet long, was captured on the coast of California recently.

The District Attorney of Luzerne County, Pennsylvania, announces that he will begin criminal proceedings against thirty-six Democratic and twenty-three Republican delegates for accepting bribes to vote for certain candidates for nomination at the recent conventions held in that County. The persons to be arrested reside in Hazleton, Pittston, Plymouth and Nanticoke.

The 'longshoremen strike in New York is beginning to show decided signs of failure so far as the strikers are concerned, although the new men employed by the companies cause much delay by their inexperience in the handling of freight.

On the 6th instant, earthquake shocks were felt very generally throughout Central and Southern Illinois and Indiana. The direction was seemingly from southeast to northwest, the vibration being accompanied by heavy rumbling sounds "which awakened the soundest sleepers." Houses were shaken sufficiently to cause rattling of window panes and swaying of chandeliers.

About 2 o'clock on the morning of the 5th instant, a dreadful railroad accident occurred, four miles from White River Junction, Vermont, on the Vermont Central Railroad. A broken rail or car-axle, is supposed to have been the cause. In crossing a bridge, the two passenger cars and the two Pullman sleepers, were overturned and thrown over the abutment on to the ice. Several were killed outright, and many others being unable to escape from the cars, were burned to death by the cars taking fire from the overturned stoves. At the time of making up this summary, 46 persons were supposed to have lost their lives.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 419, which was one less than during the previous week, and 50 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing 234 were males and 185 females: 75 died of consumption; 44 of pneumonia; 26 of heart diseases; 21 of convulsions; 18 of eroup; 16 of old age; 15 of bronchitis; 13 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels, and 12 of paralysis.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½'s, registered, 109½; coupon, 110½; 4's, 128½; 8's, 100½; currency 6's, 126 a 130.

Cotton sold in a small way to spinners on a basis of 9½ cts. for middling uplands.

Petroleum was quiet but steady at 6½ cts. for 70 Abel test in barrels, and 8½ cts. for 110 test in cases.

Potatoes were in moderate supply and good demand at full prices. White potatoes, per bushel: Early Rose, choice, 60 a 62 cts.; Early Rose, fair to good, 55 a 58 cts.; White Stars, choice, 55 cts.; White Stars, fair to good, 48 a 53 cts.; Burbanks, choice, 55 cts.; Burbanks, fair to good, 48 a 53 cts.; Hebrons, choice, 55 a 58 cts.; Hebrons, fair to good, 50 a 53 cts.; Mammoth Pearl, choice, 53 a 55 cts.; Mammoth Pearl, fair to good, 48 a 50 cts.; Peerless, as to quality, 48 a 53 cts.

Flour and Meal.—Trade in flour was slow and unsatisfactory, and prices were weak. Sales of 125 barrels of Pennsylvania family, at $3.75; 125 barrels Pennsylvania roller straight, at $4.20; 125 barrels Ohio, clear, at $4.15; 375 barrels Ohio and Indiana, straight, at $4.37½ a $4.50; 250 barrels winter patent, at $4.75 a $4.80; 125 barrels do. do., at $5; 125 barrels Minnesota, straight, at $4.50; 375 barrels do. patent, at $4.90 a $5.15, and 250 barrels do. do., at $5.25. Rye flour was quiet, but steady, at $3 per barrel for choice.

Grain.—Wheat was quiet, No. 2 red closing at 91½ cts. bid and 92½ cts. asked. Corn was dull, No. 2 mixed closed at 47 cts. bid, and 47½ cts. asked. Oats were inactive, No. 2 white closing at 37½ cts. bid and 38½ cts. asked.

Beef cattle were rather slow of sale, but prices remained unchanged, at 3 a 5½ cts.

Sheep were fairly active and firm, at 3½ a 5½ cts. Lambs were fairly active at 4½ a 7 cts.

Hogs were active and ½c. higher, 7½ a 7¾ cts. The receipts were: Beeces, 2200; sheep, 10,000; hogs, 7500.

FOREIGN.—Joseph Chamberlain writes that the Liberal-Unionists believe that the time is favorable for an unprejudiced consideration of the Irish question, and he hopes that no personal feeling will interfere with such a consideration.

C. S. Parnell has moved an amendment to the address in reply to the Queen's speech, in the following language:—

The relations between the owners and occupiers of land in Ireland have not been seriously disturbed in the cases of those who granted their tenants such abatements as were demanded by the prices of agricultural and pastoral produce. The remedy for the crisis in Irish agrarian affairs will be found, not in an increased stringency of criminal procedure or in the pursuit of such novel, doubtful and unconstitutional measures as those recently taken by Her Majesty's Government, but in such reform of the law and system of Government as will satisfy the needs and secure the confidence of the Irish people.

Paris, Second Mo., 1st.—There was great excitement on the Bourse to-day, caused by an article in yesterday's Berlin Post, headed "On the Edge of the Knife," and describing General Boulanger as the master of the situation in France, and as being unable to lead the people back to the path of peace, &c. During the continuance of the panic stocks were eagerly pressed for sale.

The foregoing article is believed to have been published for the purpose of influencing the coming elections in Germany.

The Belgian Government, it is expected, will demand of the Chambers an appropriation of 80,000,000 for military purposes, one-fourth of the total to be expended for the purchase of rifles.

The Russian Government has forbidden the exportation of horses from that country.

On the 1st instant, Premier Depretis informed the Italian Chamber of Deputies that there had recently been severe fighting in that part of the Soudan whose occupation was being attempted by Italy in understanding with England. The Abyssinians were defeated, and the Italian troops were simply annihilated. But ninety wounded reached Massowah after the battle. The Government now proposed a bill for an appropriation of $1,000,000 with which to send Italian reinforcements to Massowah. The Chamber at once approved the bill by an almost unanimous vote.

The Indians at Lesser Slave Lake, in Manitoba, are reported to be in a bad way. Last month more than 150 of them died of measles, and now their fisheries have failed, and game have deserted their country.

Emphasis is lent by the parallel column method in the Toronto Globe to show that while the United States debt has diminished from $2,503,151,211 in 1867 to $1,274,728,153 in 1886, the Canadian debt has steadily risen from $98,046,051 to $281,314,532.

NOTICE.

The next meeting of Friends' Teachers' Association of Philadelphia, will be held at No. 140 North Sixteenth St., Philadelphia, on Seventh-day, Second Mo. 12th, 1887, at 2 P. M.

Prof. Wm. H. Payne, of the University of Michigan, will address the Association.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

Until further notice the stage will connect with the 7.02 and 9.03 morning trains from Broad St., to convey passengers to the School; and at other times when timely notice is sent to J. G. WILLIAMS, Supt.

Third Mo. 25th, 1847. For the past two days have been sorely grieved because of unkind treatment—though not from under our own roof—treatment which, I believe, I did not deserve. I have craved, and may I not say prayed, that I may receive it, not in the disposition it has been given. I thought on first gathering with my friends in our little meeting that I should come at no settlement; but was calmed and comforted by the remembrance, "I will wash mine hands in innocency: so will I encompass thine altar, O Lord." This was unlooked for, and may I not say unsought for, and had a settling effect.

Fifth Mo. 1st. One month has elapsed since last entry. During which I have been passing through a wintry season; which still continues. None but thou, O Heavenly Father! knows the secret hidden exercises of thy poor child. Thou knowest the sincerity of my heart! and that I desire above all things to please Thee, as well as my earthly parent. Be pleased to make a way for me, where I can see none.

20th. Our friend, Joseph Edgerton, from Ohio, had an appointed meeting at Plymouth; which was a season of favor. My heart rejoiced in the good things handed forth.

27th. Felt heaviness of heart, our little meeting so small. Oh! that all could be awakened to the importance of assembling thus together for divine worship. It went do to come when we please and stay away when we please; for surely if we do thus, we cannot expect a blessing. Whilst dwelling on these things, a few words dropped by Ezra Comfort, being those of good old Joshua, tended to comfort and encourage, viz: "Let others do as they may, as for me and my house we will serve the Lord." He held up to view, that though some of us might have to sit meeting after meeting in great poverty and discouragement, if we held on, the reward would be sure.

Sixth Mo. 25th. Went to our little meeting this morning, under much discouragement; being considerably indisposed in body and weak in mind: however thought if I got no good myself, I could preserve stillness among my little flock. How thankfully may I acknowledge that I never felt them to be less a care; and oh! how near the good Master was, raising me above all my weaknesses, and centering my mind upon Him. So that I could but marvel how I was helped.

Seventh Mo. 22nd. At our little week-day meeting, we had the company and labors of our dear friends Elizabeth Pittfield and William Scattergood. For which favor, my heart secretly returns thanks. Yea, I feel this evening as though I could thank God, and take fresh courage. William's concern seemed to be, to lift up the drooping mind; representing that it was good for us to feel poor, stripped, and divested of every thing of our own. As then, and not till then, were we in a fit state to be clothed. I felt comforted and instructed by his communication; having never known such a state of strippedness before. Dear Elizabeth followed; her words distilling as the dew. She told us the only cause of rejoicing here below, was not that the devils were subject unto us, but rather that our names were written in heaven. She enlarged a little on this, as well as several other precious passages; particularly that of the woman who pressed through the crowd and touched the hem of our Saviour's garment. Encouraging some poor soul present to come and touch. Come just as thou art, in living faith, and thou canst not be hid or rejected. He who has a feeling of our infirmities will notice thee, and give thee help to go on thy way rejoicing. William closed the meeting in supplication.

Eighth Mo. 11th. In company with ———, paid a little visit to our dear friend E. Comfort, who has not met with us in our little meeting for several weeks. His health has for years seemed declining, and rapidly so of late; so that it looks doubtful whether we shall ever have his company and labors more. My heart has felt very sad in the retrospect. Our visit to him this evening has been a memorable one to me. On going up to bid him farewell, he requested us to sit down; when he was concerned to address us in a very solemn manner. What he had to say to me felt stirring and impressive. Oh may I lay low, and cry mightily for help to do whatever may be laid upon me. I don't wish to be of a disbelieving heart; but find myself very much in the condition poor Thomas was when told of his risen Lord.

Ninth Mo. 2nd. Attended the funeral of our dear friend and father, Ezra Comfort; whose life closed on Second-day evening, the 30th of Eighth Mo. What my heart has felt on this solemn occasion I do not feel at liberty to pen. The prayer of my spirit is, may his faithful labors be blessed to us, who have long been the objects of his tender solicitude and regard. And O! that we who are left behind a little longer, may seek to fill up our portion of sufferings, which are yet behind for the body's sake, which is His church.

5th. At our First-day meeting, we gathered into silence under feelings of great sadness. He who appeared and comforted his poor disciples formerly, manifested himself to be in the midst; and a degree of that peace which He breathed on them, I thought was vouchsafed to us. Blessed privilege!

28th. Our Monthly Meeting, held at Plymouth, was to me a good meeting. Under a sense of which my heart was humbled and bowed before Him, from whom alone good cometh. Unexpectedly and acceptably, we had the company of our friend William Scattergood; whose services amongst us I could own; and all tended to strengthen my confidence in the mercy and goodness of the Lord, who still remembers us for good. May suitable returns be made, saith my soul.

Eleventh Mo. 1st. Attended Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting. In the last meeting, our dear friend Elizabeth Evans was excellent. And again was I enabled to lay hold of that, which was as nourishment to the poor soul. A tried and proven state was comfortingly spoken to. Such were assured, that the deeper and heavier their exercises, the more sweetly would their hearts be attuned to the Redeemer's praise; with more to the same import.

11th. Our little week-day meeting. How was my heart tendered and broken before the Lord! my tears, it seemed as though there was no restraining them. Thou seest and knowest, just how it is with me, O Heavenly Father.

Second Mo. 28th, 1848. First-day.—Assembled as usual with my friends for the solemn purpose of worship, under a fresh feeling of my many infirmities and short-comings; and how I have come to, and gone from these our solemn meetings, week after week, poor and empty! Whilst thus dwelling on my situation, tried and perplexed, the effective word was spoken: Peace be unto you! when there was a settling down in a quietness, not come at by me for weeks, and may I not say months together. And under this precious covering, a door of access was opened; and the heart poured out. The language, "I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance," was afresh brought to remembrance. That I may be given to see and know the baptism of the Holy Ghost is, may I not say, the daily travail of my exercised soul.

Third Mo. 12th. How vain are all endeavors of ourselves to approach the mercy seat! afresh made sensible this day, that there is a want of a closer walking with my God. The feeble petition was breathed, "Draw me and I will run after Thee."

I think it will be right here to note that our dear mother, who has long been in feeble health, has for the last two months been increasingly so. Doubtless she is very fast hastening to her long home; while patiently and quietly is she waiting the coming of her Lord. May we, her children, be instructed by her pious life and example.

Fifth Mo. 16th. More than a month has elapsed since the last note. My time and attention have been so taken up with our dear mother, and the many new cares which necessarily rested upon me owing to her indisposition, that my little diary had to be laid aside. On the evening of the 12th inst. our dear mother closed her eyes to all earthly things. Her death was tranquil, though her sufferings for the last few hours previous, were extreme. Through all not a murmur escaped her; but patience under suffering, and resignation to the will of heaven, were the covering of her spirit: yea, it seemed the very atmos-where she lived in. May a portion of her pure spirit, saith my soul, rest upon us her children! that we, too, after her example, may be enabled to go in and out with acceptance.

25th. Sadness was the covering of my spirit, upon assembling with my friends (this morning, Being afresh made to feel our great loss. Whilst dwelling upon it, the assurance that it was her eternal gain, soothed and comforted; and afresh encouraged, to strive so to walk during the little portion of time that may in mercy be afforded, as with her, to gain an admittance within the pearl gates.

28th. Borne down and oppressed. Oh, that I could know a drawing nearer unto Him, who alone hath power to bind up, and to heal! Am sensible of too much leaning on those whom I have loved and looked upon, but who have passed away. Thou who canst take up and care for thy poor child, be near, I pray thee, now in the hour of need! take me, fashion, and prepare me, according to thy good pleasure! Thou knowest, O Heavenly Parent! the sincerity of this request; therefore do with me as seemeth good unto thee.

Sixth Mo. 1st. Our Monthly Meeting. At which we had the company and labors of our dear friends, William and Elizabeth Evans. I felt it an unspeakable favor, to be thus remembered once more by the great Head of the Church, unworthy as we are of the least of his mercies. Comfort and encouragement flowed to the tried and discouraged ones; such as might feel themselves comparable to the pelican of the wilderness, the owl of the desert, or the lone sparrow upon the house-top. The situation of the Prophet, when he sat down under a juniper tree, requesting that he might die was feelingly alluded to; and much more did dear Elizabeth set before us, to comfort and encourage. William thought there was a danger of getting too low, so as even to cast away our faith; without which it would be impossible to please God. He set forth that although we might be proven, and our faith reduced even as to a grain of mustard seed, yet we must hold it fast. He believed the Lord would arise for the help of some, if they keep close to Him: for his covenant was with the night as well as the day, &c. It was marvellous, as well as instructive and encouraging, to see how strong our dear friend's faith was that a being rescued would be experienced if there was but a holding on to the shield. Then put on strength, oh my soul! and press forward. Those dear friends, in company with Samuel B. Morris, dined with us; their visit being partly because of a sympathetic feeling for us in our stripped and lonely state. Both were led to minister to us, in a lively and instructive manner. They both spoke of what our dear mother had attained unto, and encouraged us, her children, to walk by the same rule and to mind the same things. Saying, the days of youth were days of favor, when we were under the peculiar care of Him who had promised to be the father of the fatherless; and who would care for us, if we kept close to, and often put up our secret petitions to Him, that He would go before, show us the way, and what He would have us to do. Thus encouraging us to faithfulness, whether we be called openly into service, or silently to suffer. And urging to keep under exercise, not only in meetings but out of meetings, and at all times. Then would we be brought into the favorable condition of one formerly who appointed the feet of our dear Lord; so that the house would be filled with the odor of the ointment. This, with more of a very encouraging nature, was poured into our cups. So that I may truly say, mine run over. And oh! the prayers that ascended, that I may be kept from either going before, or lagging behind my good guide.

Memories of the Prairies.

When we passed through Iowa City (in the spring of 1854) I believe the scream of the locomotive had never yet awakened the echoes that slept among the low hills and broad plains of Iowa, though the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific R. R. was then pushing its grades as far as that place.

A little before reaching the Cedar River we passed over a few miles of sandy country where the soil looked thin and poor compared with the dark rich loam, we had mostly seen in the west. Farther down this same noble river I have seen the gray sands drifting in the winds almost like the snows of winter, covering fences and invading fertile fields. I once visited some peculiar sand-hills in Clinton County, where the prairie winds had scooped out great hollows into the very heart of the hills; one in particular had a crater-like basin hollowed out in its midst; surrounded by sand-walls forty or fifty feet high, the outer surface was covered with short thick grass, while inside, the loose sand, if disturbed, would run in streams from top to bottom. The space inclosed was of one or two acres in extent. Small sandy tracts of country; and gravelly knolls are not rare in Iowa; frequently a beautiful ridge will end abruptly in a sandy or gravelly point.

Northward from Mt. Vernon our road passed over a succession of long parallel ridges, almost too high and steep to be compared to billows, yet rounded and wave-like in appearance, and a mile or more from crest to crest. On our right hand a beautiful grove covered a hillside and nestled in the valley below, and away to our left, a woodland filled the wide Valley of Big Creek and climbed to the summit of some of these ridges at their farther end. From the last of these great billows we looked far away over a wide plain, bounded immediately before us at a few miles distance, by a ridge or range of gentle hills over whose summit the woods from beyond was creeping, and through every opening in which, it was pouring out upon the prairie. To the north-west the plain stretched away, till its grassy waves met the bending sky at the utmost limit of vision. From this elevation, the plain appeared low and level, but in fact, it, and not the hills on either side, is the water-shed or "divide" between the tributaries of the Cedar and Wapsi Pinecon rivers, and it is everywhere beautifully undulating in surface and drained by many small streams that find their way through the hills on either side. All along the shore line of this prairie, and around the island grove to our right, were the houses and fields of early settlers, and already here and there upon the open plain were scattered a few "improvements" of hardy pioneers, sometimes two or three clustered together, sometimes only a little lonely house, looking bleak and bare on the wild sea of grass.

On the farther side of this plain, before reaching the foot of the timber-capped ridge, our future home was to be fixed and there we were to partake of the trials and hopes and hardships of pioneer life. A vacant house "to rent" was something almost unknown in that new country, and we were glad to get shelter in one already occupied by two families and soon to have another added, four in all and all entire strangers to each other, coming from four different States. This huddling together in such close domestic relationship of strangers so widely differing in customs, thought and habits, is one of the interesting and sometimes intolerable experiences of frontier life, yet it may be made a profitable school of forbearance and charity, and the common interests, and sympathies and sufferings of a new country does much to bind together in bonds of good fellowship, at least the better elements of a new settlement. I yet remember many of those old neighbors and friends with a degree of warmth scarcely attained in later experience.

Beyond the ridge that formed the northern boundary of our prairie, lay the grandest old forest that I have seen in Iowa. It was called the "Big Woods," and stretched for perhaps twenty miles along the southern bank of the Wapsi Pinecon (Indian name for Wolf River) varying in width from two to five or six miles. The Big Woods, unlike much of our western timber-land, occupies high and rolling land that often approaches the river and creeks in bold rocky bluffs and steep hill-sides, all richly wooded with noble old forest trees. Oak, ash, walnut, hickory, maple, linn, cottonwood, quaking asp, honey locust, elm, birch, "box alder," wild cherry, and some other more rare varieties, while the undergrowth, of which there is a greater abundance in all our western woods than in the old forests of the east, was made up of wild plum, crab-apple, hawthorn, black haw, "pigeon berry," hazel, service berry, and several other trees and shrubs in greater or less abundance.

Wild fruits were quite plentiful, and were a rich blessing to the needy pioneers. The service berries were mostly appropriated by the wild birds, but blackberries and wild plums yielded a bountiful harvest in their season. The plums are of the Chickasaw family, and are found plentifully everywhere along the borders of the timber, and in great variety, differing much in size, quality, color and season of ripening. Some of the best have already passed into cultivation and are valued varieties, the Weaver, Forest Garden and a still larger plum, called the Quaker, are all, I believe natives of the woods of Linn County. Crab-apples grew in great quantities and were relied on as an unfailing friend to the fruit-hungry people. Its flavor was a compound of richness, bitterness and sourness, that could be made quite palatable to a properly educated taste by the addition of plentiful seasoning. Wild cherries and "choke cherries" were valued in their season, and wild grapes, though small and sour until the frosts ripened them, were not despised. Wild gooseberries, black currants, and tree cranberries were less valued and rare additions to the fruit supply.

A Boston Merchant of Other Days.—Nathaniel Ripley Cobb, of Boston, one of those noble merchants of the earlier days, was generous-hearted and conscientious in the highest degree. In fact, he was so benevolent that in 1821, he drew up the following remarkable document:

"By the grace of God, I will never be worth more than $50,000. By the grace of God, I will give one-fourth of the net profits of my business to charitable and religious uses. If I am ever worth $20,000, I will give one-half of my net profits, and if I am ever worth $30,000, I will give three-fourths, and the whole after my fiftieth thousand. So help me God, or give to a more faithful steward and set me aside.

He adhered to this covenant with the strictest fidelity.—From the Dry Goods Chronicle.

Temptation.

In writing on temptation, I will begin with our first parents; as there is where the tempter first began his sad work in the world; and where they, by listening to him and embracing his temptations, first brought sin and death into the world. And I will here express an opinion, that it was according to the design of the wise Creator, that man should have something of a carnal, or fleshly nature or propensity in him which is not sin, but which we might call infirmity; and which furnishes a sufficient ground for the enemy to work upon, and to sow the seeds of sin in, if he is not resisted. Which seeds, if permitted to grow, bring forth sin; and sin when it is finished, bringeth forth death. If it were not for this chance of test, what opportunity would we have to show allegiance or fidelity to our benevolent Creator? How could we show which of the two powers we were willing to serve and obey, whether the good or the evil?

I believe that the temptation of Satan to Adam and Eve would have been no sin to them if they had not embraced it. And since then, every man is tempted when he is drawn away from obedience to God, by his own fleshly lust, or carnal appetite, and enticed. "And sin, when it is full grown, bringeth forth death" to the heavenly life in us, like it did in Adam. So, "blessed is the man that endureth temptation; for when he is tried, he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love Him." The blessing is on such as endure temptation. For temptations resisted are blessings gained; while blessings resisted may be withdrawn and lost forever.

But we have to be repeatedly tried; for it appears to have been the design of the Almighty from the beginning, that his people should be a tried people. So the tempter has to be more steadfastly resisted than was done by our first parents, before he will flee from us; and before we receive the crown of life which they, by yielding to the tempter, lost. But Christ, the tree of life, still remains; and it does look to me, that they, through obedience, might still have retained their right to eat of it and live. And also that we, who are new-born children of God, have, in adorable mercy, a way provided, through obedience, for our return to the primitive purity and holiness of Adam; and even to a more steadfast abiding in Christ, the second Adam, who never fell. For "blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city."

Whether any one of us, while this side the grave, has become, by overcoming the tempter, so established as to be made a pillar in the temple of God that shall go no more out, we had better leave to Him who knows the end from the beginning. But we are instructed by Christ himself, to pray to the Father that his kingdom should come, and that his will should be done in earth as it is in heaven. And where his kingdom is set up in the heart, and his will is done there, where is the room for the tempter to work? For greater is He that is in such, than he that is in the world. But we must continue to walk in the light while we have it, and then the blood of Jesus Christ will cleanse us from all sin, and the tempter will have no more dominion over us.

What I desire for myself, and for all my fellow travellers through this probationary world, is, that we should none of us be content with a religion which stops short of restoring us into that purity of heart which Adam and Eve were in before they fell. But if we should, by the assisting grace of God, be so favored as to regain that happy freedom from sin, we will still have to watch and pray that we enter not into temptation and lose the Divine likeness as they did. For we shall find, as they found, that although the spirit is at times willing to listen to the voice of our Maker, yet the flesh is weak; so that the watch against the tempter will still have to be maintained. For he is as willing now as he was then, to enter a family or a meeting, or even an individual heart, that might be said to be in the enjoyment of a paradise of God. And he is still the same as he was then; like a twisting, twining serpent, full of cunning craftiness, and an enemy to all righteousness. And he can insinuate himself among the churches under the guise of religion, more successfully than in any other way. For he is now transformed into an angel of light, and his ministers, as ministers of righteousness. So, "what I say unto you (my fellow professors) I say unto all, Watch."

It does appear plain to me, that a time of temptation or trial, is wisely permitted to come upon all the people of God in order to try them, that it may be known what kind of foundation they are building upon—whether on the sand, or on the Rock of Ages. Glorious are the promises to such as overcome the tempter. For our Saviour says, "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me on my throne, even as I overcame, and am set down with my Father on his throne." So it appears that Christ himself was tempted; but He overcame the temptations of Satan, and "He is able to succor them that are tempted." And to such as abide the day of his coming, when He comes as a refiner and as a purifier, if they "keep the word of his patience He will keep them from the hour of temptation which shall come upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth."

But let us not conclude that we are "tempted of God, for God cannot be tempted; neither tempteth He any man." Nor need we think that some strange thing has happened to us, or that we are deserted of God; for "there hath no temptation taken you but such as is common to man. And God is faithful and will not suffer you to be tempted above what ye are able to bear." So we might "count it all joy when we fall into divers temptations, for the trying of our faith worketh patience; but we must let patience have its perfect work, that we may be perfect and entire when the trials of time are over. But I think it rarely occurs that any one is entirely free from temptation until after this mortal has put on immortality.

I will now close by saying with Peter, "repent and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out." But let us notice, that the repentance here spoken of, as well as in all other parts of Scripture, comes before conversion, and conversion comes before salvation. And salvation comes only by resisting temptation, and following the leadings of our holy Redeemer through the paths of self-denial and the daily cross, until the washing of regeneration is accomplished, and the Divine life which was lost in the fall is restored. Then we shall be prepared to join "the general assembly and church of the first born, which are written in heaven." And I have no doubt but that a glorious foretaste of this is at times granted to such as have come out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." These are beyond the bounds of sin and sorrow, and where the tempter can never come. D. H.

Bible Readings.—No. 3.

We can readily realize that this event would arouse in their minds, feelings of the deepest emotions, mingled with remorse when they recalled the siege and destruction of the temple and all the attending calamities, their career in captivity for the last seventy years, and that their own disobedience and disregard of Divine reproofs were the causes of all these disasters. It is no wonder that "the old men wept for grief," but the younger generations who had been born or raised in Babylon, who had never seen the splendor of the former city and temple of Jerusalem, would naturally rejoice at their release from captivity and at the renewed evidences of Divine favor which were now manifested to them. Smith in his Bible Dictionary says:—

"But if the priests and Levites and Elders of the families were disconsolate at seeing how much more sumptuous the old temple was than the one which on account of their poverty they had just been able to erect, it certainly was not because it was smaller, as almost every dimension had been increased one-third, but it may have been that the carving and the gold and other ornaments of Solomon's temple far surpassed this.

In speaking of these temples we must bear in mind that their dimensions were practically far inferior to those of the heathen. Even that of Ezra is not larger than an average parish church of the last century. It was the lavish display of the precious metals, the elaboration of carved ornament and the beauty of the textile fabrics, which made up their splendor and rendered them so precious in the eyes of the people."

Zerubbabel was the recognized prince of Judea in their Babylonian captivity. On the issuing of Cyrus' decree, he immediately availed himself of it and placed himself at the head of those of his countrymen, "whose spirit God had raised to go up to build the house of the Lord which is in Jerusalem."

After the work of building was commenced, the Samaritans put in a claim to join with the Jews in building the temple, but when Zerubbabel and his companions refused to admit them into partnership they tried to hinder the building and hired counsellors to frustrate the purpose and were successful in putting a stop to the work during the seven remaining years of the reign of Cyrus, and through eight years of the reigns of his successors Cambyses and Smerdis. Nor does Zerubbabel appear quite blameless for this long delay. The difficulties in the way of building were not such as need have stopped the work, and during this long suspension of 16 years, he and the rest of the people were busy in building costly houses for themselves. But in the second year of Darius the spirit of prophecy suddenly blazed up with a most brilliant light amongst the returned captives (see Haggai and Zechariah.) Zerubbabel aroused from his apathy and threw his whole strength into the work, zealously seconded by Jeshua and all the people, and after much opposition and many hindrances and delays, the temple was at length finished in the sixth year of Darius, and was dedicated with much pomp and rejoicing, E. c. 515. Ezra, 6th chapter.

About 57 years after this dedication, in the year 458 B. c., Ezra, who was a learned and pious priest and a ready scribe in the law of Moses, went up to Jerusalem from Babylon, by royal command to return all the vessels and treasures of the temple that had been carried away to Babylon by former kings, with letters from king Artaxerxes Longimanus, saying whatsoever is commanded by the God of Heaven, let it be diligently done for the house of the God of heaven to beautify the house of the Lord, which is in Jerusalem." See Ezra, Chapter 7th.

The 13th chapter of Nehemiah tells that in the year 434 B. C., Eliashib the priest who had the oversight of the chamber of the house of God, had profaned it by preparing in it a chamber for his kinsman Tobiah, who was not a Jew but an Ammonite; and the Ammonites had been for generations inveterate enemies of the Israelites.

Nehemiah was sorely grieved at this desecration and cast forth all the household stuff of Tobiah out of the chambers and cleansed the temple, and reformed many other abuses which the people had fallen into. These reformations of Nehemiah are the latest historical records contained in the Old Testament. The history of Jerusalem and the Jews during the next four hundred years must be derived from other sources. After Darius, Jerusalem was taken by Ptolemy Soter B. C. 324 and subjugated to Egypt; was afterwards held again by the Jews under the family of the Maccabees.

The 1st and 2nd Books of Maccabees in the Apocrypha narrate their conflicts against Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria, who plundered their temple with a terrible massacre B. C. 170, and of their subsequent victory over him, continuing the narrative of their continual struggles for independence down to about 140 B. C. Jerusalem was taken by Pompey B. C. 63, and was held as a Roman city under Herod the Great until its almost total destruction by the troops of Titus A. D. 70. Herod adorned the city with many splendid monuments of his taste and magnificence. The temple which he rebuilt with scrupulous care was the greatest of those works. Josephus says he tore it down to the ground and built it from the foundation on an enlarged scale, and "the New Testament has made us familiar with the pride of the Jews in its magnificence." This was the temple of which it is said in the 2nd chapter of St. John, "Forty and six years was this temple in building."

The work of restoration was commenced B. C. 20, and the temple itself was completed in eight years, but additions were constantly made in succeeding years so that the expression "forty and six years" expresses the whole period from the commencement of Herod's work to the completion of the latest addition then made.

The Unseen Hand.—"Thank you very much!—that was such a help to me," said a sick woman, as she dropped exhausted on her pillow, after her bed had been made for her.

The friend to whom she spoke, looked up in surprise. She had not touched the invalid, for she feared to give pain even by laying her hand upon her.

She knew that the worn body was so racked with many pains, and had become so tender and sensitive, that she could not bear to be lifted or supported in any way. All that her friends could do was to stand quietly by.

"I did nothing to help you, dear. I wished to be of use, but only stood behind without touching you at all; I was afraid of hurting you."

"That was just it," said the invalid, with a smile; "I knew you were there, and that if I slipped, I could not fall, and the thought gave me confidence. It was of no consequence that you did not touch me, and that I could neither see, hear nor feel you. I knew I was safe all the same, because you were ready to receive me into your arms if needful."

The sufferer paused a moment, and then, with a still brighter smile on her face, she added:—

"What a sweet thought this has brought to my mind! It is the same with my heavenly Friend. 'Fear not, for I will be with thee,' is the promise; and thanks be to God, I know He is faithful that promised. I can neither see, hear nor touch Him with the mortal sense; but just as I knew you were behind, with loving arms extended, so I know that beneath me are the 'everlasting arms.'"—Selected.

A WINTER THOUGHT OF SPRING.

The creamy apple-blossoms
Fell down like fairy rain,
And filled the air with fragrance
Adown the shady lane:
The buttercups were springing
Thick sown on either side,
And the grass was green as green could be,
With dandelions pied:

Her steps were quick and joyous,
But mine sedate and slow;
Her laughter rang out blithe and free,
My tones were grave and low:
Her thoughts were of the blossoms
And rosy-hued as they;
My memories threw a winter gloom
O'er all that golden day.

My darling watched the petals
Slow fluttering from the tree,
And broke a branch all full of bloom
And brought to show to me;
She picked the loosened petals,
And, with astonished eye,
Low nestling down beneath she saw
A tiny apple lie.

Her blue eyes filled with wonder
And turned for help to me,
"Oh Aunt Margaret," she said,
And pointed to the tree
From which a steady snow of bloom
Fell daintily below,
"Why can't the big red apples come Before the blossoms go?"

Oh fearless, happy childhood!
Thus eagerly to scan
The inner heart of mysteries
Which God has hid from man;—
The mystery of anguish,—
The blessing of the cross—
And why the choicest fruits of life
Must come through pain and loss.

My darling's eyes uplifted
Gazed wonderingly at me,
And waited for my answer
In mute expectancy.
She could not know the things I knew,
Nor fathom my unrest,
So I only took her in my arms,
And told her "God knows best."

"He might have made the apples
Both use and beauty suit,
And the spring-time freshness of the bloom
Deck forth the ripened fruit,
But we still can trust his goodness,
And his wisdom guiding all,
When we think the blossom yet will live,
In the ruddy fruit of Fall."

But the child's attention wandered,
For the thoughts of Spring are gay,
And why should I cloud her sunshine
With the gloom of my Winter's day.
And her thoughts went back to the breezes,
And the fragrance from the tree,
And she chased the falling blooms again,
And her laugh rang gay and free.

But my graver thoughts still swayed me,
And I turned from the day so fair
To my heart's own sad communings
And the doubts which lingered there;

My early Spring had faded,
And my Summer long grown old,
And my Autumn days were hasting
To the Winter dark and cold.

I had loved my fresh young Spring-time,
And grieved that it must depart,
But turned to the lusty Summer
With a strong, undaunted heart.
I had joyed in my strength and vigor,
And striven through Summer's heat,
And I turned to the rest of Autumn
With slow, reluctant feet.

But I loved my quiet Autumn,
And knew that my silvered head,
Was the price which the years had paid me
For the strength and beauty fled.
I felt my heart was calmer
And my sight more true and clear,
Though my earthly strength was fading,
Like the wane of the dying year.

But as near I drew and nearer
To the Winter cold and still,
What wonder if trust oft failed me
To how to my Father's will?
Spring's beauty turned to Summer
And the Summer's strength to Fall,
But what would my Father give me
When he took away my all?

Oh! idle, vain endeavor,
To see God's purpose clear;
For the stars and suns do his bidding
As his fingers shape the year:
We cry aloud in our blindness,
But we feel in our hearts He is just,
And we quench our restless longings
In the peace of a child-like trust.

MY CHOICE.

BY C. M. HARRIS.

What would I be,
If freest choice were given me?—
An author, known by envied name?
An artist, crowned with deathless fame?
An orator, whose eloquence
Should sway the dulllest audience?
Or some unknown, unheeded one,
Treading life's weary ways alone?
What should I choose? I answer free:
"Just what the Lord would have me be—
That would I be."

What would I do,
If I might any end pursue?—
Bid Plenty take the place of Death?
Establish Freedom's reign on earth?
Wield pen and tongue with cunning might?
Uproot all wrong, uphold all right?
Or heavy days and nights sustain,
Dependent, on a bed of pain?
I dare not choose. I answer true:
"Just what the Lord would have me do—
That would I do."

Then I would see
Thy perfect will fulfilled in me!
Whate'er my Father wills is best—
Delight or suffering, toil or rest.
Thine eye, and thine alone, can see What I should do and I should be.
I only ask that I may know
The way which thou wouldst have me go;
That I my will in thine may lose,
And what thou, Lord, for me shalt choose,
I too may choose!

The Marquis of Westminster.—Manchester has always been noted for the public spirit of its prosperous sons; often, however, accompanied, as was the case with the late Marquis of Westminster, by a penurious spirit, but in his case only in trifles. A clergyman was dining with him who had gone to London to consult a doctor, I believe, though I am not sure, at the Marquis's expense. "What, did the doctor advise?" "Too absurd, my Lord. Horse exercise." "Then why don't you take it?" "Because I have not got a horse." "Have you got a stable and a paddock?" "Yes, my lord." "And land enough to grow some hay?" "Yes, my lord." "Then I'll give you a horse." So next day a useful cob was sent, and the grateful parson pulled out half a sovereign to give the groom. But he declined to take more than 6d., saying that it would be as much as his situation was worth. "But, please, sir, to give me 2d. for the gate. His lordship specially told me to be sure and ask for 2d." The Marquis wore shabby clothes, carried a cotton umbrella, saved bits of paper and twine, picked up pins, but gave away untold thousands. One contribution was given to the necessities of a place where he did not, I believe, own any property. The check was for £30,000. The donor's name was never published, and his own son did not know for what the check had been drawn.—Temple Bar.

"The Man in the Office Knows."

A Colorado Mining Lesson.

BY W. D. WESTERVELT.

Some visitors were passing through a Colorado smelter. Men were wheeling ores of different kinds and colors into the large furnace-sheds. Yellow lead-carbonate, rich glittering galena, green malachite, blue azurite, and dark iron ores, all combined in different proportions with silver and gold, were crowded in one upon another. The minerals were from all parts of the Rocky Mountains, now brought together in a variegated heap weighing hundreds of tons.

The visitors went on to see the furnaces. There the mixed ores were being cast into the yawning mouths of the fire-pits. Limestone and fuel were also thrown in to feed the fire, and to aid in separating the metals from the dross. A laborer was asked the question, "Why do you mix everything in this way?" The reply came, "That we may have the best results. We can do better with mixed ores than we can by smelting them separately." "By what method do you get the best results?" He answered, "The easiest and cheapest ways of separating the metal from the slag." "What will the metal be worth? What will be the real result of the work?" "We cannot tell. The man in the office knows."

The visitors passed on. They saw the precious metals drawn from the furnaces and placed in moulds. They went into the room where the bullion bricks were taken from the moulds and piled up for shipping to a refinery. The men in the bullion-room were asked the question, "How much is this bullion worth?" The answer came, with a smile: "We sometimes tell the visitors what we think it is worth; but the man in the office knows."

Here is a large smelter, employing many men who carry on their work by faith, not knowing the results any more than those who have served God "not having received the promises [the results], but having seen them afar off." Men are ordered to wheel the ore and dump it on the floor. They unquestioningly obey, not knowing the value of what they handle. Men stand at the mouths of the many furnaces, and throw in fuel and flux and mineral, as they are directed, without asking a question about the worth of the metal that is drawn off in the room beneath them. Other men handle the bullion as they would handle so many bars of pig-iron, simply because they are ordered to do that part of the work. The full knowledge of the processes and results is not among the workmen. "The man in the office knows."

It is easy to see the absolute necessity of faith and obedience among the laborers in every machine-shop and foundry, as well as in every smelter of our land; and yet, now and then, one of these same laborers will question about rendering faith and obedience in the Christian life. It seems strange that any person should find difficulty in accepting this common-sense lesson of the Colorado smelter. The steady perseverance in trusting and serving God must be infinitely more reasonable than the faith and obedience of "smelter men."—S. S. Times.

For "The Friend."

Epistolary Correspondence.

Having expressed the mind "that London Yearly Meeting is in no condition, in a spiritual sense, to help Philadelphia Friends," it is, perhaps, but just that I should state the reason of my so giving utterance to my mind in this matter in the way I have done.

It is now many years since I first took up my pen to point out the departures in practice from our principles of many of my fellow-members belonging to London Yearly Meeting, the record of which may be found in the back numbers of the "British Friend," as long ago, I believe, as 1868, down to a much more recent date.

It has been no preconceived matter with me thus to refer to English Friends, but I see not how to escape from the position, and at the same time fulfil my duty loyally to those principles that are dear to me, and doubtless to many others, both on this and on the other side of the Atlantic.

I never could see how it was possible for anyone to be a Friend, and at the same time set at naught the principles of his profession. As, for example, is it possible at one period of time to engage in a regular prearranged religious service, professing to praise God by singing, bend the knee in supplication, and then speak to the assembled people, as is done in other congregations by trained ministers; and then at another period of time meet with those who so meet, professedly to wait upon God for ability to do what in another place and at another hour they can do at will and pleasure?

I have no doubt of the sincerity of many of those who thus engage, but the one great mistake is in their calling themselves Friends. The natural outgrowth of this has been the frequency with which of latter time, the Bible has come to be used by many professing to be Friends in our meetings for worship; in some meetings the Bible is regularly read every First-day by some one appointed, while others will read a portion of Scripture and speak therefrom.

At their Mission Stations they have their appointed times of special religious services, as also vocal singing, and singing classes, and the leaders in these are those who are recorded ministers. I have seen, after an evening meeting, nearly the whole meeting gather at the meeting-house gate, unite in singing a hymn, pray and preach, as would be done by a Methodist congregation.

This is called home mission work, but it is conducted so as to bring contempt upon our principles; and London Yearly Meeting has taken this now under its own supervision.

Its foreign mission is based entirely on the same lines; the Friend in it all is entirely lost. I have come as close to the working of the whole system as it is possible to come, in order to know and judge for myself, and have always been repelled with the conviction, I must either give up my principle, as a Friend, or I must keep clear of all these things, and simply do what little was given me to do, keeping very much alone, for I have found it impossible to preserve serenity of mind and true quiet, in which growth and progress may be known on the Christian's pathway, and always to be in contact with unsound principles. So that it has often been my place to keep silence when I could not assent to what was going forward. At other times I have felt impelled to protest on behalf of our principles.

Friends have ever treated me with courtesy and forbearance, even when differing from them, and I bear them respect as fellow-professors of faith in Christ, however I may differ from them as to the nature of that faith and from whence it springs. I am a Friend in faith, and it has been my endeavor to be true to that faith in practice. I therefore have no sympathy or unity with those who are seeking to change our faith by the introduction of practices that must as a very consequence destroy by undermining it.

There are many in England who are one with me in my sense and feeling in these matters, and these may be far more numerous than I have any knowledge of. These I desire to strengthen and encourage to hold on their way in, quiet but firm dependence upon God and his ability to preserve to Himself those who shall stand clear in their testimony to the immediate teaching of his Holy Spirit. For this is the rock upon which the Society is splitting, and unfaithfulness to the Great Teacher is the cause of the very serious defection in England as elsewhere.

I therefore repeat, the Society of Friends in England, in its collective and official capacity, at the present time, is not in a condition, spiritually to minister to our good. That body must first come to a sense of its own condition and needs, so as to seek aright help for itself before it can be fitted to help others.

There were those who expressed the desire when we left the English shores, that we might be made instrumental in helping to bring the two branches of the Society nearer together; God can make use of whom He will for his own work, the weakest and most unworthy, if He will, for his service. But I fail to see how opposites can be united. Those on the one hand, however imperfectly, who are endeavoring to uphold and to live out our principles; those on the other, who are seeking to undermine and destroy it. For there exist these two opposites at the present time in the same camp.

Unity of faith can only spring from submission to the one Lord, through a willingness to undergo the one baptism by his spirit, and being willing to wait for the renewings thereof, from time to time. Much more might be added, but sufficient has been written to clear my spirit of complicity with that spirit which is seeking to destroy our faith in the Headship of Christ in his Church, and of his direction of his servants in their labor and service.

I desire that Friends here, as elsewhere, who are one in faith, may seek more and more to strengthen each other in a faithful maintenance of our Christian testimonies, more specially as to our meeting for worship, that our dependence may be upon Christ and not one upon another, and that nothing may tempt us to seek a substitute for the sense of his felt presence among us. The Lord can build up and strengthen the few, who are faithful unto Him, and He can scatter and destroy the many who are untrue. Among the former I desire in humility I may stand, may many be my companions herein.

CHARLES W. THOMSON.

Philadelphia, Second Mo, 5th, 1887.

To be like Christ is to be a Christian, and regeneration is the only way to the kingdom of God, which we pray for.

Secret of Happiness.—An Italian bishop, who had struggled through many difficulties without repining, and had been much opposed without manifesting impatience, being asked by a friend to communicate the secret of his being always happy, replied, "It consists in a single thing, and that is, making right use of my eyes." His friend, in surprise, begged him to explain his meaning. "Most willingly," he replied. "In whatsoever state I am, I first of all look up to heaven, and remember that my great business is to get there; I look down upon the earth, and call to mind how small a space I shall soon find in it. I then look abroad in the world, and I see what multitudes are in all respects less happy than myself, and then I learn where all my cares must end, and how little reason I have to murmur or to be otherwise than thankful, and to live in this spirit is to be always happy."—Selected.

Few things can so speedily ruin an individual or corrupt a nation as an unrestrained self-indulgence. Whenever pleasure or ease comes to be the supreme motive, decay begins. This must ever be the case with imperfect and improvable beings. They cannot forever sail with fair wind on placid seas; they must display energy, effort, striving, and occasionally make sacrifice. They must at all times give up something to gain something better; they must lay down what is of less value before they can take up what is of more value. Would a man have sound health? He must sacrifice to a certain extent his appetite or his desire for indulgence or his craving for gain or fame. Would he attain excellence in his work? He must resign a life of easy leisure. Would he be virtuous? He must resist temptation. Would he live for others? He must leave off living only for himself.

If we analyze the acts we instinctively approve in ourselves and applaud in others, we shall find that many of them involve a certain degree of self-sacrifice, while those which we deplore in ourselves and criticise in others involve some kind of self-indulgence. The man who makes provision for his own old age, or for his family's future, at the expense of passing gratifications, is esteemed above one who, for the sake of self-indulgence, forfeits his future independence or leaves his family unprotected. The man who risks his own life to save another from the sinking vessel or the burning building—he who devotes his youth and energies to a philanthropic enterprise—he who habitually sacrifices his ease and comfort to soothe the declining years of an aged parent, or to cheer the sick bed of a wife or friend, awakens sympathy and approval from all. This instinct of our nature sufficiently proves the praiseworthiness of sacrifice, and its value as a means of human progress.—Public Ledger.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Capillary Siphon.—If any porous substance capable of being wet, is placed in a liquid, the liquid will rise in its pores to a considerable height above its level in the vessel that contains it. The force which elevates it is called capillary attraction. This is constantly exemplified in the action of the wicks of lamps, which bring the oil to the top of the burner, where it comes in contact with the air.

If a piece of wick or thread or other porous body of the kind be placed in a vessel of liquid, so that a part of it hangs over the outside of the vessel, it will act as a siphon—the oil or water will rise on the inside by capillary attraction, and will descend on the threads outside, and drop from their extremity; and may thus empty the contents.

This process sometimes takes place in the plumbers' traps, which are depressions filled with water to prevent the passage of sewer gas. A piece of rag or thread carelessly washed into such a trap may thus act as a siphon, and empty the water, so as to leave on open passage for the poisonous gas it was designed to exclude.

Poisoned Arrows.—The most important of the substances used by the natives of eastern Africa, in poisoning their spears and arrows, is obtained from the seed of a species of Strophanthus, a running plant with large, rough-ribbed leaves. It is a powerful poison, acting on the heart. The flesh of animals killed by it is eaten without ill effects.

Oil Fountain at Baku.—The Pall Mall Gazette (London) describes an enormous outburst of oil at one of the wells at Baku, which commenced on the 5th of Tenth Month—the oil spouting to the height of 224 feet, and pouring out at the rate of 500 tons an hour. It says:—"During the birth-throes of a Baku oil fountain, stones are hurled a terrific distance, and a high wind will carry the fine sand spouting up with the oil, miles away. The roar of the gas preceding the oil is terrific, and the atmosphere for a time rendered almost unbearable. The gas soon clears off, the stones cease to rattle about the surrounding buildings, and the fountain becomes orderly, pouring skyward with a prodigious roar, and forming about the orifice vast shoals of sand, beyond which the petroleum gathers in lakes large enough sometimes to sail a yacht in."

A previous well spouted 115 days and sent forth, as was estimated, 220,000 tons of oil, before the owners succeeded in capping it, and getting it under control. The shoals of sand it poured forth engulfed neighboring buildings, and led to claims for damage, which amounted to more than the value of the small proportion of the oil which the owner was able to catch and store.

Chinese Straw Shoes.—Shoes made of rice straw and of a species of rush are much worn by the laboring people in the south of China. They are made by women and others who are too feeble for active work, and are sold from one cent to twelve cents per pair! Dr. MacGowan, who has sent samples of them to the Agricultural Bureau, suggests their introduction into nurseries for children's wear, so as to allow more freedom to the children's feet.

Ancient Mineral Specimens.—The cellars of the Academia San Fernando at Madrid, contain a collection of minerals packed away in boxes, which have been undisturbed for about 200 years. They come down from the days when Spain ruled in Mexico and South America. No one knows what specimens the boxes contain, but it is supposed there are among them many rare objects.

Railway-Tunnel Ventilation.—A recent accident at Perkasio, Pa., tunnel shows the importance of their ventilation. The tunnel is about half a mile long. Repairs are being made therein. On the 3rd (of Eleventh Month) some fifty men were at work near its centre, when a freight engine became stalled near the place where the men were at work. Fresh coal was put in the locomotive furnace, and the fan blast set in motion. Soon the train started, driving the gases from the furnace before it, and when the gases struck the men who were working in the tunnel they nearly all fell as if dead. About 40 of them became almost instantly unconscious.

One of the men only partially affected, made his way to the tunnel entrance and gave the alarm. A gravel train with flat cars happened to be standing there. It was run in to the place of the accident, and the bodies of the fallen men were dragged upon the cars and taken out to the fresh air. All were supposed to be dead, but they soon began to show signs of life, and in a short time all were themselves again, except one poor fellow who, in his fall, sank into a pool of water, and probably was drowned.—Scientific American.

Sun-fish and their Nests.—In the spring, the colors of the sun-fish, always bright, are brighter than ever; and the male fish seeking some female of its kind displays before her his brilliant hues. C. C. Abbott describes a pair, in which the female remained stationary for hours, while her companion passed up and down, and from side to side. If disturbed, they would dart away, but in a few minutes return to their former position, the one being apparently a quiet spectator of the graceful motions of the other. This continued for several days, when both fish disappeared, and were soon after found building a nest some fifty yards distant.

These nests are shallow, circular depressions, from which every particle of dirt has been removed, leaving the clean sand on which the eggs are deposited. The favorable locations along the banks of a stream are sometimes so fully occupied that these nests are not more than a foot or two apart, and look like a row of rusty pie-plates just beneath the water. In these nests both fishes will often be, and yet be scarcely recognizable when seen from above. All the gorgeous coloring is confined to their sides and bellies; and the back is of a dull green which blends well with the surroundings and the color of the water; thus affording them protection from such enemies as might be above them.

When several nests are placed in a row, the inhabitants do not molest each other, and never intrude beyond the limits of their own homes. When they leave the nests they dart with great rapidity into the deep water directly in front, and return in the same manner, thus wearing a path which can be traced for some distance along the mud and through the leaves. To test the "sense of direction," which is shown by the ability to find their own homes, Abbott carefully removed a sun-fish from its nest, and carried it 1000 feet up the stream (which in that distance made two abrupt bends) and set it at liberty. He hastened back to the nest, but the fish was there before him. He then took a fish from an adjoining nest, and carried it nearly 1000 yards down stream, past two bends, and some abandoned flood-gates. He hurried back to the nest and reached it only three minutes before the fish returned.

Like all nest-building fishes this sunfish will boldly defend its nest against every intruder. When the young are about one-third of an inch in length—and about as broad as they are long—they are left to shift for themselves. The brood generally remain together for a year or more until the increasing demand for food compels them to scatter to wider feeding-grounds.

Mated sun-fish are not merely paired for the season, but sometimes remain faithful and loving couples for several years. The same close observer mentions one patriarchal pair that lived for years under an elm whose gnarled roots extended into the clear water of the stream. As a proof of their affection for each other, he says that he once caught a nesting fish, and when dead or dying, replaced it in the nest. "I tried it once and will certainly never repeat it. The evidences of grief on the part of the distressed and bewildered widowed fish were truly affecting.

—"Book of Mormon."—M. T. Lamb, of Salt Lake City, has published a critical examination of the "Book of Mormon." It is on the veracity of this book, and its claim to be a revelation from God, that the whole fabric of Mormonism rests.

A review of Lamb's work in The Independent says: "The Book of Mormon professes to be the history of three colonies from the Old World to the New, who flourished here, between them, for twenty-five hundred years. In the first, twenty or thirty persons, under the direction of the brother of Jared, left Asia, at God's command, crossed the ocean in eight queer barges, and, after drifting 344 days, landed in North America, where they flourished for 1,500 years. Then they divided and perished in war, all but one man. About this time a second party left Jerusalem, 600 years before Christ, and drifted across the ocean to South America. A third party, under one of Zedekiah's sons, follow nine years later, and settled in Central America. From them spring the Lamanites, cursed by God with a black skin, and the white Nephites, favored of Heaven, who founded here, centuries before Christ, Christian churches, with baptism, and all the blessings of the Gospel dispensation. A few days after the crucifixion Jesus himself appeared here, remained for forty days and started a millennium which endured for two centuries, and finally went down under the fierce and infidel Lamanites who were in possession when Columbus appeared. The last leader and prophet of the Nephites was Mormon, between whom and his son Moroni the full record of the history and of God's revelations was engraved on the golden plates found by Joe Smith in the sacred hill near Palmyra, N. Y. M. T. Lamb patiently follows the dreary tale through all its windings, brings out the contradictions, incongruities, anachronism, absurdities and falsifications of the book in a way which is as effective and unanswerable as it is keen and amusing. He forsakes the path of dull didacticism; but of keen dissection, pitiless logic, and ruthless comparison of one thing with another, to the ruin of them both, there is an endless flow. It is impossible to cite examples to any extent. We notice, however, a few points; among them, that the Book of Mormon declares unequivocally against polygamy. The comparison of the points developed in the evolution of the history with each other is absolutely destructive. So is the examination of the cipher in which the assumed revelation was engraved on the plates. Of rational chronology there is none in the book. In two generations, two or three families multiply into a vast population of millions and a continental civilization. Passages are quoted from the Old Testament and assigned to a period hundreds of years before they were written. Of geography the book makes a great show, as far as names go, but of consistent geography it has none. Men cover in a few days the distance between points lying thousands of miles apart, and barred by mountains that cannot be crossed. The whole geographical and historical scheme is brought into connection with known facts and utterly crushed."

—Chinese Government and Christian Converts.—The Chinese authorities during the past few months have been issuing proclamations to the people enjoining upon them to treat with kindness and respect Christian missionaries and their converts; and reminding them that "those who embrace Christianity do not cease to be Chinese, and both sides should, therefore, continue to live in peace, and not let mutual jealousies be the cause of strife between them." It is further threatened, that "any lawless rascals who make trouble to stir up strife without a cause, shall be punished with the utmost rigor of the law."

The proclamation, issued by the Governor of the district in which Shanghai is situated, begins by explaining that under the treaties missionaries have the right to lease ground and houses, and to travel about to preach, "their sole aim being the inculcation of the practice of virtue, and having no design of interfering with the business of the people. Such of the subjects of China as wish to become converts may lawfully do so, and so long as they abstain from evil-doing there is no law prescribing inquisition into or prohibition of their action."

It is supposed that one object of the Government in taking this step is for the purpose of overthrowing the French protectorate over Catholic converts; since it declares that all converts remain Chinese subjects.

It is said that remuneration will be made for the losses sustained by the missionaries in some recent popular outbreaks.

—The Outfall of Heathendom to Christendom.—Under this heading, The Episcopal Recorder publishes a communication, which calls attention to the growing intercourse between Christian and Heathen nations. The result of this, he believes, will be the gradual familiarizing of the people of those countries with Christian ideas, and thus paving the way for their adoption of Christianity. No doubt this end would be greatly hastened, if the conduct of the professors of Christianity were more uniformly consistent with the requirements of their religion. The writer says:

"All history is false if the treaty, protectorate and governmental connections—many of them recently formed—between Great Britain, France, Germany and the United States on the one hand, and China, Japan, the New Hebrides, the Fiji Islands, Tonga, the Somali Country in East Africa, the Samoan Islands, the Manda Bay Country in West Africa, New Guinea, Burma, India, Cape Colony, and the Transvaal Republic; history, we say, will be a snare, if these inferior, and many of them smaller peoples do not, at no late day, come under the transforming power of their great associates, in religion as in all the elements, of national elevation. The coming of the lesser under the sway of the greater, means assimilation in religion equally with all the attributes of civil superiority, and these greater nations being Christian, the result must be the Christianization of the lesser in forms more or less pure, and this is outfall from heathendom to Christendom."

A similar tendency is exerted by the social contact of emigrants from heathen countries with the people of Christian nations. A steady stream of emigration flows from China to various parts of the world. "Since 1862, 200,000 have taken up their abode in Chili and Peru. In Cuba, 130,000 are becoming acquainted with Christianity by constant contact. Fifty thousand have found a home in Christian Australia. In Europe, Chinese meet the traveller at every turn, and overtake him everywhere. The thousands are as yet unnumbered. They journey on the highways of commerce, to the sunny walls of Constantinople, and to the snow-paved steppes of Russia. The American shores of the Pacific are inundated with the flood of immigration from 'the Middle Kingdom.' In San Francisco, the Chinese form one-seventh of the entire population of two hundred and ten thousand. Including these there are nearly two hundred thousand Chinese in the whole United States."

"An unequal but similar fact in the outfall, is witnessed in the annual emigration of tens of thousands of Hindoos likewise to Christian countries, a stream which naturally widens and deepens as God in the mighty workings of his providence, makes their own land too strait for them, that they go on many lines towards the parts of the earth, where the Gospel sun shines with more or less of its purposed splendor."

—Westtown Boarding School.—The destruction of the old school buildings is rapidly progressing, and by the time this reaches the eyes of our readers, it is probable little will be left but the foundation walls.

When the flooring was removed from the upper story, the carpenter reported that he found some of the girders partially decayed, and in an unsafe condition; so that if the building had not been taken down, considerable repairs would have been needed.

No ambition, however noble it may seem in itself, is worthy of a true man, if it interferes with the performance of his present duty. Nor is any man likely to do well at something that he would like to do by and by, if he is not ready to do as well as he can do at that which he ought to do just now. The path to future success is always through present duty.

THE FRIEND.

SECOND MONTH 19, 1887.

Our friend, Josiah W. Leeds, a few days since sent a communication to the Presbyterian, Methodist and Baptist associations of Ministers, of Philadelphia, calling their attention to a very objectionable ballet performance which was being exhibited in this city. In this he said: "I do earnestly hope that you will let it be distinctly known that you deem such shameless performances, even though permitted by the authorities, as totally repugnant to our Christian profession, a snare to the performers and the on-lookers, and an outrage upon the great body of self-respecting people of this city of homes."

The communication was referred by those bodies to committees, and at a meeting since held, the Presbyterian Association declared—"That it is the conviction of this Association that the performances of the National or American Opera Company, as they are publicly stated, are an injury to public morals, a disgrace to our community, and an outrage to Christian sentiment. That we protest most earnestly against them, and express it as our decided conviction that simple justice demands that they be suppressed as promptly as not more immoral, though less fashionable, places of entertainment and vice."

At the Methodist Episcopal Preachers' Meeting on the 25th of First Month, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted, and ordered to be sent to the Mayor and Chief of Police, and to both Houses of the State Legislature:

Whereas, it is well known, from general report and from advertisements in the public press, and from nude and semi-nude pictures of the human form displayed along the streets of the city, that there are public stage entertainments permitted in this city which are an offence to common decency; and, whereas, a law of this Commonwealth provides for the non-issue of a license to any place of amusement where it is proposed to present an entertainment that is "immoral in its nature or tendencies, or otherwise unlawful or hurtful to the community;" it is therefore

Resolved, That we ask the Mayor and Chief of Police of this city to enforce said law in the exercise of the utmost authority and power vested in the offices they occupy;

Resolved, That we approve of any effort to so amend the laws of this Commonwealth as shall provide against all public displays of the human form that involve the degradation of women and appeal to the baser passions of men.

In connection with this subject, we are glad to notice in The Episcopal Recorder of this city, a strong protest against a movement in New York to establish an American opera, and to educate one hundred or more girls for the ballet. To accomplish this pernicious scheme, a wealthy New York woman has devoted $100,000. The Recorder says: "If wealthy women rise up in our midst and invest capital and devote their time to degrading their sex, the righteous indignation of every decent woman should be aroused."

It is with sorrow and shame we refer to these evidences of a low tone of morality in the country; for, if this did not exist, the force of public opinion would prevent such degrading exhibitions, or would speedily nerve the public officials to discharge their duty in reference to them. We believe it is partly due to the large influx into our leading cities of emigrants from the continent of Europe, in many parts of which a deplorably low state of morals exists, connected with an extensive prevalence of infidel or skeptical sentiments. This demoralization is apparent not only in such exhibitions as we have been commenting upon, but also in the publication in many of the public papers of indecent details; as well as in the horrible revelations made within the last few months of the traffic in Canadian and country girls enticed to Chicago and New York by the promise of honorable employment. They all spring from the same root—the unrestrained passions—and differ in degree of wickedness more than in their real character, for all belong to “the world, the flesh and the devil.”

We heartily sympathize with our friend J. W. Leeds, in his efforts to elicit a testimony against this evil.

The American Garden is the title of an illustrated Monthly Journal of Horticulture, published by E. H. Libby. The office has recently been removed to 47 Dey Street, New York. Like most of the periodicals of its class, it contains much information on the subjects on which it treats, which is interesting to the general reader—because most persons are interested in flowers and fruits, the causes which promote or hinder their growth, and the enemies to which they are exposed.

From Rochester comes Joseph Harris' illustrated Catalogue of Vegetable and Flower Seeds. From the same city we have Vick's Floral Guide, for 1887, containing hundreds of well-executed cuts of the flowers and vegetables, whose seeds or roots are offered for sale. It is a beautiful and attractive work.

We have received the first number of vol. iii. of Roberts' Miscellany, a monthly periodical, published by Benson H. Roberts, North Chili, N. Y., now resumed after a suspension of a few years. It is designed especially for young people and the family circle, and differs from most publications of the kind in the care exercised to admit nothing that is not true and instructive. It altogether discards fiction. The motive of publication we infer is not the hope of pecuniary profit, for the proprietor says, “We will be abundantly satisfied to give our time and labor if we can get enough support to pay for the printing, paper and postage.”

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—In the U. S. House of Representatives the Senate bill for the retirement and recoinage of the trade dollar has passed—174 to 36, with an amendment providing “that the recoinage of trade dollars under this act shall not be considered as part of the silver bullion required to be purchased and coined under the provisions of the Bland law.” The bill has to go to Senate with the amended provision.

A telegram from Carson says both Houses of the Nevada Legislature, on the 9th instant, adopted resolutions disfranchising the Mormons of that State.

The Senate joint resolution proposing a prohibitory amendment to the State Constitution was passed by the House of Representatives of Pennsylvania by a vote of 130 to 66.

The strikes in New York are now ended, and their net result is said to be that “after nearly a month's contention, about 3000 workmen find their places occupied by non-union men, and this, too, in mid-winter, with the majority of them having families dependent upon them.” The total losses in wages to the long-shoremen and other working people in New York and New Jersey, caused by the strikes, from First Mo. 1st to Second Mo. 10th, is estimated at $2,650,000, while the estimated loss of wages by 38,000 employes thrown out of work through scarcity of coal or because of strikes of others, is $350,000. Other losses growing out of the strikes are estimated as follows: Total extra amount paid for coal through strikes, $700,000; total losses incurred by steamship companies through delays, $100,000; total losses to coal shippers, $100,000; total estimated losses of the export trade of New York in two weeks, $3,380,000.

The number of passengers carried over the Brooklyn bridge during the past three years is as follows: 1884, 8,828,200; 1885, 18,131,569; 1886, 24,478,324.

The first report of the Chief of the Rhode Island State Police, as to the working of the prohibitory law, which went into effect the 1st of last Seventh Month, shows that in Providence drunkenness decreased 42 per cent., as compared with the corresponding time in 1885. The commitments to the State Workhouse, whose inmates are largely victims of the intemperate use of intoxicating liquors, by the same comparison show a falling off of more than one-half, resulting in a large saving to the State in the item of board alone. In the city of Newport there has been a decrease of about 33 per cent. in drunkenness; in Woonsocket, a decrease of 20 per cent.; in Johnston, a decrease of 40 per cent.; in East Providence, a decrease of 45 per cent.; in Lincoln, a decrease of 40 per cent. The report is before the Rhode Island Legislature.

According to a statement compiled from the Court records of Philadelphia in Twelfth Month, 1886, there is in the whole city one drinking saloon for every 26 voters, one bakery for every 149 voters, one grocery for every 46 voters, one public school house for every 644 voters, and one “church” for every 244 voters.

Both iron and lead ores have been found in large quantities on a farm a few miles from Vicksburg, Mississippi.

It is estimated that on First Mo. 1st, there were about 200,000 cattle and 25,000 sheep on the ranges north and south of the Yellowstone River, within a radius of one hundred miles from Fort Keogh, Montana. Since that date, it is believed, thousands of the animals have perished for want of food and shelter, and thousands of them are still dying. It is variously estimated that from eight to twenty per cent. of the cattle in Dakota have perished from the severe weather this season.

Reports from all parts of the Indian Territory show that the stock have wintered well and are in fair condition. The winter has been mild, and it is estimated that the losses of cattle this season will not exceed from two to four per cent. against ten to twenty in 1885.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 394, which was 25 less than during the previous week, and 7 less than during the corresponding period last year. Of the whole number, 218 were males and 176 females: 67 died of consumption; 45 of pneumonia; 23 of diseases of the heart; 16 of inflammation of the brain; 13 of croup; 13 of old age; 12 of paralysis; 11 of bronchitis, and 10 of convulsions.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½'s, registered, 109½; coupon, 110½; 4's, 128½; 3's, 101; currency 6's, 126 a 137.

Cotton was steady, with small sales to spinners, at 9½ cts. for middling uplands.

Petroleum was quiet but steady at 70 Abel test in barrels, and 8½ cts. for 110 test in cases.

Feed was quiet but firm under scarcity. Sales of western winter bran, at $17.75 a $18.25 per ton.

Flour and Meal.—Trade in flour was very quiet, and prices were weak. Sales of 125 barrels Pennsylvania family, at $3.75; 250 barrels Ohio, straight, at $4.40 a $4.50; 375 barrels winter patent, at $4.65 a $4.80; 125 barrels do. do., at $5; 250 barrels Minnesota, clear, at $4.15; and 500 barrels do. patent, at $4.90 a $5.10. Rye flour was quoted at $3 per barrel for choice.

Grain.—Wheat was dull and unsettled; No. 2 red closing at 90 cts. bid and 90½ cts. asked. Rye was steady at 54 cts. per bushel for No. 1 Penna. Corn was steady, No. 2 mixed closing at 47 cts. bid, and 47½ cts. asked. Oats were quiet but steady; No. 2 white closed at 37½ cts. bid and 37½ cts. asked.

Beef cattle were ¼ a ½c higher; best, 5½ cts.; medium, 4½ a 5½ cts.

Sheep were in fair demand and firm: extra, 5½ a 6 cts.; medium, 5½ cts.; common, 3½ a 4½ cts.; lambs, sold to a moderate extent at 5 a 7 cts.

Hogs were firmer and in fair request: 500 State hogs sold at 7 a 7½ cts.; Western quoted at 7½ a 7½ cts.; Chicago, 7½ a 8 cts.

FOREIGN.—On the 11th inst., the debate on C. S. Parnell's amendment to the Queen's speech was continued in the House of Commons. The amendment was rejected by a vote of 352 to 246.

A newspaper correspondent of an English paper, who has recently visited Strasburg, writes from Berne that the German Government is taking advantage of war alarms for election purposes. He says there has been no increase of troops in Alsace-Lorraine, except slight reinforcements for the garrisons.

It is announced that all the forts in Belgium along the frontier of France have received a complete war armament. The preparations have been even carried to the extent of mobilizing the troops.

A dispatch from General Gene, the Italian commander at Massowa, dated Second Mo. 9th, says the situation was unchanged. King John of Abyssinia was sending troops to Adegrat. A force commanded by a son of the King had fought a sanguinary battle with the Soudanese, near Metemeh, which resulted in a victory for the Abyssinians.

The volcano of Mauna Loa, in the Hawaiian Islands is again in eruption. The eruption began on the 15th ult., with an emission of fire, smoke and lava, and was accompanied by continuous earthquakes.

The schooner William H. Jones, which arrived in Philadelphia last week from Cardenas considerably damaged, reports that on the 2nd instant, in latitude 35.59, longitude 74.30, she passed six waterspouts.

A telegram from the city of Mexico says that a project is on foot in London for sending five thousand Jewish colonists to Mexico to be distributed among the agricultural districts. The proposed colonists are victims of Russian persecution. The promoter of the project in Mexico is Lionel Samuel, who is in correspondence with some of the principal Hebrew bankers and clergymen of London.

The following is stated as a comparison of the national debts of Canada and the United States:

1886—United States.	1886—Canada.
Net debt per family of five $120 00	Net debt per family of five $254 00
Interest per family 4 15	Interest per family 9 36

DIED, at Germantown, Pa., Twelfth Month 25th, 1886, ANN BURR RULON, widow of John W. Rulon, in the 86th year of her age, a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia for the Western District.

—, on the 11th of First Mo. 1887, SARAH C. GASKILL, aged 77 years, a beloved and valued member of Newton Preparative and Haddonfield Monthly Meeting of Friends, New Jersey. Although she was one who put a low estimate upon her own religious attainments, she filled the important stations of overseer and elder for many years, to the comfort and satisfaction of her friends. Her course through life was marked by consistency, and by a diligent attendance of all our religious meetings, and this Christian care was often manifested when she was much tried with bodily infirmity. She was a bright example of integrity, and a firm adherer to what she felt was right, which gave strength and nobility to her character. As a kind and generous friend to the poor she was concerned to be a good steward of the means intrusted to her. Thus in her life and conversation she brought forth excellent fruit—the fruits of the Spirit of Christ her Redeemer and Saviour, in whom she was, we do not doubt, enabled in humility to trust. We reverently believe that in reference to our beloved friend the language is applicable: “Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them.”

—, Second Month 4th, 1887, JOSEPH HUGHES, a native of Wales, and member of Philadelphia Monthly Meeting, aged 78 years. His declining years were marked by increasing sweetness of mind; his closing exercise appearing to be prayer in his native language, and he left a message, “Tell my friends my Father will receive me.”

Seventh Mo. 9th, 1848. Exercised burden-bearers have been removed, till our little meeting seems reduced to a very small company. Which calls for increased vigilance, watchfulness and prayer, lest we let fall the ark—the ark of the testimonies given us to bear. I feel very jealous, that we are not enough in earnest to exalt the Lord's name amongst the people! If we were more as “the wrestling seed,” what meetings should we have!—a little glimpse of which is now and then given; and if the earnest be so precious, what would the fulfillment of it be? even “I will be your God, and ye shall be my people.” And, “happy is the people that is in such a case,” “yea happy is that people, whose God is the Lord.”

Ninth Mo. 3rd. Discouragement and absence from home, have caused my little diary to be neglected. But feeling I dare not omit that which I believe was begun in the life, I again make another entry, though out of the very depth of weakness. Inspirit and animate, O Lord, thy poor child.

10th. The past week hath been one of deep discouragement. Through mercy I have been enabled again this day to lift up my head in hope: “Lift up your heads, O ye gates; and be ye lifted up, ye everlasting doors; and the king of glory shall come in. Who is this king of glory? The Lord strong and mighty, the Lord mighty in battle.” Had at our meeting, the company of George Mickle and wife, from Woodbury. The latter has a precious little gift in the ministry; which flowed very sweetly this day to my comfort and rejoicing. How the very countenance of such gladdens the heart and animates to press forward!

17th. Through the power of Him alone, in whom we live, move, and have a being, was I enabled to centre down in quietness and in stillness before the Lord; and there mentally to spread my cause before Him, whom I do desire above every thing else, to be found serving in honesty and integrity of soul. This, thou knowest, O Heavenly Father!

Eleventh Mo. 16th. Since last note, I have been permitted to taste a little of the bread of life. I have also known at times a hunger and a thirst after it, without being fed. In such seasons faith hath been closely proved, but, I trust, not let go. Our Quarterly Meeting, this day week, was a season of renewing covenant. He, who fed the multitude formerly, was pleased to bless his bread that day, and gave to his disciples to hand forth to us. So that the very remembrance of the favor tenders my heart. May fruit answerable thereto, be brought forth. The First-day preceding this, was also a day to be remembered by me. Being in the city, I attended Sixth St. Meeting. Dear Elizabeth Pitfield, ministered to some of our states truly. Her concern seemed to strengthen the faith of some poor souls present; some hidden ones, whose conflicts both inward and outward, were about as much as they could wade under, and who were secretly saying and feeling, that unless the Lord help them, vain was the help of man. The secret sighs and tears of these were poured forth. Even in the midst of the fire, these were found praising their dear Lord; who alone knew what was passing within their hearts. “Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me? Hope thou in God,” &c., was again and again revived for the encouragement of these. She spoke of the silent waiting state, Mary was found in, when her sister came to tell her that Jesus had come, though she knew He had power to raise their brother. The belief was expressed, that there were those present, who were waiting to break the box of precious ointment, &c. She dwelt much upon the power that opened the blind eyes; saying that it was the same it ever was, and that Jesus was as willing as ever, to hunt out the poor diseased ones of whatever class, and wherever located. Sarah Hillman followed in supplication for all; for some in an especial manner who had long been waiting as at the pool of Bethesda, that they might be healed. It was a day never to be forgotten by me. Oh! that fruits answerable to the favor received, may be brought forth.

Twelfth Mo. 28th. Attended our Monthly Meeting, held at Gwynedd. In the afternoon, at our friend M. Spencer's, where we dined, with several others, our friend, Robert Scotton, when about leaving, had a word of encouragement to drop for some tried ones present: desiring such to stand still and wait patiently; believing help would come; and such be enabled, as in days past they had done, to set up their Ebenezer, &c. I felt free to take my little portion, though hardly daring to; knowing how unworthy I am of the smallest crumb of heavenly bread.

31st. Our First-day meeting was to me a good one. How did my heart overflow, in being once more given to feel the good presence of Him whose presence alone giveth life! the breathing prayer was, take me and do with me as seemeth thee good: only take not thy Holy Spirit from me. If I am only made meet for acceptance with thee when done with time here, 'tis all I covet.

Third Mo. 1st, 1849. Our Monthly Meeting, held at Gwynedd. There seemed a little intimation given in the last meeting, to help along with some business that was before the meeting. But for want of faithfulness, I robbed the meeting and myself too. I have thought sometimes I was strong for the work; but when the time comes, how weak I am. Fear a like opening will never be again given.

4th. Poor, weak and empty.

29th. Had at our meeting the company and labors of Benjamin Hoyle, a Friend from Ohio; who is visiting meetings within the compass of our Yearly Meeting. He was not lengthy in testimony, but life and power attended his ministry. Under a sense of which, many of us could, I trust, acknowledge to the goodness of the Lord in still preserving among us a living gospel ministry. Oh! that we could be made quick of understanding in the fear of the Lord; and know also the true bread which alone nourishes. There are so many voices abroad, that we need to be deep in our spirits to discern the voice of the stranger, from that of the true Shepherd. “I am the vine, ye are the branches,” was spoken and opened by B. H., to our understanding. Those that abode not in Christ, the Vine, were to be broken off. This, I fear, has become too much the case with us as a people, for want of abiding in Him, who is the Living vine. Have not many amongst us become as withered branches? Benjamin had a word of encouragement to the mourners in Zion, and the heavy-hearted in Jerusalem. And oh the interceding that went forth for these! that the accuser and devourer might be driven back or rebuked, and these enabled so to overcome, that when their dear Lord reigned, they might be permitted to reign with Him, &c. The wanderers, those that had strayed, were plead with to return to the ark—the alone place of safety.

[Our Diarist here alludes to the changes that took place in their family and home, in consequence of her mother's death. She thus comments somewhat upon said vicissitudes: “It feels a trial to leave our old home, though I dare not repine; but quietly acquiesce in the Divine will concerning us: feeling assured that if we cleave unto the Lord, He will care for us.” By this change, A. W. H. became an inmate of her brother and sister J. and P. W. Roberts' family, and soon after, a member with them, of Goshen Monthly Meeting: where the reader may now mentally locate her.]

Fifth Mo. 22nd. Attended Concord Quarterly Meeting. We had the company and labors of our friends Elizabeth Pitfield and Sarah Hillman. In the first meeting Elizabeth was engaged in testimony and Sarah in supplication. My heart overflowed with thankfulness, not only for the favors of this day, but for those of the preceding evening. Like the poor prisoners formerly, even in the night season did my heart sing praises unto the Lord, for remembering me in my low estate, with a fresh crumb of soul-sustaining bread. The opportunity I allude to, was at a little family sitting previous to retiring to rest, in which dear E. Pitfield was led to address some present in, I thought, a remarkable manner. Her words, and the power that accompanied them, may I never forget; but be stimulated thereby to increased diligence, the short time of my sojourn here below. She dwelt upon the trials and provings poor Job passed through; yet he was enabled to say: "Also now, behold my witness is in heaven, and my record is on high." She seemed to believe it was the will of our Heavenly Father, that his little ones should be fed and nourished, saying: "I hear the language, Feed my sheep, feed my lambs." And, "When my father and my mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up." At the same time enlarging on these precious words; and alluding also, in a moving manner, to her own weakness, quoting in reference to it, the words of Jonah: "The waters compassed me about, even to the soul: the depth closed me round about, the weeds were wrapped about my head. I went down to the bottoms of the mountains: the earth with her bars was about me for ever: yet hast Thou brought up my life from corruption," &c., &c.

27th. On gathering with my friends in our little meeting this morning, I was left to feel my many infirmities; which brought me to the place of prayer. Feeble as these were, his ear inclined unto me, whereby a little help was afforded; so that my meeting closed comfortably.

31st. Attended the Monthly Meeting at Goshen. It is composed of three Preparatives, which make a clever little body of Friends; and I believe there are those among them, who may be compared to the salt of the earth. Had the company and labors of our friend Samuel Cope, from Bradford. It was a favored time; and I could rejoice at the descendings of good. He dwelt much upon the one saving baptism, which I know too little of; and my soul was humbled under a sense of it. Nevertheless, living desires have been raised, that the Lord may not spare nor pity until this great work be accomplished in me. Our dear friend Hannah Warner, was led to supplicate for some of us, who felt our need, but had no strength to ask.

Sixth Mo. 7th. Went to the city as one of the Westtown Committee. It was under weakness and great depression that I met with them; being alive to my unfitness for any such a work; and our busy enemy was not wanting to take advantage of my discouragements.

10th. Attended North Meeting, both morning and afternoon; which were seasons of favor. Oh! the interceding that went forth in our afternoon gathering, as well as previous to it, when alone in my chamber; that I might be reached, and that that which was lost might be found. I even went so far as to covenant, that if I could be once more remembered through that servant of the Lord, E. P., I would afresh set out in earnest in my heavenly journey. Our friend, about the middle of the meeting, arose with, "Even the youth shall faint and grow weary," &c., and as she proceeded, rehearsed the blessings that were pronounced in Christ's Sermon on the Mount for "the poor in spirit," "the meek," those "that hunger and thirst," and "that mourn," as well as on the "pure in heart." With also the poor widow's offering, when Christ sat over against the treasury. How was my heart humbled and contrited! She believed it was the will of our Heavenly Father, that some of us should be a little cheered and animated. Said, I hear the language: "Thy Maker is thy husband; and the Lord of hosts is his name; and thy Redeemer, the Holy One of Israel," &c. And, with more of a very encouraging nature, was poured into our cup, till mine ran over; and I said within my heart, O Lord, it is enough!

Prayer is the vital breath of faith.

Sea-side Ramble.

Being at Atlantic City on the New Jersey coast, on the 11th of Twelfth Month, a ramble on the beach presented several objects of interest. As we approached the northern limit, where the broad inlet separates it from Brigantine Beach, which lies further north, the quantity of sea-weed left on the sand or still floating in the waves increased; a fact which seemed to show that many of these were grown in the quieter waters, inside of, and protected from the ocean waves by the beach of sand, which with occasional breaks, lines almost the whole of the New Jersey coast.

These sea-weeds, or Alge as they are termed, vary much in shape and color. I think one person at the Academy of Natural Sciences in Philadelphia, had there on exhibition on the evening of the 9th inst., about 150 species which he had collected at this locality. Many that we met with were red, with a slender, round thread-like stem, which continually subdivided and branched till it formed a multitude of fibres that spread out beautifully in the water, but collapsed into a shapeless mass when left on the sand. In other species this branching stem could be traced, but bordered throughout its length by a narrow leaf-like expansion, as in the common bladder-kelp, whose leaves are provided with curious little air-bladders scattered over them. Then there was a beautiful broad green leaf, with no trace of a stem, as thin as paper, and closely resembling a somewhat crumpled sheet of green tissue paper.

In an open shed at the beginning of the inlet we found some fishermen busily engaged in preparing their lines, or trawls, as they are termed, for cod-fishing. These lines are about a mile in length, and have from 7 to 800 hooks attached to short side lines at intervals of a few feet. The bait used was the common shore-clam or Gaper described in "Sea-side Rambles No. 3," page 274, of the last volume of "The Friend." As fast as hooks were furnished with bait, they and the line were stowed away in a tub or half-cask, so that they would run out freely into the ocean without becoming entangled, when one end was thrown overboard. The fishing vessels go off several miles from shore into water of 8 or 10 fathoms deep, and casting out the free ends of this line with an anchor and buoy attached, allow the remainder to go over as the boat moves over the waves.

In the pile of bait (clams removed from their shells) that lay at the fishermen's feet, we observed a number of transparent, worm-like objects, two or three inches in length and about as thick as a crow-quill, apparently destitute of any external organs, and so delicate in texture that they were little more than sea-water, held together by a mixture of gelatinous matter. These we supposed to be parasites of the clams, an opinion which was confirmed later in the day, by a man on the sea-shore, who was opening a pile of these shell-fish. He said there was a worm in every clam; and to prove his assertion, he opened several clams in our presence, and by pressing the body of the animal forced out what looked like worms. Some of these were placed in a small bottle of sea water for examination; but so frail was their texture, that a day or two afterwards they were found to be hopelessly disintegrated. Since that we have learned that we and that fisherman were both mistaken as to the nature of these curious objects.

The lines on which our fishermen were working, had been recently brought in from a fishing trip, and a part of the hooks still retained the bait which had been placed on them. In many of these a carnivorous shell-fish, the Natica, described on page 261 and 267 of last volume of "The Friend," had closely embraced the bait, and was so intent on feeding on it, that many of them had suffered themselves to be drawn from the bottom of the ocean and transferred to the floor of the shed, and still maintained their hold. There may have been hundreds of them lying about. It was an interesting circumstance, as showing the depth of water in which these shell-fish live and abound.

On picking up one of these Naticas, it poured out some water; and this permitted it to sink more deeply into its shell, thus confirming the assertion made by naturalists, that it is the absorption of water by the thick foot of the animal which swells it, so as to protrude from the mouth of the shell.

On returning to my home, when the satchel in which were carried some shells, sea-weed and other trophies of the sea, was unpacked, one of the family queried whether it was desired to preserve some seeds which were lying on the top of a tin lunch box. This led to an examination which showed that she had mistaken for seeds, many hundreds of small sand-fleas adhering to the sea-weed, and lying loose in the satchel. Not one of them had been noticed when the articles were collected; a fact which shows how transparent these little creatures are when wet. They were interesting crustaceans, about the size of a canary-seed, with an arched back and red eyes.

Being desirous of ascertaining with more certainty the nature of these supposed worms, which infested the clams, at a subsequent visit, I packed a number of the living clams in a small basket, and sent them to the Academy of Natural Sciences in Philadelphia, directed to Professor Joseph Leidy who is an authority on such subjects. I was somewhat amused at receiving from the learned doctor, a good-natured reply, which showed that the fishermen were partly right, and I was quite wrong. They were correct in thinking that this peculiar object was always present in the clam; and I was mistaken in supposing it to be a parasitic worm; for I was informed that it was a peculiar organ termed Stylus, which is common to several species of shell-fish, but the use of which is not known to anatomists!

For "The Friend."

In two of the last numbers of "The Friend," there are articles in regard to "stated pastors" in our Society. It is well that Friends, where these remarks were penned, are thus sensible of the dangers that threaten us from this source; but it is much to be regretted that there can be such a condition as is here implied, inside of our organization.

There is an instructive passage in the life of Felix Neff, who spent the manhood of his short life as a faithful pastor among the poor peasantry on the high Alps. He had been instrumental in bringing these people under the quickening influence of religious feeling, and along with this change, they had been raised from a state of miserable destitution to the enjoyment of the decencies and comforts of life. Himself had been ordained a minister according to the formula of the Church of England, and was carrying out in sincerity the duties connected with his position. But as these people were too poor to pay a minister, and he foresaw he would probably soon be taken from them, he advised them to a course of procedure that would make them less dependent upon what are called "Church ser-VICES." He told them that such meetings are not the meetings spoken of by the Apostle in the 14th chapter of 1st Corinthians, in which God, who is not the author of confusion but of peace, permits all to speak one by one, that all may learn and all may be comforted. He saw here an order of worship recognized by the great Apostle, depending upon Christ as its authority and its inspiration; and as he foresaw they must in the future be much neglected by man-made ministers, he advised them to lay hold upon it. He assured them that, if they thus came together with devoted hearts, the Head of the Church would not be wanting to raise up individuals, to be exercised in so much of exhortation or vocal prayer as was for their good.

I have no account of what became of these people after the death of F. Neff, but his biographer appends an interesting note to the passage where he gives these instructions to his flock. He says: "F. Neff was so manifestly correct and judicious in the several acts of his life, that he hesitates to criticise adversely any of his measures. But he thinks these meetings for worship, with no appointed leader, must soon run into disorder." It may be that F. N., in his youthful inexperience, did not place them squarely upon the ground of Divine direction, where Friends stand. And if he had designed doing so, his biographer did not appreciate this source of order in a gathered church. Hence he could see no security for a healthy manner of worship that did not include the formula of presiding Bishops, with the catenation of subordinate authority.

There is no standing ground between the simple worship of Friends, gathered with Christ "in the midst of them," and the regulated services among other established denominations of Christians.

When any people meeting in our manner, becoming weary of waiting upon the alone Source of comfort and strength, proceed to stir up an activity of their own, one step will not satisfy them. It may commence with Bible reading, but will soon embrace teaching, singing, a stated pastor, and eventually the ordinances; and all this necessarily involves a regulating human directory.

The members of the Christian sects around us claim our friendship and kind regard as fellow-pilgrims through a world of probation. Their forms of worship are consistent with themselves; and we trust that millions who have worshipped within their pale have lived with pious devotion, and died with well-grounded hope. But the failure of these people, in a collective capacity, to maintain what we believe the true Christian standard, brings yet upon us the duty to adhere firmly to the spirituality of our religion, that, by the purity of life to which it leads, we may "shine as lights in the world."

Among the larger sects of our fellow believers, the Methodists hold many points in common with us—especially in regard to the doctrine of regeneration and the characteristics of a holy life.

But a careful comparison of the careers of John Wesley and George Fox, shows how widely they differed in the principles of church government. The one supervised the qualification of all his ministers, and assumed the direction of their labors. He also held the title of all the meeting-house property in England made use of by his people. He thus literally carried with him "the care of all the churches." Geo. Fox, on the other hand, with the scores of his co-temporary laborers, was but one among equals. All alike depended on the Great Master to guide their labors, and guard the welfare of his collective people.

It cannot be necessary at this day to prove that to consider the "clergy" as distinct from the "laity" is an idea utterly foreign to Quakerism. Neander, the Church historian, tells us it forms no part of the system of religion introduced by Christ. Those who ministered among the early Christians stood on equal grounds with their brethren and sisters, laboring, after the example of Paul, for their own temporal support. The order of a paid priesthood was not fastened upon the Church till the time of Cyprian, and then its leading features were borrowed from the Jewish dispensation. Since we have such authorities outside of our limits, who acknowledge and proclaim with us, that "One is our Master, even Christ," let us say nothing that implies that our Society has any misgivings on this point. We are Friends, and can surrender no one point without virtually yielding all that divides us from the ritualistic sects around us.

For "The Friend."

The following remarks on gospel ministry are copied from the Life of Catharine Phillips. The meetings alluded to in the beginning of the extract, were held at Cambridge in England.

"That was indeed a singular time, and answered a singular end, viz: to convince a man who had contemned women's ministry in Christ's Church, of its weight, efficacy and consistency with the gospel dispensation. The same man, who did not live in the town, was invited to attend this meeting, and he might therein hear gospel truths published, and treated upon in a more argumentative way than it was common for me to be engaged in.

The all-wise Employer of true gospel ministers knows how to direct his servants, both as to the matter and the manner in which He intends it should be communicated to the people. I have admired his wisdom and condescension therein, when without forethought my speech has been accommodated to the capacity of those to whom it was directed. To such as were illiterate and ignorant, I have spoken in very low terms; and to those of more understanding, in such as answered its level; while to the learned and those of superior natural abilities, I might say with the prophet, 'The Lord God hath given me the tongue of the learned,' although I had it not by education. I have not wanted eloquence of speech or strength of argument, wherein to convey and enforce the doctrines given me to preach; of which I could say as my Lord and Master did, 'My doctrines are not mine but his who sent me;' and his love, life and power have accompanied them, to the stopping of the mouths of gainsayers, and convincing of the understandings of many, of the rectitude and efficacy of the Truth as it is in Jesus. O the depth and excellency of true gospel ministry! The Lord's prophet in the prospect of it might well exclaim, 'How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of those who bring good tidings, who publish peace, who publish salvation, who say unto Zion, thy God reigneth!' These are not made so by human or literary acquirements; but 'the Spirit from on high being poured upon them,' under its humbling influence, they are enabled to minister and 'compare spiritual things with spiritual,' or elucidate them by natural things, as occasion may require, without forecast or premeditation; for they speak extempore as the Spirit giveth utterance. When the ministry in general thus returns to its original dignity and simplicity, an education at colleges will not be sought to qualify for it. No, those who are accounted for the service of Him who spoke as never man spake, must be educated in his school, and disciplined by his wisdom; whereby they are made able ministers of the New Testament, not of the letter which killeth, but of the Spirit which giveth life.

Thus have I, with many of my fellow-laborers, been assisted to minister in the gospel of Christ; and now in the close of a laborious day's work, I may commemorate the mercy, power and wisdom of Him who chooseth whom he pleaseth for the various offices in his Church. He appoints, both of male and female. Some apostles, some prophets, some evangelists, and some pastors and teachers; for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ; until his members come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ; and may grow up into Him in all things, who is the head from whom the whole body fitly joined together and compacted by that which every joint supplieth, according to its effectual working in the measure of every part, maketh increase of the body unto the edifying of itself in love.' Then there is the highest rejoicing in Him the Heavenly Teacher; who fulfills the gracious promise, both to those who minister under Him, and to those who are not called to this awful service, 'Lo I am with you always, even unto the end of the world!'

Unto Him all true gospel ministers direct the people, and endeavor to settle them under the teaching of his pure spirit. These disclaim the least degree of ability to labor availingly in his service, except what flows from Him the fountain of Divine power, love and life; and after they have done what He assigns them, sit down in the acknowledgment, that what they are they are through his grace; and thanking Him that they have not received his grace in vain, humbly confess they have done but their duty. Thus from early youth I have travelled and labored, that the saving knowledge of God may increase, through experience of the prevalence of the power of his Son; whereby the true believers in Him become crucified to the world and the world unto them; and being thus dead, are raised by Him in newness of life, to the praise and glory of God. Freely I have received the knowledge of salvation through the sanctifying operation of the Spirit of Christ; and freely have I testified thereof, and of God's universal love through his Son to mankind; for He would have none to perish, but that all should be saved, and attain to the knowledge of his Truth.

My views, with those of others, my fellow-laborers in the ministry have, in regard to ourselves, been simply to obtain peace with God, through an honest discharge of our duty; and in respect to those to whom we have freely ministered, that they might be turned from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God; and be favored with the experience of the remission of sins, and obtaining a fixed inheritance amongst all those who are sanctified. And we are not afraid to say, that the love of Christ has constrained us to minister, unmixed with any temporal motive, or view of reward. Through that love we have been made willing to spend our temporal substance, as well as our strength of body and of faculties, and to suffer many hardships; yea to leave what was dearest to us in nature, and be accounted fools by the wise and prudent of this world; some of whom have poured upon us contempt, but who professing themselves to be wise, have manifested their foolishness.

As to us, however we may have been favored by the Lord, who has accounted us worthy to have a part in this ministry, and has at seasons clothed us as with a royal robe, to the astonishment even of those who have had us in derision, all boasting is excluded by the pure humbling law of faith in Christ, 'the wisdom and power of God;' and we confess, with his primitive ministers, that we have nothing to boast of but infirmities, nor have we ought to glory in but his grace to help us. Through which we have been rendered equal to the arduous tasks assigned us; and willing to turn from prospects the most pleasing to the natural mind, and to endure crosses, tribulations and the contempt of men for his sake, who so loved us as to die for us; and has mercifully called us by his grace to become heirs with Him in the kingdom of his Father; and having done all, we have nothing to trust in but the mercy of God, manifested in and through Him. And under a sense that all we can do to promote his honor is but little, and that little communicated by his strength, this is ultimately the language of our spirits: Not unto us, O Lord! not unto us, but unto thy ever worthy name or power, be glory for ever!—Amen.

For "The Friend."

A Singular Sermon by Joseph Hoag.

An allusion in the 19th number of "The Friend" to the similar exercises of Christopher Healy and Jonathan Taylor, brought to the writer's recollection the following sermon by Joseph Hoag, an abstract only of which can be given.

At Starksboro Monthly Meeting, Vermont, he rose and repeated, "Ephraim is a cake not turned." He then said, in substance, that he had been reflecting upon the various necessary processes through which the flour, which had first been rightly prepared, had to pass, before it became good, wholesome bread, suitable for the nourishment and sustenance of the body.

It must first be properly moistened by either pure milk or water. Then a little leaven must be added, and the whole thoroughly worked together and incorporated. Some time must then be given for the "little leaven to leaven the whole lump." After this it must be submitted to the action of fire, the most important of all. Oftentimes it had to be turned to receive the full effect of the fire; otherwise a part of it would, after all, be only raw dough and unfit entirely for food. Like Ephraim of old, it would be a cake not turned. Now he had been led greatly to fear there were some amongst us who might have submitted to some of the various processes, and a good beginning had been made in the right preparation. But when they came to be tried so as by fire, they had shrunk from the needful trial, they were not willing to be turned; and so were like Ephraim, "Cakes not turned," and could not be made useful in the household and family of the Lord.

He exhorted such to submit to all the turnings of the hand of the Lord upon them, and to the fiery trials and baptisms that might be dispensed unto them, until they were fully purified and prepared for acceptance in his sight, and could be made instruments of usefulness in his militant church.

Joseph used occasionally in his communications to say: "Dear Friends, As there is but one journey for each one of us through life, and as there is no going back for any of us to mend mistakes, how very important it is that we should earnestly endeavor not to make any which we can never be permitted to recall." For "The Friend."
The following lines were suggested by the terrible disaster on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, near Tiffin, Ohio, wherein almost a score of lives were lost, in consequence of the drunken conductor of a freight train disobeying orders.*

THE RAILROAD WRECK.

Out in the gloom of the winter night,
Bounding on in its headlong flight,
With spinning wheels on the iron way
Wildly urged by the piston's play,
Throbbing and panting, with hiss and roar,
Speeding each minute a mile or more,
Through the frosty air and drifting snow,
Was the night express on the B. & O.

Within the coaches, all warm and bright,
Lying, reclining, or bolt upright,
The sleeping passengers dreamed away
The hours that carried them on their way.
But there as the train swept 'round a curve,
Thrilling with horror his brain and nerve,
Full on the eye of the engineer
Burst a gleaming headlight bright and clear.

A click of levers, a rush of steam,
The wild alarm of the whistle's scream,
And wheels reversed, but all too late
To save the train from its fearful fate.
A crash, a shock, and the piteous cries
Of pain, went up to the midnight skies;
And shout, and curse, and moan and prayer,
Strangely blent on the shuddering air;
And over all this horror there came
Roaring and crackling, the pitiless flame,
Till the heavens, aglow with lurid light,
Seemed bending in pity above the sight
Of so much anguish in one sad night.

But why the wreck with its loss untold
Of treasure, counted in paltry gold?
With the wringing hands and bitter tears,
And wounds that the heart must bear for years?
With its score of human beings lost
In that night's terrible holocaust?
Why that fright on the railway track?
Only the meaningful word comes back,
"Drunken," alas! but all too true,
A railway train with a drunken crew!

Oh Rum! thou demon of crime and sin!
Curse of the age we are living in!
When will the nation arise and draw
Over thy traffic the ban of law?
When will the people who bow to thee,
Rise in their manhood and dare be free?
God will rebuke thee! welcome the day
That rolls the weight of thy curse away.

ALL YOUR CARE.

Casting all your care upon Him; for He careth for you.—1 Peter v. 7.

"Cast all thy care." What precious words!
So full of Jesus' tenderest love,
To draw thy heart, like silken cords,
To his dear self in heaven above!

"Cast all thy care." Yes, every care;
And though thou thinkest some but small,
Just cast them all; be sure He bare
The small ones when He bare them all.

"Cast all thy care." Why should'st thou try
A task of hopeless agony?
"Tis finished," was the Victor's cry,
When that same load was borne for thee.

"Cast all thy care." Canst thou not see
That there exists no other way?
O, come to Him, and ask that He May give thee grace by faith to say:

"Lord Jesus! now to thee I come,
Before thy wounded feet to fall,
To find in thee my peaceful home,
My only Lord, my rest, my all."

To patient faith the prize is sure,
And they who to the end endure
The cross shall wear the crown.

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 118.

BENEVOLENCE.

The incidents which from time to time are brought to notice of that benevolent feeling which lead persons to do good to others without any prospect of pecuniary reward to themselves, find an answering chord in the hearts of nearly all.

The Chicago Herald gives the following anecdote related by one whom it calls a "kind-faced old gentleman," who had for a tenant a child not more than ten years old.

"A few years ago I got a chance to buy a piece of land over on the West Side, and I did so. I noticed there was an old coop of a house on it, but paid no attention to it. After awhile a man came to me and wanted to know if I would rent it to him.

"What do you want it for?" said I.

"To live in," he replied.

"Well," said I, "you can have it. Pay me what you think it is worth to you."

"The first month he brought $2, and the second month a little boy who said he was the man's son came with $3. After that I saw the man once in a while, but in the course of time the boy paid the rent regularly, sometimes $2 and sometimes $3. One day I asked the boy what had become of his father.

"He's dead, sir," was the reply.

"Is that so?" said I. "How long since?"

"More'n a year," he answered.

"I took his money, but I made up my mind that I would go over and investigate, and the next day I drove over there. The old shed looked quite decent. I knocked at the door and a little girl let me in. I asked for her mother. She said she didn't have any.

"Where is she?" I said.

"We don't know, sir. She went away after my father died, and we've never seen her since."

"Just then a little girl about three years old came in, and I learned that these three children had been keeping house together for a year and a half, the boy supporting his two little sisters by blacking boots and selling newspapers, and the elder girl managing the house and taking care of the baby. Well, I just had my daughter call on them, and we keep an eye on them now. I thought I wouldn't disturb them while they are getting along. The next time the boy came with the rent I talked with him a little and then I said:

"My boy, you keep right on as you have begun, and you will never be sorry. Keep your little sisters together and never leave them. Now look at this."

"I showed him a ledger in which I had entered up all the money that he had paid me for rent, and told him it was all his with interest. "You keep right on," says I, "and I'll be your banker, and when this amounts to a little more I'll see that you get a house somewhere of your own."

The following simple incident told by a writer in the Sunday Magazine, confirms the truth of the poet's words, that kindness

"Is never Without its excellent reward," even if that reward is only the feeling of comfort which it gives to him who does a kind act.

"I remember once going with two young companions through a wildly romantic Scottish glen. Suddenly we came upon a broken bit in the road; it had been torn up somehow, and was full of great holes, sufficient to throw a horse or turn a wheel. "An ugly place in the dark," said one of us as we stood looking at it. "Whose business is it to mend that?" asked another. "Let us do it ourselves!" cried the third. And so we set to the sk. There were plenty of stones not far off, and as we had no tools we had to use the more genuity in the selection of shape and size. I did not take us three-quarters of an hour to make the road safe, if not neat.

"Now, we shall not be responsible for any accident there," we said, as we straightened ourching backs, "for there will be no accident for anybody to be responsible for!"

"What a light lay on the hills as we lifted our glowing faces towards them! We seemed to longer strangers there; we had made for ourselves a share in it all. What an appetite we had for the milk and bannocks we got at the nearest cottage! And how distinctly we can all remember that ramble, though many another, under as fair a sky, and amid scenery equally grand, has faded behind the mists of memory!"

Precious also is that feeling of love and respect which attaches to the memory of those who have been just and kind in their dealings with others. This is well shown by a notice published in the Messenger of Peace by John Hemmenway, of Jeremiah Chaplin, a Baptist minister, and the first President of Waterville College in Maine. "When Dr. Chaplin lived in Waterville, as president of the college, he bought his fire-wood, of a small quantity, for one year or more, of a poor man in Fairfield, about four miles off. Now all Maine wood-cutters and haulers know to their sorrow, that cutting and hauling green, heavy, hard wood with an ox team is very hard work for both men and oxen; and when sold, as was in Waterville more than fifty years ago, for two dollars a cord or less, it was a very small paying business. But this was not all the trouble of the poor hardworking wood seller. He was often dissatisfied with the measure given him by the wood buyer for his loads of wood.

Now as the poor man in Fairfield sent his youngest son down, day after day, with a load of wood, with one pair of oxen, to Dr. Chaplin's door, the doctor would step out and measure the load. Well, the poor man's son, the friend of mine, said to me when speaking of Dr. Chaplin's President of Waterville College. "Dr. Chaplin was a fair man to measure wood. He would make the loads measure more than I could!" I do not know how this act, in the life of this great man will strike others, but it affects me very tenderly, so much so that my eyes grow wet as I write. Dear, good man! he well knew that he was making large measure in the loads of wood, and that was just what he intended to do. He meant to be sure not to wrong the poor man, and meant to give a larger measure than justice required.

No greater sermon than Dr. Chaplin ever preached spoke so eloquently of his character as his careful and conscientious care to do justly in measuring wood at his door in Waterville for a poor man.

I am not a Baptist, and never was, and never can be; but I love and revere the memory of Dr. Jeremiah Chaplin."

We have the highest authority for believing that he who does a kind act,—even so small a thing as giving a cup of cold water—from the love of God, will not lose his reward. The following case seems clearly to belong to those in which the deeds of kindness are done "in the name of a disciple." It is related by Robert Moffat in his account of his missionary travels in Southern Africa.

"In one of my early journeys, I came with my companion to a heathen village, on the banks of the Orange River. We had travelled far and were hungry, thirsty and fatigued; but the people of the village rather roughly directed us to halt at a distance. We asked for water but they would not supply it. I offered the 3 or 4 buttons left on my jacket for a little milk, and was refused. We had the prospect of another hungry night, at a distance from water, though within sight of the river.

"When twilight drew on, a woman approached from the height beyond which the village lay. She bore on her head a bundle of wood, and had a vessel of milk in her hand. The latter, without opening her lips, she handed to us; laid down the wood and returned to the village. A second time she approached with a cooking vessel on her head, and a leg of mutton in one hand and water in the other. She sat down without saying a word, prepared the fire and put on the meat. We asked her again and again who she was. She remained silent until affectionately entreated to give us a reason for such unlooked-for kindness to strangers. Then the tears stole down her sable cheeks, and she replied, 'I love Him whose servants you are; and surely it is my duty to give you a cup of cold water in his name. My heart is full; therefore I cannot speak the joy I feel to see you in this out-of-the-world place.'"

Further conversation showed that years before, she had attended a school, and had received a copy of a Dutch New Testament, which she drew from her bosom. The reading of this in measure supplied the place of that outward communion with fellow believers, which is often so helpful to the Christian; and He who has promised never to leave nor forsake his devoted followers, we may assuredly believe, had preserved her spiritual life amid her unfavorable surroundings, and enabled her to prove her faith by her works.

An inquirer, writing to the Guide to Holiness some months ago, put the following query: "Is it possible for a person to live a true and consistent Christian life, and at the same time belong to the Masonic or other secret lodges?" To which the editor replied: "We could only speak for ourselves—we could not. In the early days of our ministry we were foolish enough to be drawn into a lodge. One night's experience there sufficed; by the grace of God we have never been there since. We cannot decide the question for others, but we seriously doubt whether any Christian ever realizes that a 'lodge' is a means of grace, contributing to the development of spiritual character and life. We recommend all who are disposed to enter into such connections to study Ephesians v. ii. The best 'secret society' of which we have knowledge is described, Psalm xxvii, 5 and xxv, 14."

An intelligent man of about forty years of age—a superintendent of schools from a Western city—was staying overnight at my house, a short time ago, when, our conversation turning upon secret societies, he remarked in explanation of the opposition he had just before expressed to them, that the subject of uniting with the Masonic order was presented to him by an acquaintance when in early manhood. He not unnaturally felt desirous of knowing all about the "truth," a full apprehension of which he was given to understand, could only be arrived at by those who were privileged to become acquainted with the Masonic secrets, as revealed to the initiated in their various progressive orders. His acquaintance, as an additional persuasive, handed him an approved book upon Masonry—an act which the rules of the order forbade him to do. It gave my informant, however, all the knowledge in that direction which he desired, and he very soon handed back the book, his mind fully made up to keep out of any entangling alliance with an association possessing such a ritual and order as the volume portrayed.

Notwithstanding the Society of Friends has a testimony against all secret societies, making it a reprovable, if not a disownable, offence, on the part of its members, to ally themselves with such bodies, yet it has appeared to the writer of this that we may have perhaps kept this testimony of ours too much hidden away, as it were, in a napkin. It was remarked by that estimable man, the late Charles G. Finney—respecting whose renunciation of and declarations against Free-masonry, I shall presently have somewhat to say,—"Every local branch of the Church of Christ is bound to examine this subject, and pronounce upon this institution, according to the best lights they can get. God does not allow individuals or churches to withhold action and the expression of their opinion, until other churches are as enlightened as themselves. We are bound to act up to our own light, and to go as far in advance of others, as we have better means of information than they. We have no right to say to God that we will act according to our own convictions, when others become so enlightened that our action will be popular and meet their approval." Friends, in the main, have not been chargeable with indifference, certainly not with moral cowardice, respecting any of the great moral questions which have successively agitated the communities in which they have been placed. The enormous growth of secret organizations within the past quarter of a century, would seem to indicate the desirability of our not omitting in all right ways, to declare our disunity with them.

I recall the fact that little more than a year ago, when discoursing with a Friend hereupon, the remark was made that there was one consideration, if no other, which should of itself suffice to condemn the lodges, to wit, their rejection of or antagonism to Christ; and that though I was personally unable, through any experience of my own, to vouch for the truth of such asserted rejection, yet the many observations to that end which had come under my notice, seemed fully to support the charge. It happened, as a curiously pertinent sequel to this conversation, that upon the evening of the day on which it was held, my wife imparted to me the following circumstance in connection with a woman, then our guest, who had come from a Southern State to attend the National Convention of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. The wife of a man of high standing in the legal profession, she held the position of president of a lodge of "Good Templars." (These, unlike the open "Unions" formed of late years, are constituted upon a basis of secrecy.) Her statement was, that being a "church communicant," the fact that there were, quite a number of Jewesses in the lodge over which she presided, had frequently occasioned her much trouble of mind, for the reason that she had deemed it expedient that the name of Christ be suppressed. She was sorry for it, but what (she queried) should she do—what, indeed, could she do? The reply was, that it would not do to deny Him whom she claimed to be her Master, so that if there was apparent any incompatibility between the expression of her allegiance and retaining her place, there need be no question as to what was the true course to take. She turned away sorrowful, unprepared, it would seem, to make the suggested sacrifice.

This little incident, therefore, furnished a direct proof of what I had sought, and that in connection with a secret order accounted quite harmless by many who are by no means friendly to such an oath-bound organization as Free-masonry.

For "The Friend."

The Beautiful City.

The Beautiful City, dear reader, is Heaven; otherwise known as Zion, the city of our God. John, in the Revelations, employs the most beautiful figures and types of earth to bring to the comprehension of man a faint shadow of the great and glorious reality; but all, all in vain. For here we see as through a glass darkly, but there, face to face. It is not for mortal eyes and ears to see or hear, or the finite mind to comprehend, the great and glorious realities that await the pure in heart. Enough for us to know, that where the Saviour is, there is Heaven. Even here on earth, before passing the dark vale, we may have a heaven in our souls, because of the presence of Him who hath redeemed us by his blood, and opened to us the flood-gates of peace and joy.

Oft when faint and weary by the way; when storm-clouds gather, and doubts and fears and sorrows seek to overwhelm, how unspeakably refreshing to our souls is it to view with the eye of faith the glories of the promised land, the Beautiful City, with its foundation of precious stones, its walls of jasper, its gates of pearl, its streets of gold, its crystal rivers, its trees of life; whose temple and whose light are the Lord God Almighty, and the Lamb. There, too, are the vast multitude of redeemed and precious souls from every kindred and tongue, which no man can number; the angels and archangels, ascribing "Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever."

Here we have no continuing city, but we seek one to come. In our Father's house on high, the dear Saviour has gone to prepare a mansion for us. The door of mercy is open, the gospel feast is spread, the Spirit and the Bride say, come, and whosoever will may come and enter in through the pearl gates.

"No chilling winds, nor poisonous breath,
Can reach that healthful shore;
Sickness and sorrow, pain and death,
Are felt and feared no more."

Though on earth we may meet with trials and tribulations, disappointments and sorrows, clouds and darkness; soon, if we are faithful, these will all be over, and we shall reunite with loved ones gone before, where sin and sorrow, pain and death come not, and all tears are wiped away.

As it is written, "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard; neither hath it entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for those that love Him."

"O city of the jasper wall,
And of the pearly gate!
For thee, amid the storms of life,
Our weary spirits wait.
We long to walk the streets of gold,
No mortal feet have trod;
We long to worship at the shrine,
The temple of our God!

O city where they need no light
Of sun, or moon, or star;
Could we with eye of faith behold
How bright thy mansions are,
How soon our doubt would flee away,
How strong our trust would grow,
Until our hearts should lean no more
On trifles here below!

O city where the shining gates
Shut out all grief and sin,
Well may we yearn amid earth's strife,
Thy holy peace to win!
Yet must we meekly bear the cross,
Nor seek to lay it down,
Until our Father brings us home
And gives the promised crown."

Spread of Weeds and Noxious Insects.—A writer in The Independent, in commenting on this subject says—that some weeds are extremely formidable, and are on the increase; and that the number of species which are giving trouble has been largely added to within a few years.

"Within ten years the wild carrot has swept over all the Northern States and part of the Southern. We cannot eradicate it by any known method. Mow it ten times in a season, and yet it manages to sow some seed. No animal will eat it. It fills the land literally full. It crowds out even thistles. It ruins meadows and chokes pastures. It despises no soil, and yet appreciates the best.

"To a person for the first time travelling in the Western States, what is most astonishing is the vast acreage of newly cleared timber land taken possession of by thistles, mullein, burdocks, nettles. I remember the first trip that I took on the road that runs north through Michigan. I was fifty miles from the cultivated lands, in a dense wilderness stretching for scores of miles between clearings, and the road had not been open two years. Yet every square foot of open land was covered with dandelions, while other weeds were hardly behind, only less developed.

"Doubtless readers will say after all, what can a weed do, or a plant? Well, I venture to say, that but for four families of plants that now exist, man would immediately degenerate, and perhaps become extinct. Three of these four families originated about the same time that man did, and have always been more or less his allies. I mean the rose family, the solanum family, the cereal family and the palm family. In the rose family is not only the loveliest flower on our lawns, but the apple, the pear, the peach, the plum, the cherry, the apricot, the blackberry, raspberry, dewberry, strawberry, and more, could we get on without these. The solanum family includes tomato, potato, and that bug and fool killer, tobacco—a plant so far known more for what evil is in it than for the good in it. How should we get on without the solanums? This is as much the potato age as it is the iron age. The cereal family includes wheat, rye, corn, rice, oats, and the rest of that sort; and while a new wheat, giving an average of one hundred bushels to an acre would absolutely revolutionize civilization, the loss of the cereal family would reduce the human family one-half or more. The palm family has several hundred sorts of food and fibre for human use; and it shoulders the human tribes of the tropics, as corn and potatoes and wheat and apples carry us. That is what the plant world is doing for us.

"You see what a single family of plants can do to help us; what can another do to injure us? To overcome any one possible weed, exhausts our time and energy, which is needed in other directions. To get absolute riddance of thistles, wild carrots, wild parsnips and mulleins, would do more for the laboring classes in a year than any possible legislation concerning monopolies of another sort. These are the monopolists who steal our dinners away and make us work fourteen hours a day.

"Man has killed, or is rapidly killing off, the rest of the larger animal tribes, and absolutely putting an end to the most useful. The buffa is soon to be a myth. The chamois and the antelope, and all varieties of deer, are being exterminated. Our streams are fished out of a valuable stock. The rodents we cannot destroy and probably, although often terribly destructive it is well we cannot. The rat is, like the moquitto, a cosmopolitan scavenger. But as things are, the great tribes of carnivora, and especially the herbivora, are rapidly disappearing. None will be saved but our domesticated sorts. On hundred years more, and the creatures that no furnish our "sport" will be gone.

"While we have coped with bears, lions and serpents, with monsters in the sea, air, and land we have had our match with the insects. We are not their masters, boast as we will. Without an alliance with the birds we should be ingloriously whipped by the bugs. And it is a most alarming fact that insects, pests dangerous to fruits and vegetables and cereals, are as much of the increase as are noxious weeds. During 188 over one-half of New York State suffered a literal plague of lice. Egypt could not have suffered worse. A profuse and promising blossoming of all sorts of fruit was followed by clouds of aphid Myriads on every apple tree, on plum tree, thornbushes, hedges, cherries, and sometime shade-trees. The fruit was obliterated in whole counties, and many trees destroyed, even whole orchards. It may be possible to check such an invasion, but to really overcome it will be impossible. Fifty years ago a full plum crop was almost a certainty. But the curculio came to us, and it has stayed. Plums are now scarce. In my boyhood I have seen eighty bushels of green gages picked from my father's trees, super and delicious. The utmost diligence is now necessary to secure five bushels from an equal number of trees. Think of the quinces of those days! I have helped pick fifty bushels in a season. But the borer came, and away went the trees.

"In our gardens, the last quarter of a century has introduced, besides many more destructive insects, two that have caused millions of damage each year—the potato beetle and the cabbage worm. We have settled down to a fight with these, and are somewhat accustomed to their ravages; but do we know when another equally cosmopolitan scamp will develop his energies at our expense? I am not over-drawing the danger. It is a question of the possible progress of agriculture and era of civilization.

"I have spoken of our allies the birds, and our absolute dependence on these creatures, in our war with our worst pests. This is no figure of speech or bit of poetry.

"It is some encouragement that there are species of birds constantly adding themselves to our domesticated sorts. The robin is our friend because he has not sense to build a nest that is safe anywhere except near man's habitation. But his cousin, the catbird, is a mighty hunter can take splendid care of himself, and is easily made to feel at home with us. The grosbeak has latterly drawn closer to humanity; and the same is true of the tanager and other birds, when they are not slaughtered."

Ostrich-Hunting by the Bojesman.—Though so swift of foot and so enduring of lung that scarcely the best horse could catch it, if followed on its own track, the ostrich can be outwitted without much difficulty. It never runs in a straight line, so that the hunters can calculate on its course and intercept it. Many ostriches are killed in a very ingenious fashion by the Bosjesmans. These tiny hunters fit up the skin of an ostrich with straps, so that it can be fastened to their backs. The skin of the neck and head is also prepared by being stuffed, and having a neck thrust through it by way of a handle. When he goes ostrich-hunting, the Bosjesman fastens the skin on his back, takes the neck in his hands, and goes boldly towards any ostriches that he may see. He counterfeits the movements of the bird with such marvellous fidelity, that although I have seen the performance within a few yards, I have more than once been inclined to think that I was looking at a real bird. The imitation of the gait of the ostrich, and the pecking at imaginary food, were nature itself. Two favorite imitations were wonderful. In one, the bird seemed to sit down suddenly, after the manner of its kind, peep about for a minute or so, stretch out its neck on the ground, and lie motionless, as if asleep. Another ruse was adopted when the Bosjesman fancied that the birds suspected the imposture. This was done by pretending that the bird was rolling on the ground, and dwelling in the sand, just as the sparrow dusts itself in the dry road. I never saw so wonderful a performance, the body rolling over and over, the legs kicking up in the air, and a cloud of dust being flung up, so as to veil any deficiencies. Had I been an ostrich I should certainly have been deceived. The one great precaution which the Bosjesman has to bear in mind, is to keep himself well to leeward of the birds, as if they were to catch a whiff of the human odor that perfumes every living creature—even the lion, the bear, and elephant—they would put miles between them and the hunter. As it is, however, the Bosjesman works his way until only a few yards separate him from the birds. He then delicately fits a poisoned arrow to his tiny bow, and presses it in the body of the nearest bird. Stung by the pain, but not knowing its source, the ostrich runs off, accompanied by its companions, and is followed by the Bosjesman, who in this way contrives to shoot several more of the birds before his ruse is discovered.—From "The Handy Natural History." Church Funds.—The Anglican Bishop of Huron, Ontario, has issued a pastoral condemning the raising of money for church purposes by means of games of chance or theatrical entertainments.

The Ballet.—The Christian Statesman of this city, writing with approval the efforts of our friend Josiah W. Leeds, for the suppression of the Ballet, calls attention to the fact, that while the exhibition was in progress, "not one of the dozen daily papers of the city expressed itself in favor of the maintenance of decency," and in opposition to what he calls a "travelling scheme of debauchery." One of these papers, The Press, having denied that there was anything immoral in the Ballet, J. W. Leeds dressed a letter to its Editor, which he published, on which the following paragraphs are extracted: "The Press, in editorially replying to my protest against the ballet, and to the action of the ministers' meetings thereupon, advises the ministers and myself to view for ourselves the entertainment complained of. It ventures the assurance that in 'the velocity of the costuming and posturing they would do nothing but pure delight.' It likewise alluded to the representation as a 'graceful and pleasing exhibition and not at all immoral in its nature and tendencies, as Mr. Leeds imagined.'"

"Nevertheless, the Ledger of this morning (Household column), speaking authoritatively, says that 'the posturing, &c., of the dancers, in their modest, scant attire, was 'simply revolting.'"

That the spectacle was 'sensuous and debasing,' as I had previously charged, has, I believe, been fully sustained.

"The editor affirms that my apprehension that such entertainments are immoral in their nature and tendencies has been 'imagined,' and that I had better see for myself. I can reply to him that in my early manhood, twenty years ago—not being then a member of any religious society—my great fondness for music led me quite frequently to attend the opera, but when on my way one night to the Academy the thought that the ballet was a feature of the entertainment, and that upon no account would I be willing that my sister, or any other young woman in whom I felt an interest, should so expose herself, came with such power to my mind that I thereupon retraced my steps, and have been entirely satisfied never again to frequent the opera.

"Apart, therefore, from the 'pure (?) delight' which such spectacles may afford anyone is the unworthy consideration that we are willing that young women should, for our mere sensuous gratification, expose themselves in the 'revolting' manner stated in The Press contemporary. Now, it seems to me, that the withdrawal of the audience or general cries of 'Shame' would be the fitting reception to be accorded every such representation, so contaminating to the (assenting) beholders, and so degrading to pure womanhood. Before giving countenance to the ballet, therefore, I believe we may with profit give place to two considerations which I am very sure are not mere 'sentiment.' The first is the testing self-inquiry: Would I be willing that my own wife, sister or daughter, should disport, half dressed, on a public stage? The second: Do I estimate the worth and the preciousness of that word of Scripture, 'Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God?'—Josiah W. Leeds."

—A Warning to the Profane.—The Savannah News relates the following remarkable incident: "I hope that God may paralyze me!" were the words spoken by William Burkett, at Douglas, Coffee County, last week. At once his hands dropped to his side, his legs refused to move, and his eyes rolled wildly around. His prayer was answered, as he stood paralyzed on the spot where but a few moments before he was a magnificent type of physical manhood. He tried to speak, but his tongue would not move. Half a dozen men who were present were rendered motionless by the evident visitation of the hand of God. When they recovered self-possession, they tenderly removed the afflicted man to his residence, a half-mile distant. When Miss Rhody Burkett saw the plight in which her father was brought home, she screamed and fainted, and died a few days later.

"For years Mr. Burkett had been the ferryman at Howkidsville road-crossing of the Ocmulgee River. He was of giant physique, with long gray locks, and became especially noted because of the brace of revolvers which he kept strapped to his waist. He was a great hunter, and the ferry being in the midst of a swamp he was convenient to an abundance of game. From those who lived around him it is learned that he was fearfully profane. Whenever he sighted game and was called off from it by an alarm from the ferry, he would pour out such a volley of oaths as would make the flesh of an ordinary man crawl. It was while in one of these profane spells that he cursed his Creator and wound up with the expression above quoted. The preachers in the neighborhood have used the incident in their sermons with great effect."

A Friend of Philadelphia wrote to the Postmaster at Douglas, inquiring as to the truth of this narrative, and has received the following reply, which he handed to the Editor of "The Friend."

"Douglas, Ga., Feb. 8, 1887.
Dear Sir—[Yours of] 2nd instant to hand asking me if the report of William Burkett, if it is true from what I can learn? I have not a great way from him, and all I have talked with tell me it is true. I think you may take it as truth.

I remain yours, &c."

He that cannot forgive others breaks the bridge over which he must pass himself. — George Herbert.

It has been an inestimable boon to the English peoples, for nearly three hundred years, that they possess in the King James Bible a book sufficient in itself to instruct in the most ancient history, the sublimest poetry, the truest philosophy, and the most effective and beautiful language.

THE FRIEND.

SECOND MONTH 26, 1887.

We have received a communication which raises the question, as to how far a body of Friends [or of professors of any other denomination] can truthfully be said to uphold any particular doctrines or principles, while there are in its communion some members whose views are at variance therewith.

In reflecting on this subject, we have remembered the gradual manner in which clear convictions of the mysteries of religion are unfolded to the mind of the attentive learner in the school of Christ—"First the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear." The ideas imbibed by education or derived from outward sources, need to be made vital by the immediate teaching of the Spirit of Christ, before they become truly a part of our spiritual possessions. In the Church as in the world, there must always exist various degrees of development. But in the outward, where there is life in a child, we may reasonably expect growth, and subsequent maturity. So, in religious matters, if there is spiritual life, through a yielding to the government and operations of the Spirit of Christ, we may hope for an increase in true knowledge, agreeably to the Scripture promise—"They that do the will shall know of the doctrine." The Grace of God which bringeth salvation, teaches those who will receive its instructions, all things that are necessary for them individually to know. William Penn speaks of this as the root of the goodly tree of doctrines held by Friends; but the development from this root is gradual, not instantaneous, and not equally rapid in all cases. So, also, Robert Barclay testifies that to feel the Divine Life and Power quickening the soul "is the surest way to become a Christian," to whom afterwards "the knowledge and understanding of principles will not be wanting, but will grow up so much as is needful, as the natural fruit of this good root." The degrees of this growth, and of living knowledge, will be almost as varied as are the individuals concerned.

Therefore in answering the question which has been stated, we must not lose sight of the varying degrees of religious attainment. While the importance of sound doctrine is ever to be kept in view, yet we think there may be true unity between those who are advanced scholars and those who are only as it were beginners in Christ's school.

But it is sadly true, that in every branch of the professing Church (and we believe this may be said of it in every age of the world) there are those who are not following the Lord Jesus in the path He would lead his followers. There are also many who rely for their doctrines on the explanations of Scripture passages which their own reason or that of those whom they choose to follow, have suggested. This is the root of most of the theological contentions which have distracted the world, a measure of which pervades every part of Christendom. How far then, can any body of professors be said to uphold the doctrines they profess, while such members are found in their connections?

So long as these conform to the regulations of the society of which they are members, and do not disturb its peace by promulgating doctrines at variance with its principles, the Church has no right to pry into their secret thoughts, or to sit in judgment upon them. It may, and indeed it ought, to watch over its members for good, caution them against departure from the truth, and seek to lead them in the footsteps of the flock.

The presence of such nominal members ever will be a source of weakness, and of exercise to the living burthen-bearers; but so long as there are enough of the living to maintain the testimony of truth, and to keep the official acts and declarations of the body in accord with its professed principles; we believe the defects or defection of individual members cannot properly be regarded as compromising the society to which they belong, or rendering it responsible for errors against which it testifies.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—In the Senate the Eads' Telman-tepe bill was passed on the 17th instant, by 46 to 7. It incorporates James B. Eads and some eighty other persons named as a body politic under the name and title of the Atlantic and Pacific Ship Railway Company. The stock is not to exceed $1,000,000, and when 10 per cent. of stock is subscribed for, and 10 per cent. thereon paid in cash, a meeting of stockholders is to be held in Washington or New York, for the election of directors. If ten millions of stock is not subscribed for, and ten per cent. in cash paid thereon within two years, the charter is to expire by limitation. No certificate of stock shall be issued until it shall have been fully paid for in money at par value, and bonds in excess of the amount of capital actually paid in shall be issued, and no bonds shall be issued or disposed of at less than their par value.

On the 21st the same body passed the Nicaragua Ship Canal bill—53 to 5. It provides for the incorporation of the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua, with a capital stock not less than fifty, nor more than one hundred millions. The principal offices to be in New York City. "The United States is to exercise such control over the canal as provided for by treaty with Nicaragua, and not inconsistent with any treaty obligations of the United States with any power, and is to enjoy its unobstructed use (as half rates) for troops, munitions of war and mails. If stock to the amount of $10,000,000 be not subscribed, and 10 per cent. thereof actually paid in within two years, or if the work of construction shall not have actually commenced and been in progress within four years, the corporation shall be deemed to have expired by limitation, and all its franchises to have ceased and determined."

Two other important bills have also passed the Senate. One of them for the construction, by contract, of two protected steel cruisers, at a cost, exclusive of armament, not exceeding $15,000,000, each vessel to have a maximum speed by trial of least 20 knots per hour. For the armament the sum of $4,800,000 is appropriated. The other is for the increase of the naval establishment. It provides for the construction of vessels and torpedo boats, for coast, harbor and river defence, and for their armament, $15,400,000.

Prohibition amendments to their State Constitutions have passed the Senate of West Virginia, and the House of Representatives of Missouri.

The Ohio Legislature has passed a bill repealing the laws providing separate schools for colored children. And a municipal woman-suffrage bill passed by the Legislature of Kansas, has been signed by the Governor.

J. C. Beiser was fined $50 in the Police Court at Atlanta, Georgia, several weeks ago, for violation of the Prohibition law. He appealed to the City Court, and, being convicted, has been sentenced by Judge Howard Van Epps, to pay a fine of $1000.

On the 17th instant, a severe earthquake was felt at Fredericktown, Missouri. The shock was sufficient to displace plastering on the walls and overturn furniture.

A bed of cream and white colored marble has been discovered just in the edge of Rome, Ga. A company has been formed to develop the marble, which is there in almost exhaustless quantities.

Asphalt is stated to have been discovered in Morgan County, Ala. It is said to be the only large deposit in the United States.

Tobacco, in its various forms, paid an internal revenue tax last year of almost $28,000,000. The tax was paid upon 3,510,898,488 cigars, or more than a half-box for every man, woman and child in the country, an increase of nearly 152,000,000 cigars more than for the preceding year. With the $8,311,114 received as customs on imported tobacco and cigars, there appears to have been $36,218,476 paid in this country last year to the Government on tobacco alone. A New York Times correspondent figures up that the value of this was nearly $182,000,000, or more than $3 worth for every man, woman and child in the country.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 454, which was 60 more than during the previous week, and 79 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the whole number, 231 were males and 223 females; 56 died of consumption; 50 of pneumonia; 39 of heart disease; 21 of convulsions; 16 of inflammation of the brain; 15 of old age; 13 of apoplexy; 13 of croup, and 12 of measles.

Markets.—U. S. 4½'s, registered, 109½; coupon, 110½; 4's, 128½; 3's, 100½; currency 6's, 126½ a 137.

Petroleum was quiet but steady at 6½ cts. for 70 Abel test in barrels, and 8½ cts. for 110 test in cases.

Potatoes.—Prices ruled steady. White potatoes, per bushel: Early Rose, choice, 60 a 62 cts; Early Rose, fair to good, 55 a 58 cts; White Stars, choice, 53 a 55 cts; White Stars, fair to good, 48 a 50 cts; Burbanks, choice, 53 a 55 cts; Burbanks, fair to good, 48 a 50 cts; Hebrons, choice, 55 cts; Hebrons, fair to good, 50 a 53 cts; Mammoth Pearl, choice, 53 a 55 cts; Mammoth Pearl, fair to good, 48 a 50 cts; Peerless, as to quality, 48 a 53 cts.

Flour and Meal.—The flour market reflected no improvement. Demand was of a hand-to-mouth character, and prices were weak. Sales of 125 barrels Pennsylvania family, at $3.75; 250 barrels Ohio, clear, $4; 125 barrels do. straight, at $4.40; 125 barrels Indiana straight, at $4.30; 375 barrels winter patent, at $4.70 a $4.80; 125 barrels Minnesota, straight, at $4.40, and 500 barrels do. patent, at $4.90 a $5.10. Rye flour was quiet, but steady, at 83 per barrel for choice.

Grain.—Wheat has declined the past week, No. 2 red closing at 90 cts and 90½ cts. asked. Corn was quiet, No. 2 mixed at 46½ cts. bid, and 46¾ cts. asked. Oats were a shade firmer, No. 2 white closed at 30¾ cts. bid and 31¾ cts. asked.

Deer cattle were active at 3¼ a 5½ cts. Sheep were firm at 4 a 6 cts. Lambs were firm at 4½ a 7 cts.

Hogs were active at 7¼ a 8 cts. for Western; 7 a 7½ for State.

FOREIGN.—W. E. Gladstone has written a letter, in which he says that he believes that many members of the House of Commons are ignorant of the fact that, down to the time of the union with England, the Irish Protestants were the most prominent supporters of Irish nationality. The letter adds: "They now have an opportunity of supporting nationality within safe bounds giving peace to Ireland and comfort to the whole kingdom."

On the 19th, W. E. Gladstone in addressing a crowd at the Penmaen-Mawr (Wales) Station urged that the Welsh demand a settlement of the Irish question in order to secure attention for their own local concerns. The Times advises that no time be lost in affecting a settlement of the fisheries dispute between the United States and Canada before the fishing season opens, because after its commencement the dispute may be complicated by fresh seizures of fishing vessels. "The Canadians," says the Times, "as well as their neighbors, must be prepared to waive some of the rights for which they have been sticking."

Major Edward James Saunderson (Conservative), member of Parliament for North Armagh, publishes a letter in which he declares that if Home Rule be granted to Ireland the Loyalists of that country have ample assurances from England that they will not have to battle alone against the Irish Cabinet.

All the French troops have been recalled from Madagascar except four companies, which are to remain at Diego Suarez.

The Gaulois prints an interview with a diplomat, who confirms the statement that Prince Bismarck will demand the neutrality of France in the East.

Negotiations between Spain and the United States for a new commercial treaty have been suspended by Spain until the American Congress shall have taken action with regard to the tobacco and sugar duties.

The Swiss Government seized a Nihilist printing office in Geneva, and effected an extensive capture of type and pamphlets.

A recent storm in Geneva, Italy, damaged the telephone system there to the extent of $500,000, according to a statement of the "director of telephones," who ordered all the offices temporarily closed.

The beggars of Rome, it is estimated, receive $2,000,000 a year, and 500 are said to be worth for $15,000 to $25,000 each.

The first copy of the original edition of "The Letter of Columbus," in Latin, printed in 1493, the year after the discovery of America, was recently sold in Cologne for 6600 marks ($1650), said to be the highest price ever paid for a single book in Germany.

It is stated that Von Radowicz, German Ambassador to the Porte, has informed the Bulgarian deputat that in the event of the failure to settle the Bulgarian question by the negotiations pending Russia will occupy Bulgaria, with the consent of Germany and Austria.

Australian advices received in San Francisco report that sixty lives were lost by the recent floods at Brisbane, Queensland. The damage to property is not estimated.

Twenty-seven hundred Japanese are stated to have emigrated to the Hawaiian Islands.

Late mail advices from Honolulu received in San Francisco gives details of the eruption of Mauna Loa. It began on First Month 16th, when a column of fire shot up from the south crater. Two days afterward earthquake shocks kept the whole district around the volcano in tremulous and violent motion, and three great rivers of molten lava broke from the mountain and flowed towards the sea, wiping out houses and plantations in their course. No loss of life is reported as the inhabitants had received timely warning. The earthquakes shook down many walls and buildings.

On the 12th the Honolulu Bulletin announced an outbreak of Mokuaweoweo. Smoke, steam and lava were emitted.

The slaughter of lobsters at Prince Edward Island something surprising. There were exported the past season 91,000 cases, mostly to Europe, which involve the killing of 35,000,000 lobsters.

Near Frankford, (Twenty-third Ward,) Philadelphia. Physician and Superintendent—JOHN C. HALL, M. D. Applications for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board of Managers.

DIED, on the 3rd of Twelfth Month, 1886, at his home in Davis Co., Kansas, AARON MORRIS, in his 84th year of his age. At the time of his death he was a member of Danmorris Monthly Meeting, Kansas. A gentle and quiet life was crowned by a quiet and peaceful close.

—, at his residence near Rancocas, N. J., on the 14th of Twelfth Month, 1886, RICHARD BUZZY, in his 70th year of his age, an esteemed member of Rancocas Particular, and Burlington Monthly Meeting Friends, in the attendance of which he was a good example. His relatives and friends have a comfortable hope that, through redeeming love and mercy, he will have been permitted to enter into everlasting rest and peace.

—, on the 5th of First Month, 1887, at her home in Sherwood, New York, after a short illness, ELIZABETH OTIS, aged 63 years. This dear Friend was a woman of sterling worth, kind to the poor, and thoughtful to entertain strangers. Her family and friends have the comforting assurance, that her departure was a transition into the realms of light.

—, on the 21st of First Month, 1887, SAMUEL OTIS, husband of the late Elizabeth Otis, aged 66 years. He was a firm advocate for the principles of Truth as held by Friends. For several years prior to his close, his health declined, and he often remarked he felt his "life hung on a very slender thread, and it was his daily concern to live in acceptance with his Heavenly Father." Samuel and Elizabeth Otis were both members of Scipio Meeting of Friends.

Seventh Mo. 20th, 1849. "Thi when we are weak, that the enemy seeks to lay waste our little strength, and even to destroy. That I have feared of latter times I never shall see one of the 'days of the Son of man' again. Nevertheless, we endeavored, like poor Job, to retain mine integrity. Suffer me not, O Heavenly Father, to let go the shield of faith through this season wherewith thou hast seen meet to prove me. I am willing to go even yet deeper into baptism, if I may only know a rising unto newness of life, when thou seest meet to say, It is enough.

On the evening of the 25th of Seventh Month, 1849, our dear friend, Sarah Emlen, was suddenly brought low by a stroke of paralysis; which affected the whole of her right side, and deprived of the power of speech. It was thought she knew those around her for about twenty-four hours, when she became insensible, and lay in an unconscious state till about 12 o'clock, Sixth-day night, the 27th, when she quietly passed away to her everlasting home. The unexpected and sudden death of this dear friend and mother in the Church, has caused sadness in many hearts; and we feel that a great one hath fallen in our Israel. May He, whose she was and whom she served, be pleased to bless and sanctify this dispensation of his providence, not only to my own poor soul, but to all who have been the objects of her love. The travail of her soul was great; which I have been sensible of, in seasons gone by. Through her ministry, or rather the ministry that flowed through her, have I been brought to make sacrifices long called for. Ah! those were days of avor, when the Lord cast his mantle over me, and bid me live.

31st. Attended the funeral of our dear friend, Sarah Emlen. It was large. And of the many here, not a few were sincere mourners, being made sensible of our great loss—the harvest truly being great, and such "laborers few." At the grave, our aged friend, Hannah Gibbons, and also Hannah Rhoads, were engaged in testimony. After the interment, the company went into the meeting-house: where Wm. Scattergood, David Lope, and Hannah Gibbons, ministered unto us.

Eighth Mo. 1st. Attended, in company with brother J. and sister P., Birmingham Monthly Meeting. We had hardly settled into silence in meeting, ere a spirit of drowsiness assailed; and what a struggle and combat I had! It was nothing short of agony. Thought for a while I should have to leave the meeting. But very unexpectedly, help came; and the tribute of "Thanks be to God who giveth the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ," arose in my heart. It broke all down, and brought me once more to the mercy seat; which more than compensated for all the suffering passed through. I felt so thankful the warfare had been maintained.

17th. Again and again am I given to feel and know, that yesterday's manna will not satisfy to-day. Under a sense and feeling of this, am I again left poor as the very poorest. "Send I pray thee, O Heavenly Father! a little help from thy sanctuary and strengthen me out of Zion."

Ninth Mo. 5th. As our week-day meeting approached, like poor Hezekiah, I did dare to ask for a "sign;" which was on this wise: that our friend, William Evans, might be sent to our meeting that day, with a little gospel message for me. I had hardly faith to believe my request would be heard, so unworthy did I feel. But hardly had I taken my seat in meeting, before William stepped in. I could scarcely believe it possible, as my eyes followed him to his seat. A fresh sense was then given of the mercy and compassion of Him, who had thus regarded even to hear and answer my prayer. Tears flowed, and something like a little covenant was entered into. Our meeting was held in silence till toward the close; when our dear friend ministered to my state truly. Encouraging to bear quietly all the necessary baptisms, that so the portion of suffering might be filled up for our own souls' sake, and his body's sake, which is his Church; quoting: "The life is more than meat," &c. The acknowledgement would, he believed, be raised in the hearts of some present, that "there is a God in Israel." With more to the point so applicable and good.

Tenth Mo. 13th. Awoke this morning under a quiet comfortable feeling; which has thus far gone with me through the day. Our meeting was a precious one to me; many comfortable Scripture passages were brought to remembrance: such as, "Thine eye shall see Jerusalem a quiet habitation," &c., &c. Oh! how truly comforting it was after a long wintry season, not of days, weeks, or months only, but even years.* Still Thy good hand, though unseen, has followed me even when I was forgetful of Thee; and tempted, at times, almost to believe Thou hadst forgotten me.

Eleventh Mo. 24th. "Commune with thine own heart and be still," arose in the mind on awakening this morning. There has seemed for days past, no ability to commune or be still. Should this favor be once more granted, may I avail myself of the blessed privilege of asking

* That skilful veteran in the Lamb's army, Thomas Scattergood, during his long tarriance in England in the service of the gospel, noted: "Suffering is work done." And again: "It is not suffering when we see fully and feel what we have to suffer for; but when we have to live day after day, and week after week, and year after year, by faith alone and hope alone that there will be a change. This is suffering."

counsel and direction of Him, who alone is able rightly to direct. We read that "A good man's ways are ordered of the Lord." This is what I covet.

Twelfth Mo. 14th. Came to the city and met the Westtown Committee to-day. My heart was humbled during our sitting, under a precious sense of the love and regard of our Heavenly Father afresh extended towards us. The covering overspread, had a very comforting and consoling effect upon my troubled mind.

20th. Feeling this morning unusually cast down and disquieted, my mind seemed to turn toward the week-day meeting at Arch St. I strove to reason it away—faith being too low even to believe there was good in store for me. But dwelling under it some time, it finally settled for me to go. Whereupon this little petition was raised, "show me a token for good," "that the bones which thou has broken may rejoice." I went in great weakness. And as I patiently waited, the Lord inclined unto me and heard my cry. Both immediately and instrumentally, was I fed. For towards the close of our meeting, dear Rachel Thornton, in a very impressive manner, revived this language: "Fear thou not; for I am with thee; be not dismayed, for I am thy God: I will strengthen thee; yea, I will help thee; yea, I will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteousness." With more enlargement, so comforting and good. O! for suitable returns for the favor of this day.

Second Mo. 7th, 1850. Attended our old Quarterly Meeting, (Abington). A season, I feel it right to record, as being one of renewed favor; a fresh evidence being extended that He who blest and fed the multitude formerly, was in the midst,—satisfying hungry souls. It seemed on sitting down in meeting, as though I could hear the language, "I will bless the provision of Zion, and satisfy her poor with bread." Which promise was livingly fulfilled. We had the company and labors of our dear friends Christopher Healy, Elizabeth Pitfield, and Sarah Hillman.

Strengthen me, O Heavenly Father! more faithfully to follow thee, the few remaining days of my pilgrimage here; that I may be admitted to a resting place with thee, when this chequered scene closes.

9th. Sincere desires have ascended this day for preservation. And not only for myself, but for the church and people, that the Lord would be pleased to "spare his people and give not his heritage to reproach."

Third Mo. 14th. Through indisposition I was not able to assemble with my friends this day, which had been anxiously and pleasantly looked towards. This feeling brought afresh to remembrance days long since gone by, when meeting days were greeted with such delight. Truly youthful days are days of favor; those when we are nursed and dandled as it were on the knee. My heart is often humbled in the remembrance of the loving-kindness of my Heavenly Father extended toward me in those days. Often attended with a fear that they will prove my best days.

For "The Friend."

Fourth Mo. 21st. During the past week, attended our Yearly Meeting. Many of us have now returned as with our hands on our loins, pleading that we may be "spared," and "thy heritage not given to reproach." Keep, dearest Father! thy chosen messengers and servants, those who have long followed thee through many and deep sufferings. Strengthen them, oh afresh strengthen them, to stand firm for thy blessed cause and testimony on earth. That so "others, seeing their good works, may glorify our Father which is in Heaven."

Fifth Mo. 19th. Attended West Chester Meeting. Our friend Elizabeth Evans was there. She revived the Scriptures: "Fear not, thou worm Jacob," &c., for I am with thee, &c. When thou passeth through the waters and the fire, I will be with thee, &c. The tried, tempted and proved soul, was sweetly encouraged. Said the Lord was nearer such than they were aware of; that the enemy's power was limited. And, moreover, that the day of deliverance was drawing nigh, &c. The young people were, with an earnest call, invited to come. Some in an especial manner, who were putting off the great work, thinking it was time enough yet. They were shown that no hour of the day was exempt from the call of death. That though we had an instance left of one—the thief on the cross—being saved at the last, there was but the one; and that was left that none need despair, and also that none might presume.

Seventh Mo. 9th. Week-day meeting at Sixth Street, Philada. Though feeble both in body and mind, yet felt drawn to assemble for the solemn purpose of worship. The enemy seemed to take advantage of my weakness; which for awhile caused a hard struggle. A short communication, addressed to a tried and proved state, from dear Sarah Hillman, raised the life. She was followed by William Evans, and Elizabeth Pitfield: all tending to make glad the heritage of God. When this pure stream flows unmix'd from the fountain, how it enlivens the parched ground! how it causes the heart of the dumb to sing for joy! Tears of gratitude were poured forth to Him, who condescended to our low estate, blessed the provision of Zion, and satisfied her poor with bread.

18th. Attended the week-day meeting at Arch St. Under the ministry of Samuel Bettle I was instructed; he revived the Scripture, "I waited patiently on the Lord and He inclined unto me," &c., and was led tenderly to sympathize with some present "who had fasted many days," not daring to open their lips in prayer to Him, who alone could help. He assured that as these patiently waited, they would be lifted out of the miry clay, and a new song would be put into their mouths: the very words of dear William Evans last Third-day, to some he was addressing. Samuel impressed it upon us to enter into the vineyard at the call, and labor, as such only would receive wages. He dwelt very sweetly upon the mercy of Him, who called even at the eleventh hour.

I have been enabled to commit my soul to Him who says: "Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out," and who is "able to save to the uttermost." These two texts have been as sheet anchors, by which my soul has outrode many a storm when otherwise hope would have failed. "In no wise" takes in all characters, and "to the uttermost" goes many a league beyond all difficulties. I recommend these anchors, they are sure and steadfast.—John Newton.

Persia and the Persians.—No. 1.

This is the title of a work written by S. G. W. Benjamin, lately Minister of the United States to Persia. It gives considerable insight into the physical characteristics of a country, and the social, political and religious peculiarities of a nation with which the general reader is but little acquainted. It is hoped that some information drawn from its pages may prove interesting.

Persia extends from the Caspian Sea on the north, to the Persian Gulf and Arabian Sea on the south. The west and northwest have a broken surface, rolling and mountainous, and partaking of the general character of the adjoining parts of Asia Minor. The central and eastern portions of Persia form a vast elevated tableland from four to six thousand feet above the sea.

The great Elburz ranges of mountains, whose main direction is from east to west across the northern part of the country, reach their greatest height in the peak of Demavend which is not less than 21,000 feet in elevation. The provinces lying north of these ranges, between them and the Caspian Sea, present a great contrast in climate to those of Central Persia. On the northern side the mountains concentrate the humidity from the Caspian; fog and clouds are frequent; the moisture is deposited in heavy and frequent rains; and numerous streams leap down the precipices of the rocky Elburz and meander across the alluvial plains that border the sea. This abundance of humidity produces a wonderful vegetation, perennial in loveliness, and almost tropical in its variety and luxuriance. The roads wind through primeval forests of extraordinary density and beauty, whose venerable trees are clothed with the velvet of emerald mosses, or embraced by the tendrils of clambering lianas. Near the sea, the wilderness gives place to cultivated orchards, or to spacious lawns and vistas of barley-fields, and steaming fields of rice.

But the stranger, however fascinated he may be with the charms of one of the loveliest regions on the globe, is warned to be on his guard, to carry with him rifle and quinine, and not to tarry there except in the early spring-time. For in these forests lurk the panther and the tiger, the frequent and the persistent mosquito, and the venomous serpent; while the deadly miasma floats like a spirit of evil over the rice-fields. But as one begins to reach the upper shelves of the mountains, he enters upon very different scenery; and when he reaches the summit, he looks on parched plains, extending south with scarcely an interruption for 600 miles. The atmosphere is likewise altogether changed. On the northern side the damp heat causes the perspiration to start as if from a steam-bath, while on the south side of the Elburz the air is dry, devoid even of dew the greater part of the year; and although the mercury ranges at a higher point, the heat is less relaxing than in the Caspian provinces. The average annual rainfall of Central and Southern Persia is but about seven inches. Although the heat in summer is excessive, ranging from 105° to 110° Fahrenheit, yet the dryness of the air is opposed to malarial and many other diseases; and the climate is favorable to foreigners who avoid exposure to the midday sun and live temperately.

The mighty plains of central Persia roll away like a great sea, dotted at long intervals by islands of verdure, and reddish-gray ridges which rise above the plain like rocky headlands. Almost the whole of this vast area is dependent upon irrigation for the scanty vegetation which grows upon a comparatively small portion of the surface; and this irrigation is dependent upon the snows which cover the lofty ridges which rear themselves at intervals. In the valleys at the foot of these mountains where irrigation is possible, abundant crops are produced; but enormous tracts of this country are mere deserts, often covered only with sand, gravel and salt, almost entirely destitute of water and in parts to be traversed with circumspection on account of dry quick-sands, in which persons have lost their lives.

A peculiar feature of the great table-land of Persia is seen in the wind-storms. They are most formidable in Kerman, the southernmost province, where it is said an army was once overwhelmed by a sudden storm of dust. One which the writer witnessed came up with the appearance of an impending thunder-storm, conveying every impression that there was to be a general convulsion of the elements. It approached rapidly, and when within two or three miles the distant landscape became obscured as if by a cloud-burst of rain, rushing furiously over the plains, while we drove before it for shelter. But when the storm struck us it was accompanied by neither rain nor lightning, but only wind and a terrific cloud of driving dust, careering forward in dense whirlwinds, completely shutting out every object at the distance of a hundred yards. Happily, these dry-storms of Persia are generally of the briefest duration, and are not often as dangerous as those of the Sahara.

There is reason to believe that the vast desert of Khorassan in Eastern Persia, was at one time the bed of an inland sea, which has dried, up as the Caspian is now slowly evaporating. In the southwestern Persia, the mountain ranges trend with remarkable regularity from southeast to northwest, separated by regular valleys like wave-hollows, and intersected by tremendous defiles.

Such is the country occupied by one of the most ancient nations of the earth, which filled a conspicuous place long before the Christian era. In modern times it has had comparatively little intercourse with the civilized nations of Europe. This is partially due to its location, which renders it difficult of access by land; and partially to the fact that it has very few good harbors on its ocean coast, and almost no foreign commerce by water.

The population is estimated at about 9,000,000 people. Among these are numerous Turks, Armenians, Arabs and other tribes, which have been domesticated in the country by the various political changes that it has passed through. The Persians proper are described as a handsome, witty, vivacious and intelligent race. "To them are due the arts, the philosophy, the science, and the poetry for which Persia is famous."

The present capital of Persia is Teheran, situated in the northern part of the great central plateau. It was made the seat of government 100 years ago, and is an active, thriving city of about 200,000 inhabitants. Ispahan in the central part of Persia, and Shiraz in the South, both ancient and noted cities, lie nearly south of it—the three being nearly in a line. Being on a dry plain, where there is no water, it depends for its supply of this prime necessity of life, on subterranean aqueducts which convey the precious fluid from the base of the mountains.

The palace of the Shah at Teheran contains many interesting apartments. Among these is the Royal Library with its collection of manuscript volumes. The grand audience chamber is one of the most imposing halls in the world. The floor is paved with beautiful glazed tiles, arranged in the most exquisite mosaic. In the centre of the hall is a large table overlaid with beaten gold, and a long row of arm chairs are massively splendid with the same costly material covering every inch of space. At the end of the hall is the famous Peacock Throne, brought from Delhi by Nadir Shah, covered with gold and precious stones, in a profusion that places the lowest estimate of its value at not less than $13,000,000.

The magnificence of the Shah's audience-hall is still further heightened by the fact that here also are stored many of the crown jewels. In a glass case one sees a large heap of pearls dense as a pile of sand on the seashore. Diamonds, rubies, emeralds, and sapphires catch the eye at every turn, sometimes flashing forth like a crimson or a green fire on the brass of a buckle or a helmet worn at the front of battle ages ago. There, too, is a globe of the world, 20 inches in diameter, turning on a frame of solid gold; the surface of the earth is represented by precious stones, different colors being used to indicate the divisions of land and sea; the ocean is entirely of turquoise, and Persia is represented by a compact mosaic of diamonds. The famous Dar-i-noor or Sea of Light, the second of known diamonds in quality, size and value, is kept carefully locked in a double iron chest, but is shown on rare occasions, and is worn by the Shah on great State days.

In accordance with the ideas that prevail in many oriental countries, the houses of the better class have separate apartments for the women to which no man has access but the master of the house. These are called the Anderoom. All the mansions, even the most costly, are constructed of sun-dried bricks,—a material which has been in favor in those regions from the remotest antiquity; and which is very durable in that dry and hot climate.

"It is interesting," says our author, "to watch the builders at work. They wear long tunics which are tucked into their girdles when working.

The one above sings out in a musical tone, 'Brother, in the name of God, toss me a brick!' The one below, as he throws the brick, sings in reply, 'Oh, my brother! in the name of God, behold a brick!'"

The flat roofs are of mud, partly from the scarcity and costliness of wood in central Persia; and partly also because a roof of great thickness furnishes a better protection from the long dry heat of summer. Heavy undressed timbers are laid across from one wall to another; on these comes the lathing, or a layer of dry twigs, and then a layer of mud 10 or 12 inches thick. During the summer such a roof becomes very hard; and when the surface is slightly inclined, to allow the water to run off, long and heavy rains are required to penetrate it. After the wet season, the surface is rolled again for the next winter. With these precautions such roofs last a long time in Persia.

For "The Friend."

The Peace of God Exemplified.

When Christ was about to leave the world, and go to the Father, He said to his disciples, "Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you; not as the world giveth, give I unto you." Which plainly signifies that the world has a peace which differs from the peace that Christ gives to his disciples; and which He left with them for their enjoyment, and for the comfort of all his dedicated followers. But the peace which the world gives may so resemble the true "peace of God, which passeth all the understanding" of the natural man, as to require great care lest we substitute the peace which the friendship, and the fellowship, and the praise of men give us, for that Divine peace which flows from a spiritual acquaintance with God.

Where the peace of the world fills the heart, the peace of God cannot enter. But there is a woe on them that are at ease in Zion, and that cry peace, peace, where there is no peace. While a blessing is upon such as are reviled and persecuted, and all manner of evil said against them falsely for Christ's name's sake; for this tends to keep them humble; and it is the humble that the Lord teaches of his ways, and the meek that He guides in the true paths of peace. So "acquaint thyself with God and be at peace." But how are we to acquaint ourselves with God, only as we draw nigh to Him in the spirit of our minds, and in faith listen to his teachings as inwardly revealed? For He says, "I will instruct thee and teach thee in the way thou shalt go; I will guide thee with mine eye." And He said to Israel of old, "I am the Lord thy God which teacheth thee to profit, which leadeth thee by the way thou shouldst go. O that thou hadst hearkened to my commandments! Then had thy peace been as a river, and thy righteousness as the waves of the sea." But they became disobedient and rebellious, so that the same prophet said of them, "Woe to the rebellious children that take counsel, but not of Me; and that cover with a covering, but not of my spirit; that they may add sin to sin; that walk to go down into Egypt, and have not asked at my mouth; to strengthen themselves in the strength of Pharaoh, and to trust in the shadow of Egypt! Therefore shall the strength of Pharaoh be your shame, and the trust in the shadow of Egypt your confusion."

How is it with us now in this day, who profess to be the spiritual Israel of God? Are we not, too many of us, taking counsel but not of God? Are we not striving to cover our hypocrisy with a covering, but not of his Spirit? And thus adding sin to sin? Are we not turning our backs upon Zion, the city of our former solemnities, and walking to go down again into the Egyptian bondage and darkness which our forefathers were, with a Divine power, led out of? And is it not without asking at his mouth? And do we not strengthen ourselves in the strength of Pharaoh, and trust in the shadow of Egypt, in stead of abiding under the shadow of the Almighty, as in former years? Therefore has the strength of Pharaoh become our shame, and the trust in the shadow of Egypt our confusion. Has not the spirit of discord and confusion entered the hearts of many individuals, and also disturbed the harmony of families? And more to be deplored, as it is more openly visible, has it not entered many of our meetings for worship and discipline, and so filled them with disunity and strife, that the Son of Peace finds no room for a dwelling, nor even a quiet place whereon to lay his head?

But verily there is a reward for the righteous, and verily there is a peace which the world cannot give nor take away. "And the fruit of righteousness is sown in peace of them that make peace;" but not of them that disturb the peace of our assemblies without the qualifying power. And notwithstanding in this word the righteous shall have tribulation, yet their reward is glorious. For they are at times permitted to feel, even in the silent watches of the night, when no disturbing element intervenes, the peace of God to flow as a river, and their righteousness as the waves of the sea. But where the spirit of man bears rule, the peace of the world may flow, but the peace of God is not there. And here, my chief concern in writing this seems to be, that none of us may rest satisfied with the peace that the world gives, and thus fail to receive and enjoy that true peace which Christ has left for his humble, dedicated followers. And although He has ascended on high, and inhabiteth eternity, yet He condescends to dwell also "with him that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones." And how it does revive the drooping heart, when the peace of God flows in as a river, and swallows up, or drives away, all worldly cares! For then we can feel, "that the work of righteousness is peace, and the effects of righteousness, quietness and assurance forever." So it is no wonder that such are revived and enabled to thank God and take courage. "But there is no peace, saith the Lord, unto the wicked." So "let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts; and let him return unto the Lord, and He will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for He will abundantly pardon." But every weary Christian traveller knows, that in this world we have tribulation. But the comforting presence of Him who speaks peace on earth and goodwill to men, abundantly compensates for all. D. Dublin, Ind., Twelfth Mo. 22d, 1886.

Allusion has been made on a preceding page to Charles G. Finney's temporary connection with the order of Freemasons, yet in looking over his Autobiography (edited by his son) I was surprised not to find in it any reference to his Masonic experience, notwithstanding he had once been threatened with assassination as a penalty for his exposure of the secret institution. His book of 272 pages thereupon, is entitled "The Character, Claims and Practical Workings of Freemasonry."

In his introduction, Finney states that at the age of twenty-one years, when he was quite indifferent upon the subject of religion, an uncle of his persuaded him to unite with the Freemasons, representing to him that as he was away from home and among strangers, it would be to his advantage to unite with such an order, because he would then be sure to find friends wherever he went. He accordingly united with a lodge, and went through the first three degrees, or as far as what is styled by them the "the Sublime degree of Master Mason." This occurred while he was in the State of Connecticut. Returning to Adams, in his native State, New York, he affiliated with the Masonic lodge in that place, the Master of the lodge being a deist. "There were in that lodge," Finney remarks, "some as thoroughly irreligious men as I have ever associated with anywhere, and men with whom I never would have associated had they not been Freemasons."

Four years later, however, Finney experienced a thorough change of heart. Then the oaths with which he was familiar appeared to his spiritually-informed vision "monstrously profane and barbarous," so that, he says, "upon reflection and examination, and after a severe struggle and earnest prayer, I could not consistently remain with them." My new life instinctively and irresistibly recoiled from any fellowship with what I then regarded as 'the unfruitful works of darkness.'" Although he withdrew quietly from the lodge, yet afterward he felt it his further duty, as occasion arose, and as opportunities were afforded for examining the institution more thoroughly, to speak freely in regard to it, being convinced that it was highly dangerous to the State, and in every way injurious to the cause of Christ.

The first formal revelation of Masonry in this country, is stated to have been made by William Morgan, of Batavia, New York, (a seceder from the order) who, in the year 1826, published a pamphlet entitled "Illustrations in Masonry," in which the ceremonies of initiation and the obligations of the first three degrees were disclosed. For this publication, Morgan was abducted by Freemasons, confined in the magazine of the United States fort at Niagara, and from thence taken in a boat, and, as is alleged, drowned in the Niagara River. Miller, the publisher of Morgan's book, was also forcibly carried off, but the citizens of Batavia, being apprised of the violent procedure, pursued the kidnappers and finally rescued their prisoner.

As a result of Morgan's exposure, and the excitement upon the subject thence following, probably nine-tenths of the 50,000 Masons then in the United States, turned their backs upon the lodge to enter it no more. Although the number of adherents of the order at that time may not seem to have been dangerously great,* yet they even then were found to boast that the civil officers of the country were largely in their hands. Finney remarks, "I do not recollect a magistrate, or a constable, or a sheriff, in the county, [where I resided] that was not at that time a Freemason." The adverse combination was such in the locality where Morgan had been abducted, that the fact of the murder was never judicially proven so as to fasten it upon the alleged perpetrators,—courts, sheriffs, witnesses, jurors, seemed struck with an inability to do anything in the premises. Likewise, the newspapers fell into a similar conspiracy of silence, and refusing generally to publish the disclosures, it was found necessary to establish other newspapers for that purpose.

In 1828, an encampment of Knights Templars at Leroy, New York, after a protracted debate between the members, concluded to disclose all the secrets of the order, including twelve degrees of Masonry beyond the first three revealed by Morgan. Several months later, eighteen others were added, making thirty-three in all that were then revealed. A committee, of whom the late Thurlow Weed was one, reported the following year that in New York State 400 initiates had publicly denounced the institution, and that thousands had silently withdrawn."

A Baptist minister in good standing, Elder Bernard, who had been a distinguished Mason, published a work entitled "Light on Masonry," which did much to enlighten his brethren and the general public on the subject.

Meanwhile, Freemasonry became an issue in politics, the Anti-masonic movement culminating in a National Convention, held in Philadelphia in 1830. It was attended by 112 delegates, among whom were Amasa Walker, William H. Seward and Thaddeus Stevens. They issued an "Address to the People of the United States," which appears to have been attended with good results. Chief Justice Marshall writing to Edward Everett (1833) that he had not attended a lodge for thirty or forty years, goes on to say: "I thought it, however, a harmless play-thing, which would live its hour and pass away, until the murder or abduction of Morgan was brought before the public. That atrocious crime, and I had almost said, the still more atrocious suppression of the testimony concerning it, demonstrated the abuse of which the oaths prescribed by the order were susceptible, and convinced me that the institution ought to be abandoned as one capable of producing much evil, and incapable of producing any good which might not be effected by safe and open means."

WHILE WE MAY.

The hands are such dear hands;
They are so full; they turn at our demands
So often; they reach out,
With trifles scarcely thought about,
So many times; they do
So many things for me, for you—
If their fond wills mistake,
We may well bend, not break.

They are such fond, frail lips
That speak to us. Pray, if love strips
Them of discretion many times,
Or if they speak too slow, or quick, such crimes
We may pass by; for we may see Days not far off when those small words may be Held not as slow, or quick, or out of place, but dear,
Because the lips are no more here.

They are such dear familiar feet that go
Along the path with ours—feet fast or slow,
And trying to keep pace—if they mistake
Or tread upon some flower that we would take Upon our breast, or bruise some reed,
Or crush poor Hope until it bleed,
We may be mute,
Not turning quickly to impute
Grave fault; for they and we Have such a little way to go—can be Together such a little while along the way,
We will be patient while we may.

So many little faults we find.
We see them; for not blind
Is Love. We see them; but if you and I Perhaps remember them some by and by,
They will not be
Faults then—grave faults—to you and me,
But just old ways—mistakes, or even less—
Remembrances to bless.
Days change so many things—yes, hours,
We see so differently in suns and showers.
Mistaken words to-night
May be so cherished by to-morrow's light.
We may be patient; for we know
There's such a little way to go.

THE ELDER BROTHER.

Selected.

The sun was set. The twilight dim had gathered,
And, 'gainst the window-pane
The fierce north wind sent sudden, spiteful furies
Of mingled sleet and rain.

My easy-chair was drawn before the fire,
Benny was on my knee,
When low he whispered, "I don't see, Aunt Dolly,
When folks are small like me,

"How they get on without a nice big brother.
Why, even Tommy Stead—
Who bullies all my mates—don't dare to touch me;
He's afraid, you see, of Ned."

Just then he shyly pointed o'er his shoulder,
With such a proud, fond look,
At his tall brother Edward sitting near us,
Intent upon a book.

"He carries the umbrella when 'tis raining,
And gives the note to me;
And helps me find the very far off places
In the geography;

"And explains the sums, and makes the fractions easy."
Here Benny heaved a sigh,
"I don't like rithmetic; but Ned says, 'Benny,
Be brave, my lad, and try.'

"He has long patience, and he's very clever.
Why, once he made a cart,
And once he made a trap that caught a sparrow;
And 'cause it hurt my heart

"To see the wild thing flutter, he soon freed it,
And smiled when off it fled;
And when I'm scared because it's dark, or lightens,
He takes me in his bed."

The blue eyes closed. Perhaps the gentle sand-man
Had touched the golden head;
For low it drooped. But smiles still curved the sweet Lips;
He dreamed, perhaps, of "Ned."

For "The Friend."

Pastors.

A paid pastor as "the need of the Church," having been advocated by persons claiming to be Friends, the following thoughts are presented:

Among the spiritual gifts bestowed by the Head upon its members is the service of pastor or shepherd, (Eph. iv. 11.) The proper business of a shepherd is to watch over and guard the flock, and this duty rests in measure on all the members, according to their growth in spiritual knowledge; for the members of the one body are designed to be mutually helpful, one to the other.

The reception and exercise of spiritual gifts have been recognized by the Society of Friends from its rise. The ministry is an important service, to be performed in the ability which God giveth; yet, those entrusted with it are members of, and subject to the body. Another important service is that of the elders, their labors are more private than the ministers, but both, in the right exercise of their respective gifts, "feed the flock of God;" and in taking the oversight thereof, are not, as lords over God's heritage, but "ensamples to the flock." Friends also recognize the special office of overseer. Among the duties assigned to these, are the taking the first official action in the case of delinquents; which cannot be rightly performed unless the overseers are spiritually minded persons themselves. Under a sense of their own liability to err, they should try every means to bring about the reformation of offenders before said official action is taken.

There are different degrees of religious experience; yet as there is a faithfulness on the part of members to divine requiring many may be engaged in the exercise of spiritual gifts, who have not been officially recognized by the Church by special appointment. Faithfulness to the Head, by the members, individually and collectively, in comparatively smaller or larger matters, is the need of the Church. "We need not go from our principles to do good."

Some who claim the name of Friends appear to entertain the idea that a revival of primitive zeal, and success in the ingathering of souls, do not require primitive simplicity and self-denial. The necessity of entering in at the strait gate and walking in the narrow way which leadeth unto life, is not set forth by these as essential; and those who, by example and precept, have inculcated this doctrine of Christ have, in some instances been set at nought, as hinderers of the work of the Lord.

Some have manifested much interest in missionary work. Organizations have been formed for the special purpose. Some of the Yearly Meetings are making a combined effort in said direction with special provision for the purpose. The Women's Foreign Missionary Association of Friends, Philadelphia, appears to be an outside arrangement, which presents the idea that there is not within the regular organization of Friends' meetings sufficient provision for every right religious labor.

The Society of Friends has ever been a missionary people. Its members, particularly in its earlier days, have largely engaged in labors for the extension of the Redeemer's kingdom in the earth. Its mission has been to bring people to Christ; to bring them off from a dependence on the teachings of men to Christ Jesus their free teacher. The service was performed in entire harmony with their testimony against a hireling ministry. There is no question but the world and the things of the world have hurt the spiritual life, and benumbed the spiritual energies of many of its members; yet all through the years there were faithful servants and hand-maidens who did good service in their day and generation. Thomas Shillitoe, Stephen Grellett, Daniel Wheeler and others, performed missionary service without a compromise of principle.

It is now apparent that there are persons in membership with Friends, who are endeavoring to remove the Society from its original basis by the establishment of a system of clergy and laity; which system does away, to a large extent, with the mutual help and privileges of the members of the body of Christ. If a hired pastor successfully performs the functions of his office, he must necessarily be a sort of confessor for the people. And if he is called and supported by meetings as a minister, he prepares his sermons or so arranges them that at the time appointed for divine worship he gives utterance to the thoughts already prepared, and the thoughts of the hearers following his speech, they may conclude that they have been performing the worship of God. Such service comes far short of the solemn silence of all flesh in the blessed fellowship with the Father and his Son Jesus Christ. But when the minister speaks as the oracle of God, and reaches the Divine witness in the hearts of the people, the latter will have something to digest and profit by.

The departures so prevalent at the present time are evidently the result of doctrines at variance with Friends' principles. All efforts to lop off the branches will avail nothing in the way of reformation. Nothing short of a faithful return to first principles will heal the breaches and restore the paths to walk in. It is a blessed thing to receive the truth in the love of it, and live and abide in it to the end. ADAM SPENCER.

Ceremonies in Covenant-making.

In ancient times there were different ways of ratifying an alliance, but significant ceremonies always accompanied the act. Presents were given and received, or food was shared. The firmest agreement of all was the blood covenant. It consisted in the persons sealing the alliance by piercing some part of the body and drinking each other's blood. Not less binding was the eating of salt together, a custom still preserved among the Bedwy Arabs. Salt, consecrating the table of the common people as well as that of princes, is, in Homer called "the divine;" and Eustathius says, in his commentary on the Iliad: "Salt is the symbol of friendship, because duration and continuance lie in the idea of friendship, and salt insures these very qualities." And the Arab has the same conception of salty substances, for when he proves faithless to any one with whom he has shared his bread, he excuses his behaviour by saying, "There was no salt in the bread." The custom of ratifying an alliance by the sacrificing of animals is found among all the ancient nations. The ceremony was common among the Israelites, as is shown by the covenant made between God and Abram. The rite observed by the Old Babylonians, Hebrews, Macedonians, and other nations, was as follows:

One or more beasts were killed, and cut into two equal parts. These parts were then placed opposite to each other, and the parties to the covenant walked between the pieces. The meaning of this ceremony was, that, as the halves of the beasts belonged to each other, so the two persons who made the alliance must be regarded as one ever after; and as the beasts were cut into halves, so he who breaks the alliance shall likewise be cut into pieces. In the case of Abram it is God alone who binds man by commandment and himself by promise, and therefore God alone who, in the appearance of a flaming torch, passes between the pieces of the animals killed by Abram. Although the patriarch killed a heifer, ram and she-goat, other nations were accustomed to use other animals. Plutarch says that the Bœotians divided a dog into two pieces when performing the ceremonies referred to.—Prof. Hilprecht in S. S. Times.

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 119.

ON RELIGIOUS CONVERSATION.

David Ferris, in his Journal, makes the following remark, which may be a profitable caution to some: "In one respect I was apt to err, until experience taught me better. This was talking too much about religion in my own will and time. At length I found it tended to poverty; and I learned, when in company, not to be forward to enter into any discourse concerning religion or any other subject; but to be content to keep silence and be esteemed a fool; until Truth arose, a subject presented, and liberty was given for conversation. Then I found a qualification to speak to the edification of others, and my own peace and satisfaction. I mention this for the benefit of others; being convinced that many who have had experience of the Truth, and have in some degree witnessed a change of heart, have talked so much on religious subjects, that their souls have become barren; so as scarcely to know when good cometh."

While there is need of care in this respect, there is also a danger to some, especially to those of a diffident disposition, and those who are not so thoroughly humbled under the Divine Power as to be willing to appear as fools for Christ's sake,—that they may withhold a testimony for their Master, when it is really called for. In the Youth's Companion, an instance is recorded, where a manifest blessing rested upon the faithful discharge of such a duty. After speaking of the wisdom needed in speaking to another person upon his religious welfare, and that personal allusions of the kind should be made modestly and quietly, the narrative says:—

"Two New York merchants lived near neighbors in the environs of the city, and rode to and from their business in the morning and evening trains. They saw each other every day, but were not intimate friends, and were very seldom together. One was a religious man, and the other was not.

One day it happened that they occupied the same seat in the car. They fell into talk on business matters, discussed the general condition and prospects of trade, and then spoke of their personal successes.

"It has been a lucky year for me," said the elder of the two. "I suppose I could retire with a hundred thousand dollars. That certainly is a competence, and I don't know as I care for any more."

"Yes, that is enough," replied the younger. "You are provided for."

"I suppose I am."

"For this life. Excuse me, may I ask how about the next—the life beyond?"

"Oh, I don't worry myself about that!"

"But wouldn't it be wise now to give serious thought to what comes after death?"

"I can see no use in it. These matters are beyond our control. I've no fears but it will all come out right."

"But isn't that a rather uncertain trust? I would not risk it without inquiry and study. Here, if anywhere, we want things plain, and the words of Christ have made them so."

The merchants parted, to all appearances as totally different men as when they met; the one with a Divine love in his heart; the other taken up with the present life, and with no thoughts for the life of eternal future.

No opportunity occurred to renew their conversation. Months passed—and not many—before the elder was taken ill. His neighbor missed him from the daily trains. He inquired after him, but learned of no alarming disease or danger.

At length, one day while he was in the city, a telegram, sent at the sick man's request, was handed to him in his office, "A. is dying, and wishes to see you." The merchant hurried away, and at the earliest possible moment stood by his neighbor's bedside.

"I could not die," the sick man whispered, "till I had seen you and thanked you. What you said that morning on the cars came up to me since I have been confined at home. I've looked into it, thought over it and prayed over it. I'm going now, but going in peace. Christ is my Saviour. My trust and hope are in Him."

The power for good of a "word fitly spoken," when impressed on the heart by the Spirit of Christ, is shown by the following incident:—

"Many years ago, a child was leaving the junior department of a city school for a new home in the country. As he left, his old teacher put her hand upon his head, and in a single, simple sentence commended him to God and to good. Years passed, and the child grew up, and read books, English, French, German, Greek, on ethics and listened to lectures on the same subject, by famous professors in a venerable university. But no word which he read in the pages of ancient philosophers, or listened to from the lips of living teachers, ever proved to him a beacon-light like the simple words of his old school-mistress. In the time of temptation, the learned discussions of the philosophers were forgotten, or were remembered only to cause bewilderment as to the basis of right and duty; but the lesson of childhood shone then the most clearly in the secret chamber of the soul, and neither time nor doubt had power to dim its radiance. Perhaps neither mother nor teacher can lead the child into the knowledge of the world's deeper wisdom; but a few simple, earnest words, for God and good, from either, may do far more,—they may enter into the very being of the child, to be a strength in weakness, a refuge in temptation, and a cherished memory in the long, hard conflict of earthly life. This is not the wisdom which is taught by the speculative thinkers; but it is the best and most enduring wisdom, nevertheless."

That eminent minister, Richard Jordan, who died in 1826, is said to have been one who was "apt to teach" in social conversation. He remarked of himself, that he sometimes felt himself as much under the Divine anointing when engaged in serious conversation, or relating religious anecdotes, as when pleading the cause of his Saviour in the public assemblies of his people. On one such occasion, when visiting at the house of a friend in New Jersey, during the evening, he addressed each of the four sons in the family where he was staying, in a conversational way. One he cautioned against the use of tobacco; another against excess in eating; another he warned against too much laughter; and the fourth against talking too much.

What effect attended these admonitions we are not informed; but they were probably all judicious, and no one of that four addressed could evade the application to himself of the advice, on the plea that it was intended for others.

Recent Work of the Tract Association.

The work of preparing new electrotype plates for the older Tracts, is still in progress. A new set has been completed for "Straightforwardness Essential to the Christian." The title does not mean that to the Christian only, straightforwardness is essential; but that without it, a profession of Christianity can avail no more than the sounding brass or the tinkling cymbal. This remarkable exposition of the scrupulous delicacy of the balances of the sanctuary, is not so well known as it should be. Although best suited to cultured minds, the language is not above the comprehension of persons of ordinary education. Heretofore its usefulness has been lessened by the small size of the letters, and also by the wear to which they have been subjected during the forty-five years that have passed since the plates were cast. The matter that had covered twelve pages in the old, has been expanded in the new to twenty pages.

Equally instructive with the foregoing, is the essay by the same writer—Mary Ann Kelty—entitled, "Individual Influence," which has also been extended from twelve to twenty pages.

The Tract on Profane Swearing, has been somewhat shortened and put into larger sized type. It is a moral disquisition, adapted to logical minds, but not so well calculated to interest uneducated people and boys. To supply the latter class of readers, a new Tract of four pages has been written, entitled, "Vulgar and Profane Language." Simple words are used, and an incident is introduced to encourage the users of such language, to seek to the Source of all spiritual strength for ability to enable them to be delivered from this sinful habit.

Our Tract No. 9, on Detraction, had long been felt to have but little in it to interest the ordinary reader. The sentences are ponderous, and the subject is treated argumentatively. This tract has been canceled, and a new one with the same title and the same number of pages, that is eight, has been substituted. The subject is considered didactically, under separate sub-heads. These include the origin, progress and effects of detraction; how to treat those who asperse ourselves or others; how to act when we are defamed, &c.; and most important of all, the remedy for detraction. Several anecdotes and incidents are interspersed, calculated to make it more attractive to readers.

This is a subject of much importance to us all. Thomas Story remarks in his Journal in reference to detraction from the reputation of other people: "I do verily think this secret evil hath done more hurt to Christian Society in general, and to us as a people in a more particular manner, than all the open and flagrant sins which any among us have fallen into unto this day. For open evil is seen of all—but secret evils reign and rage in the dark as with toleration and authority; and yet to be called a false accuser or a calumniator, is highly offensive to mankind, even to be supposed to be guilty of it." Another Friend writes: "There are many shades of turpitude in this prevailing evil, * * * and, startling as the sentiment may appear, observation induces me to believe that few very few, even among professed Christians, have wholly washed their hands from this defilement."

The Tract entitled "Origin and Object of Civil Government," not being entirely satisfactory, has been supplanted by another and shorter essay, bearing the same title. The latter explains the position which Friends and other Christian professors hold on this subject, consistently with the precepts of the New Testament.

A new edition of "Divine Preservation at Sea," has been put into eight pages of larger sized type. The narratives are placed under appropriate headings, which give the tract a neater and more attractive dress.

"Reasons why Women should be permitted to exercise the gifts of the Holy Spirit, particularly with reference to the ministry of the Gospel," has been carefully revised, under the more concise, comprehensive and aggressive title, "Womens' Preaching as well as Mens', a gift of the Holy Spirit." As far as we know, all the principal arguments against women being allowed to preach the Gospel, derived from the New Testament, are fully met and plainly set forth. In this respect the revised is a decided improvement on the original essay.

Three new Tracts have been added. A leaflet entitled "What Then?" is well suited for circulation among those whose ambition limits their best efforts to the attainment of earthly treasures and emoluments. Some inquiries having been made for publications giving the views of Friends on "the Communion," an eight page tract has been prepared with that title. It contains a careful examination of the texts in the New Testament, that the advocates of an outward ordinance claim establish it a perpetual obligation for Christians to observe. Other passages of Scripture are quoted to show that the true communion of Christians with Him who is the bread of life, is inward and spiritual. This communion has been the privilege of the righteous, in all ages and generations of the world—before, as well as since the coming of our Holy Redeemer. For the Israelites of old drank of that rock which followed them, and that rock was Christ. It is to be hoped that this Tract will have a service among some who profess to be Friends, but who advocate the use of outward bread and wine. The third new Tract is entitled, "Remarkable Conversion of Jacob Parsons." It covers eight pages of large type.

Lastly we have bound the miscellaneous reading matter of the "Moral Almanac," from 1868 to 1887, inclusive, with a suitable title page, making a book of 324 pages. There was material for 100 copies only, for which 25 cents each will be charged. An opportunity is thus afforded for securing this valuable collection of moral and religious anecdotes and extracts, at a nominal cost. A like opportunity is not likely to occur again. E. M.

A Curious Mental Phenomenon.—In some remarks on the late Judge Woodruff, of New Jersey, Judge Dixon said:—

"Whatever might have been Judge Woodruff's first impression when he was practicing at the Bar with regard to the case that came into his hands, whatever might be his abstract notion of the laws, he never failed to bring his mind to an abiding conviction that the cause he was employed to advocate was the cause of justice." He then illustrated what he meant as follows:

"I remember a very remarkable exemplification of this trait of his character. A case was committed to his keeping, and as soon as it was disclosed to him he applied the correct rule of the law and decided against his client. But he pursued his investigation to see whether his first impression was sound. My association with him in the case led to frequent conferences. The next time I saw him I found that doubt had been engendered in his mind whether his first impression was right, but still these doubts seemed to him so tenuous that he did not think any other mind could be brought to entertain them. At the next conference his doubts had grown into a belief that his first opinion was wrong and a hope that he might persuade other minds to view the case as he then did. At the next conference his belief had become a conviction, and he had become satisfied that other minds could be brought to the same view, and at last his conviction was so strongly grounded that it seemed to him that the view he had at first entertained was preposterous, and that no reasonable man, on full explanation of the case, could entertain any other opinion than that to which he had at last come. This illustrates one of his distinctive traits. He always became at last sure that his client's cause was right."

In commenting on this subject, and pointing out the danger of tampering with clear convictions of right or duty, the Christian Advocate says:—

"Not a few instances have occurred in which men have come to do acts, under the conviction that they were right and could be made to appear right to others, which every unsophisticated man would denounce, and which they themselves in the beginning believed to be wrong.

"Much of the infidelity that exists originates in this way. Whether the tale be true or not, that David Hume accepted a position on the negative in debate upon the truth of Christianity, and afterward became an unbeliever as a result of his zealous and indefatigable preparation to speak against Christianity, it is certain that the story is in harmony with human nature."

Natural History, Science, &c.

Poisonous Gases.—Several persons died and others were in imminent danger a short time since, at Troy, N. Y., from inhaling a gas made for use as a fuel, and which escaped into the air from some defect in the pipe that passed by the homes of the victims. The fuel gas is a mixture of 56 parts of Hydrogen gas and 44 parts of Carbonic oxide: and both are almost without smell, the danger is the greater, since the air may gradually become contaminated with it without the odor exciting attention. The Carbonic oxide is a deadly poison, and a comparatively small admixture of it in the air of a room is sufficient to produce fatal consequences.

Buffalo-raising.—Several of the Western ranchmen have entered into the business of raising buffaloes. The high price of buffalo robes and the quality of the meat may make this a profitable enterprise.

Cocoa-nuts in Florida.—A large tract of land, said to contain 10,000 acres has been purchased on the Atlantic coast of Florida, in Dade County, for the cultivation of the Cocoa-nut, and extensive plantations of the trees have been made. They seem to be doing well, and there is reason to hope that the enterprise will be successful.

Liquorice.—The liquorice of commerce is the extract obtained from the root of a plant, whose botanical name is Glycyrrhiza glabra—a word derived from two Greek words, signifying "sweet" and "root."

It may be considered as a species of sugar, which does not crystallize, and cannot be made to undergo vinous fermentation like true sugar.

The plant is grown in many countries, especially in those bordering the Mediterranean. The chief source of supply has been the northern part of Spain. It is grown also in some of the counties of England; and of latter times its cultivation has increased in the United States. At a fair held in San Francisco last year, specimens of the root from Sacramento County, attracted considerable attention.

The United States has a native species of Glycyrrhiza, which is found in the Missouri Valley, and has been naturalized on the lake shore near Buffalo, N. Y. But so far as we know, this has never been cultivated.

Purity of Air in the Ocean.—In the course of an address on the action of micro-organisms on surgical wounds, Prof. F. S. Dennis, of New York, states that during his last trip across the Atlantic he made some experiments to test the purity of the air about 1,000 miles from land.

He employed capsules of sterilized gelatine, and exposed them for fifteen minutes. One capsule was exposed in the stateroom upon the main deck of the steamer. Within 18 hours over 500 points of infection had developed. Two capsules exposed in a similar manner in a cabin on the promenade deck, where the circulation of air was free, showed five or six points of infection each ten days afterward. A capsule exposed over the bow of the ship was found to be entirely uncontaminated. These experiments are on the same lines as those of Pasteur and Tyndall upon the mountain air of Switzerland, and so far as they go, they show the germless condition of mid-ocean air, and also the need for much more efficient ventilation in the state rooms of even the first-class American liners.—The American.

Owls Training their Young.—C. C. Abbott, in his Rambles about Home mentions a family of short-eared owls which had made their abode in a hollow maple. One pleasant moonlight evening in the Tenth Month, he took a position from which he could watch their movements. The old birds first appeared, flew directly to the meadow and disappeared in the long grass. The four young birds crept cautiously along a limb of the tree and then settled themselves in a muffled-up manner. When the parent owls returned, each had what appeared to be a mouse in its beak. "When they alighted on the maple," he says, "I could detect, in the uncertain light, that they did not approach closely to the young birds, but having removed the mice, which they now held in their claws, they chattered and screamed to their young in a manner that could only be interpreted as 'Come over here and get your mouse.'" It was evident that the young owls were to be taught to help themselves, and to practice their power of flight. Finally, one young owl, more venturesome than his fellows, essayed to fly, but instead of reaching the desired branch, it fell short a foot or more, and tumbled to the ground.

"Leaving the tree the old birds flew down to the hapless fellow, and muttered in low tones to it. After the lapse of a minute or more, the old birds together took a short, low flight, and then returned to the young owl. Was it not to show it how easy flight was? Then again they flew away in the same manner, and the young owl endeavored to follow. It was with evident difficulty that it left the ground, but when once its feet were clear of the grass, it progressed satisfactorily, though only for a short distance. This pleased the old birds, for one of them came to the little fellow, and with one wing extended, patted the young bird on the head and back most tenderly. At this I laughed aloud, most unfortunately, and immediately the old birds flew to the nesting tree, and then discovered my hiding place. Of all the scoldings I ever got, that from the owls this evening was the severest. Keeping just out of reach of my cane, they swooped about my head, and snapped their bills viciously. They did not dare to strike me, but they came unpleasantly near, and it was with a feeling of comfort that I finally reached safer quarters."

Items.

—Methodist Membership.—The number of members of the Methodist Episcopal Church (including those on probation) is nearly two millions; there being an increase during the year 1886 of more than 100,000.

—Freedom in Cuba.—The colored people of Cuba recently kept a day of rejoicing in honor of the action of the Spanish Government which proclaimed the freedom of the slaves, and the removal of the guardianship system—the last remnant of slavery—which had continued for a time the control of their former masters. This emancipation is said to have been favored by the Liberal party and by most of the native Cubans. The Liberals favor the granting of political power to the Negroes, and in return hope for assistance from them in the work of reform.

—War.—The Christian Statesman calls attention to the lamentable fact, that in respect to the warlike spirit, the so-called Christian nations are more guilty than some of the heathen nations. "China and Japan are more peaceable than England or Germany or France. It is in Christendom that the art of killing men has been carried to its greatest perfection. The menace to the world's peace to-day comes wholly from those who bow at the altars of the Prince of Peace. The armaments of the so-called Christian nations were never so enormous or so deadly, or the number of their trained soldiers so great, as to-day."

—Use of Drugs.—The Christian Advocate says: "Few diseases are worse than the consequence of the habitual use of any medicine; and no physical or mental effects harder to endure than the effects of opium, chloral, cocaine, and alcohol."

Similar in its teaching is the following item from the Scientific American. "The Manufacturer's Gazette, we believe, speaks candidly when it says that the increasing use of opiates and other drugs intended to either allay or excite nervous activity, is an evil in this country equal to, if not worse than, the excessive use of intoxicating liquors. Comparatively little is said of it in public journals, and there is no such crusade against it as there is against intemperance. The insidiousness of the drug habit makes it the more dangerous. The great majority of those who begin the use of opium, morphine and chloral, do it under prescription of physicians, and often without being allowed to know what they are taking until the habit is thoroughly fastened upon them. Such trifling with life and health by physicians should be made a criminal offense, and its victim or his friends should prosecute for malpractice to the full extent of the law. It is a safe rule to take no medicines from any except those known to be trustworthy; and no physician is trustworthy who refuses to inform patients of possible danger from the drugs he may prescribe. So many have been wrecked in this way that the old secrecy about the composition of medicines is out of place, at least to the extent of informing patients that they are taking nothing liable to bind them in the hopeless slavery of some drug habit."

—Divorce Legislation.—In Vermont a law was passed, in 1884, requiring libels for divorce to be filed at the term of court preceding that in which they are heard. This insures a delay of six months before they can come to trial. The result in Vermont is, that, whereas there were 202 divorces in 1884, the number fell to 94 in 1885. The provision named is most wise, preventing hasty action, and giving the aggrieved parties abundant time in which to deliberate, and often to become reconciled. Hundreds of divorces might be prevented each year did such legislation prevail all over the land. Hasty divorces are the bitter fruit of recklessness in entering into unsuitable matrimonial engagements. Did young people reflect more seriously beforehand, they would often save much bitter reflection later on.—Congregationalist.

—Ecclesiastical Union.—The Independent states that last fall the Free Baptists Central Association and the New York State Christian Association adopted identical resolutions, which affirmed that, "being well acquainted with each other's doctrine, methods of work, and Christian spirit," they "feel that they may be, and ought to be one people."

Recently representatives of these two associations met in Buffalo to perfect organic union; the two legal associations were consolidated and a common constitution adopted. The territory embraced was enlarged by adding New Jersey and Ontario to the previously included States of New York and Pennsylvania. It is expected that the Meetings and Conferences of this territory will all send delegates to the next Association as one people, and that their example will be followed ultimately by other bodies of Free Baptists and "Christians" in other States.

—Defensive Armors.—Bishop William Taylor has planned a device for his new Congo steamer which will do away with the necessity of fire-arms. In case of attack he can put the natives to flight by a hose attached to a powerful steam-pump. "Neither dogs nor men," he remarks, "can stand before such a shot of water."

Our Holy Redeemer vanquished cruelty by suffering.

THE FRIEND.

THIRD MONTH 5, 1887.

We have received a letter from an aged friend, a member of Iowa Yearly Meeting (the Larger Body) which speaks of the action of his Yearly Meeting in encouraging meetings to supply themselves with "pastors," as "the opening wedge to a paid ministry, or a regularly established Pastorate, with a pastor employed at a stated salary to preach at stated times, and otherwise to conduct the meeting." Our correspondent says they are beginning to feel the effect of this advice; and he describes a meeting he had lately attended, professedly of Friends, in which the time was nearly all occupied by "singing (proposed by the minister); then reading; then immediately prayer; singing, prayer, preaching, singing, prayer, speaking, or as it is termed, testifying, singing, &c. Then the minister or Pastor, as he is called, told what he proposed for next First-day; and requested the meeting to rise and be dismissed."

The most cheering thing in the letter is the following paragraph: "I believe there are many scattered up and down in the land, who mourn over the innovations now being introduced into our once favored Society,—who have not bowed the knee to Baal nor kissed his image. O may the Lord strengthen and enable them to hold out faithful to the end!"

The presence of such faithful ones has a restraining and preservative effect, even in those meetings where their influence is largely overborne by the number and activity of those who have adopted methods of Church work inconsistent with the principles of Friends. But how sad is it to reflect that many of the younger members in such meetings are growing up under teachings and practices which tend to keep them in ignorance of the spiritual doctrines of our Society; so that if ever they come to be true Friends it will be by a conviction similar to that which would bring into the fold one from another society.

The same mail that brought the letter above referred to brought also one from a minister in another denomination, whose mind has been led step by step nearer to the doctrines held by us, so that he is able to say, "I am in heart and mind a Friend." He mentions that a few days before he wrote, "I went to visit a Society of Friends [in Western New York] but found them Friends in name. The meetings were held as other worldly churches do—a pulpit and large pictures for Sabbath School teaching, the same in dress and language like the world. A few years have brought a change, but I fail to see the change for the better, and believe it is not primitive, or modern Quakerism improved."

Does not such a statement instructively show, that those who have been led by the Spirit of Christ to see the beauty and excellency of true spiritual religion, will not be attracted by the "half Jew and half Ashdod" imitations of a modified Quakerism?

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—In the U. S. Senate on the 22nd ultimo, a letter was presented from Senator Sherman, resigning the office of President pro tempore, the resignation to take effect at one o'clock on the 26th. He says the resignation "will promote the convenience of the Senate and the public service to elect a Senator as President pro tempore whose term extends beyond that date, so that he may administer the oath of office to Senators elect and aid in the organization."

The Director of the Mint reports that the production of gold in the United States during the year 1886 exceeded that of any previous year since 1850, and almost equalled the production of that year. It amounted to $35,000,000 in 1886, against $31,800,000 in 1885, an increase of over $3,000,000. The production of silver, as nearly as can be ascertained, was $49,895,930.

A telegram from St. Louis says that a company of American capitalists, including Rufus Hatch, have purchased from the heirs of a Dr. Beales, an immense tract of land covering 50,000,000 acres, in Northwestern Texas, Northeastern New Mexico and Southwestern Colorado, which was originally granted to Beales by the Mexican Government. The right of the grant was protected by the Guadalupe-Hidalgo treaty. The despatch says: "Those interested in the purchase will not, at present, make public the exact boundaries."

The Senate of Texas has passed a prohibitory amendment to the State Constitution, for submission to the popular vote at a special election in Eighth Month next. The vote stood 21 to 8.

Strong efforts are being made in New York City to influence the Legislature of the State to secure, at this session, the passage of an amended Excise bill now pending there. The New York correspondent of the Philadelphia Ledger, says: "The out-and-out Prohibitionists are standing aloof from this movement, believing that it is not the sort of radical reform that the times demand. What they want is not high license, but no license at all—in other words, absolute suppression of the saloons, and total abstinence instead of moderate drinking. They have no lack of enthusiasm and, like the original anti-slavery orators, are possessed of a conviction that, how much soever they may be resisted at present, they are eventually bound to win."

The deaths in this city last week numbered 454, the same as during the previous week, and 54 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing 250 were males and 204 females: 251 were adults and 203 minors: 69 died of consumption; 45 of pneumonia; 24 of heart diseases; 23 of convulsions; 22 of bronchitis; 19 of old age; 15 of marasmus; 15 of typhoid fever; 14 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 13 of cramp, and 12 of apoplexy.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½s, registered, 109½; coupon, 110½; 4s, 128½; 3s, 101; currency 6s, 126½ a 137.

Cotton was only in moderate request by the spinners, at 9½ cts. per lb.

Petroleum was quiet but steady at 6½ cts. for 70 Abel test in barrels, and 8½ cts. for 110 test in cases.

Feed.—Choice bran was wanted, but finer ruled dull. Sales of western winter at $17.75 a $19 per ton, as to quality.

Flour and Meal.—The movement in flour continued slow, and prices favored buyers. Sales of 125 barrels Pennsylvania family, at $3.80; 125 barrels Ohio, clear, $4; 250 barrels do, straight, at $4.40; 125 barrels Indiana, straight, at $4.25; 375 barrels winter patent, at $4.70 a $4.85; and 625 barrels Minnesota, patent, at $4.85 a $5. Rye flour was steady, at $3 per barrel for choice.

Grain.—Wheat was quiet, No. 2 red closing at 89½ cts. bid and 89½ cts. asked. Rye was quiet at 53½ cts. per bushel for No. 2 Pennsylvania. Corn was dull with No. 2 mixed closing at 46½ cts. bid, and 46½ cts. asked. Oats were quiet: No. 2 white closed at 36½ cts. bid and 37 cts. asked.

Beef cattle were ½ a ¼c. lower, at 3¼ a 5½ cts.

Sheep were fairly active at 4 a 6 cts. Lambs at 4½ a 7 cts.

Hogs were inactive and ¼c. higher. Western, at 8 a 8½ cts.; State, at 7 a 7½ cts.

Milch calves were active at 5 a 8½ cts. Fat cows were fairly active at 2½ a 4 cts.

Milch cows were dull, at $25 a $55.

The receipts were: 2400 bees, 10,000 sheep, 6000 hogs.

FOREIGN.—On Second Month 28th, W. H. Smith, the leader of the Government in the House of Commons, stated that the 21st day of Sixth Month had been decided upon as the date for the national celebration of the Queen's Jubilee. The day would be declared a holiday, and the Queen would attend a State service to be held in Westminster Abbey.

Sir James Ferguson, Parliamentary Secretary of the Foreign Office, stated that diplomatic relations between Great Britain and Venezuela had been suspended owing to a dispute with Venezuela respecting the frontier line between that country and British Guiana.

The jury in the cases of John Dillon and the other Irishmen charged with conspiracy, were unable to agree on a verdict. Another trial is set down for Fourth Month.

Of the elections in Germany the results in 334 districts are now known. The candidates elected comprise 13 New German Liberals, including two who favor the Septennate, 73 Conservatives, 30 Imperialists, 89 National Liberals, 90 Centreists, including three who support the Army bill, 15 Poles, 15 Alsatiens, 2 Guelphs, 1 Dane and 6 Socialists. Re-elections will be necessary in 60 districts.

In one quarter Bismarck suffered a serious repulse, viz., Alsace-Lorraine, where all the candidates who were openly advocating the restoration of Alsace-Lorraine to France were elected by overwhelming majorities, the aggregate vote in their favor being about 45,000 against less than 20,000 for the more moderate candidates.

The Berlin Tageblatt says that owing to the war scare the emigration to America has greatly increased, the emigrants coming chiefly from Hesse, Wurttemberg and Baden.

The Berlin National Gazette says that the alliance between Italy, Germany and Austria, for reciprocal defence and guarantee of the present possessions of the parties to the arrangement, is assured of completion, although the Italian ministerial crisis may delay its formal conclusion.

A very destructive earthquake occurred on Second Month 23d, in Southern France and Northern Italy. The destruction of life and property was greatest between Nice and Genoa. The whole of the Italian Riviera was devastated.

At the village of Bajardo, situated at the top of a hill, a number of the inhabitants took refuge in a church building when the shocks were first felt. A subsequent and greater shock demolished the building and three hundred of the people who were in it were killed.

At a house near Diano Marina a ball was proceeding when the shocks came. The building was completely wrecked and a terrible loss of life resulted. The dancers lay dead in heaps upon the ground. Many of the houses destroyed had large tanks underneath, which were filled with new olive oil, intended for exportation to France and Germany.

Despatches from Rome give the following official list of killed and wounded: Bajardo, 300 killed and wounded; Diano Marina, 250 killed and injured; Brassano, 50 killed and 36 injured; Diano Castello, 30 killed; Castello, 30 killed and many injured. It is estimated that in the Province of Porto Maurizio 570 were killed and 156 injured. In the Province of Genoa 64 were killed and 37 injured. Bajardo and Diano Marina were the only places destroyed.

Lockroy, the French Minister of Public Works, says that the sewers in the shaken districts are so damaged that the soil will become infiltrated with sewage, and be a source of contagion as soon as hot weather comes. The Government will send engineers and specialists to do everything possible to avert such a disaster.

It is semi-officially stated in St. Petersburg, that there is great tension in the relations between the Russian and Chinese authorities in the Kuldja district. Russian officials think, it is affirmed, that serious measures will be necessary to resettle the frontier between Russia and China in that portion of the empire.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE.

Near Frankford, (Twenty-third Ward,) Philadelphia. Physician and Superintendent—JOHN C. HALL, M. D. Applications for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board of Managers.

DIED, First Mo. 17th, 1887, RACHEL, wife of Joseph P. Lupton, in the 62d year of her age, a member and elder of Concord Particular and Short Creek Monthly Meeting, Ohio. This dear Friend was firmly attached to the doctrines and testimonies of our religious Society, and diligent in the attendance of all our meetings. Her last illness, of nearly two months, she bore with Christian patience and resignation, imparting suitable counsel to her family and other relatives. At one time she said, "through the boundless mercy of my Heavenly Father I believe I shall be accepted." Nearly her last words were "all is well." Leaving her friends a well-grounded hope of her entrance into everlasting rest.

—, at Camden, on the 14th of First Mo. 1887, PHEBE EMLEN, wife of Wm. B. Cooper, aged about 67 years, a valued member of Newton Preparative and Haddonfield Monthly Meeting of Friends, New Jersey. The unexpected removal of this dear Friend after a short illness, was a great shock and surprise to a large circle of friends, both within and outside of the pale of our Society, to whom she had greatly endeared herself. Nurtured by her pious parents, the late James and Sarah Emlen, in the fear and in the admonition of the Lord, the blessing of preservation and support through many painful vicissitudes was her continued experience. It was evident to those who knew her best, that while largely blessed in her latter years with earthly comforts, her chief treasure was "in the Heavens" and her friends are enabled to believe that, through the mercy of God in Christ Jesus, her redeemed spirit has been received into one of those mansions which He has prepared for those who love Him—a sight of the glory of which she was graciously permitted in a very remarkable manner to behold a little before the final close.

—, on the 25th of First Mo. 1887, at the residence of his sister-in-law, Hannah Hall, after a lingering confinement of more than eight years, JOSEPH HALL, in the 87th year of his age, a member of Short Creek Monthly and Harrisville Particular Meeting of Friends, Ohio. Although a shadow had for a length of time dimmed his intellect, an evidence seemed mercifully granted to some who witnessed the close of his lengthened life, and attended the funeral, that he had been gathered as a "shock of corn fully ripe."

—, at Germantown, on the 28th of First Mo. 1887, in the 60th year of her age, SUSAN D. EMLEN, the youngest daughter of the late James and Sarah Emlen. She was an esteemed member of Germantown Preparative and Frankford Monthly Meeting of Friends, Pa. This beloved Friend was trained for her Heavenly inheritance, through a long course of bodily affliction, and it is believed that she could at times adopt the language of the Apostle, "For our light affliction which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory."

Eighth Mo. 25th, 1850. First-day.—Much serious reflection has been mine, since the above entry. Closely was I led on retiring to rest to scrutinize, how it was with me, and whether any progress is making heavenward! Many good desires and resolutions have been mine; but what will I do these avail, if there is not an earnest pressing for holiness, heaven, and heavenly things? Under a sense of all this, heart-felt desires have been raised that He, who alone has power to make alive, would be pleased in mercy to visit my poor soul; would bring under and keep under exercise, if it be all the days of my appointed time; that so, I may know the great work of my soul's salvation going forward while the day asteth; and that the night may not find me unprepared.

Ninth Mo. 15th. The covering of my spirit or days has been that of quietness; accompanied with sincere, and may I not say, fervent desires that the day's work may be keeping pace with the day. Our meeting this morning was a very full and a very solemn one to me, being made to feel the truth of: "Wherewith shall I come before the Lord?" or bow myself before the most high God? I was made sensibly to feel my impotency, and the majesty of Him, whose subjects we are! and that He should condescend to our low estate, "Visit us every morning, and try us every moment." O Lord, revive thy work in the midst of the years, in the midst of the years make known, &c.

27th. Both last night and the night before, had a heavy gust, accompanied with much thunder and lightning. That last night was not very distant, and during it there was the appearance of a great fire—something no doubt struck with lightning.

"God moves in a mysterious way,
His wonders to perform;
He plants his footsteps in the sea,
And rides upon the storm."

These lines, on first awaking yesterday morning, arose so forcibly, accompanied with such a sense of his mercies which are "new every morning," that I felt I dare do no other than pen them. Am afresh made sensibly to feel the favor of my life being yet spared. O! may I be enabled to walk more and more acceptably, the few days allowed.

Eleventh Mo. 1st. In company with James

Emlen and ———, visited a young man, John Newlin, who was a teacher at Westtown at the time I was; but is now rapidly going in a decline; brought on by a heavy cold taken in the Third Month last. It is about three years since he entered into the marriage state, so that, altogether, it seems very affecting. He is so changed I should not have known him. His voice gone so as not to speak above a whisper; and such a hard cough! He was sitting up, and seemed quiet and composed. I believe our visit to him was timely. Both he and his wife received us very kindly. Immediately on gathering into stillness, this language arose: "When the poor and needy seek water, and there is none, and their tongue faileth for thirst, I the Lord will hear them, I the God of Israel will not forsake them." The impression which accompanied to revive it, brought me into a great strait. I feared to speak, and I feared to withhold. I thought, should I carry away that which was given me for this dear afflicted brother, and he be shortly removed, how miserable should I be! I could not help hoping ——— would give utterance for me. She did speak excellently and suitably but it did not relieve me; and the word obey seemed sounded in my spiritual ear. Therefore, in much fear, I revived what arose. A word of encouragement given me by dear James afterwards, tended a little to revive; "It is better to give than to receive." The feeling of stillness which covers my spirit, gives me to hope that I have not done wrong. Thou knowest, O Heavenly Parent! that the bent and desire of my soul is, to do that which is well pleasing in thy holy eye-sight; and wherein I have erred, it is, or has been, more through fear than from a disposition to go counter to thy blessed will. Therefore be pleased, for thy blessed name's sake, and my poor soul's sake, to strengthen the things that remain, &c.

28th. Met with my friends this morning, being our Monthly Meeting. Poverty seemed the covering of my spirit; so much so that I abhorred myself. But was very unexpectedly brought under exercise, though unable to see whether for myself or the church. If I have withheld more than is meet it has not been through wilful disobedience, but from a fear of running before I was sent. Was afresh instructed in the remembrance of, "My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me;" but the voice of a stranger will they not follow. I can say, that sincere, fervent breathings were raised, that I may hear and follow the true Shepherd, and not be turned aside by the stranger. Think I never felt more, the awfulness of "handling the word of God deceitfully." May I be preserved, and be given yet more plainly to see, what the Lord my God is requiring of me.

First Mo. 12th, 1851. Oh Thou! who alone knowest the deep, the hidden, the untold exercises of thy poor child, be pleased to mark for, and own me in the path wherein I go; seeing thou knowest, O dearest Father! the bent and desire of my soul is, to follow Thee. It is this, that has led me this day to appear a spectacle to angels and to men. If I have mistaken thy word, or run and thou hast not sent, be pleased to make me sensible thereof, and show unto me the way wherein thou wouldst have me to go.

19th. The greater part of our meeting this morning, was passed in much emptiness as to any good. Near the close a language saluted my inward ear, but whether intended for my own comfort and consolation, or some others present, I could not see. I have felt a fear since, that I withheld, through my own wisdom, "more than was meet."

30th. Our Monthly Meeting. We had the company of our friend Hannah Warrington; who has a minute to visit the meetings in our Quarter. She was acceptably engaged in testimony, from: "What I say unto one I say unto all, watch." The necessity of a daily watchfulness, also of an abiding in the vine, was impressed upon us, that we become not as broken off branches of the olive tree.

Second Mo. 2nd. Our meeting this morning was held in silence, and a precious silence it was. But as in the "days when the sons of God came to present themselves before the Lord, Satan came also among them," and was permitted to tempt that good man, Job; so he seems still to be permitted to buffet, tempt and try our integrity; and too often, I fear, gains the ascendancy. But a little strength did to-day seem given to lift up a standard against him; and to appeal in sincerity, Thou who knowest all things, suffer me not in anywise to dishonor thee, neither the precious cause I have so long loved, or bring disgrace upon myself.

26th. Visited, in company with ——— and our dear friend J. Emlen, a poor young man in prison under sentence of death. Since his case has been tried in court, and a verdict brought in against him, he has acknowledged that he took the life of a dear young woman; and for nothing less or more than to get her watch; and which he was afraid to take after he did the deed. He is rather of weak capacity, and here the enemy has taken the advantage and overpowered. He shed tears while we were with him, and seemed penitent; but I fear not yet sufficiently so. May He, who alone can work the great change and give a heart of flesh, be pleased to bow the strong man and lay him low, and give a sight and sense of his lost and undone condition, with the truly penitent feeling and acknowledgment, "A Saviour or I die, a Redeemer or I perish forever." His condition seems a very pitiable, and a very awful one; and while impressed with the weight of sin and iniquity that rests upon him, I am no less so with the words of our Divine Lawgiver: "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." In spirit us all, and especially thy poor child that now bows before Thee, more faithfully, and singly, and simply, to follow Thee; that so at the end, or the final winding up of all things here below, the joyful welcome may be heard: "Come ye blessed of my Father," &c.

Third Mo. 2nd. Attended this day West Chester meeting; not in my own will went I there; it proved a most exercising meeting. I think I can say a willingness was wrought to be anything or nothing in His eye-sight. No relief could be obtained, and the language seemed sounded in my spiritual ear, "Where I am there shall also my servant be."

4th. A retrospect of the above visit gives peace, and I can but believe the will was accepted. May He who alone knows wherein I have fallen short in obedience to Him and his commands, be pleased to be merciful and regard with an eye of pity; knowing I desire not wilfully to offend.

6th. Attended the funeral of Hannah Forsythe; she being in her ninety-eighth year. At her great age, it is wonderful how she retained her faculties. She died sitting in her chair, though she had been poorly for several days. Her remains looked so well that I should not have thought of her being that age—not a wrinkle or furrow being seen in her face. Her attire was very simple and plain.

11th. Attended the interment of our friend, James Forsythe. His funeral was largely attended by many whose hearts were made sad at the unexpected call. After the interment, a meeting was held; in which our friends David Cope, and others, were constrained to call loudly unto the living to work while it is called to-day; for most assuredly the night will overtake us all, sooner or later: when no man can work.

23rd. Never felt more sensibly than this day, the precious privilege of sitting each under our own vine and fig tree, where none can make afraid: which favor hath long been granted me. If the time has fully come, that I am to show forth unto others the good things the Lord hath done for my soul, even that He is good, and that his mercy endureth forever, may a clearer evidence, than hath yet been given, be granted: that so I dishonor not Him the Lord of life and glory, nor bring distress and shame on myself, neither be a burden on my friends, is the daily, and may I not say hourly, prayer of my soul.

27th. Though I have enjoyed for days past something like a little sabbath, this has passed away; and I am left to feel and know my own nakedness. May a patient state be abode in, till it please Him, who said formerly, "Let there be light and there was light," to change the dispensation.

30th. Our First-day meeting. If I did any good this day in assembling with my friends, it was in caring for the little ones I had charge of. I have thought sometimes when they were good and quiet, that their innocent little spirits rather helped than hindered in the effort to have a good meeting.

Persia and the Persians.—No. 2.

For "The Friend."

Of still greater interest to a philosophical reader than the country and the dwellings, are the people who inhabit them. In speaking of the differences between men of the East and the West, our author says:—"A Persian mounts his horse at the right side; he draws the saw towards him in cutting wood; he reads and writes from right to left. These may appear trifling in themselves; but they are typical of the profound divergences existing in the intellectual cast, the thought, of the two great divisions of the human race, the Asiatic and the European."

Life in Persia is essentially an out-of-door life; it is marked by an apparent publicity and absence of reserve; and in direct contrast with this, there is about its domestic side a profound mystery and seclusion. The shops are invariably open to the street like booths. So are the schools, where the teacher may be seen with the pupils in rows before him, seated on their heels, reciting their lesson in chorus. The barber performs his functions in the same public manner. The baker kneads and rolls his dough before the public, flattens the loaves into long, thin sheets on his bare arms, and when it is baked into loaves not more than one-tenth of an inch in thickness, tosses it on his shoulder like so many hides of leather, and peddles it.

In the middle of the day during the hot season the entire city sinks into a deep slumber, gradually arousing again as the sun sinks to the west. At this hour the tea-houses are thronged. The tea is drunk without milk, and made very sweet and flavored with the juice of the lime. In the tea-houses may often be heard recitations from the poets—the songs of Hafiz, and entire cantos from the great epic of Firdouse, chanted with resonant modulations, and listened to with enthusiastic rapture.

A large establishment in Persia includes not only the servants actually employed, but also their families, as Persian servants are invariably married. Thus a household that includes only 15 servants may easily represent a community of from 80 to 100 persons, resembling the feudal houses of olden times. All this community looks up to its master as to a protector and lord. Whenever one of the servants marries, then he expects a present for his wedding; then the bride must wait on the mistress of the household, and in turn receive a present. If a child is born, another present is expected; and if a physician is needed, the interposition of the master is again required, with a note to the doctor requesting him to call at the house of the patient. The authority of the head of such a household is practically patriarchal.

Many of the household servants of a Persian gentleman are retained purely for the purpose of adding dignity to his position, and to accompany him when he goes abroad. The love of ostentation is common to the Oriental. The Premier—the greatest subject in the kingdom, keeps no less than 3,000 men in his employ.

In comparing the character of the Persians with the people of western Europe or America, the difference in the governments must not be overlooked. Like most Orientals, the Persians from remote antiquity have been trained to regard themselves as practically the slaves of their sovereigns, who exercised unquestioned and absolute power over them and all that belonged to them—But among the Western nations, the theory of government is that power belongs to the people, and that government is to be administered only for the common good, and not merely for the benefit of the ruler. This difference must naturally exert a powerful influence in modifying the habits and characters of the people brought up under such different systems.

In illustration of the difficulty there is, in persons so differently trained, of understanding each others' feelings, the author mentions the case of a prominent Persian official at Tabreez, who had an altercation with an English gentleman, whom he repeatedly called a liar. The Englishman, who seemed not to be acquainted with the oriental character, sent him a note demanding either an apology or that he should accept a challenge to fight. The Persian was not a coward, but the idea of risking his life because he had called another man a liar seemed to him preposterous—as indeed it was.

"I fight!" said he, "what shall I fight for? I only called him a liar, and now he wants me to fight him; was anything more absurd!" He could not comprehend why the man should have felt insulted by being called a liar; but he was perfectly willing to soothe his feelings by apologeticizing. "I'll say whatever he wishes me to say I lied when I called him a liar. I am a liar, the son of a liar, and the grandson of liars. What more does he want me to say?"

The present sovereign, Nasr-ed-Deen Shah, is spoken of in kindly terms, as a monarch whose long reign (he ascended the throne in 1848) has shown a desire to promote the welfare of his country; and has been marked by fewer incidents of a sanguinary character than usual among his predecessors. S. Benjamin observes:—"On reflecting upon the cruelty of men possessed of unlimited power and brought up amid the associations of absolute despotism, I am sometimes inclined to think a measure of charity should be extended towards such rulers, even when they are brought up as Christians, like the Czar of Russia. The necessity of acting with quick decision in a despotic government, and the power to do so, familiarize the mind to harshness and blunt the sympathies; while it is also true that men, and even women, who have always moved in the upper ranks fall from that very fact to realize that the classes below them are of the same blood and nerves as themselves, and no less capable of suffering."

One of the princes of the blood royal "voiced the sentiments which prevailed among Asiatic despots towards the classes below them, when he said to the United States dragoonman, who by my instructions had gone to Hamadân to protect our citizens there, 'Why does your Government take so much trouble for these Americans of Hamadân? They are only three or four in number, and simple people; why make such fuss about what you call their rights?'"

The present Shah rises early in the morning soon after day-break, and though he gives minute attention to the affairs of state, finds leisure for relaxation and the cultivation of his tastes in literature and art. Besides the narratives of his journeys to Europe, he has published two illustrated volumes descriptive of journeys taken in Persia. He is also a poet, and has a taste for drawing, some of his sketches being very clever. "I remember," says Benjamin, "on the occasion of an official interview with the late Minister of Foreign Affairs, that a royal rescript was brought to the Minister. When it was handed to him of a silver salver by the colored attendant, he arose and took it with both hands and touched it to his bowed forehead before opening it, saying to those around, who likewise arose, 'A despatch from our Lord and Sovereign, the Shah-in-Shah! After reading the document, the Minister pointed out to me a pen-and-ink sketch which his Majesty had drawn around the seal of the envelope with his own hand. 'See,' said the Minister to me 'this sketch by the Shah-in-Shah himself show that his Majesty is in happy disposition to-day and feels graciously toward me his slave.'"

In hours of leisure the Shah is fond of conversation, and devotes part of the evening to social relations with his favorite courtiers. His genial nature is shown by a remark made to a cultivated gentleman at Teheran, at whose elegant country seat he was making an afternoon visit. Turning to his host, as they were strolling through the grounds, the Shah remarked, how much I regret when in the society of a gentleman so polished and intelligent, that I cannot lay aside for awhile the burden of royal etiquette, and converse with you with the freedom I should like!"

He is not ignorant of the corruption and sel-eking which characterize many of his courtiers although he may not know where to find better men to fill their places. This is evidenced by what occurred on a summer afternoon, when he was reclining in a pavilion, with his courtiers seated below him, engaged in familiar conversation. In the course of the conversation, the Shah remarked, 'Why is it that Anushirwān (a noted sovereign who lived centuries before) was called the Just? Am I not also just?' No one dared to reply; it was a severe question, unfair perhaps to put to them. Again the Shah inquired, "Can no one of all your number answer the King?" But silence reigned until it became oppressive, not to say perilous. At length one of them, taking his life as it were in his hands, hesitatingly replied,—

"As I am your sacrifice, O King of kings, Anushirwān was called the Just because he was just."

"And is not Nasr-ed-deen Shah also just?" demanded the King with a frown.

But no reply came, except that the courtier shrugged his shoulders and opened the palms of his hands and lifted his eyebrows with a deprecating gesture. Then in wrath the Shah responded,—

"O ye unregenerate sons of burnt fathers! I know well that if Anushirwān had been surrounded by a corrupt and disreputable council like you, he never could have obtained the title of Just."

They all replied; "as we are your sacrifice, the Asylum of the Universe hath uttered the truth."

In his hunting excursions, of which the Shahs very fond, he likes to dispense with the burdensome etiquette of court life. One of his favorite amusements at such times is to have the Ministers or upper Stewards of the royal household prepare a dinner for him. Our author says,— "I have seen a photograph of a group of these high dignitaries engaged under a tent, assorting the vegetables, one hulling the beans, another preparing the potatoes!"

(To be concluded.)

For "The Friend."

On the Love and Grace of God.

A noted passage from Paul to Titus is, I think, worthy of a more full consideration than many give it, for it shows us how we "may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things," by giving heed to the grace of God, which, he says, has appeared to all men; and which brings salvation to all who receive it and obey the teachings of it; for it teaches us that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world; which seems to comprehend the whole duty of man. And shows us that we should be redeemed from all iniquity, and purified unto Christ a peculiar people, zealous of good works. (Titus ii. 11, 12, 13, 14;) and hence it brings salvation, as it saves us from the defilements of sin, and restores to heavenly favor.

If we deny ungodliness we shall not be satisfied with a form of godliness without the heart-cleansing power. And if we deny worldly lusts, then the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, or the pride of life will no longer have dominion over us.

And as we abide under the restraining teachings of the grace of God, we shall live soberly, and our moderation will be known unto all men, for we shall feel and know that the Lord is at hand. And we will find Him to be a swift witness against all wrong, and ready to check every inordinate desire. So whether we eat or drink, or whatever we do, we should do all to the glory of God, and not to the glory of man; nor to the gratification of the depraved appetite of men.

And the word righteously comprehends much. For if we lived righteously, we would do so to others as we would have them do to us. We should be just in our dealings, and as far as in us lies, be punctual in complying with our engagements.

But the word godly seems to embrace all; for "godliness is profitable unto all things, having the promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come." So "godliness with contentment is great gain." But if we have only a form of godliness while in our walks among men, we deny the power, and suffer great loss; for we lose the life that now is, and that which is to come. But if we live godly in this present world, our whole lives will be marked with piety, and adorn the doctrine we profess, and we will be enabled to do the will of God in all things; "and this is the will of God, even our sanctification." So that to live godly, is to live after the teachings of God's Spirit; and not after the teachings of that spirit which rules and reigns in the hearts of the children of disobedience.

And as we follow the teachings of the grace of God, we may look with a holy confidence for the blessed hope which the Christian has beyond the grave. And also for the glorious appearing of Him who gave himself for us that He might redeem from all iniquity. But let us not vainly hope that this gift of God, through Jesus Christ to a fallen world, will redeem us, or bring salvation, unless we comply with the terms. For unless we walk in the light, as God is in the light, we need not expect to have fellowship with Him, nor with one another, nor for the blood of Jesus Christ to cleanse us from all sin. For Christ will not be the Saviour of such as will not be saved by Him; nor of those who are relying on outward helps for salvation. But I do believe that a saving portion of the grace of God is inwardly revealed, and freely offered to every man, of every nation, kindred, tongue and people. And it is offered that all who will accept it, may have a chance to be saved from their sins, but not in them.

We may have this view, without undervaluing the help and blessings that the Holy Scriptures are of to the man of God, in the way of making him wise unto salvation, and pointing him to Christ, the only Saviour. They teach us that his saving grace is universal; and that "the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man" for him to profit by, if he will receive it and so use it as to be profited in the way of salvation. But the Scriptures have only reached to a portion of our sinful world; and to those who have received them, they only give a declaration of that gospel which is the power of God unto the salvation of all who obey the teachings of it. So, while the Scriptures cannot save us, they are able to make wise unto salvation, through faith in Him that can save us. And they teach us that God so loved the world, that He gave his only begotten Son for our Saviour. And it is far better for us to witness his saving presence to be with us, and in us, than for us to be merely reading, hearing, or talking, or singing about Him, as a distant or known friend.

We must accept this grace of God, through faith in the atoning sacrifice of his Son whom He sent in love for poor deluded man, that He might redeem us from the pollutions of our sinful nature, and through the washings of regeneration, renew us again into that Divine image of life and love which was lost in the fall. But we must have a sufficient faith or belief in his atoning grace and cleansing power, as to make us willing to become co-workers with Him in the work of redemption. For it is God that works in us both to will and to do of his own good pleasure; and we must carry out that work which He wills us to do, without murmurings or disputings. For it is not of ourselves, but the whole plan of salvation is the gift of God.

But it is hard to distinguish between the human or animal love, and the heavenly or divine love. And also between the human life and the divine life; and between the wisdom which is from above, and the wisdom which is from beneath. But if any man lack heavenly wisdom, let him ask of God and it shall be given him; but let him ask in living faith, nothing wavering. If he lack earthly wisdom, let him ask of man, for he knoweth the things of the natural man by the spirit of man that is in him. And the true light cannot be distinguished from the false or transformed light, but by the Spirit of God: because the things of God are only spiritually discerned.

The blending of the human and the divine is no marvel, for Christ himself was both human and divine; and the servant is not above his master, nor the disciple above his lord. And the body and mind of man are mysteriously connected; which, like the unity of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, is placed beyond the reach of our limited comprehension, and will, perhaps, never be seen by any, until this mortal shall put on immortality. For now, this side the grave, we only "know in part, and we prophesy in part; but when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part will be done away." We have the chance to choose for ourselves which we will follow or be actuated by, whether that which is earthly, sensual, and self-indulgent, and does not submit to the restraining influence of the cross of Christ; or that which is heavenly, and is willing to deny self and take up the daily cross for Christ's sake.

It seems that a natural love is given to the whole animal creation, in order to bind them together in an earthly tie. But a heavenly love is given to the children of God, in order to bind them together in the love and fellowship of the grace of God, that we may be one in Christ, even as He is one with the Father. The Scriptures testify of Christ, but He himself says, "No man can come to me except the Father which hath sent me, draw him." So if any man lack wisdom or knowledge concerning the grace or love of God, and the way of salvation, let him go to Him who giveth liberally and freely, and it shall be given him. D. H.

Surgical Uses of Catgut.

Upon reading a brief article on "What is Catgut?" in "The Friend" of Second Month 5th, 1887, another important use of this article, not noticed there, occurred to the writer.

Within a few years the use of catgut in surgery has so greatly increased that at present it promises to supplant silver wire and silk thread as a material for suturing wounds and ligating arteries. For these purposes the smaller sizes of the commercial article are prepared by soaking first in oil of Juniper and then in alcohol. By this process the oil is removed from the catgut, which is then stored in alcohol until wanted for use, when it is placed for a few minutes in an aqueous solution of bi-chloride of mercury which renders it at once as soft and pliable as silk and perfectly aseptic.

The advantage of catgut over wire, silk, &c., is that being an animal substance it can be absorbed by the cells of living tissue, and therefore does not require to be removed from the wound after the healing process has been established. Small bundles of fine catgut strands are frequently placed in deep wounds, one end being allowed to project, in order to act as capillary drains and carry off the serous ooze which is thrown out from the surfaces of all recent wounds.

A wound, thoroughly cleansed with antiseptic solution; in which the bleeding arteries have been secured by catgut ligatures, drainage provided by capillary catgut drains, and which finally is closed by catgut sutures and antiseptic dressings, may be left undisturbed for a long time and will heal with wonderful rapidity.

In uncomplicated wounds the first dressing is frequently left on for two or three weeks, and when it is removed, the projecting ends of the sutures and drains will be found lying loose in the dressings, while the wounds will have healed perfectly.

It is interesting to observe that the absorption of catgut by the tissues is not due to mere maceration and solution, but is the result of vital action, the foreign substance being devoured by the migratory connective tissue cells or the white cells of the blood, and by them carried into the lymphatic vessels. If a strand of catgut be inserted into the cavity of an abscess, where it is bathed in pus, which is a fluid containing as its essential element large numbers of these small cells in a dead or dying condition, the strand will be found unabsorbed even after a long period.

A catgut ligature prepared as above described is usually absorbed by living tissue in about one week, but it can be rendered much more durable by treating with chromic acid solution for variable lengths of time.

The use of animal ligatures was first suggested by Dr. Physick, of Philadelphia, in 1814, but they have come into general use only within a few years, since the methods of antiseptic surgery have made wound treatment without profuse suppuration the rule instead of the exception.

The surgical service of the Pennsylvania Hospital is at present consuming thousands of feet of this useful article annually, to the almost complete exclusion of the time-honored silver wire and silk ligature.

[The author of the poem, "The Railroad Wreck," published in No. 30 of "The Friend," sends the following additional information, which our readers will please consider in connection with the foot note attached to that article.—Ed.]

Since writing "The Railroad Wreck," I see the verdict of the Coroner's Jury acquits the engineer of the charge of drunkenness, although witnesses before that jury testified to having drunk with the engineer at a saloon in Tiffin. The conductor had also been charged with drinking, and the Coroner "finds the conductor was grossly negligent in not putting out warning signals for the other train in time."

He finds, also, "that the Express Train was not properly supplied with brakes, and therefore could not be stopped as quickly as was necessary."

Perhaps in the light of the Coroner's report, some expressions in my poem were too strong, I have therefore written this explanation. It seems, however, that the B. & O. Railroad Co. considered that intoxicating liquor was a factor in the disaster, as they issued an order almost immediately that no one should be retained in the employ of the Company who indulged in the use of anything that would intoxicate.

A HOME MISSION.

Not to the millions of the dark-browed nations
Beyond the sea,
To bring them tidings of the great salvation
Her work might be.
Though in the deep love of her young devotion,
She longed to go
And bear the cross beyond the distant ocean,
But Christ said, No.

She longed within the rich man's lordly mansion
To tell the tale;
She thought the sweet words of the holy Jesus
Would there prevail;
She said: "The cold heart of the child of fashion
Will melt and weep,
When I shall tell them of His surer compassion,
His love complete;"
Oh! might she to the weary in the palace
In mercy go,
And offer to their lips Love's golden chalice?
But Christ said, No.

She said, "Oh to the wretched and the lowly
He sendeth me;
To tell them of a purer life and holy,
My work shall be.
Down by the side of earth's poor outcast children
Will I go now;
Oh! grant me, Christ, to bear Thy blessed image
Upon my brow,
That I may carry to the hungry thousands
In want and woe,
The tidings of a Father's grace and mercy;
But Christ said, No.

"Is there no work for Thee, O blessed Master,
In all Thy lands?
Must I stand ever in thy busy vineyard
With folded hands?"

* * * * *
Silent awhile, but ever sweetly guiding
Her onward way,
He led her to a quiet home, and bade her shine
For Him all day.
Then pointing to the little ones around her—Sweet children three—
He said, "Feed these my lambs, thus doing True work for Me."

And little lisping lips that called her "Mother,"
She taught to pray;
And little glancing feet she followed daily
Lest they should stray;
And little busy hands, her own hands guided
In doing good.
Christ said, "She hath, the patient, careful mother, Done what she could."

THE WILL AND THE WAY.

There's something I'd have you remember boys,
To help in the battle of life;
'Twill give you strength in the time of need,
And help in the hour of strife.
Whenever there's something that should be done,
Don't be faint-hearted and say,
'What use to try?' Remember then,
That where there's a will there's a way.

There's many a failure for those who win,
But though at first they fail,
Then try again, and the earnest heart
Is sure at last to prevail.
Though the hill is rugged and hard to climb,
You can win the heights, I say,
If you make up your mind to reach the top,
For where there's a will there's a way.

The men that stand at the top are those Who never could bear defeat;
Their failures only made them strong
For the work they had to meet.
The will to do and the will to dare
Is what we want to-day;
What has been done can be done again,
For the will finds out the way.

Village Rambles.

During much of the past winter, the state of the weather or of the roads has been such as to furnish little temptation to the pedestrian to venture far into the woods and fields. But even in walking along the streets of our village I have found that objects were not wanting to interest him whose eyes and whose mind are observant of what is spread before him on the book of nature.

The nests of the birds which favored us with their company in the summer, were then so skillfully hidden among the foliage of the trees, that but few of them were seen by the passers by. But now that the leaves have fallen, the deserted nests are seen in greater abundance than one would have supposed; often low down in the branches of trees by the road-side, or in close vicinity to the houses, showing that many of our smaller birds recognize in man a protector from the birds of prey, and seek his companionship and shelter. This would probably be increasingly the case, if it were not for the destruction caused among them by the domestic cat—an animal which retains much of its original fondness for hunting and destroying smaller animals. Among the nests I observed those of the Robin, which, with its kindred the Catbird and Wood Robin, is perhaps the largest of the winged summer residents of the village. All of these, like some of the more delicate of the people, seek a warmer home in the "Sunny South" during the winter season.

From one of the trees was suspended the deep hanging nest of the Baltimore Oriole or Golden Robin, a bird which skillfully adapts its architecture to circumstances. When the nest is hung to the slender twigs, where it is liable to be greatly swayed by the wind, its depth is made so great, as to insure the safety of the eggs and young. It is begun by firmly fastening strings of the flax of the silk-weed (Asclepias) or swamp holly-hock (Hibiscus) round two or more forked twigs, corresponding to the intended width and depth of the nest. The bird also gladly appropriates in this work any artificial strings it may meet with. Nuttall saw one carry off a piece of lamp-wick 10 or 12 feet long, the ends of which were left hanging out for nearly a week before the whole was woven into the nest. Some other little birds, making use of similar materials, at times twitched these flowing ends, and generally brought out the busy Baltimore from her occupation in great anger. Some years ago, a nest was found the frame work of which was made from silvered wire pulled from a soldier's epaulet. The materials employed are so interwoven together as to form a kind of coarse cloth; and inside of this outer pouch or framework, a nest of grass, hair, &c., is placed, in which the eggs are laid.

The Baltimore Oriole spends its winters in South America, where, indeed, most of the group of birds to which it belongs, remain throughout the year. The male is beautiful in his orange and black livery, but the female and young are more plainly attired. It is an active, quick-motoned species; and a lively songster, with a marked habit of imitating other birds. Nuttall mentions that a Cardinal Grosbeak happening to visit their neighborhood, his harmonious and bold whistle appeared to greatly delight a Baltimore Oriole, which at once laid aside his ordinary notes, and commenced using the syllables uttered by the Cardinal.

A smaller cup-shaped nest, suspended from the forking twigs of a small tree by the side of the street, no doubt belonged to one of the Vircos, or Warbling Flycatchers—a group of small birds, inconspicuous in appearance, but interesting as songsters. The outside of the nest is made of fibrous materials such as thin strips of red cedar or grape-vine bark, spiders' webs and moth cocoons, fastened together by the glutinous saliva of the bird. These are often coated on the outside with pieces of green lichen, so as to resemble a knot of the tree coated with moss.

Like most other villages in this section of the country, we are well supplied with English Sparrows. So far as I have noticed, these appear to prefer for their nesting abodes, the hollows of the trees. Immediately in front and by the side of our house are some large silver maples, several of which have cavities, formed by decay in spots whence branches had been cut off. A mild day about the middle of the Second Month seemed to make the sparrows feel that it was time to begin preparations for summer housekeeping; and they were quite busy about the maples, chirping, and going in and out of the holes, as if deciding on a location for their nests. They are quarrelsome and noisy birds, but furnish much amusement to a quiet observer of their habits; nor do they do as much injury to our gardens as some charge them with. I noticed in the spring of a former year that they were busy among the swelling buds of a pear tree; and remembered the assertion that they were destructive in such cases. But in due season, the tree showed a sufficient amount of bloom, and the yield of pears was very satisfactory.

Although cold weather is not favorable in a general way to vegetation, yet the present winter has somewhat modified my views in that respect. One of the maples that line the side of our main street furnished a fruitful soil for the growth of various species of moss, lichens and fungi. I was somewhat surprised to find that one of these fungi, a species of Agaric, or mushroom-like plant, continued to grow during the winter, and did not seem to be injured by a temperature many degrees below the freezing point. Its growth was probably suspended at such times, but it did not seem to be killed; and when a few milder days came, it continued to live and develop itself.

This plant is one of the most curious of its kind that I have met with. It grew in small clusters on the bark of the maple, each mushroom of which was small, of a brownish yellow or leather color, but so densely compacted together that an oval group of three inches in length and half that width, contains about 100 distinct plants. Another cluster, somewhat shrivelled in drying, which is less than a square inch in size has over 20 of the rounded umbrella-like tops. Indeed the stems which support them are almost hidden from sight, and they might be compared to a group of ancient Roman warriors attacking a besieged town and covering themselves with their shields so that no part of their bodies were exposed to their enemies. This species of Agaric is called Agaricus velutipes.

On the same maple grew another species of Agaric, remarkable for its diminutive size. A slender, thread-like stem projected from the bark of the tree, and was crowned with its little mite of an umbrella-top, not larger than a large pin-head. It is the Agaricus corticola, meaning the mushroom whose home is on bark.

Whether either of these two species are found growing in the summer season, I know not.

An Inquiry into the Character and Tendencies of Secret Societies.

The Public Ledger of this City, several months ago, contained quite a lengthy contributed article upon "A Century of Freemasonry in Pennsylvania." The writer speaks of the early vicissitudes of the institution in the State, and explains that in 1835, the order was "in reduced circumstances in consequence of the Anti-masonic persecution." It was at that time that Joseph Ritner, with the support of Thaddeus Stephens, was elected governor upon the Anti-masonic issue.* The article concludes: "Governor Ritner, in his message of December 6th, 1837, made some references to the evils of Freemasonry, which brought out a memorial from certain members of the order to the Legislature, complaining of his message as slanderous, particularly in those portions of the paper which declared that General Washington was never a Freemason.† The Governor replied by a special message, and thus ended the last effort of political Anti-masonry in Pennsylvania."

It can hardly be said, however, that Masons are not now well represented in the public offices of this city and State. An election for officers of the "Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania" was lately held, and in the list then published, I find amongst other public officials, the names of two judges, an ex-governor, ex-mayor, the City Controller, Prison Inspector, President of Public Building Commissioners, and two or three of the citizens prominently mentioned as nominees for the mayoralty. Our present mayor, a member of the same order, expressed his satisfaction in a published letter written during his trip to the New Orleans Exposition, that the mayor of every city at which he stopped, except one, was a Freemason. Two years ago the whole number of Masons in the United States and British America was stated to be nearly 580,000. The supporters of Masonry can probably claim for it, what one of its champions did in the year before the Morgan abduction, when, in an oration delivered at New London, Connecticut, he said: "What is Masonry now? It is powerful. It comprises men of rank, wealth, office and talent, in power and out of power, and that in almost every place where power is of any importance; and it comprises among other classes of the community, to the lowest, in large numbers, active men, united together, and capable of being directed by others, so as to have the force of concert throughout the civilized world! They are distributed, too, with the means of knowing one another, and the means of keeping secret, and the means of co-operating in the legislative hall, on the bench, in every gathering of business, in every party of pleasure, in every enterprise of government, in every domestic circle, in peace and in war, among enemies and friends, in one place as well as in another! So powerful indeed, is it at this time, that it fears nothing from violence, either public or private; for it has every means to learn it in season, to counteract, defeat and punish it."

*It was to this Governor Ritner that John G. Whittier inscribed one of his most stirring Anti-slavery poems, the Governor having in a proclamation let it be known that he could take no part in authorizing the capture of human beings who had fled from bondage.

†Washington's connection with the Masonic order seems to have been as lightly held as that of Chief Justice Marshall. Before his death he warned the whole country to beware of secret societies. From Mount Vernon, in Ninth Month, 1798, he wrote, in allusion to an assertion relative to his lodge connection: "The fact is, I preside over none, nor have I been in one more than once or twice within the last thirty years."

It is interesting to notice that, a few months after the delivery of the oration from which the foregoing extract is taken, Richard Rush (son of Dr. Benjamin Rush) who had been an "entered apprentice" of a lodge, turned his attention to the investigation of its principles and operations. This was previous to his valuable public services at the English and French courts. At the first Anti-masonic National Nominating Convention for President (1831) he declined the nomination that he might give more force to his writings against Masonry. I append a single brief extract therefrom:

"I see objections to secret societies, because, pursuing objects not known to the public, through means not known to the public, they act under diminished responsibilities to the public. If the objects be good, why not state them? If bad, they ought to be known. Our legislative halls are all open, and our courts; so are all the acts of our people, that may come to affect the interests of the body politic or social. Not a bridge company, nor a turnpike company, no bank, scarcely an association of any kind for whatever purpose existing, whether for the advancement of charity, or learning or religion, or any of the common business of life, whether incorporated by the law or not, but renders its statements to the public either voluntarily or by command of the law. If the latter do not positively enjoin publicity, a competent share of information regarding the objects of any such associations is rarely or ever withheld, on proper inquiry being made. Societies, then, profoundly secret by the first element of their constitution, whatever their ostensible ends, cannot be too closely watched, in a country whose primary principles of political and social action are all in the face of day."

It thus appears why Chas. G. Finney believed it a positive duty to publish (in 1868) his book upon Freemasonry. The facts published after the Morgan abduction were "so universally known and confessed," that, he says, "I should just as soon expect slavery to be established in this country, and become more popular than ever before—to take possession of the Government and of all the civil offices and to grow bold, impudent and defiant—as I should have expected that Masonry would achieve what it has."

We will now consider seriatim a few of the points mentioned by Finney relative to the character and claims of Freemasonry.

He contends that the people at large cannot really know what the institution is from a perusal of the eulogistic books which adorning Masons have written respecting it. The oath of initiation binds them "to conceal and never reveal" any part of its secrets. So, what they publish does not profess to be the secrets of Freemasonry. In the same manner, we cannot obtain this knowledge from the oral testimony of adhering Masons. These can hardly be expected to admit that they have taken oaths which it is not their purpose to keep. Hence, some will say of the books which profess to reveal Freemasonry, that there is some truth and a great deal of falsehood in them.

Now, many persons of excellent repute, have on conscientious grounds withdrawn from the order, and are ready to testify that its secrets, as revealed in certain books, are substantially correct expositions of Freemasonry as it was and is. The testimony of these witnesses is certainly worthy of credit. If it be said that such persons are "perjurers," then an admission is made that they have published the truth; for, unless they have published the secrets of the order truly, they have violated no Masonic oath. Further, the renunciation of the lodge by 45,000 Masons after the Morgan abduction, is in itself a cogent historical fact corroborative of this view. The seceders were competent witnesses, being able to testify from their personal knowledge what Masonry was, while their withdrawal was made in the face of the fact that such evidence is given with the probability, if not the certainty, of incurring the animosity and it may be the persecution of those who continue to adhere. Had not Morgan truly revealed Masonic secrets, there would have been no motive for the high-handed outrage.

If it be claimed that Freemasonry is now reformed, there is then an admission that indefensible secrets were in the past truly revealed. Yet their own authorities do not claim it to be reformed, inasmuch as they "expressly require of their candidates to conform to all the ancient principles and usages of the institution." Be it asked, why go to the opponents of Freemasonry to get a knowledge of what it is, we may answer, why go to its adherents when their oaths inhibit the revelation of their secrets. If those who have renounced the institution are its enemies, "it is," says Finney, "only in the sense that they regard the institution as not only unworthy of patronage, but as so wicked in a moral point of view, and so dangerous in a political point of view, that they feel constrained to reveal its secrets and publicly to renounce it." William H. Seward, speaking upon this matter in the Senate, in 1851, said: "I belong to one voluntary association of men, which has to do with spiritual affairs. It is the christian church—that branch of it, all imperfect though I think it is which, according to my notions, most nearly contains in their purity the instructions of the gospel. That association is an open one, which performs all its rights and gives all its instructions with publicity, and invites every man, in the language of its divine Founder, to come in and partake of the privileges with which He invested it, and of the blessings which He promises."

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 120.

ONE OF SATAN'S STRATAGEMS.

The essence of religion consists in being brought under the dominion of the Divine Life and Power of Christ; and knowing it to regulate our whole course of life. Where the enemy of all good sees that any are thoroughly awakened to the necessity of this, so that they are no longer his willing servants, one of his stratagems is to clothe himself so as to appear as an angel of light, and to suggest various duties and even acts of self-denial. However helpful these might prove, if Divinely required, yet if they are performed at the suggestion of the Evil one, they tend to bewilder the mind, and to keep it in bondage to him. This is a more common temptation than some may suppose. Many of those who have attained a good degree of religious experience, in looking back over their lives, can remember travelling over this rough and rocky ground.

Thomas Ellwood, in his interesting and instructive autobiography, relates how he was for a time entangled in this snare, "I, not then knowing the wiles of Satan, and being eager to be doing some acceptable service to God, too readily yielded myself to the conduct of my enemy, instead of my friend."

"He thereupon, honoring the warmth and zeal of my spirit, put me upon religious performances in my own will, in my own time, and in my own strength; which in themselves were good, and would have been profitable to me and acceptable to the Lord, if they had been performed in his will, his time, and the ability which He gives. But being wrought in the will of man, and at the prompting of the Evil one, no wonder that it did me hurt instead of good.

"I read abundantly in the Bible, and would set myself tasks in reading; enjoining myself to read so many chapters, sometimes a whole book, or a long epistle at a time. And I thought that time well spent, though I was not much the wiser for what I had read, reading it too cursorily and without the true guide, the Holy Spirit, which alone could open the understanding, and give the true sense of what was read.

"I prayed often and drew out my prayers to a great length; and appointed certain set times to pray at, and a certain number of prayers to say in a day; yet knew not, meanwhile, what true prayer was. This stands not in words, though the words that are uttered in the movings of the Holy Spirit, are very available; but in the breathing of the soul to the Heavenly Father, through the operation of the Holy Spirit, who maketh intercession sometimes in words, and sometimes with sighs and groans only, which the Lord vouchsafes to hear and answer.

"This will-worship, which all is that is performed in the will of man, and not in the movings of the Holy Spirit, was a great hurt to me, and hindrance of my spiritual growth in the way of Truth."

John Griffith records that after he had been divinely visited, and been made willing to deny himself in all things which appeared inconsistent with the Divine will, Satan, "taking advantage of the ardency of my mind, suggested that my work would be much easier in obtaining a complete victory over evil, were I to refrain for a time from some of the necessities of life, particularly from eating and taking my natural rest in sleep, except just as much as would preserve my life; and that I must constantly keep my hands employed in business, as idleness is the nursery of vice; neither was he wanting to bring Scripture, and passages out of other religious books, to confirm these requiremgs."

In his effort to conform to these requiremgs of a hard task-master, his strength failed, and he almost sunk into despair. But the Lord whom he still loved, awakened a concern in the mind of one of the members of his meeting, who visited him, closely inquired into his condition, and showed him that he was under a delusion of Satan. John Griffith says:—"Being thus, through the Lord's mercy, delivered from the wicked designs of my enemy, which undoubtedly was to destroy both soul and body, I had in reverent thankfulness to rejoice in his salvation. I then clearly saw, that Satan in his religious appearances, is also carefully to be guarded against; as nothing in religion can be acceptable to God, but the genuine product of his unerring spirit."

It was probably a similar concern to that which John Griffith's friend felt for him, that led John Thorp in one of his excellent letters, to extend the following caution to his friend Frances Dodson, whose spirits were long in a depressed condition:—"I would have thee in any wise comply with whatever thou thinkest may conduce to thy bodily health, in meat, drink, sleep and exercise; to do anything to injure our health, or shorten our lives is certainly a fault. The blessing of natural life and health, deserves our gratitude and attention; and I believe it equally offensive to defile or to destroy."

The testimony borne by James Naylor in his treatise, "Love to the Lost," as to the danger of being deceived by the Enemy of all good, is substantially the same as those of Thomas Ellwood and John Griffith. He says:—

"When the creature hath been out in the world and unrighteous ways thereof, doing that which is evil, then the Spirit of Christ in the heart condemns for the evil and neglect of good; then the same mind runs to act a worship to get peace, when both the evil and the worship is in one nature, and so the prayer becomes abomination. For the Evil-worker hath not only his hand in the deceitful works of the unrighteous mammon, but in the deceitful works of worship too. For, did he not deceive in worship to hide his wickedness with pretence of godliness and long prayers, he could not keep his people in any peace in his wicked ways." J. W.

For "The Friend."

Christianity a Spiritual Religion.

The following testimony to the spiritual nature of vital religion, is condensed from an Editorial article in The Independent. There is a tendency in the mind of man to give the praise of any good effected through human effort, to the instrument, instead of ascribing it to that Divine Power from which every spiritual blessing flows. It is the Grace of God that bringeth salvation, and it is to the work of this grace—the Spirit of our blessed Redeemer—that we must look for the power to take each successive step in the path that leads to eternal happiness. For "Transformation of apostate man

From fool to wise, from earth to divine,
Is work for Him that made him."

It is therefore with satisfaction that the writer finds this important truth forcibly presented to view in the columns of a Journal so ably conducted and widely circulated.

"The danger that threatens the Church to-day is that we are depending too much on the outward and visible means used to promote temporal and worldly enterprises to carry forward the spiritual work of God. Fine churches, an educated and brilliant ministry, the patronage of the best people will always maintain an outward show of prosperity. These will make Laodicean churches, but not churches 'full of power and of the Holy Ghost.'"

"Christianity is a supernatural religion, and it must have supernatural power in order to its true progress. From the beginning, our Lord impressed this truth upon his disciples. Though they had all the facts of his life, death and resurrection, He would not suffer them to begin their ministry until they had tarried at Jerusalem and been 'endued with power from on high.' This was the initial ministration of power, and thenceforth, from time to time, there were other administrations of the power of the Holy Ghost. The disciples always recognized and counted on the continuance of the presence and power of the Holy Ghost. Throughout the Epistles the great truth is everywhere recognized, that the Gospel can only be preached efficiently as the word is accompanied with the power of the Holy Ghost. All the triumphs of the Gospel were ascribed to the presence of the 'hand of the Lord.' 'And the hand of the Lord was with us,' is a familiar formula of their reports. 'For our gospel came not in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance.' So declared Paul, as accounting for the wonderful results of his preaching in Thessalonica.

"It is the absence of this mighty power, in our Church life and work, and indeed, in all our Christian operations, which we mourn and deplore; not that there is not a small measure of it, but that there is not a fullness of it. In its stead we have, we believe unwittingly, and because we have allowed ourselves to be sucked into the tide of worldly and human masterfulness, substituted human power and greatness. Great preachers, great evangelists, and great combinations of churches are not to be despised, but they cannot take the place of the Holy Ghost and the great power of God.

"God only is sufficient for the salvation of men. All the blood of beasts, on Jewish altars slain, could not atone for sin. The blood of Christ alone was sufficient for our redemption. Even so, all the might of man, no matter how sincerely and well meant in its use, will not be sufficient for the conversion of a single soul. After all, we are but instruments, both as to ourselves and our means; the Holy Ghost is the divine agent, and to Him and his presence we must most earnestly look for results. A pastor writes us, after the lapse of a year, of the results of one of Moody's great meetings: 'Though we have followed up diligently the people who gave in their names as having been converted, we have not been able to gather in more than ten per cent. of the whole number.' It is evident that these people were not converted. They were moved by human power, but not 'pricked in their hearts' by the Holy Ghost."

—The Condition of the Negro Race.—The Independent, of New York, has been publishing a summary of replies to sundry questions, from numerous correspondents in the Southern States, selected for their intelligence and familiarity with the condition of their people in various neighborhoods. The last of its articles touches the subject of morality, and the probable future union of the races. The answers, says the Independent, "indicate a somewhat chaotic state of opinion, there is one thing noteworthy in them all, even the most dependent; the writers show faith in their race. The dominant opinion is not only that the Negro can and will build himself up morally, but that he is building himself up. Most of these correspondents think that fewer children of mixed parentage are born (a smaller per centum at least) than in slavery. But even in communities where the number of these births is yet large or is thought to be as large a percentage as ever, it is noteworthy that a growing sentiment in colored society is reported, which takes positive ground against immorality. Under slavery, and as a long after-result of slavery, the social force of the race was not sufficiently strong to exert itself against immorality with effect, not always strong enough to make immorality disreputable. That this force has now become strong enough to do this in most communities, and is becoming strong enough in others, means that colored society has got moral consciousness, and that a social structure on a moral basis is fast being reared.

"There is an unmistakable belief shown in this correspondence that amalgamation will be the final outcome of the present tendencies. This will not be through any special desire for it on the part of the Negro, and it will be in spite of the formal angry protest of white society; but it will come through the working of natural forces."

—Hasty Temper.—The following incident concerning Professor Webster, of Harvard University, who murdered Dr. Parkman, has been brought out since the death of the late Dr. Perry. "One afternoon, at the close of the day's work, two of Mr. Perry's fellow pupils, the late Dr. John Homans, of Boston, and John White Webster, began a playful scuffle. Homans finally threw Webster down, and refused to let him go until he 'begged.' 'I beg,' said Webster. No sooner was he released than he seized a cudgel and aimed a blow at Homans's head. It would have crushed his skull had not Mr. Perry interposed his arm. Had Dr. Webster, when on trial for murder, pleaded Dr. Parkman's notorious violence of invective and his own hasty temper as palliation for his crime, instead of denying undoubted guilt, the recital of the early outbreak in the witness-box might have saved his life." It shows the importance of self-control in youth.—Christian Advocate.

—The Chinese Indemnity Bill.—This bill, as passed by Congress, appropriates $147,750 to pay for the losses sustained by the Chinese by mob violence in Washington Territory. When it was before the House of Representatives, William Walter Phelps made a speech in support of the bill, in which he said:

"I want to pay the $147,000, because the Chinese Government asked for that sum. The sum represents only the property destroyed. The Chinese Government knows that our Government never likes to pay a claim in full, so it wisely presents its bill only for the property destroyed, and says nothing of twenty-eight men murdered; nothing of fifteen men wounded; nothing of seven hundred Chinese hunted for ten days with club and rifle, like rabbits, until they were dispersed into the wilderness, and their village was made an ash-heap.

"In the time when Great Britain was at war with China, an American citizen named Edwards was arrested by mistake as an Englishman, imprisoned from sunrise to sunset, and then released. The Chinese Government paid $81,600 for the injury done to his person, and to the dignity of the United States. There were seven hundred Chinese who suffered at Rock Springs—all of them more than this man. We hesitate to pay them $200 each. Recall the familiar story of heathen generosity—how China once gave us $700,000 and said: 'Take it and pay the claims of your citizens.' We took it; we paid the claims with twelve per cent. interest, and there was enough left to return $200,000 to the Chinese Government.

"If this seems ancient history, long after the Rock Spring massacre there was riot in Ching King. The rabble destroyed property belonging to the American Methodist Mission. The Chinese Government has already paid $25,000 for these losses; and also since our discussion on this bill, a riot, under similar circumstances, at Shanghai, destroyed other missionary property. The Chinese Government has paid this bill too, $5,000."

—The Fortification Mania.—The New York Evening Post has the following remarks on the efforts now being made to spend many millions of dollars in vessels of war and fortifications:—

"England, France and Germany are the three powers who might give us the most battering along the Atlantic coast. But they are also the countries most exposed by their foreign commerce to terrible and continued reprisals from us. Putting New York under contribution, so far as they are concerned, means putting their trade, i. e., their means of livelihood, under contribution in return. Every dollar that they should collect from our seaboard cities would be collected back, or its equivalent destroyed, by our cruisers. Every nation of Europe knows that the future belongs to us. No government is likely to defy the future for the sake of levying a temporary assessment on New York. We consider the fortification mania largely unreasonable, and even mischievous, if its realization puts us in the race of competition with those countries which make the arts of destruction their chief concern in life.

THE FRIEND.

THIRD MONTH 12, 1887.

There is no subject that more justly claims the deepest interest of mankind than that of their final salvation—or becoming prepared for a state of heavenly enjoyment before their time of probation in this life expires. Nor is there any more grievous mistake, than a wrong persuasion as to the conditions necessary to procure such a blessed experience.

The Scriptures testify that "The gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ, our Lord;" that Christ died for our sins, that in Him we have forgiveness, that God was in Him reconciling the world unto Himself:—and many similar passages there are, which point out the love of the Father, and the blessings which He has bestowed and is ready to bestow on man through His beloved Son.

But there is abundant reason for believing that many are claiming these blessings for themselves without submission to the necessary conditions; and that their hope is therefore no better founded than the hope of the hypocrite, which will fail in the time of trial. In one of our exchanges, there lately appeared an anecdote, the point of which was, that a man who lived a good moral life, had no better prospect of heaven than one who was notoriously wicked, because, in either case, eternal redemption is a free gift, obtained for us by the Saviour. This is a fair sample of some of the religious teaching of the present time, which is misleading, because it leaves out of view very important truths, and indeed, we believe, is based on erroneous conceptions of the nature of salvation.

In the case referred to, much would depend on the motives which led the individual to live "a good moral life." If it proceeded from the operations of the Grace of God, "which bringeth salvation," and which teaches to "deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously and Godly;" it would be a strong evidence that such an one had accepted Christ in the way of his coming into his heart, and had been joined to Him in a covenant which death itself would not sever, unless he himself first departed therefrom. Such an one is a true Christian; yet none of these ever placed his hope of salvation on any less stable a foundation than the mercy of God.

As to the "wicked" man, there can be no hope for him except through repentance and amendment of life. For, so long as he continues in his sinful ways, he continues to reject Christ, and to do despite to his Spirit which visits all in order to bring them into the fold of peace and safety.

Would that all men would duly heed such Scripture truths as these—that "the wages of sin is death," "the soul that sinneth it shall die," "he that soweth to the flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption," "there is no peace to the wicked," and many others of like import.

And though God has provided a way for man's redemption, yet this is inseparably connected with a submission of heart to this work of his Spirit, a turning from sin, denying all evil, being born again, becoming washed and sanctified, so as to be brought into harmony and fellowship with our holy Redeemer and the eternal Father.

A deeply spiritual writer of last century (Job Scott) speaks of those impenitent sinners who hope that Christ will accept and save them, because they profess to renounce all their own righteousness, and to trust only in His for salvation. To these he gives the following caution:—

"Oh fools! He never accepts nor saves any further than their souls are sanctified and redeemed from the filth of sin. Sin remaining in any soul is a separation of that soul from a state of reconciliation with God. It is in direct opposition to God."

Yet there is hope for these, if they will open their hearts to the visitations of God's Spirit humble themselves before Him, and walk in the Light which he will give them; for then they will experience the blood of Christ to cleanse them from sin.

"Let the wicked forsake his ways and the unrighteous man his thoughts; and let him return unto the Lord, and He will have mercy upon him, and to our God, for He will abundantly pardon."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Forty-ninth Congress ceased to exist at noon on the 4th instant. All the regular appropriation bills were got through and received the President's signature, except three. The three which failed were: The Deficiency bill, which could not be engrossed in time; the Fortifications bill, abandoned in conference, and the River and Harbor bill, which did not receive the President's signature.

Among other bills that have become laws which the President signed, are the Fisheries Retaliation bill; the Indian Diplomatic and Agricultural Appropriation bills; the Agricultural Experiment Stations bill; the Pacific Railroad Inquiry bill; the bill to repeal the Tenure of Office act; and authorizing the employment of mail messengers in the postal service.

Those that have become laws without the President's signature, by the expiration of the constitutional limit of ten days, are the Trade Dollar Redemption bill and the Anti-Polygamy bill. The President has vetoed 101 measures during the session just closed, nearly or quite all of them very properly.

The aggregate of the appropriations made by the regular appropriation bills passed by the Forty-ninth Congress, is about $250,000,000. This is exclusive of the sums appropriated by the River and Harbor and Deficiency appropriation bills, which failed of enactment. The appropriations for the current fiscal year aggregate $264,000,000, which amount would have been equalled by the appropriations voted by the last Congress had the two bills mentioned become laws.

The public debt statement shows a reduction during Second Month, of $1,436,782. Cash in the Treasury, $561,278,209.

The State Department is informed that the cholera has been officially declared epidemic at Montevideo.

The Treasury Department decides "that the wife of a Chinese laborer is a person whose original entry into this country is prohibited by the Chinese Restriction act."

A slight earthquake shock was felt at Charleston, South Carolina, at a quarter past two o'clock on the morning of the 4th instant. The shock was also felt at Summerville, Oakley, Midway and other points in the lower section of the State.

Harvard College has recently come into possession of a bequest of $230,000, "which is applicable only for purposes of special astronomical investigation, at such an elevation as to be free, so far as practicable, from the impediments to accurate observations which occur in observatories now existing, owing to atmospheric influence." It is likely that an observatory will be established in the Southern hemisphere under the bequest.

The largest gold nugget ever found in California is stated by the Grass Valley (Cal.) Union to have been picked up in Downieville, Sierra County, Eighth Mo. 21st, 1866. It weighed 5000 ounces, and its estimated value was $90,000. The great Ballerant (Australian) nugget was valued at $60,000. The finder of the California nugget, J. A. Finney, known as "Old Virginia," afterwards went to Washoe, and Virginia City is said to have received when the silver deposits were discovered, its name from his. He died in extreme poverty.

In the Rhode Island House of Representatives on the 4th instant, a resolution to submit a woman suffrage constitutional amendment to the people was carried, 52 to 7. A resolution proposing an amendment repealing the Prohibitory article was indefinitely postponed.

At a meeting of the Hotel and Saloon Keepers' Union in this city on the 2nd instant, a circular headed "The Fallacy of High License" was distributed, "to show that the size of the license fee has little or no perceptible effect in determining the number of saloons."

Henry Ward Beecher died at his home in Brooklyn, N. Y., on the 8th instant. He was in the 74th year of his age.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 391, which was 63 less than during the previous week, and 14 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the whole number 208 were males and 183 females; 206 adults and 185 minors; 64 died of consumption; 32 of pneumonia; 26 of diseases of the heart; 25 of convulsions; 17 of debility; 17 of meningitis; 14 of marasmus; 11 of croup; 10 of apoplexy, and 10 of old age.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½'s, 109½; 4's, registered, 127½; coupon, 128½; 3's, 101; currency 6's, 126½ a 136½.

Cotton was in limited request at 9½ cts. for middling uplands.

Feed was scarce and firm, with a very moderate inquiry. Quotations: Bran, western winter, spot, per ton, $18 a $19; do, spring, spot, $17 a $17.50; red middlings, $16 a $17; white middlings, $17 a $19.

Petroleum was quiet but steady at 6½ cts. for 70 Abel test in barrels, and 8½ cts. for 110 test in cases.

Potatoes were in liberal supply, but ruled dull at former rates: White potatoes, per bushel: Early Rose, choice, 58 a 60 cts.; Early Rose, fair, 50 a 52; 53 a 55 cts.; White Stars, choice, 50 a 53 cts.; White Stars, fair to good, 45 a 48 cts.; Burbanks, choice, 50 a 53 cts.; Burbanks, fair to good, 45 a 48 cts.; Hebrons, choice, 53 a 55 cts.; Hebrons, fair to good, 48 a 50 cts.; Mammoth Pearl, choice, 50 a 53 cts.; Mammoth Pearl, fair to good, 45 a 48 cts.; Peerless, as to quality, 45 a 50 cts.

Flour and Meal.—Demand for flour continued of a hand to mouth character, but prices ruled steady. Sales of 250 barrels Ohio, clear, at $4; 375 barrels Ohio and Indiana, straight, at $4.25 a $4.40; 500 barrels winter patent, at $4.65 a $4.85; 125 barrels Minnesota, clear, at $4, and 500 barrels do. patent, at $4.75 a $5. Rye flour was quiet at $3 per barrel for choice.

Grain.—Wheat was in good demand and advanced; No. 2 red closing at 92 cts. bid and 92½ cts. asked. Rye was dull at 53½ cts. per bushel for No. 2 Pennsylvania. Corn advanced, No. 2 mixed closing at 47½ cts. bid, and 47½ cts. asked. Oats: No. 2 white closed at 36½ cts. bid and 36½ cts. asked.

Beef cattle were ¼c. lower, at 3 a 5½ cts. Sheep were ¼c. lower, at 3½ a 5½ cts. Lambs were unchanged, 4½ a 7 cts. Hogs were inactive and ¼c. higher. Western, at 8½ a 8½ cts.; State, at 7½ a 7½ cts.

FOREIGN.—It is officially announced that Sir Michael Hicks-Beach has resigned the office of Chief Secretary for Ireland, and that Arthur J. Balfour, Secretary of State for Scotland, has been appointed to succeed him. The resignation of Sir Michael is understood to have been on account of the formation of cataracts on his eyes.

Sir William Vernon Harcourt writes to the Times to show that the troubles in Ireland arise from the attempt of the Government to enforce the payment of rents which their own Land Commission has declared the people are unable to pay. He quoted from speeches of Sir Michael Hicks-Beach and other Conservatives, made last year, in which it was admitted that if Parnell was able to prove the premises of his Tenants' Relief bill, the Government would be bound to attempt to supply a remedy. The Land Commission, says the writer, proved Parnell to be in the right, yet the Government, instead of bringing in a bill to deal with judicial rents, proposed fresh coercion measures.

A sensation has been caused in Limerick by extensive incendiarism in the country surrounding the city. A large number of houses occupied by tenants, and the hay and outbuildings belonging to each, were destroyed by fire. As the victims were in all cases persons who had paid their rents, the outrages are set down as political, and great excitement prevails. The aggregate of property destroyed is very large.

Advices received in London on the 2nd instant, from Zanzibar say: The natives of the province of Mozambique, taking advantage of the absence of the Portuguese squadron and troops at Tungi, have risen and devastated trading stations and destroyed many British houses. On the 4th, the Governor of Mozambique telegraphed to Lisbon that the Portuguese gunboats returned to Tungi and bombarded the fortress there. After capturing it they burnt the village of Massingane which the Zanzibaris had fortified.

A telegram from Shanghai says that China has ceded to Germany the Chusan Islands, off the East coast of China, opposite the estuary of Tsién-Tong-Kiang.

On the 1st instant an explosion occurred at the Beauport Colliery near St. Etienne, France. The latest advices from St. Etienne say that there were 104 men entombed in the mine, and that 43 have been recovered and 16 are dead.

On the 6th instant an explosion of fire-damp occurred in a colliery at Quaregnon, four miles from Mons. The explosion shattered the roofs and galleries so that many of them fell. Fifty dead bodies, all terribly burned, have been brought to the surface.

The complete returns, including the supplementary elections in Germany, are as follows:

Conservative, 81; Imperialist, 39; National Liberal, 100; Centre, 97; New German Liberal, 34; Polish, 15; Protesters, 15; Socialist, 11; Guelph, 4; Danish, 1.

The negotiations for a renewal of the treaty of alliance between Italy, Austria and Germany have been suspended owing to the Italian Cabinet crisis. Prince Bismarck is unwilling to renew the alliance unless the Italian policy be guaranteed permanence.

On the 5th instant, six new cases of cholera and four deaths were reported in Catania in twenty-four hours.

On the 2d instant, a rising against the Bulgarian Government took place at Ruskuch and other places in Silesia. It was soon suppressed and the leaders have been executed. A despatch from Sofia to the Vienna Political Correspondence says that the Bulgarian Government has obtained proof that the risings formed a part of a widely laid Zankoffite plot.

The construction of a railway across the desert of Bokhara has been commenced.

A telegram received in Bombay on the 3d instant from Lahore, reports that the Ameer of Afghanistan is raising a new army in preparation for war.

Another outbreak at Mauna Loa, in the Hawaiian Islands, is reported. At last accounts all the craters were in a state of great activity.

BIBLE ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS.

The Board of Managers are desirous of completing two sets of the Reports made to the association. Any Friend who has either of the following numbers, will confer a favor by sending them to the Depository, No. 116 N. Fourth Street, viz: For the years 1830—33—40—41—43—54—73.

NOTICE TO PARENTS AND OTHERS INTENDING TO SEND CHILDREN TO

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

The rooms used for the accommodation of the girls in the new building, during the present session, have been uncomfortably crowded; and they will be lessened by the removal of the nursery building preparatory to the erection of the West Wing. It has consequently been found necessary to limit the number of girls to be admitted next session. As those now at the school who are expecting to return will occupy all the rooms suitable for their use, it has been concluded to decline further applications for the Summer Session.

By direction of the Committee,

JONATHAN G. WILLIAMS,
Superintendent.

Third Mo. 4th, 1887.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE CONTRIBUTORS TO THE ASYLUM.

A Stated Annual Meeting of the "Contributors to the Asylum for the Relief of Persons Deprived of the Use of their Reason," will be held Fourth-day, the 16th of Third Month, 1887, at 3 o'clock, P. M., at Arch Street Meeting-house, Philadelphia.

THOMAS SCATTERGOOD, Clerk.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

A meeting of the Committee on Admissions, will be held in the Committee-room, Fourth and Arch Streets, on Seventh-day the 19th instant, at 10 o'clock A. M.

JOHN W. BIDDLE, Clerk.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

Until further notice the stage will connect with the 7.02 and 9.03 morning trains from Broad St., to convey passengers to the School; and at other times when timely notice is sent to J. G. WILLIAMS, Supt.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE.

Near Frankford, (Twenty-third Ward,) Philadelphia.

Physician and Superintendent—JOHN C. HALL, M. D. Applications for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board of Managers.

DIED, in Philadelphia, on the 13th of Twelfth Month, 1886, SARAH W. FRENCH, wife of Joseph C. French, in her 74th year, a member of Frankford Monthly Meeting. This dear Friend was frequently engaged in preparation for the final change awaiting her. Not as she said, that the prospect produced sadness at any time, but a feeling of solemnity with the command to "Watch and pray." Her friends are consoled with the belief that in her dying hour the "Everlasting Arms" were her support.

—, at Farmersville, Leeds Co., Ontario, Canada, First Mo. 7th, 1887, ANNA WILTSIE, aged 73 years and 10 months, a member and elder of Leeds Monthly Meeting of Friends. She was an exemplary mother, being a pattern of patience and meekness, and was beloved by all. She has left her friends the comforting assurance that her end was peace.

—, Second Mo. 6th, 1887, DEBORAH C. HATTON, widow of the late Thomas Hatton, in the 79th year of her age, a member and elder of Goshen Monthly Meeting of Friends, Chester Co., Pa.

—, at the residence of her brother-in-law, David Thomas, Harrisville, Harrison Co., Ohio, on the 16th of Second Mo. 1887, SARAH EDOBERTS, daughter of Anna M., and the late Joseph Edgerton, in the 27th year of her age, a member of Harrisville Particular and Short Creek Monthly Meeting. Through Divine help she was enabled to bear a protracted and very painful illness, with a remarkable degree of patience and resignation; and was favored to contemplate approaching dissolution in the confident hope of a glorious immortality.

Fourth Mo. 7th, 1851. Have been instructed this afternoon in reading the life of Jane Pearson, in Friends' Library, vol. 14th. The exercises and deep inward conflicts she passed through, before she was made willing to obey and follow her dear Master; also her remarks respecting the ministry, or preparation for it—not running before the time or lagging behind; with her language to minds that are resigned and devoted to their Lord, were all very comforting to the tossed state I am, at times, left in. One of her assurances to such was, "Fear not; the time will come when you will not doubt respecting the Lord's will."

Fifth Mo. 18th. Our meeting this morning was a solemn one, particularly the closing part of it. After dropping a few words which seemed to rest with weight on my mind, dear — followed in supplication sweetly and solemnly. Were it not for a little glimpse and measure of that peace which the dear Master gave unto his disciples, and left with them, where would we be when distress and fear seem ready to overwhelm!

27th. Attended, yesterday, Springfield Meeting. It was an exercising meeting. Oh, the strait this poor one was brought into! my very soul is humble and prostrated in remembrance of it. If I disobeyed Thy command to approach Thy mercy seat, O Heavenly Father! be pleased to regard with an eye of tender compassion my shortcoming; seeing Thou knowest that I desire not wilfully to disobey! but O! the fears that Thou has not chosen me, or appointed for this great work.

Sixth Mo. 26th. Afresh given to feel, on assembling with my friends this morning, my inability for anything good. But as I patiently waited upon the Lord, He inclined unto me, and heard my cry. A voice saluted my inward ear, saying: "Eye hath not seen nor ear heard," &c. In much fear I dropped what arose: fearing to give, and fearing to withhold.

Seventh Mo. 31st. Arose this morning comforted in feeling; and my faith and hope afresh confirmed, in being made to feel and know that our God is a prayer-hearing God; and that He does condescend to our low estate. In my sleep last night, I was brought into company with that servant of the Lord, Elizabeth Pitfield, who spake peace to my troubled soul, telling me "no longer to doubt," &c. I thought when preparing for meeting, now if dear E. P. should only be there, my faith would be confirmed! Still I had no expectation of seeing one who was twenty miles off. We went early, and who should we find there, but this very friend! I could hardly believe it possible, but so it was; and I was no longer to doubt. Early after taking my seat, the language arose: "Be not faithless, but believing." Like doubting Thomas, thou has seen the print of the nails, and hast thrust thy hand into His side. I was instructed; believing it was intended for myself. After dear Elizabeth had spoken and taken her seat it revived, and with such force that it seemed I must hand it forth to some poor soul who had been, through our friend, closely ministered unto. I did so, but in fear and trembling. Keep me, O Heavenly Father!

Eighth Mo. 7th. A small meeting. Felt on taking my seat so clothed with the infirmities of the flesh, as to be assured that unless there was an earnest engagement of heart to seek the Lord for help and strength, vain was it for me to present myself before Him. As I earnestly sought, a little saving help seemed mercifully afforded; so that I can say, my meeting was a comfortable one: but not through any power or might of my own. "The Lord is good unto all them that wait for Him, to the soul that seeketh Him."

[In the memorandum, under date of Ninth Mo. 1st, our friend alludes to going from home, and meanwhile attending the funeral of a relative; and then subjoins the following in relation thereto:]

It affords another instance of the mercy, the long forbearance of Him, who waiteth to be gracious. My heart is tendered under a fresh sense of it; accompanied with sincere and fervent desires, that my poor life may be spared till the great work for which this uncertain probation is given, may be accomplished.

Ninth Mo. 7th. It may not be improper here to note that the 29th of last month was the time fixed for the execution of poor George —, before alluded to. The last words he uttered were, "God be merciful to me a sinner." How full, and how impressive! It was thought by those who were much with him, that there was a decided change in him the latter part of his life. I can but believe that a place of repentance was found. Would that that law could be changed; and imprisonment for life substituted. There is something very awful to me in thus sending a never-dying soul into a never-ending eternity.

16th. I believe it will be right for me here to note, that a concern I have been wading under for months past, and heavily so at times, is of entering as a caretaker of the girls at Westtown School. It is a situation I have much shrunk from; and when alive to my many weaknesses and inability, I have been ready to say, I can never do it. But if only strengthened to "go in the name of the Lord," He will be found sufficient. The last of this week the Committee meet; when I shall know whether I am to go or not. May the Lord direct, and not suffer it unless it be his blessed and holy will! "If thy presence go not with me, carry me not up hence."

19th. For the two past days, I have enjoyed, may I not say, a little sabbath of rest to my weary soul. I feel bound to acknowledge that, "the Lord is a rich rewarder of all those who diligently seek Him." For a little act of dedication to my dear Master, in a family sitting at our dear friend James Emlen's, how has my peace flowed as a river! May I never be ashamed of owning my dear Saviour! or else I shall justly incur the sentence which came nigh, even on this occasion, of resting upon me: "He that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much: and he that is unjust in the least, is unjust also in much." Of course it is the latter part I mean; though the whole of it, I heard as plainly, as though a voice had spoken it audibly.

21st. First-day.—An exercising meeting this morning. While trying to get ready to follow my dear Master, the meeting closed. So that I brought away with me my exercises, in sorrow and with a heavy heart. Make me, dearest Father! "instant in season" at thy word of command; and also "strong to labor." May there be "no breaking in or going out;" and "no complaining in our streets."

26th. Received information this week, of my appointment at Westtown. In five weeks, should I live, I must enter upon my duty there. May I be strengthened to fulfil it both to God and man. I have not been able to see how I am to get along; yet I do know "help is laid on One who is mighty," and able to save even unto the uttermost.

Eleventh Mo. 6th. This is now the fourth day since coming to my new home. So far have been helped and cared for beyond my deserts. Be with me and care for me, O Heavenly Father, that I offend not the precious life in any, even to the least child in this large family. Keep me on every hand; that so thy kingdom may be alone exalted in, by, and through me, thy poor unworthy child.

9th. During our meeting this morning, a little fresh sense of the goodness and mercy of our Heavenly Father was given, and the canopy of his love seemed to overspread; under which breathings arose, that his protecting providence might be round about us, and keep and preserve on every hand. Some of us do feel and know, O Heavenly Father! that from Thee all our fresh springs flow; and that our life and all that we possess, are in thy hands.

13th. I find myself surrounded with many cares; but can say through and under all, the bent and desire of my soul is, to be found serving and honoring Thee, O Heavenly Father! that so through me, thy own works may praise Thee, and that the creature may be more and more humbled and laid as in the dust. Have been made to feel afresh my inability for any good thing.

17th. Thou alone, O dearest Father! can perfect and carry on thy own work. Thus do for me, and for all and each of us, who go in and out before this thy flock and family; that so thy great name may be honored, magnified and adored, not only now, but henceforth and forever.

At our afternoon meeting yesterday, we had the company and labors of our dear friends Yardley and Hannah Warner. He was engaged in testimony, quoting: "Simon son of Jonas, lovest thou me more than these?" "Feed my lambs." "When thou was young, thou girdest thyself and walkest whither thou wouldst; but when thou shalt be old, thou shalt stretch forth thine hand, and another shall gird thee, and carry thee whither thou wouldst not." It was a language some of us could understand. Encouragement flowed to such, to hold fast faith and confidence; and to keep the eye singly staid on the Lord, the alone sure helper. The children, too, were remembered, and suitable counsel given. After the foregoing, Yardley followed in supplication—short, yet full. Mouth and wisdom, tongue and utterance were given, to plead on our behalf. It was the breathings of my burdened soul, that a sight and sense of our undone condition might be given; with the need we all have of a Saviour; for in us, dwelleth no good thing, &c.

20th. Yesterday I suffered a little hard feeling toward a sister to arise, to my loss. Almost immediately on taking my seat in meeting this morning, the Scripture presented: "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one for another." I felt the rebuke, knowing that I could not, while at enmity with any one, be a disciple of Him, who endured such contradiction of sinners; and who "when reviled, reviled not again," &c. May the future be marked with increased carefulness, is the secret desire of my heart.

Twelfth Mo. 4th. I remembered as I took up my pen, that "The life is more than meat." May my little memorandum not stand in the letter only, but in the life. For the last few days we have had the company of many dear friends; it being the time for our committee to meet here. Their company and labors have been comforting and strengthening. Dear Samuel Bettle and William Evans, both separately paid me a little visit in my room. Samuel told me that he "did not come in to preach to me;" but he did truly. May I treasure up, profit and improve by his concern: and while I am caring for others, not neglect caring for myself. True it is, as dear Samuel told me, there is no standing still in our Christian journey.

In the evening collection after our reading, dear Wm. Evans spoke so suitably to the dear children! Such a communication in my youthful days, how it would have melted and tendered my spirit! Should be glad could I see more of a broken heart and contrite spirit, manifest among the dear children now. But the Lord is able for his own work; and I have a secret hope that He "will yet work, and who shall let it." In the collection I read the 103rd Psalm, or part of it, finishing with: "But the mercy of the Lord is from everlasting to everlasting upon them that fear Him, and his righteousness unto children's children; to such as keep his covenant, and to those that remember his commandments to do them." This dear William commenced with, and spoke so well; he finished with a little word, I thought, for some of us who often go on our way weary and heavy laden. This has been a day of favor. May fruits answerable thereto, be brought forth.

Many things may be expedient, but to learn to die is the one most emphatically needful.

During the residence of our author at the Court of Teherán, he spent a few weeks of each summer amid the wild mountain scenery of the Elburz to the North. He describes the journey to the Lar Valley, which lies at the foot of the majestic peak of Demavénd; as being over a narrow and dangerous track, and along the edge of precipices. The pass at which the mountain chain was passed is 13,000 feet above the sea.

The Lar Valley is in reality the bed of an enormous crater. At some remote period volcanic peaks have been upheaved above its crust, of which the mightiest is Demavénd. Though this has been quiet for ages, yet the sulphur constantly forming at its top, and the vapor and heat below the surface, show that it is not entirely dormant. Near the camp of the party, in the valley, was a group of 40 intermittent boiling springs; and not far removed are two apertures from which came a deep, perpetual and mysterious roaring. No one has ever ventured down to see what is transpiring below; for a mephitic gas of deadly potency exhales from the openings in the rock. Around the rock there is ever a score or two of birds which have fallen dead on inhaling the air; when our author visited the spot, a dead bear was lying at the entrance.

An interesting feature in the Lar Valley, was the presence of one of the Nomadic tribes, which to the number of nearly a million persons, under different names and in distinct clans roam over the wilds with numerous herds and flocks. Irregular as their movements may seem, they are yet guided by invariable laws and habits. When the Lar Valley is covered with snow, they resort to a district southeast of Teherán. When summer comes round, they scale the wild passes that surround Demavénd and allow their flocks to nibble the herbage of the valleys. By a sort of unwritten law each family recognizes the rights of others, and pitches its black goat-hair tent in the same place from year to year. Every night the flocks are counted, and each month the tax-collector comes round and gathers the monthly levy of three cents on every sheep.

These nomads are a thrifty set; and by the sale of butter and cheese, of mutton and wool, and textile stuffs which are woven by the women, they manage to live, and to accumulate enough to endow their daughters with flocks and jewels. Those in Northern Persia are generally a peaceable, inoffensive class; but the tribes in Central and Southern Persia are treacherous and turbulent, addicted to bloodshed and robbery. Some of them are astonishingly skillful in thieving—A Persian dignitary travelling among them gathering taxes was reading in his tent; his back was supported by cushions; he bent forward a moment to bring his book nearer to the light, but when he leaned back again, he found the cushions had been removed, and he fell flat on his back. The mattress on which a man and his wife were sleeping has actually been taken by these rogues. When the pair awoke in the morning, they found themselves on opposite sides of the tent, their bed vanished, spirited away, whither and how and by whom they knew not.

We read in the Scripture of ink-horns as far back as the time of Ezekiel. They are still in use in Asia, with scarcely any change, from the Mediterranean to the Indies. The pen is made of a special kind of reed, the size of a pencil. This sort of pen suggested a black, glossy ink, thickened with a bunch of linen thread to prevent too rapid flow. It is more easily effaced than European ink, and is carried in a small oblong metallic case, closed with a minute lid, which in turn is enclosed in a long case containing the pens. To these are invariably added a seal, on which is engraved the name of the scribe, or of the person for whom a document is written. The seal has a little ink rubbed on the surface with the finger, and is then applied to the paper or parchment on a spot that has been first slightly moistened. The cutting of seals is one of the most important of the minor arts of the East, and especially of Persia. It may be doubted whether in all Europe a lapidary can be found equal in this art to the chief of engravers in Teherán. Everyone in Persia, from the humblest mule-driver to the Shah himself, is provided with his signet-ring or seal, without the impression of which no document can be accepted as authentic.

Every great man is attended by a secretary, who carries in his belt an ink-horn. Being ordered to write something, he drops on his knees and takes out a roll of paper and the ink-horn. He has no other desk than his left hand, which holds the paper. He writes from right to left diagonally across the page, leaving a wide margin. If the document is not completed when the bottom of the page is reached, the writing is continued in the margin in short lines at right angles, running around the page like a border.

The Persian ink-horns are made of papier-maché, in the form of an even-sided, oblong box with slightly convex top, from 8 to 12 inches in length, and about 2 inches, more or less, in width. One end pulls open, and discloses a drawer extending the entire length, which contains the brass ink-holder and pens.

The prevailing religion of Persia is Mahomedan, and the people, when excited, are among the most fanatical of the followers of the Prophet. But they have as little religious unity with the Turks and Arabs, as existed in Puritan times between Papists and Protestants. This is the result of political dissensions that arose after the death of Mahomet, and has led to the division of Mahometans into two great sects—the Sunnees and the Sheáhs. The Turks and Afghans, the Arabs and most of the Moguls of Northern India, are Sunnees; they consider that the caliphate descended from the Prophet through Omár, Abú Bekr, Osmán and the house of Moaviyéh. The Persians are Sheáhs; they consider that the heritage of the caliphate vested in Alee, the son-in-law of Mahomed and his posterity. The law of both sects is based on the Koran, and both look forward to a reformer of the faith called by both the Mahdée, who shall reunite all the believers in one orthodox creed. Hence the intense and profound anxiety that was exhibited by the entire Mahometan world in the late so-called Mahdée. If he had succeeded in conquering Egypt, all the sects and races of Islám might have rallied to his support.

That a difference in opinion on an historical question, such as the right of succession to the power of Mahomed, which excited the passions of people more than a thousand years, should prove a source of bitter and irreconcilable antagonism after so many generations, seems very unreasonable to our minds. The power which it still exerts on the Persian people, is shown especially in the season of the year when Hossein, the son of Alee was murdered. Then processions parade the streets at all hours, shouting, "Ya Hossein, ya Hossein!" Our author describes a troop of 60 men who passed his gate on such an occasion in 1884. They were stripped to the middle, and all smote their bare bosoms with their right hands. Their bosoms were raw from the oft-repeated blows: all carried naked swords or daggers in their left hands, with which they gashed themselves. As they strode rapidly along in this manner from street to street, they continually shouted or groaned, "Ya Hossein!"

In commemoration of the death of Hossein, dramatic representations of the event are annually exhibited on a grand scale, for many days in succession; which are attended by immense multitudes; and serve to keep alive the fervor of the people.

Persian law is divided into departments—one founded on the Koran and administered by the priests; and the other administered by secular judges who decide cases according to common sense and traditions, or precedents orally handed down. The cases coming before the secular judges are mostly those of a criminal nature. The Persian Code descends into great detail, and consists of a vast collection of dicta applying to every conceivable situation in life. There are 549 laws relating to religious worship; 1012 concerning fasting and pilgrimage; 625 titles of the law of sales; 212 respecting bankruptcy and mortgage; 1412 concerning marriage and divorce; 1259 that speak of penalties, retaliation and blood-money, &c., &c.

As to the future political condition of Persia, S. Benjamin regards its principal danger to be from the ambition of Russia, its neighbor to the north, which under one pretext or another has already absorbed part of the country; and whose greed for territory seems to be as insatiable as that of Great Britain in the Indies; or of the trespassers on the Indian reservations in our own country. The Scriptures and the Spirit.

WATCHFULNESS.

The Scriptures, though highly to be prized, are, when in the hands of fallible men, greatly liable to false interpretations. The more sure Word of prophecy coming immediately from God, through the Holy Spirit, is more reliable, as it passes through no adulterated channel, and hence is infallible. The Scriptures are a written declaration given under the infallible Spirit, and they testify of Christ. But I fear that many now, as in former days, in their much searching of them, almost think that in them they have eternal life; and hence fail to come to Christ that they might have life. And I also fear that many are wresting the Scriptures to their own destruction. But when rightly understood they certainly are very profitable for doctrine, for proof, for instruction in righteousness, &c., and should be prized above all books, but never idolized.

We still have the same infallible Spirit that the original writers of the Scriptures had; and it is able to enlighten our understandings so that we may see the deep things of God, as contained in the Scriptures, in their primitive clearness. And if we would rely more on that, and less on the wisdom of fallible men, we would be more free from the bewildering disputations of uninspired men, and see more eye to eye, as we would have more of the unerring light to guide us. But it seems lamentably true, that many are turning so outward, and so away from the love and grace of God, that they seek for interpretations of the Scriptures more from the light and wisdom of fallible men, than from the Spirit that gave them; and so they are placing the Scriptures equal with, if not before the Spirit; and saying that Robert Barclay made a great mistake in calling the Scriptures a secondary rule, subordinate to the Spirit. So God is leaving them to their choice; and leanness and darkness are taking the place of light and life. Thus the Scriptures are exalted and placed higher than they put themselves; but the writings of our worthy forefathers are insidiously put down; and that by some who still claim the honorable name by the which we are called.

There is a great and a fatal mistake made by many, I fear, in taking the promises of Scripture that belong to the children of God, and applying them to the children of men. And thus becoming content in a delusive rest and peace which belong only to the children of God. And the emissaries of Satan are glad to see an undisturbed rest. For when his opposers come out with an honest and holy zeal against him, they are denounced, and cried down as fault finders and disturbers of the unity. But Christ "came not to send peace on the earth but a sword." (Matt. x. 34.) And his disciples should have on the whole armor of God, that with the sword of the Spirit they may successfully fight against the rulers of the darkness of this world; and against spiritual wickedness in high places. But above all, they must have on the shield of faith, wherewith they will be able to quench all the fiery darts of the wicked. For the Christian's life is a state of warfare until an overcoming is experienced, and the strong man who is well armed with opinions and arguments, is cast out, and all his goods spoiled.

But then, even though the man of God is thoroughly furnished with all good works, he had better keep the armor of watchfulness on, lest the enemy, in some weak or unguarded place should again enter, and make the last state of that man to be worse than the first. Paul had to watch, and to keep his bodily propensities in subjection, lest after he had preached to others, he himself should become a castaway. But he was told that God's grace was sufficient for him, and so it will be for us, if we keep under the protecting influence of it: though the buffetings of Satan, or something comparable to a thorn in the flesh, may still be permitted to try us, lest we be exalted above measure through the abundant revelation of the love and grace of God. So Paul said he would rather glory in his infirmities, that the power of Christ might rest upon him. For he found that when he was weak in the flesh, he was strong in the Spirit. And we, by obedience to the grace of God, become stronger and stronger in Him, and so better enabled to deny ourselves of all ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to take up our daily cross and follow Him in the way of regeneration, instead of following the evil one, and being led by him in the broad way of the world to destruction.

I believe that the enemy of all righteousness is making many inroads among the professors of religion, by setting up a transformed light, and so blinding the eyes of many who are seeking the way to the Kingdom of Heaven, as to cause them to take it for the true light. He sees that the true religious light, and life and strength are low; and he can, in our weak condition, easily induce us to substitute a human life, and a false light, and under the deceivableness of unrighteousness, act from that, instead of the Divine life. So he persuades those who are forward in prayer and singing, that it is from the Spirit and the understanding that the Lord gives, when it is only from human activity and life, and from the spirit and the understanding that man gives. Thus we have been imperceptibly drawn from the sure foundation, until strangers have devoured our strength and we know it not; for great is the "deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish."

Christ told his disciples that when He, the Spirit of truth is come, He would guide them into all truth, and show them things to come. So we may be led into all truth, by the Spirit of Truth, or we may be led into all error, by the spirit of error, according as we prefer and obey. So our salvation is through obedience, and of our own choice. Then choose ye this day which ye will serve: for we cannot serve both. "How long halt ye between two opinions? If the Lord be God, follow Him; but if Baal, then follow him." But does not the following of Baal lead into confusion, and away from the quiet habitation, where we can at times see and hear the King in his beauty, saying in a still small voice, "this is the way, walk ye in it," when ye turn to the right hand, or when ye turn to the left.

The grace or love of God would teach us, if we would be taught by it, not to be conformed to this world, that lies in wickedness; but to be transformed, by the renewings of our minds, that we may prove for ourselves, by individual experience, what the good and acceptable and perfect will of God is concerning us. But since the present "revival" movements have gained such an acceptance amongst us, are we not becoming more and more conformed to the world, in its manner of dress and language? and in its ostentatious shows and pastimes? And in the ministry, music, and formal worships of other denominations? Do these things prove that we are transformed or changed from earthly to heavenly things, as our forefathers were? When I was young, I found no difficulty in distinguishing one of our ministers by his dress, manners or language, from a lawyer who made no pretensions to religion. But how is it now? If it has not come to this in some places, I believe there are places where this revolutionizing spirit will not rest satisfied until everything that distinguishes us from other religious denominations is taken out of the way, or leveled down to the broad platform of the world. I may be thought to be too hard; but I speak from what I see and hear, and know to be true in places. Though it may not be as general as I fear it is. But it will do no harm for all to be on the guard; for a little leaven may be permitted to leaven the whole lump. But I know all is under the control of Him who can say, "thus far shalt thou go and no farther." Do we seek first the Kingdom of Heaven, and the righteousness of God; or do we seek first the things of this world, and the glory of it, and act upon them, and go in conformity with the world? By their fruits ye shall know them. D. H.

C. G. Finney next adduces the petition of about 1400 citizens of Connecticut, addressed to the Legislature of that State in 1833, relative to "extra-judicial oaths;" also an abstract of the evidence taken before the Committee then appointed, together with their report. Among the facts shown by the testimony were these,—"that the proportion of funds disposed of for charitable purposes is extremely small, while the lodges are scenes of extravagant mirth and bacchanalian revelry, and the admission, passing, and raising of candidates, occasions of much indecent sport and ridiculous merriment, accompanied with mock murders, feigned discoveries, and profane and blasphemous ceremonies and representations.*

In their report to the General Assembly the Committee say, that they believe "the administration of such oaths [as the ritual provides] to be highly improper, and that the same should be prohibited by legal enactments. Our reasons for this opinion are: 1. Because they are unauthorized by law. 2. Because they bind the person to whom they are administered to disregard and violate the law. 3. Because they are, in their natural tendency, subversive of public morals, and blasphemous. 4. Because the penalties attached to the breach of them are such as are entirely unknown to our law, and are forbidden both by the Constitution of the United States and by the Constitution of this State."

To the writer of this essay, while it is an unpleasant task to refer in any other than general terms to the oaths and penalties of the Masonic order; yet when he reflects that there are those of our own Society who have followed this delusion, and not a few who are exposed to the danger of being led into it, it may not be wise to omit some specific allusion to the wording of those penalties.

The first of the oaths is that of the "entered apprentice," the candidate, standing on both his knees, with his hands on the Bible, promising in the name of God, "without the least equivocation, mental reservation, or self-evasion of mind in me whatever," "ever to conceal and never reveal," except to a brother Mason, any of the secrets, arts, and mysteries of Freemasonry; "binding myself under no less a penalty than to have my throat cut across, my tongue torn out by the roots, and my body buried in the sands of the sea at low-water mark, where the tide ebbs and flows twice in twenty-four hours." It is unnecessary to remark upon this, other than to quote Finney's apposite comment: "And now we are told by one of the highest Masonic authorities, that, to suppose that Masonic oaths mean anything in these days, is simply absurd. Then, surely they are blasphemy."

The oath of the third degree, or Master Mason, is a very long one, specifying amongst other things, that the candidate binds himself to fly to the relief of a brother Mason when in distress, to observe the law of charity and of chastity toward every Master Mason, and the family of such, and that the secrets of a brother when given in charge, to remain as secure and inviolable as in his own breast, murder and treason excepted. The penalty prescribed for the violation of this obligation is of a similar horrible character to the foregoing, and so may be left unrepeatd. It will thus be seen, that whereas our Divine Master commands the law of love, charity and forgiveness toward all mankind, even those who may be our enemies, the creed of the Master Mason, on the other hand, tends to selfishly restrict these virtues to his own fellows; and whereas, the obligation to purity and chastity, both under the law and the gospel revelation, is laid equally upon every son and daughter of Adam, that of the Master Mason in simply promising to regard those of his own order, is well described as "an odious partiality, and does not imply even the semblance of virtue." As to relieving a brother Mason in distress, considered in relation to the administration of justice, I quote again from Finney:

"Cases are reported as having repeatedly occurred in the administration of justice, where this hailing sign of distress has prevailed to rescue the guilty. In another part of this oath, you will observe, the candidate swears that he will apprise a brother Master Mason of approaching danger, if within his power. This binds a Master Mason to give a criminal notice, if he understands that he is about to be arrested. If the sheriff has a writ for the arrest of a brother Master Mason, this oath lays him under an obligation not to arrest him, but to give him notice that if he does not keep out of the way, he shall be obliged to arrest him. If the magistrate who issued the writ is a Master Mason, his oath obliges him to give the criminal Master Mason warning, so that he may evade the execution of the writ. * * If a Master Mason is suspected of a crime, and his case comes before a justice of the peace who is a Master Mason, or before a grand jury upon which there is a Master Mason, or before a court or petit jury in which are Master Masons, if they keep inviolate their oath it is impossible to reach the execution of the law. * * If Freemasons deny this [concealing secrets relating to crimes] in the denial they maintain that Masons care nothing for their oaths. It is self-evident that this Master's oath is either a conspiracy against the execution of the law, or Master Masons care nothing for the solemnity of an oath." They are hence advised to take either horn of the dilemma they may prefer.

In concluding this part of his treatise, Finney explains that he has given so much place to it, because probably two-thirds of the Masons in the United States had, (as was the case with himself,) gone no further than this (third) degree. He calls pointed attention to the concluding clause of the cunning oath, which binds the candidate, "that if any part of this solemn oath and obligation be omitted at this time, I will hold myself amenable thereto, whenever informed." He further speaks of the agony of mind which was experienced by a conscientious correspondent, who in taking the oath as to keeping a Master Mason's secrets, "murder and treason excepted," was not tendered that clause. He said "that his mind was so distressed, in view of his Masonic obligations and relations, that he was wholly unable to attend to business, and that he should become deranged if he could not escape from these entanglements—that he must and would renounce Freemasonry at all hazards." Happy they who, to rid themselves of every entanglement and perplexity, straightway step out from such dark surroundings into the light of the "glorious liberty of the children of God."

Wonders of Dreams.

A prominent Philadelphia physician, who, as a specialist in diseases of the brain has a wide reputation, is engaged in writing a little book about dreams and dreamers. In a discursive mood the doctor talks about the physiological phenomenon commonly spoken of as dreams in a most entertaining way. "Generally," said he, the other evening, "we think of nothing so swift as the electric current, and yet a flash of lightning is a slow coach compared with the rapidity with which, upon occasions, the human brain operates. Nothing shows this in so striking a manner as the wonderful performances of the mind in dreams. The events of years, to the most minute detail, are recalled in a second, and purely imaginary events, covering years and decades, are pictured so as to be retained permanently upon the mind, and are conjured up in the hundredth part of a minute. Some years ago a friend of mine related to me the particulars of a striking proof of this fact. He had been nursing another friend whose illness was such that he required constant watching. My friend had been at his bedside for nearly ten hours. A little French clock stood in an adjoining room which struck the half hours, and thus gave notice of the time to administer the patient's medicines. At two o'clock a dose of morphia had to be given the sick man, and the nurse was waiting for the little clock to strike. He was very sleepy and could with difficulty keep his eyes open. Presently the first tinkling stroke of the hour sounded. At that moment my friend fell asleep in his chair. He dreamed a most wonderful dream, the details of which it would be tedious to relate just now. The events in the dream were spread over three years, during which time he had been to Paris, to London, to New Orleans, and made innumerable brief trips by land, lake and river. His vision began with an execution, when the dreamer saw his own wife hanged. The most minute details of life and travel and adventure were distinctly portrayed, and my friend estimated that a novel of two big volumes could be written in merely outlining the events of the vision. When he awoke with a start at the climax of the execution he heard the French clock strike one. Supposing that he had been asleep several hours, he felt some alarm. His patient, however, was sleeping quietly, and when he went into the other room to look at the clock he was astonished and incredulous to find that the stroke of the clock he had heard upon awaking was but the second stroke of two o'clock, and that his wonderful dream had occurred between the two strokes of the hour. But this is not at all an unprecedented occurrence. It is related of an English clergyman, who fell asleep in his pulpit during the singing of a psalm before the sermon, that he dreamed the events of a life before he awoke, to find that his slumber had lasted only during the singing of a single line. Canon Knox Little, of Manchester, dreamed that he wrote a hymn. Remembering it upon waking up, he wrote it down on the fly-leaf of a handy book. He then fell asleep again. When he awoke the second time he had forgotten the words of the hymn, and supposing that all of the incident had been a dream, but when he looked at the fly-leaf in the book, he found there, sure enough, the verses he had written down, and which are now incorporated in several hymn-books in England.—Philadelphia Record.

On Prayer.—"The place of prayer is a precious habitation; for I now saw that the prayers of the saints were precious incense; and a trumpet was given me that I might sound forth this language; that the children might hear it, and be invited to gather to this precious habitation, where the prayers of the saints, as precious incense, arise up before the throne of God and the Lamb. I saw this habitation to be safe; to be inwardly quiet when there were great stirrings and commotions in the world.

"Prayer at this day, in pure resignation, is a precious place; the trumpet is sounded, the call goes forth to the church that she gather to the place of pure inward prayer; and her habitation is safe."

REWARD.

Selected.

All joyously down through the golden field
The reapers had come with a shout;
They had cheered each other with word and song,
As their sickles flashed in and out.

And tenderly now fell the day asleep,
And they heard the Master call
Through the starlit silence, "Enter ye in;
My reward is waiting for all."

The palace shone out on the happy night
With its windows all aflame,
Its radiant portals swinging wide
With a "Welcome" for all who came.

With bannered sheaves, with a trumpet's voice,
With the marching of eager feet,
The train swept in through the golden gates,
And up to the royal seat.

But lo! far off in the harvest field,
Weary and sad, and so late,
With a single sheaf, they lingered one,
Still striving to reach the gate.

He had caught the echo of that sweet call
That fell through the holy night,
He had seen the throng from the darkened field
Sweep into the palace-light,

And a cry went up from his sorrowful soul,
"O Master, tarry for me:
Oh, shut not the gates whence the glory streams,
My weary heart breaketh for Thee."

At last to the banqueting-hall he came,
So ragged and old and worn,
His only treasure the one bright sheaf
On his poor bent shoulders borne.

Then the face of the King was tender and grave,
As of one who was hiding a tear;
And he gently questioned, "What wouldst thou,
And what dost thou bring me here?"

Most eager and loving the answer that came:
"I had gone with the reapers at morn,
With longing to bring thee such glorious sheaves
As might even thy palace adorn.

"But scarcely one hour I wrought with the rest
Ere I fell by the wayside alone;
With a fevered brow a pain-racked frame
I lay till the morning was done.

"Sweet children passed by with their sickles small,
They would reap for the King, they said;
I showed them whither the reapers had gone,
And bless'd them as on they sped.

"But when in the noontide's sultry hour
The fever and pain were done,
The rust, alas, my sickle had spoiled,
And the strength of my youth was gone.

"Far off, I could see the victorious ones
With the flash of their blades so keen;
But no words could reach them, and there, alone,
I knew I could only glean.

"The few bright stalks they had left in their haste
I gathered, in weakness, for thee;
And this poor, bare entrance within thy gates
Is all that is left for me."

Then the King rose up from his thronged seat
With a face most sweet to see:
"They also serve who suffer," he said;
"Their reward is still with me.

"Thy sheaf may be small, but thy love was great,
I crown thee victor with this!"—
And lo! in the silence, bending, He pressed
On that brow his signet-kiss.

And the sorrowful gleaner stood—a prince,
Transformed by that wondrous sign,
While a shout ran down through the palace-hall,
"O Love, the guerdon is thine!"

ONE DAY AT A TIME.

Selected.

BY HELEN HUNT JACKSON.

One day at a time! That's all it can be;
No faster than that is the hardest fate;
And days have their limits, however we Begin them too early and stretch them too late.
One day at a time!
It's a wholesome rhyme,
A good one to live by—
A day at a time.

One day at a time! Every heart that aches Knows only too well how long that can seem;
But it's never to-day which the spirit breaks:
It's the darkened future, without a gleam.

One day at a time! A burden too great
To be borne for two can be borne for one;
Who knows what will enter to-morrow's gate?
While yet we are speaking all may be done.

One day at a time! When joy is at height—
Such joy as the heart can never forget—
And pulses are throbbing with wild delight,
How hard to remember that suns must set.

One day at a time! But a single day
Whatever its load, whatever its length:
And there's a bit of precious Scripture to say
That, according to each, shall be our strength.

One day at a time! 'Tis the whole of life:
All sorrow, all joy, are measured therein,
The bound of our purpose, our noblest strife,
The one only countersign, sure to win!
One day at a time!
It's a wholesome rhyme,
A good one to live by,
A day at a time. —The Independent.

Memories of the Prairies.

The pioneers on the prairies found their farms
Not only rich but ready cleared for them.
Not a stick, stump or tree, stood in the way of the plow. Sometimes, it is true, a great stone of gray granite raised its bald head above the grass, a lone witness of strange passages in the unwritten history of these beautiful lands. "Lost stone," or "boulders," or "nigger heads," as they are variously called, form a striking feature on the prairies of central and northern Iowa; but travelling southward, they grow smaller and fewer in number, until they vanish from notice altogether. In Linn County they are plentiful, of every shape and size from that of a small house to a mere pebble. They are always more or less rounded at the corners as if water-worn and mostly have at least one smoothly polished face, frequently with grooves plowed more or less deeply across it. On, or for many feet below the surface of the plain, no place is sure to be without them, and in no situation are they sure to be found. To the practical farmer they are a nuisance to be endured or got rid of as best may be, but to one scientifically or poetically inclined they must ever be of peculiar interest as lonely land-marks pointing back to a time in the uncertain past when ice was king over all these now fertile meadows; for surely it was his frozen hand that tore these vagrant masses away from their rocky foundations in the northern hills, and scattered them here; and to a time, possibly not so very far in the by-gone, when ocean billows rolled unbroken over all these level lands and beat upon shores at the eastern and western hill country, for everywhere heaps of sand or gravel or drift, deep buried or on the surface attest the work of mighty waters.

But the early settlers here as well as elsewhere had difficulties to overcome before their wild lands became well ordered farms or comfortable homesteads. The tough roots of the wild grass wrapped the rich soil in a thick coat of sod that first had to be broken up. For this purpose oxen were almost always used, and great plows, often turning a furrow three feet wide. It was not an uncommon sight to see a team of five or six pair of cattle with their obedient necks bowed under the yoke, slowly moving on before the plow from whose shining shear rolled a continuous sheet of sod perhaps half-a-mile or even a mile in unbroken length: the driver stepping back and forth by the side of his team, shouting to his cattle and swinging his great whip, often cracking it in the air over them with a report that could be heard a mile, and far too often letting it fall with unmeasured force upon the laboring beasts.

The cruelty often meted out to them will surely be remembered when the merciful and the unmerciful receive their rewards.

Breaking prairie was in early times followed as a separate branch of business, and its craftsmen used to pride themselves much on the great accuracy and force with which they could use their whips, and such whips! a lash of plaited thongs eight or ten feet long, swelling towards the middle to near an inch in thickness, then tapering and terminating with a single thong of buckskin or "cracker," was looped to the slender tip of a hickory or ironwood "gad" six or eight feet long, and when wielded by a skillful hand and an unfeeling heart, made an instrument of torture, (or "persuader," as it was ironically called,) of no little power. The great plow had no handles, but was controlled by means of a lever attached to the forward end of the long beam and turning on a fulcrum over a pair of wheels a little back, and moving upon an upright post rising from the hinder part of the beam, to which it could be fastened with a pin at any desired depth.

The sod was usually about two inches thick and was turned over, not smoothly but was as much wrinkled and kinked as it could be; thus it was more exposed to the elements and more effectually killed and rotted, and better prepared to receive the harrow and grain the next spring for the first crop, which was usually wheat, and was sown in the spring with no further preparation than thorough harrowing. Sometimes a "sod crop" of corn was planted on the newly broken land. In this work the most common method was to take an old axe or spade in the right hand with a large pocket of seed suspended conveniently to the left, then following a newly turned furrow, a gash was cut into or through the sod, a few kernels dropped in and the earth pressed back upon them with the foot or another stroke of the axe, and then the work was done until gathering time; for the "sod crop" was never cultivated.

In this way about half an ordinary crop was often produced, but the ground was not left in as good condition for the succeeding one, and it was often thought inexpedient even where the land was already inclosed; but breaking was usually done on the open prairie, and afterward fenced.
No "herd law" had then been thought of; and great droves of cattle and horses ranged these common pastures.

In the early years of settlement, the few cattle of the scattered inhabitants made but little impression on the abundant pasturage, and hay was made plentifully and freely on the open common; but as farm after farm was made and field after field was fenced in, and every one's quota of stock increased, the luxuriant grass was eaten short or trampled down, and the hay maker was forced to seek his meadows within fenced fields, where tame grasses have gradually succeeded the wild, though some of the wild grasses made excellent hay. There was a great variety as well as an abundance of wild grasses upon the prairies of Iowa, and almost every different kind marked some different feature, or quality in the soil upon which it grew: thus, in passing over the treeless plain, one could tell, with almost unerring certainty the character of the soil by observing what grass predominated, and often the line of separation was very distinctly marked. Incidents and Reflections.—No. 121.

SUBMISSION.

When the Patriarch Job was grievously afflicted, he replied to the suggestion of his wife—"What! shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil?" The submissive spirit which breathed in this answer is acceptable in the Divine sight, and ought ever to animate him who loves the Lord and desires to walk in obedience to his will. Indeed, hard as at times it may be to attain to this condition, yet there is great encouragement to strive for it, when we remember the declaration, that all things work together for good to them that fear God. The very trials which now seem grievous may be the channel through which greater blessings will flow; and are sure to yield "peaceable fruits of righteousness" to them who bear them in a proper spirit.

Want of submission really implies a rebellious spirit—not willing to trust the government of ourselves and of all that concerns us in the hands of the Ruler of the Universe. Hence, where it is indulged, it tends to bring a cloud over the mind, and to prevent the clear shining of the Sun of righteousness into the heart. It is recorded of a minister of the Gospel, whose labors had been blessed to his hearers, that he lost a young daughter whom he greatly loved, and grieved immoderately for her loss. He became sensible that the Divine Power which had once attended him, was no longer to be felt in his ministrations; and he sought out an aged woman, who was one of his hearers, and inquired of her, if she still received benefit from his teaching. She replied, that now she could gain nothing from his ministry. A week after, he repeated the inquiry; and the faithful woman told him, that his discourse lacked unction, and that his words were nothing to her; that she had prayed for him, and the feeling that impressed her mind was—"he is joined to his idols." The admonition was not unheeded. He drew from his breast a portrait of the child he had so lamented, and broke it to pieces under his feet; and, it is to be hoped, bowed in submission to the dispensation allotted, in accordance with the prayer of our Holy Redeemer, "not my will, but thine be done."

One of the most touching instances of submission based on childlike faith and trust, that we have ever met with, is that narrated in the Sunday School Times of a tender-hearted, loving child in a New England home. The narrative says:—"He loved as he was loved, and he was worthy of all the love which was given to him. One day, as he was starting out for a ride with his parents, he asked them where they were going; and they told them that they were going to take him up to the new cemetery, a beautiful city of the dead by the river's bank, beyond the town. His bright face grew shadowed, and his little lips quivered, so that his father asked him, "Why, Willie, don't you want to go there?" Quietly the trustful answer came back, "Yes, if you think it best, papa." And they rode on silently, in through the broad gateway; or, along the tree-shaded and turf-bordered avenues. The child seemed strangely quiet, clinging in love to his mother's side, and looking up from time to time with a face that seemed never so beautiful in its restful confidence. As they finally passed out again from the gateway they had entered, the dear child drew a breath of relief, and looking up in new surprise asked: "Why, am I going back with you again?" "Of course you are. Why should you doubt it?" "Why, I thought that when they took little children to the cemetery, they left them there," said that hero-child. And then it was found that with a child's imperfect knowledge, that dear boy had supposed he was being taken, at the call of God, and by the parents whom he loved and trusted, to be buried in the place which he had heard of only as a place of burial. And all by himself he had had the struggle with himself, and had proved the victor. "Yes, yes," you say; "but that was a child's foolish fancy, a mere fear of his imagining." Ay, and the most desperate of all struggles are our struggles with dangers that are unreal. The sorest conflicts for which we must make preparation are conflicts which do not occur; and the battles which we anticipate with direst dread are battles which are never fought. In all the course of life,

Are less than horrible imaginings."

When danger or disease comes upon those who are most dear to us, it is often very hard to bow in submission to the will of Him who doeth all things well. And yet He only knoweth what the end shall be, and what He most effectually promote the real welfare of his children. It has sometimes happened that those who have been raised from the bed of sickness have become alienated from God, and a source of trouble and distress to their friends.

The late Hugh Judge, for many years a valued minister in the Society of Friends, but who, towards the close of his life joined with the followers of Elias Hicks, had a son who was highly esteemed and whom he greatly loved; and who, when about 19 years of age, was very ill, apparently nigh unto death. Anxious that he should not be taken away, the father knelt by his bedside and prayed that the life of his son might be spared. The son did recover from his sickness, but afterwards fell into evil courses.

About the time referred to, a merchant residing at Wheeling, Va., fitted out a boat with store-goods, and made a trading voyage down the river. In the neighborhood of Salina, the boat was observed by two men in a situation which awakened their suspicions. They obtained a small boat and crossed the Ohio to the opposite shore, where it was lying. On inquiring of the crew for the captain, they were told that he had gone overboard in the night, and was missing. The men gave them his name, and said he came from Wheeling. On being further questioned, the boat hands slipped away; leaving the boat deserted. Not long after, a body was discovered, with marks of violence upon it, which was supposed to be that of the captain, as he was never heard of afterwards.

Under the circumstances, the two men at Salina thought it best to sell the boat and its contents. This they did, and wrote to the family, telling them the money would be delivered to the person they should send for it. Hugh Judge's son, who had then recently recovered from his illness, was requested to go to Salina; the money was paid to him, but he never made a return of it to the family. It was supposed that he was enticed by some gamblers, and lost that with which he had been intrusted.

This incident was related to a friend of the writer by one of the members of the family of the missing merchant. It ought to teach us the need of a submissive spirit, even when the life of a beloved relative is at stake; for only He who knoweth the end from the beginning, can tell whether life or death will be the greatest blessing.

That submission which we owe in the first place to the great Ruler of the Universe, extends also in degree to those who are placed over us by his authority. Children must obey their parents, pupils their teachers, and citizens the magistrates. And in the church there is a deference due from the younger and less experienced to those who are further advanced. This is included in the Apostle's advice, "All of you be subject one to another, and be clothed with humility." In accordance with this principle, Isaac Pennington says, "It is the ordinance of the Lord for the weak to receive counsel and help from the strong, and for the lesser to be watched over and blessed by the greater,—by such as more grown in the life and into the power." Marriage in Cairo.

I send a few items on a subject of interest in the East as well as in the West, in modern as well as in ancient times. True, there are some differences in the ceremony of marriage, the preliminaries, courtship, and betrothal, between the East and the West. Still, marriage is marriage, whether it be in Eden, Cairo, or New York.

A young man came from one of our stations in the Delta to Cairo to ask for a girl in the Boarding-school. He had heard of her, but had not seen her. On coming here, after making certain inquiries about her, he asked to see her. This reasonable request was granted in this way: The young man and a friend whom he had brought with him sat with me in a room, and the girl served us with coffee. This she did gracefully, but not without a little embarrassment. The friend of the would-be bride-groom engaged her in conversation while she stood with the tray in her hand, waiting until they slowly sipped the coffee, or, rather, until the young man got a good look at her.

After she left the room I asked the young man what he thought of her now that he had seen her. He expressed his pleasure and satisfaction, and requested me to ask her what she thought of him, and, if she had no objections, to become his betrothed. I had a private interview with her, and informed her of what I had heard of the young man, his business, religion, salary, etc. She asked me only one question, namely, "Is his mother living?" On replying, "No, she is dead," the damsel modestly gave her consent to be engaged to the young man. That night a company of friends met in our home, and after reading the account of Rebekah's engagement from Genesis xxiv, the two young people were engaged, the young man sealing it by giving the girl a present of jewelry.

Some time ago one of our best young men, who had been greatly perplexed about the subject of matrimony, came to me and informed me that he had decided to marry ———, a teacher in one of our schools. He requested me to do him the favor of seeing the girl, and get her consent. In the meantime the brother of the young man called upon me, and begged me to obtain the girl's consent as soon as possible, lest the other members of the family would influence the young man to change his mind. Accordingly I sought a private interview with the damsel, and laid the matter before her in as delicate a manner as my blunt

Such nature would allow me. After a very short pause I was gratified to receive her answer in the affirmative. This I soon communicated to her intended, and after a few weeks they were united in marriage. And, I am glad to add, they seem to be very happy.—W. Harvey in United Presbyterian.

“They Know His Voice.”—A good illustration of this, in the case of other domestic animals, is given by Barrow in his story of his journeys in Africa. The quotation given below is translated from Rosenmüller’s German: “Toward sundown the whole plain was covered with cattle, which upon a certain sign, consisting of a quite peculiar piping tone made by the mouth, came together from all quarters. Upon another piping, the milk kine separated themselves from the herd, and came together to be milked. . . . In the morning, the herds go off to the pastures upon another similar signal. Indeed, the Kaffirs and their cattle seem to understand each other perfectly.” A better instance, in the present case, is given by Schulz in his description of a visit to Bed’ween camp, near Nazareth: “There came a shepherd, blowing upon a pipe (Schalmie), and behind him more than two hundred sheep, which moved according to the tone of the pipe, as if they understood everything. They knelt immediately upon their forelegs, stood for a moment upon their hinder feet, then fell down upon all four, at the sound of the pipe.”—S. S. Times.

Make a Better One.—An eloquent blasphemer was once saying in public that he himself could make a better book than the Bible; when a woman promptly rose and said, “You had better do it. There is money in it.”

It is related that when the evangelist Jabez Swan, while preaching in Albany, was vindicating the Bible against the assaults of infidels, and hurling volleys of argument and appeal upon infidels and their theories, one of the noisiest scoundrels in the city shouted from the gallery:

“Elder Swan, if you will give me five hundred dollars and a month’s time, I will bring you a better book than the Bible.”

“It is a bargain,” replied Swan, “and I will be here a month from to-night with the money to receive the book.”

Accordingly when the time came, Swan was on hand, and before commencing his sermon called for the man and the book, but neither of them were forthcoming! Said the preacher when speaking of the matter afterwards, “The poor, miserable fellow couldn’t begin to produce a book as good as the Apocrypha.”

The conceited college student who told Dr. Wayland that it did not require any great ability to make Proverbs like Solomon’s, got for his answer, “Make a few; make a few.”—The Christian.

—Plain Dealing.—The following letter from General John A. Rawlins, remonstrating with his friend and commander on the dangers he incurred from wine-drinking, is a pleasing illustration of the proverb, “Faithful are the wounds of a friend.”

Letter to General Grant from his Chief of Staff—afterward his Secretary of War.

“Before Vicksburg, Miss., June 6, 1863, 1 o’clock A. M.

Dear General:—The great solicitude I feel for the safety of this army leads me to mention what I had hoped never again to do—the subject of your drinking. This may surprise you, for I may be (and I trust I am) doing you an injustice by unfounded suspicions, but if an error it better be on the side of this country’s safety than in fear of offending a friend.

I have heard that Dr. M’Millan, at Gen. Sherman’s a few days ago, induced you, notwithstanding your pledge to me, to take a glass of wine, and to-day, when I found a box of wine in front of your tent and proposed to move it which I did, I was told you had forbid its being taken away, for you intended to keep it until you entered Vicksburg, that you might have it for your friends; and to-night, when you should, because of the condition of your health if nothing else, have been in bed, I find you where the wine bottle has been emptied, in company with those who drink and urge you to do likewise, and the lack of your usual promptness of decision and clearness in expressing yourself in writing tended to confirm my suspicions.

You have the full control of your appetite, and can let drinking alone. Had you not pledged me the sincerity of your honor early last March that you would drink no more during the war, and kept that pledge during your recent campaign, you would not to-day have stood first in the world’s history as a successful military leader. Your only salvation depends upon your strict adherence to that pledge. You cannot succeed in any other way. As I have before stated, I may be wrong in my suspicions, but if one sees that which leads him to suppose a sentinel is falling asleep on his post, it is his duty to arouse him; and if one sees that which leads him to fear the general commanding a great army is being seduced to that step which he knows will bring disgrace upon that general and defeat to his command, if he fails to sound the proper note of warning, the friends, wives, and children of those brave men whose lives he permits to remain thus imperiled will accuse him while he lives and stand swift witnesses of wrath against him in the day when all shall be tried. If my suspicions are unfounded, let my friendship for you and my zeal for my country be my excuse for this letter; and if they are correctly founded, and you determine not to heed the admonitions and the prayers of this hasty note by immediately ceasing to touch a single drop of any kind of liquor, no matter by whom asked or under what circumstances, let my immediate relief from duty in this department be the result.

I am, General, your friend,

JOHN A. RAWLINS.”

The retained copy of this letter was indorsed by General Rawlins, as follows:

This is an exact copy of a letter given to the person to whom it is addressed at its date about four miles from our head-quarters in the rear of Vicksburg. Its admonitions were heeded, and all went well.

JOHN A. RAWLINS.

—Caste in the Methodist Episcopal Church.—Our Methodist friends have taken an active interest in the promotion of education in the South, both among the white and colored races. In the prosecution of this work its Freedmen’s Aid Society cooperated in the establishment of a University at Chattanooga. At the General Conference of the Church in 1884, the subject of distinctions on account of color or race was under deliberation, and the following resolution adopted:

“Resolved, That this General Conference declares the policy of the Methodist Episcopal Church to be, that no member of any society within the Church shall be excluded from public worship in any and every edifice of the denomination, and no student shall be excluded from instruction in any and every school under the supervision of the Church, because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.”

Apparently relying on this decision of the Church, two colored Methodist students applied a few months since for admission to the Chattanooga University, where the students were all white. They were refused on the ground that their admission might injure the prosperity of the school, as the general feeling in the South is opposed to co-education of the races. This act, being in direct opposition to the Resolution adopted by the General Conference, has excited much discussion in Methodist circles. One of the Methodist ministers (himself a colored man) writes to the Christian Advocate, the leading organ of that denomination, an article in which he states that unless this act “is condemned by the Church, it will stamp hypocrisy and insincerity upon her profession of interest in the elevation of the Negro. The time-worn argument that the admission of colored men to these institutions would sadly cripple, if not destroy their future usefulness, is only a neat and very plausible combination of folly, cowardice and prejudice.”

A meeting of the Board of Managers of the Freedmen’s Aid Society has been called to consider the question of the admission of colored students. It may be expected that this body will either instruct the Trustees of the University that such shall not hereafter be excluded; or will withdraw the aid heretofore extended for its support; or make some arrangement which will relieve the Methodist Church from the charge of being inconsistent with its professions.

—Methodist Deaconesses.—A number of the female members of the Methodist Episcopal Church have united in the formation of a body to be incorporated with the title “The Deaconess Institute of the Methodist Episcopal Church.” “The object and purpose of said corporation is to provide trained nurses for the poor and others who require medical or surgical treatment, and to establish and maintain and conduct in the city of New York an institute or school, with a hospital connected therewith, for the training and education of Christian women as nurses, and to furnish nurses for the sick in private families, hospitals, asylums, almshouses, and prisons, and especially to provide, free of charge, nurses for the poor, with medical or surgical care and treatment.”

THE FRIEND.

THIRD MONTH 19, 1887.

An Editorial article in The Independent recommends the practice of stating Christian doctrines in the words of the Bible, without supplementing it with any human philosophy in order to make it “intelligible to the head or impressive to the heart.”

This has reminded us of a passage in the writings of William Penn, in which he speaks of the controversies which have arisen among Christians from a departure from the use of Scripture language, and the introduction into their statements of their own speculative ideas. Such people, he says, were not satisfied simply, “To know there was a God, and that He was but One, just and good, the observer of their actions and the rewarder of their deeds, and that therefore they should serve Him; but they must be distinctly informed of his nature, and all his attributes, his purposes and his decrees, and the suitableness of them all to the line and plummet of their understanding. Nor did it satisfy that there was a Christ; that this Christ was the Son of God; that God so loved mankind, as, beholding them in a way of destruction, He sent his Son to proclaim pardon upon true repentance, and offered a general reconciliation to as many as received and embraced his testimony; and that to that end, He laid down his life a ransom, rose and ascended, and gave his good Spirit to lead his followers after his example, in the way of truth and holiness. But they must search into the secret of this relation, how and after what manner He is the Son of God. His nature, power and person must be discussed. They will be satisfied in this, before they can find in their hearts to believe in Him.”

The true rule of Christian doctrine is not the judgment, or the conclusions of other men as to the meaning of the Scriptures, but it is that measure of the Spirit of Christ which He mercifully grants to all who will receive and obey it; which will lead its faithful followers in the way of salvation, and will open to them from time to time the mysteries of the kingdom of Heaven, and give them a clear sense of the meaning of Scripture passages, so far as it is needful for them to know.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The total value of the exports of domestic breadstuffs from the United States during the eight months which ended on Second Mo. 28th, was $104,670,449, against $72,461,285 during the corresponding period of the preceding year.

In relation to the reported dismissal of an employé of the navy yard at Chatham, England, for selling information, plans of vessels, &c., to this Government, it is said at the Navy Department in Washington that, so far as the United States Government is concerned, "there is absolutely no truth in the charge."

Our State Department is informed that the cholera has spread through portions of the Chilian provinces of Aconcagua and Valparaiso, and is extending toward the sea. At a station on the railroad between Santiago and Valparaiso, 35 miles from the latter, about 600 cases have so far been reported, of which about 250 have proved fatal.

The Duke of Sutherland is reported to be about to purchase a tract of 10,000 acres in Florida.

Salt is reported selling in Michigan at the lowest price known since its manufacture was begun—51 cents a barrel.

"The National Association of Oxford Down Sheep Growers" is holding its annual session in Cincinnati, E. C. Goldsborough, of Easton, Maryland, presiding. "Oxford Downs are the largest sheep in the world, and more of them are raised in Ohio than in any other State in the Union."

A train of eight cars on the Dedham branch of the Boston and Providence Railroad, in Massachusetts, on the morning of the 14th instant, broke through a bridge near Roslindale, and five cars fell to the bottom of a cut, thirty feet below. The cars and bridge fell together in one mass of debris. The latest particulars show that 26 persons were killed, and about 100 injured. Some of the latter are not likely to recover.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 456, which was 5 less than during the previous week, and 65 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the whole number 224 were males and 232 females; 280 adults and 176 minors; 66 died of consumption; 51 of pneumonia; 21 of diseases of the heart; 20 of convulsions; 19 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 18 of marasmus; 17 of old age; 17 of typhoid fever; 12 of debility; 12 of apoplexy, and 11 of Bright's disease.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½s, 109½; 4s, registered, 127½; coupon, 128½; 3s, 101; currency 6s, 126½ a 137.

Cotton was quiet but firm, at 10 cts. per lb. for middling uplands.

Petroleum was quiet but steady at 6½ cts. for 70 Abel test in barrels, and 8½ cts. for 110 test in cases.

Feed was weak, with moderate offerings and a light demand. Quotations: Bran, western winter, spot, per ton, $18 a $18.75; do., spring, spot, $17 a $17.50; red middlings, $16 a $17; white middlings, $17 a $19.

Flour and Meal.—Nothing new was developed in the flour market. Demand in the local trade was restricted to current wares at former prices. Sales of 125 barrels Penna. family, at $3.75; 250 barrels Ohio, clear, at $4; 250 barrels do. straight, at $4.40; 500 barrels winter patent, at $4.62½ a $4.90; 125 barrels Minnesota, clear, at $4.15, and 500 barrels do. patent, at $4.75 a $5.

Grain.—Wheat ruled steady, and No. 2 white closed at 90 cts. bid and 90½ cts. asked. Rye was dull and nominal at 53½ cts. per bushel for No. 2 Pennsylvania. Corn—No. 2 mixed closed at 46½ cts. bid, and 46½ cts. asked. Oats were inactive but steady: No. 2 white closing at 35½ cts. bid and 36 cts. asked.

Beef cattle were active, and ¼ a ½c. higher, at 4 a 5½ cts.

Sheep were dull at 3¼ a 5½ cts.; and lambs at 4½ a 7½ cts.

Hogs were active and ¼c. higher. Western, at 8½ a 8½ cts.; State, at 8 a 8½ cts.

FOREIGN.—A sensation has been caused in England by the publication of Gen. Sir Redvers Buller's evidence before the Land Commission. It appears that Gen. Buller testified that what law there was in Counties Kerry Clare and Cork was on the side of the rich, and he expressed the opinion that it would be a serious matter, with their grievances unredressed, to attempt to suppress by force the tenants' right to openly associate for the protection of their interests. A majority of the tenants, he said, struggled to pay their rents, and, where they could, did pay; but, in a great many cases, the rents were too high and such as the tenants could not pay. He said there would never be peace in Ireland until there had been established a court having strong coercive powers over land landlords and protective powers over poor tenants.

The Parnellites and Gladstonians rely upon General Buller's evidence to support their demands for the stoppage of evictions and the early production of land legislation. Lord Hartington has offered the Government the solid vote of the 70 Unionists for the Irish Crimes bill. The opinions of his followers, privately ascertained, favored stronger coercion than the bill proposes.

Negotiations between the Liberals and Unionists have been broken off, since which the demands of the latter have grown.

As formulated they comprise the following eight essentials: That Ireland be represented in the Imperial Parliament; that Ulster be separated from the jurisdiction of the Dublin Parliament; that the Irish Parliament be subordinate to and not co-ordinate with the Imperial body; that the subordinate powers of the Irish Parliament be strictly defined and limited; that the maintenance of law and order remain under the control of the Imperial authority; that Gladstone's financial proposals be abandoned, that his proposition that the Irish Parliament be composed of two orders be abandoned, and that Irish credit be not pledged for the benefit of Irish landlords.

The Parnellites and Gladstonians scold these demands as unworthy of consideration. Gladstone has been asked to explicitly define his position, and to state upon what terms a reunion is possible.

A new society in England is called "The Speak-no-Evil Society." Its members are enjoined before speaking true of any one to ask themselves three questions—Is it true? Is it kind? Is it necessary? Four texts from the New Testament bearing on the subject are printed at the foot of the membership card.

The Nicaraguan representative in London has sent a letter to the Times, in which he says: "The President of Nicaragua has ordered me to deny the existence of a treaty with the United States stipulating that that country should control the Nicaraguan Canal, recently mentioned in connection with the formation of a company to build the canal. The treaty alluded to is, doubtless, that of 1884, which lapsed because of the failure of the United States Senate to ratify it. My Government, in granting any concession, will not omit any means to secure the strictest neutrality for the canal."

Earthquake shocks were felt on the 10th, 11th and 12th instants, in Southern France and the Italian Riviera. Many buildings were cracked and people camped out in the open air.

At Monte Carlo the shock caused a panic in the gambling rooms. The tables shook violently and the players fled in dismay.

On the 11th instant, Prince Bismarck had a long conference with Count Schouvaloff, the Russian Ambassador. Reports were afterwards circulated in official quarters that Russia would for the present let events take their own course in Bulgaria.

The Septennate bill was read the third time in the Reichstag on the 11th instant, and was passed without debate by a vote of 227 to 31. Eighty-four members abstained from voting.

A despatch received in Baedon on the 14th instant, from St. Petersburg says that six students were arrested on the Newski Prospect, near the Anitchkin Palace, having in their possession a quantity of explosives. They were awaiting the coming of the Czar on his way to the Cathedral to take part in the anniversary services.

It has since transpired that the plot against the Czar was widespread and serious, and that numerous arrests have been made in connection therewith.

The new Congress Hall at Buenos Ayres is to cost $10,000,000. The site covers twenty acres.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

The rooms used for the accommodation of the girls in the new building, during the present session, have been uncomfortably crowded; and they will be lessened by the removal of the nursery building preparatory to the erection of the West Wing. It has consequently been found necessary to limit the number of girls to be admitted next session. As those now at the school who are expecting to return will occupy all the rooms suitable for their use, it has been concluded to decline further applications for the Summer Session.

By direction of the Committee,
JONATHAN G. WILLIAMS,
Superintendent.

Third Mo. 4th, 1887.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

A meeting of the Committee on Admissions, will be held in the Committee-room, Fourth and Arch Streets, on Seventh-day the 19th instant, at 10 o'clock A. M.

JOHN W. BIDDLE, Clerk.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

Until further notice the stage will connect with the 7.02 and 9.03 morning trains from Broad St., to convey passengers to the School; and at other times when timely notice is sent to J. G. WILLIAMS, Supt.

DIED, at their residence, Coal Creek, Keokuk County, Iowa, on the 6th of First Month, 1887, ANNA, wife of David Holloway, and daughter of Evan and Mary Cooper, in the 46th year of her age, a member of Coal Creek Monthly Meeting of Friends. She was an invalid for more than five years, not being able to walk without the use of crutches in all that time, and much of the time confined to her room and bed. In the early part of her affliction, being brought apparently near the border of the grave, and being much concerned for the welfare of her immortal soul, she experienced a remarkable evidence that she was not forsaken by Him whom she earnestly sought after, on this wise: She felt that her Saviour was very near, her chamber seeming to be filled with His presence, and there came before her spiritual vision an open book, which she was instructed was the Book of Life, and on its page she was shown her name written in letters of gold. This seemed to make a lasting impression on her mind, the remembrance of which many times cheered and strengthened her through the remaining tedious wearisome months and years allotted her in the probationary state. Her sufferings were at times very great, which she was enabled to bear with a remarkable degree of Christian patience and fortitude. She was entirely confined to her bed for about six months previous to her departure, and with but very little change of position, causing at times great nervous irritability. Not long before her close, one morning on one of her nurses coming to the bed side, she said, "What a sweet and peaceful night I have had: my pain has all been taken away, so that I have been perfectly easy, and the language of my heart has been and is, 'Thy Redeemer liveth, and because He lives thou shalt live also.'" Her attachment to her family was very strong, but she was strengthened near the close to give them all up; taking them separately by the hand and bidding them farewell, imparting suitable counsel and advice to each one, and saying, "I am going to meet the precious babes that have gone before, (of whom there were four who died in infancy) and I want you all to live that when done with time, we may all meet on that blissful shore where sickness, pain and sorrow, never come. She remained sensible to the last, and her sorrowing relatives and friends have the comforting assurance that, through the condescending mercy and goodness of our Heavenly Father, she has been admitted into one of the many mansions prepared for the righteous of all generations.

—, on the 7th inst., at his residence in this city, BENJAMIN COATES, aged 79 years. An active life, followed by years of suffering and feebleness, endured with Christian patience and resignation, closed calmly and peacefully. "God is love; and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God and God in him."

Selections from the Diary of Abigail W. Hall.

Twelfth Mo. 23rd, 1851. Many and various have been my engagements this morn'g. But can say, that notwithstanding the multitude of business which daily engrosses, my heart is, may I not claim, continually lifted up unto the Lord for preservation, and for help to perform my various duties in singleness of heart unto Him; not unto man, for if so, I shall have "no reward of our Father who is in heaven."

25th. It seemed this morning, as meeting hour approached, as though I could not go, I was so listressed. Had had some trouble with my children; then my own poverty and leanness, stared me in the face. But there was no turning aside. Early after taking my seat a passage of Scripture arose, and with it a feeling to revive it amongst us. Never surely was the cross so great! It seemed like laying down my very life. I remembered how I had again and again rebelled, and the language seemed to be, "If thou art faithful in blessing, I will bless thee," &c. I dared not withhold, and in fear and trembling arose, and repeated the little message given: "Are there few that be saved?" Jesus saith unto them, "Strive to enter in at the strait gate; for many shall seek to enter in, and shall not be able." A quiet feeling has ensued, that makes me hope I've not done wrong. But none knows but Thee, dearest Father, the many doubts and fears which have assailed and do assail. Among other things the enemy told me, the children would not receive what I had to say; reminding of the Scripture: "The Jews of late sought to stone thee, and goest thou thither again?" This with other things so presented, that I had a struggle. Being enabled to make the offering, may it be accepted.

26th. A quiet good feeling seemed to be among the children. They flocked around me more last evening than usual. May I be preserved from doing the least thing that will offend the pure witness in any, yea in the very least child. Make us, every one, O Heavenly Father, "Quick of understanding in thy fear."

First Mo. 5th, 1852. My meetings yesterday, both morning and afternoon, were exercising ones; feeling, particularly at the close of the latter, cast down and distressed. On opening the Bible, unexpectedly mine eyes lighted on that portion where the Apostle speaks of glorying in his infirmities. This seems, of latter time, all I have to glory in. May Heavenly grace be found sufficient.

19th. On Third-day last, our friends William and Elizabeth Evans, and Elizabeth Pierson, came out in the stage, and remained with us till Fifth-day afternoon. What a comfort and strength they have been to us!

26th. I am oftentimes ready to fear, that I am making no progress in my good journey heavenward, because such an abiding sense attends nearly all the time, of my great inability for anything good. In our meetings, there seems so little settling or staying the mind, that I have felt of late, as though I know not how to present myself there. "Verily, thou art a God that hidest thyself, O God of Israel, the Saviour." With this feeling uppermost, I went to meeting in the afternoon yesterday. As I took my seat, my heart, sad as it was, gladdened at the sight of our dear friend Samuel Cope, sitting at the elbow. And believing he was sent hither to help us, my spirit seemed to revive; and a little strength was given to ask, that our "provision might be blessed," and the poor satisfied with bread. Our dear friend was very comforting and encouraging, both to the older and younger: quoting: "Godliness is profitable unto all things, having the promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come." Upon which he enlarged instructively; and also narrated the account we have of the poor fishermen who had "toiled all night and taken nothing," &c. "Nevertheless said they "at Thy word, we will let down the net." Encouragement flowed to such as these, with desires that obedience might be kept to. He was very instructive on the account we have of the children of Israel, when Moses delayed coming to them beyond their expectation. How they gathered themselves together unto Aaron, and said unto him, "Up, make us gods which shall go before us; for as for this Moses, that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, we wot not what has become of him." Altogether our meeting was a good one, as I trust some of us were sensible; and from whose hearts gratitude flowed, for the Lord's continued care and mercy over us, in that our "low estate" is "condescended to."

30th. Attended, yesterday, our Monthly Meeting. In our last meeting, I thought, a living united travail seemed to prevail; and through faithfulness on my part, I, poor as I was, was made a partaker thereof, though One only knew the struggle it cost me. I was very near giving out, when covenants lately entered in, in seasons of distress, came so fresh before me I dared not withhold. My peace for this little act of dedication, was in proportion to the suffering I passed through. So that I can but acknowledge, the Lord is good, and a rich rewarder of all who serve Him. Whilst I feel very desirous to be found doing the little I may have to do, may I be preserved from putting forth in any way, a hand unbidden.

Second Mo. 11th. As dear Christopher Healy once said in our meeting at Plymouth, "A little unfaithfulness, how it weighs down the scale!"

&c. So in our Quarterly Meeting yesterday, I was not a partaker of good, because of unfaithfulness. Will I ever know a being established?

12th. It seemed hard work this morning in our meeting, to come to a right settlement, till near the close, when He who formerly stilled the troubled waves arose; and the language sounded so plain, "My people shall dwell in a peaceable habitation, in quiet resting places, and none shall make them afraid," that I believe, had I revived it, my reward would have been in it. I was nearly ready so to do when meeting closed. Not wilfully have I disobeyed.

24th. Have felt for the few last days, poor and empty and divested of good, so that I have been almost ready to doubt my ever being lifted up again. "Cast me not off from Thy presence, and take not thy Holy Spirit from me," is the breathing of my burdened soul. Have had trouble with some of the dear children; so that their little naughtiness, added to my weakness, has together cast me down very low.

27th. Entered yesterday my fortieth year. Through mercy unmerited, it was a day of favor. Being the time of our Monthly Meeting I attended; and through faithfulness to the "still small voice" of Christ within, how did my peace flow as a river! After making my little offering (which seems like laying down my very life) how sweetly did this language salute my inward ear: God shall give an answer of peace. A covering which we of ourselves could not command, overspread; while, moreover, the testimonies borne, all tended to strengthen and lift up; encouraging to trust in His mercy, which is great, and new unto us every morning.

28th. Yesterday was a quiet day; and a sweet peaceful night's rest followed. Which favor, my heart seems alive to; and fervent desires are raised this morning for a continuation of Thy preserving care and providence over me, through this day, yea, all the days that thou sees meet to lengthen out unto me. Keep mine eye, O Heavenly Father! singly staid on thee; watching the pointings of thy holy finger; neither going before or lagging behind; but following simply and singly thy blessed holy leadings: that so I may witness a growth and establishment in thy ever blessed Truth.

Third Mo. 1st. A beautiful spring-like morning! "Thou crownest the year with thy goodness: and all thy paths drop fatness," &c. "The little hills rejoice on every side," &c. The feeling which prompted the Psalmist thus to break forth, seems in measure to pervade my mind this morning, under a renewed sense, that the Lord's hand is opened wide, so that bounties and blessings unmerited and undeserved, are scattered around.

8th. I was given last evening, very sweetly to see the purity of that life which is hid with Christ in God. And that we never can be his humble depending followers, unless He rule and reign in us and over us. Every thought, word and action, must be brought into captivity to Christ. That I have afresh been led to covet and crave an increase in those hidden, unseen virtues, which alone make alive unto Him. "Set a watch, O Lord! before my mouth, and keep the door of my lips."

10th. One of our dear children, Phebe Jane Underhill, from the State of New York, who has been very sick for two weeks past, and for the last week, both day and night, in such suffering and distress as I never witnessed, was this morning quietly released from her sufferings. Poor dear child! never while I live, will her sufferings and distress be forgotten by me. I desire it may prove a loud call to be diligent and fervent in doing my day's work while time is afforded. Strengthen me, O Heavenly Father! in the fulfilment of every duty—to thee, to myself, and all with whom I have to do.

22nd. Oh how stripped, tempted, tossed and tried, was I through the forepart of yesterday, and the night preceding! In the afternoon, very unexpectedly, help came, so that all within me was hushed; and the language sounded, solemnly and awfully so to my soul: "Behold the bridegroom cometh, go ye forth to meet Him." And, "Behold I come quickly." "to give unto every man according as his work shall be." I received it, and gladly would I have retained it in my own bosom. But the impression to impart came so with it, that I dared not withhold, though I feared to speak. The conflict was great. The woe to the unfaithful shepherds vividly arose. I strove, and I prayed saying: Give, O Heavenly Father! a little more evidence. When this language followed, "This is my beloved Son, hear ye Him." I arose, and tremblingly made the little offering. From the feeling which has since attended, I humbly trust it was accepted by Him who sees and knows all things.

Fourth Mo. 17th. I should have noted a good meeting we had this day a week ago. A number of the Committee were with us, among whom were dear William and Elizabeth Evans. The former was excellent in testimony, and the latter in supplication. The trials and sufferings of the present day will, I believe, if rightly abode under, deepen those exercised thereby in the root and power of religion. Oh! that a pure and living ministry may be preserved unto us as a people; that the Lord would still manifest himself amongst us, as in the beginning; and that his servants and hand-maidens may be willing to "tarry, as at Jerusalem, till endured with power from on high." Then I believe there still would be a gathering unto this people; and we should know the Lord's arm stretched out for our help and deliverance.

Passing over the next three degrees, we come to the seventh, known as the Royal Arch degree, which is taken in a lodge called a chapter. Its members, instead of being called brothers, as in the lower degrees, are there styled companions. In addition to the oaths previously taken, the candidate, with hands on the Bible, proceeds: "I furthermore promise and swear, that I will aid and assist a companion Royal Arch Mason when engaged in any difficulty, and espouse his cause so far as to extricate him from the same, if within my power, whether he be right or wrong." Also that "a companion Royal Arch Mason's secrets, given me in charge as such, shall remain as secure and inviolable in my breast as in his own, murder and treason not excepted." Notwithstanding the hand may be laid upon the Scriptures while the lips pronounce the aforesaid promises, yet one may vainly turn the pages of Holy Writ to find support for such unrighteous and unholy doctrine, whereby a solemn covenant is entered into which may make the candidate a partaker in his "companion's" guilt. We need go no further into the evident evil tendencies of such obligations than simply to emphasize the query put by Finney: "Are such men to be safely intrusted with office, either in Church or State?"

But the candidate, in this degree, makes another mischievous, and a politically dangerous avowal, to wit: "I will promote a companion Royal Arch Mason's political preferment in preference to another of equal qualifications." The degree to which Freemasons have reached out for political power has already been briefly alluded to. Something further, as to the danger in this direction may pertinently be added.

At a banquet last year, tendered by the Knights Templar of San Francisco, to the late General John A. Logan, the latter—who would scarcely have been called a religious man—declared,— "Our organization [Freemasonry] is better and greater than all the others you can find in the world. Christianity itself advances under the light of the mystic tie. * * * The mystic tie [Freemasonry] has a controlling influence in every government on God's earth."

The Editor of The American, of Washington, who is in a position to know whereof he affirms, gives the following instances in commenting on the Logan speech: "A man would be blind," said a clerk in one of the departments in Washington, 'who could not see that secret societies control these departments.' Said another: 'A ring of Knights Templar run this department.' These and other similar remarks from employees who have had opportunity to know, simply coincide with General Logan's declaration. 'Men ask endorsement,' said an ex-senator, 'on the ground that they belong to certain lodges and can control the votes of those lodges. Hence it comes to pass that lodge men largely hold offices.'

Now, the heir apparent of the British Empire, the Prince of Wales, is a member and (I believe) the head of the Masonic order in Great Britain. The Anglo-Saxon race having thus committed such great power to this secret, oath-bound order, can it be said that "the kingdoms of this world" are in the way of approach to that open acknowledgement of the Son's dominion in which it may be said that they "are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ." But we behold another great power, rising side by side with Freemasonry, strenuously opposed to the latter, and making no secret of its thirst for and intention to rule, to wit, the Roman Curia. In the late Encyclical of the Pope, it may be remembered, that the "faithful" were encouraged to endeavor after places of trust and influence. At a reception for Romanists only, given to a Cardinal in Washington City lately, there were present, amongst others, the President's private secretary, two members of the Cabinet, the Marshal of the District, and the general second in command in the army. The commanding general himself is closely connected with the denomination named. Likewise, at the Capital, a great Catholic University is about to be erected, so that in many ways the influence of the Roman Curia is likely to be felt in the near future. The full significance of the present greatly talked of visit of Cardinal Gibbons to the Pope may not be known to this generation. To refer to the first ecclesiastical authority (so claimed) the alleged secret features of the Knights of Labor organization, of which organization the "Grand Master Workman," T. V. Powderly, is a Romanist, and to obtain the Pope's recognition of the order, or at least to remove his alleged opposition to it, were the ostensible objects of the Cardinal's errand. The claims of, and dangers from, Freemasonry, in this country, were doubtless subjects that received attention. What contests may be in store in the future, when these two forces come, as they seem likely to do, into collision, we may leave. It is for us to keep out of the secrecy and the darkness, and remain in the light. As to the rest there are those who believe that the vision of that faithful man of God, Joseph Hoag, was that of a true seer, and that the signs of the times seem to indicate a hastening toward its further fulfilment.

Returning to Finney's book, and passing over the chapter concerning the obligation of adhering Masons to persecute those who secede, or reveal their secrets, we come to the degree of Templar and Knight of Malta, the oath of which, it is stated, is taken by the candidate, drinking wine out of a human skull, and pronouncing a double imprecation upon himself should he knowingly or wilfully violate any obligation then taken, or that he should at any future period take. One who renounced Masonry, Avery Allyn, thus speaks of his experience in this connection:

"When I received this degree I objected to drink from the human skull, and to take the profane oath required by the rules of the order. I objected to the Most Eminent that I supposed that that part of the ceremony would be dispensed with. The Sir Knights charged upon me, and the Most Eminent said: 'Pilgrim, you here see the swords of your companions drawn to defend you in the discharge of every duty we require of you. They are also drawn to avenge any violation of the rules of our order. We expect you to proceed.' A clergyman, an acquaintance of mine, came forward, and said: 'Companion Allyn, this part of the ceremonies is never dispensed with. I, and all the Sir Knights have drank from the cup and taken the fifth libation. It is perfectly proper, and will be qualified to your satisfaction.' I then drank of the cup of double damnation."

The blasphemous procedure of the order is further illustrated by the ceremonies in connection with the "Knights of the East and West," where one styled the "All Puissant" opens seven seals successively, and seven trumpets are sounded. The candidate for the Royal Arch degree, when asked if he is a Royal Arch Mason, replies, "I am that I am," therein profanely taking to himself the name of the God of Israel. Finney very forcibly sums up this part of his subject as follows:

"What a shocking misappication and misrepresentation do we find here! And the cases are numerous in which, as I have said, the most solemn passages [in the Bible] are used in their nummeries and childish ceremonies, in so shocking a manner that we can hardly endure to read them. I beg my Christian readers to examine these books for themselves, and then see what they think of the assertions of so many professors of religion, and even of professed Christian ministers, that 'there is nothing in Freemasonry inconsistent with the religion of Jesus Christ.' I cannot imagine anything more directly calculated to bring the [Bible] into contempt than such a use of it in Masonic lodges. It is enough to make one's blood curdle in his veins to think that a Christian minister, or any Christian whatever should allow himself to pass through such an abominable scene as is frequently represented in the degrees of Masonry:—multiplying their horrid oaths, heaping one imprecation upon another, gathering up from every part of the Divine oracles the most solemn and awful sayings of Jehovah, and applying them in a manner so revolting, that the scene must make a Christian's heart tremble, and his whole soul to loathe such proceedings."

(To be continued.)

For "The Friend."

Grace Universal. The Gospel the Power of God.

DIVINE LOVE AND NATURAL LOVE.

I believe that God is no respecter of persons; but in every nation or denomination, "he that feareth Him and worketh righteousness, is accepted with Him," whether they have been blessed with the advantages of the Holy Scriptures or an outward ministry or not. For I think the saving grace of God is as universal as the defiling effects of sin. And that He is able to save to the uttermost all that come to God through the effectual workings of the Holy Spirit; although they may never have heard the name of Christ in the outward language that we apply to Him. For the gospel is the power and not the letter of God, unto the salvation of all who receive and obey it. But it is not the power of man; nor can man, with all his cultivated intellect, or human power, add a particle of saving grace to it. The power may be savingly felt, but not outwardly seen nor heard. And all the formal preaching, praying or singing from mere human power, can never give proof of what the good and acceptable and perfect will of God is, concerning us. Yet instrumental services should be thankfully accepted as helps, when they come to us in vocal utterance, through the Lord's chosen and qualified instruments, and in demonstration of the spirit and power of God, without too much of the spirit of man, but in the ability that God giveth, that He alone, and not man, may be glorified.

But I am abundantly persuaded that it is the earthly, animal, impulsive and emotional part in man, that the popular religion of the present day operates upon; as like begets its like; so it seems to content such as receive it, with a visionary paradise; while he that is filthy remains to be filthy still. But all this does not prove but what there is a pure and undefiled religion—a religion which, through the grace of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Spirit, is able to save to the uttermost all that come to God through Him who is the way, the truth and the life. And although the wisdom and eloquence of poor fallible man, may boast great things, and make a great noise in the religious world, yet there is an invisible and a silent power far above the powers of man; and through the hidden workings of this Almighty power, "many shall be purified and made white and tried; but the wicked shall do wickedly, and none of the wicked shall understand; but the wise shall understand." And they that are made wise, by a wisdom Divine, "shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars for ever and ever." And I believe that many now (although they may seem like a small remnant in comparison) are being made white and purified and tried, even while the overflowing scourge is upon us. And the more we are purified, the more we shall witness the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ to abound; while "the wicked shall do wickedly and none of the wicked shall understand."

of wisdom more willingly, that the reader may see, and judge for himself, as to which kind of wisdom we, as individuals or as a Society in the transaction of our church affairs, are actuated by. Is it the wisdom from above, which is "pure and peaceable, gentle and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits: without partiality and without hypocrisy?" Or is it the wisdom which is earthly, and which rules and reigns in the hearts of the children of disobedience? causing rents and divisions amongst us? We need heavenly wisdom to enable us to see and do heavenly things; but earthly wisdom is sufficient for earthly things. And the children of this world are in their generation wiser in earthly things than the children of light. But the world, by all its boasted wisdom, knows not God. Is the heaven still above the earth, or has the earth got to be above the heavens with some, so that they can look down on heavenly things with disdain?

When we stray away from the Father's house, and become in want of the bread of life, we may fill ourselves with the outside of religion, which is dry and lifeless, and no better than the husks that the swine did eat. One day in the Father's house, or in the courts of God, is better than a thousand on the barren mountains of Gilboa, where there is neither dew nor rain nor fields of offering. One hour of teaching from the enlightening presence of the Holy Spirit, can give us more instruction concerning the joys of heaven, and the deep things of God, than all the heaps of uninspired volumes on theology, or all the sermons from the wisdom and eloquence of men can ever give us. Because "the kingdom of God cometh not with observation," and there is not one drop of Gilead's precious balm in it, nor in all the lo heres! or the lo theres! which may cause us to wander far from the Father's house in search of rest, but finding none.

Those who have had their hearts warmed and softened by the love of God, and have tasted of his goodness, know that true love from man to man, springs from God's love to man; and flows as wave upon wave, until it encircles the whole human race. And we may love the good in one another, but not the evil. Christ loved sinners, but not sin. We may love the people of other denominations, but not love their manner of worship, because our fellowship is not in that line. But godliness is godliness without denominational distinction. For heart-felt and heart-changing Christianity is the same wherever we find it. And we may love even our enemies, though we lament their ways. And such as through the love and grace of God attain to this, find that godliness with contentment is great gain. And that it is profitable unto all things, having the promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come: while the way of the transgressor is hard. And there is no peace to the wicked, saith the Lord.

The natural love which has been wisely given by the great Creator, to the whole animal race, and of which man has his share also, is mortal; while the love of God is immortal. And if the love of God is driven out of the heart, men may become as tigers, destroying their fellow-men instead of esteeming them as brothers. While those who have the love of God abiding in them are not easily provoked, are not puffed up, think no evil, but bear all things; and rejoice not in iniquity, but rejoice in the truth. And while the love of the world, and every thing belonging to it shall vanish away, the love of God will abide forever, because it springs from the everlasting fountain.

I recollect of reading a passage from some unknown writer, who, in speaking of the love of God, says that "Love is just the hardest thing

A man can find to do;
For that of which ten thousand sing
Is understood by few.

So that many, I fear, incline to mistake that love which belongs to the animal part in man, and take it for the love of God.

And it is not by works of righteousness which we have done of ourselves, or which we can do without the love of God prompting us, yet it is "according to his mercy, that He saves us, by the washing of regeneration and the renewing of that Holy Spirit" which was lost in the fall. And this renewing of the Holy Spirit is not to be accomplished without a conflict of tribulation. So the servants of the Lord are divinely commissioned to put on the whole armor of God. And with the sword of the Spirit, to fight against the opposing powers of darkness in themselves, and also against spiritual wickedness in high places around them; for they will have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness. But the armies of Gog and Magog may be permitted to rise up in noisy array against them; and the enemy may come in like a flood, and seem ready to swallow up and devour; yet the man of God will feel constrained to endeavor to raise up a standard against him. But my hope is that they who hold out to the end will be saved. And though the battle for a time may be strong, yet strong is the Captain of our salvation; and I still have faith He, for the love He has towards his Church, will in due time give his followers the victory. Abby W. Hall dismisses the closing scenes of her mother's life with a few well chosen words. She does not tell us that in the bureau, near her bed, was the cap and shroud, made by her own hand, neatly ironed and folded, ready for her burial. Nor does she tell us that every relative received from her own hand some little memento of her—a book, a handkerchief, something to remember their relative, their teacher, their well-wisher, when she would pass from their sight.

Under various circumstances, as a scholar and in her service on many an embassy, have I seen her, but never, under any circumstances did I receive an impatient answer, or unkind word. Nor was she always the pale-faced, white-haired, frail woman, that we knew her. I was once in a farm-house in a sequestered spot, in a strange neighborhood; there sat an old, old woman; said she "when I was a scholar at Westtown, there was a girl there from Montgomery County named Hannah Albertson; we liked her so much, she was a nice looking girl, she had a good deal of color, and brown hair and hazel eyes: "Was she a relative of thine." Such was she, the hair faded, the color left, but her admirers and her lovers increased in numbers as years rolled on: the young joining the old in paying respect and affection to her virtues and her grace; which neither left nor faded. She refused the hand of the rich, and married him toward whom the finger of Truth pointed; and though left a widow with four small children to provide for, in very early life, she could truthfully and experimentally say, "I have been young and now am old, yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken nor his seed begging bread."

Optical Phenomena.

Having occasion during a very foggy evening in the early part of the Second Month to pass near the Rail Road Station, I was interested in noticing what seemed like a dense black smoke rising perpendicularly from one of the lamps, and enlarging as it ascended, so as to form an inverted cone of darkness, whose point was the top of the lamp. It was evidently the shadow of this top of the lamp, and must always be there when the lamp is burning; but as this shadow is not any material substance, but a simple absence of light, it is not commonly visible. In the present case the surrounding fog was made luminous by the light of the lamp; and the contrast of its illumination with the dark cone, gave the latter the appearance of a material object. A similar cone of darkness, having its point in the side of the earth farthest from the sun, must ever be sweeping through space as the earth performs its annual circuit around the sun; but there is nothing to make us sensible of it, except when the moon occasionally enters its limits, and becomes eclipsed, by the earth shutting off the light of the sun, to which its usual brightness is due.

I was reminded of a somewhat similar cone of light (not of shade) which I had observed rising from one of the street electric lights in German-town. In that case there was nothing to obstruct the rays of light from ascending; and I suppose the brilliancy of the electric flame was such that it rendered the particles of paper or dust in the atmosphere on which it fell, sufficiently luminous to make them visible, and thus produce a faint glow like that of an aurora. For "The Friend."

The selections from the diary of our late valued friend, Abigail W. Hall, are no doubt interesting and comforting to many readers of "The Friend." We desire the encouragement of the compiler. In reading the account of attending a meeting at West Chester, when Elizabeth Evans ministered from the text: "Fear not thou worm Jacob," &c., an incident was brought to mind, which then took place, but which is not included in the published narrative. After speaking for some time very impressively and encouragingly from the text above alluded to, she remained standing in silence for some little time, then commenced again in words like these (if recollection serves correctly at this distant day), "Is it possible that there is in the present company, a single individual who has doubts of future rewards and punishments, or in the existence of a Supreme Being?" enlarging thereon. It was a startling inquiry, and to the writer, strikingly impressive.

On our way to meeting that morning, one of the most prominent citizens of the place, a lawyer of high standing in his profession, wealthy, and esteemed as a moral man, but who was thought to be an unbeliever, was invited to accompany us to meeting. The invitation was accepted, and no doubt he was the cause of our dear friend's exercise. The meeting was altogether a memorable one. W. P. T.

A boy who was taunted by his neighbor in the class for failing in a protracted attempt to answer a hard question, replied: "Well, I would rather try and fail, than do as you did,—sit still and do nothing."

"Failure after long perseverance is much grander than never to have a striving good enough to be called a failure."—Selected.

A WINTER THUNDER STORM,
Second Mo. 18th, 1887.

And is this winter? Have we slept,
And passed the hours in dreaming,
Till summer's reign upon us crept,
Without spring's intervening?

For surely never summer hills,
In all their emerald splendor,
Nor leafy wood, whose shadow thrills
With zephyrs warm and tender,

Have ever raised to grander cloud,
Or bowed a darker under,
Or ever echoed peal more loud
Of awe-inspiring thunder.

From height to height with lurid glow,
The vivid lightning flashes,
While downward in resistless flow
The raining torrent dashes.

'Tis strange to sit by glowing coal,
While tropic storm is raging,
And hear in battle's din and roll,
The elements engaging.

How impotent man's vaunted power,
We cannot fail of feeling,
As silent in this awful hour,
Our hearts are dumbly kneeling

Before the Might that rules the world,
In deep and reverent wonder,
That has the lightning's flag unfurled,
And rides upon the thunder.

At last the cloud gates seem to close,
The tempest's force is ending;
And slowly on a calm repose,
The veil of night's descending.

Still, far away, in fitful play,
The electric glory lightens—
While from the west a silver ray
On humid nature brightens.

And thus, perchance, when winter lies
Upon the heart so dreary,
When bleak and cheerless seem the skies,
And soul and brain are weary;

When long we've heard no song of bird
To thrill with note entrancing;
And thro' the spirit's mazes stirred
No sunbeam's golden glancing;

It may be that a flash will rend
The gathered clouds asunder,
And from on high a voice descend
In living tones of thunder,

And sweeter sound than choral hymn
Be woke for our possessing,
And even as from Gerizim,
May be pronounced a blessing.

ASPIRATION.

O! Righteous Father, in thy time
Dispel this darkness by thy light;
And let this troubled soul of mine
Be changed from blindness into sight.

Long has thy presence from my view
Been hid, my faith in Thee to try.
O Lord! my strength in Thee renew,
And hear my plaintive hourly cry.

If in displeasure thou hast thrust
Me from thy presence evermore,
I must submit, and say, "Tis just;"
Though without Thee, whom I adore.

But hope's an anchor to the soul,
And o'er the wave a gleam of light
Is shed, my spirit to console,
Which makes my pathway seem more bright.

So, spirit, raise thy drooping head,
And turn thy downcast eyes toward heaven;
But let the dead enter their dead,
And walk thou in the light that's given.

Japanese Version of an Ancient Fable.

The following is taken from a volume of sermons of a Japanese Buddhist moralist, published under the title of "The Sermons of the Dove-like Venerable Master;" and translated for The Independent.

In some city there was to be performed the ceremony of marriage, and it was decided to call in, as guests, the elders and principal men of the street. By the time that the feast was prepared they came in and all went to their respective seats according to seniority, and sat down with their legs bent. In a short time wine was set, and every one was expected to drink some. All drank and were merry; but there was one elderly man who so disliked it as to be liable to become intoxicated with even a quantity equal to a drop of dew sparkling on a bamboo leaf. He, from the first, seemed to be very little interested, and somewhat embarrassed, which, the master of the house noticing, went to him and said, respectfully: "You do not like wine, I suppose. You must be tired, I fear. Will you not take some things which are sweet?" So saying, he went and brought a beautiful china vase full of candy-balls. All the guests praised the sensible act of the master, and pressed the old man to eat them freely. The old gentleman, who was in truth very glad to be thus spoken to, could not refrain from thrusting his hand into the vase. He first felt his hand little pressed by the sides of the opening, but had patience enough to thrust in more and more, till the whole hand went in, when, to his great surprise, on attempting to draw it out, he found it impossible to do so. He tried every means, first turning his hand round, then pulling the vase by the other hand, and attempting many other kindred things, all of which proving to no purpose, he began to despair. This attracted the attention of one of the guests sitting near by, who asked him what was the matter. "The hand has become tight, and I feel it difficult to draw it out," answered the old man, with a voice which told unmistakably of his serious feelings. The guest kindly offered him aid, and took hold of the bottom of the vase, while the old man attempted to draw his hand out. The voices of the two men, unconsciously uttered, in putting forth their whole energy, drew the eyes of all the persons in the room upon them, who, seeing such an incongruous thing taking place in the midst of the marriage feast, all burst out into loud peals of laughter. The old man alone was serious, and, with a countenance ready to weep, and with a voice feeble and trembling, groaned: "Painful—unbearable—impossible to draw it." At these words, the mirth and joy of the feast was instantly changed into sorrow and anxiety; and there was running to and fro, some calling for a physician, and others doing the utmost to help him out of this inconvenience. At the height of this confusion, rose up one, a man of great wisdom, seemingly, and thus addressed them: "Please be quiet. I am going to speak. I just recollected a story told by some one, which will save the life of this venerable gentleman. In ancient times there was a noted sage, whose name was Shiba-Onko. He, when a little boy, was playing beside a large vase full of water, when one of his playmates accidentally fell into it. All the other boys, seeing this, ran away and left Shiba-Onko alone, who began to deliberate upon the way of saving his life. At last he hit it, and immediately taking a stone, with great force threw it against the vase, which was thus broken, and the boy issued forth from the rent without any injury. Now the venerable gentlenan's case is of the same kind; and it seems neat that I should act the part of Shiba-Onko, and break this China vase. Surely the venerable gentleman's arm is worth more than a thousand of vases, however high the price." So speaking, he went round, and sat down, ready to strike, with a smoking-pipe in his right hand. The old man, with some hesitation, held up his vase-capped hand. The man struck, and in an instant sandy balls were seen flying all over the room, like snow-flakes. At this, all congratulated him, saying: "You are saved at last," and looked at his hand, the cause of all the troubles, and, to their great astonishment, saw the hand taking hold of candy-balls, as much as it could grasp at once. No wonder that it could not be drawn out.

Just so with our hearts. If we only drop the things we are grasping, then our hands are free, and our hearts are also free. Men, however, have such obstinate hearts as to persist in taking hold of the things they grasped, and therefore it is impossible for them to become free or pure. If I should speak in this manner it may seem that I am hinting only at gold and silver. No; I am not thinking only of these things. There are other objects which we covet and want to grasp—beauty, learning, glory and rank. Men's hearts lie in these things, and consequently they do not listen to our preaching.

A Tested Remedy.—It is related that Bishop Kavanagh was one day walking when he met a prominent physician, who offered him a seat in his carriage. The physician was an infidel, and the conversation turned upon religion.

"I am surprised," said the doctor, "that such an intelligent man as you should believe such an old fable as that."

The Bishop said, "Doctor, suppose years ago some one had recommended to you a prescription for pulmonary consumption, and you had procured the prescription and taken it according to order, and had been cured of that terrible disease, what would you say of the man who would not try your prescription?"

"I should say he was a fool."

"Twenty-five years ago," said Kavanagh, "I tried the power of God's grace. It made a different man of me. All these years I have preached salvation, and wherever accepted have never known it to fail."

What could a doctor say to such a testimony as that? And such testimonies are what men need to turn them from the error of their ways, to the personal experience of the saving power of the Lord Jesus Christ.—Selected.

We have learned pretty well to preach the Golden Rule standard to individuals. We tell them that they must do as they would be done by, or they have no right to call themselves Christians. It is not quite certain that we apply this rule to the conduct of the affairs of nations. When we say that the United States, or England, or France, or Germany is a Christian nation, do we mean that it does to other nations as it would be done by? Are we to expect a nation in its international relations to be absolutely selfish, or to be unselfish? We hold that as between men godliness is gain; do we think of confessing that it can be so between nations? Do nations enlarge their territory, impose restrictions on foreign immigration or foreign trade, make treaties or make war, with the idea of doing to the other nation as they would have that other nation do to them? If a man does not obey the Golden Rule is he a Christian man? If a nation does not obey the Golden Rule is it a Christian nation?—The Independent.

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 122.

TAUGHT OF GOD.

David Ferris was brought up among the Presbyterians in the State of Connecticut, and imbibed with his education the principles generally held among them at that time. Through the workings of Divine Grace on his heart, and without the aid of man, he came to perceive clearly "that all right understanding in spiritual concerns must proceed from the immediate revelation of the Holy Spirit; and that we could not come to the knowledge of God, nor of anything relating to his kingdom without it.

"This belief was very different from that held by the people I made profession with, so that I had no assistance from them. On the contrary, their conversation, their preaching and their books were against me. I had no outward help but the Bible, and that I could not understand without Divine assistance."

One of the subjects on which he felt much concerned was, the doctrine of unconditional election and reprobation. It pleased the Lord to open his understanding clearly to perceive the error of this doctrine; and he was enabled to believe that Christ, who "gave himself a ransom for all," would "have all men to be saved, and come to the knowledge of the Truth."

Before this period, "I had heard," he says, "of a people called Quakers, but was unacquainted with any of them. As I had never seen any of their writings, I knew not what doctrine they held, but ascribe all my knowledge in Divine things to the inward manifestations of grace and truth—the teaching of the Holy Spirit. It was Christ, the light of the world, the life of men, who opened to me the Scriptures, and gave me a discerning of their meaning; and as I was faithful and obedient to the pointings of truth, I was favored with further and clearer discoveries thereof." He discoursed from time to time with one of his fellow-students (he was then at College) on the views that were presented to him, until they had gone over nearly all the doctrinal points mentioned by Robert Barclay, although at that time he knew nothing of his writings.

When Daniel Stanton was quite young, he lived in a part of New Jersey where he had no opportunity of attending a place of religious worship, "but the Lord," he says, "was pleased, by his grace and good visitations, to operate on my mind, that I was made to dread and fear the great Almighty Being, and it was given me to know that 'God is a spirit, and they who worship Him must worship Him in spirit and truth;' and through the blessed knowledge of God by his Holy Spirit, I had great reproof in my own breast for sin and transgression, and dreaded to speak bad words, or do what was evil, and was brought by inward conviction to mourn and seek for mercy to my soul. And at a time when I heard of the suffering of my dear Saviour on the cross, and how He suffered unto death, my heart was broken before the Lord, and I went alone and wept, being much affected with a sense of his suffering by that hard-hearted people, the Jews, and of his being crucified. Great was the goodness of the Almighty to me, in giving me a sense of many things appertaining to godliness, in the time of this tender visitation; and I found by the divine witness in myself, that if I would be a disciple of Christ, I must take up my cross daily to that which displeaseth God, He being greatly to be feared and obeyed, and was worthy of the deepest reverence that my soul, body and strength could ascribe to his all-powerful name."

We believe there are thousands of witnesses to the fulfilment of the gracious promise, "they shall be all taught of God." For the Apostle declares, "The grace of God which bringeth salvation hath appeared unto all men, teaching them, &c.," so that it may truly be said, "there is no speech or language" where the voice of this Divine Instructor is not heard.

The Lord teaches us not only by the direct impressions of his Spirit on the mind, but he often administers counsel by the incidents which he permits to befall us. It was thus that Joseph Hoag was, on one occasion, taught not to regard as "common or unclean" the instrument which his master had prepared for usefulness. A woman Friend belonging to the same Quarterly Meeting with himself, was at one time exercised as a minister, and Joseph had entertained a prejudice against her, thinking that she was not fit to preach the Gospel. He awoke one morning with an impression that it would be right for him to attend a meeting at some distance from his home. As the feeling of duty grew clearer and clearer, he arose, and reached the house in time for the meeting. A religious exercise spread over his mind, and when he thought the time for service had come, he put forth his hand to take hold on the rail in front of him, in order to rise. At the same time, this woman Friend, who was a member of that meeting, rose with the very words that had presented him to commence with. He continued in his seat, and the subject opened before him, as if he had been commissioned to preach to the people; but she was the mouth piece who delivered it all, while he said nothing. After a time the current seemed to close up in his mind; and then the woman sat down. He felt relieved from any vocal service, and, when the meeting closed, mounted his horse and rode away. On his way home, as he reflected on this singular occurrence, he was favored to see that it contained a lesson of instruction for himself; and it was effectual in removing the prejudice he had cherished. In speaking of it, he remarked, "I was bound to acknowledge that it was the Gospel she preached."

When the late Joseph Edgerton of Ohio was in Philadelphia, and at the house of Sarah Hillman, on the 20th of Sixth Month, 1851, he related the following items of his own experience, which are given nearly in his own words:—

"It was five years after I first spoke in meeting, before I ventured or could find strength to open my mouth in that way again. And now, in looking back to that long and sorrowful period, it seems unaccountable that I should have so long withstood the undoubted calls of duty; as I was rewarded for my first little act of dedication with sweet peace, and an assurance of being in the way of my duty in offering it. It was not stubborn wilfulness that sealed my lips, for there was no time during that long period but what I would have been glad to have obeyed the call, if I could have felt assured that the Lord required it of me. I felt so poor and weak, and thought myself so unfit, and every way so unworthy, that I seemed afraid to move again; and often concluded it was all a delusion.

"I now remember a dream I had not long after my first appearance in public, which was descriptive of what I had passed through, as well as prophetic of what was in store for me. I thought that I was furnished with wings, that I tried them and was much surprised at the ease with which I could mount up above this lower world, and soar in the clear firmament of Heaven. My heart seemed filled with joy and gladness; and with gratitude also, because I had been so highly favored. But then I soon let in the reasoner, and began to query whether this could really be so. I knew I was a poor, unworthy creature; and, as my doubts increased and faith lessened, I found my power of flight rapidly declining; so that I was soon brought back to the earth, from which I could not again raise myself, though I repeatedly tried my wings. I now found myself on the brink of a great dark gully, which I had to cross to gain the plain, open country which I could see beyond. Oh! what toiling and plunging I had to endure, and this for a long season, ere I was enabled to get out of this horrible pit. But, as I was enabled eventually to attain the pleasant country beyond this dark and dismal valley, in my dream, so I was encouraged to toil on in my weary course after that good land which I had seen to be beyond this region of doubt, darkness and woe; and I may now acknowledge that the Lord did enable to toil through, and to praise Him on the banks of deliverance.

"I have now brought to my remembrance another dream, which I had a little before I appeared the second time in public testimony; which was on this wise:

"I thought I was in company with a large circle of friends, one of whom was a minister visiting in our neighborhood. This Friend was giving a very thrilling account of a young man who had come to an untimely end, perishing miserably. The narrative was much like that Young gives of him he calls Altamont. As the friend (William Planner) finished the story, he turned to me and said, 'Joseph, if thou had been faithful, this young man would not have perished.' The horror I felt at this declaration awakened me, and I was truly glad to find that it was only a dream." J. W.

The Kingdom which Cannot be Moved.—The excellent Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna, was obliged to quit the city in consequence of increasing persecutions; he went with one of his disciples to a region in the vicinity. In the cool of the evening the Bishop was walking under the shade of the magnificent trees which stood in front of his rural abode; here he found his disciple sitting under an oak-tree, leaning his head upon his hand, and weeping. Then the old man said, "My son, why weepst thou?" The disciple lifted up his head, and said, "Shall I not mourn and weep when I think of the kingdom of truth upon earth? Tempests are gathering round it, and will destroy it. Many of its adherents have become apostates, and have denied and abused the truth, proving that unworthy men may confess it with their lips, though their hearts are far from it. This fills my heart with sorrow, and my eyes with tears." Then Polycarp smiled, and answered, "My son, the kingdom of Divine truth is like unto a tree which a countryman reared in his garden. He set the seed secretly and quietly in the ground, and left it; the seed put forth leaves, and the young tree grew up among weeds and thorns. Soon the tree reared itself above them, and the weeds died, because the shadow of the branches overcame them. The tree grew, and the winds blew on it and shook it, but its roots clung firmer and firmer to the ground, taking hold of the rocks downward, and its branches reached unto heaven. Thus the tempest served to increase the firmness and strength of the tree. When it grew higher, and its shadow spread farther, then the thorns and weeds grew again around the tree; but it heeded them not in its loftiness. There it stood, in calm, peaceful grandeur—a tree of God!"—Selected.

"God Gave Him Another Heart."

1st Samuel x. 9.

When Saul was called to be king over Israel, he had to be prepared for the place he was to occupy. Though he was "from his shoulders and upwards higher than other people," which would make him to be considered a suitable person for a king, yet there was another requisite in the mind of God. After he had received "another heart," he became as one of the prophets, therefore it became a proverb, "Is Saul also among the prophets?" Without going into detail of Saul's life; how he fell away from the heart that was given him, and how he died an ignominious death, it sufficeth to say, it shows the weakness of the human heart, unless there is a confiding trust in God abode in.

Soon after the war of the rebellion, there was a man with whom I have some acquaintance, who was a member of the Society of Friends, and had always attended meetings diligently. He felt his heart was hard, and he could not obtain a better heart. He wrote letters to a number of ministers, asking them to come to his house on a certain day and hour. Many of them came, not knowing why the invitation had been sent. He stated to them briefly why he had sent for them. They settled down in silence and held a meeting, in which prayer and exhortation were offered. The company then returned to their respective abodes, except one Friend who could not conveniently, and remained over night. At the evening reading of the Bible, before retiring for the night, this Friend delineated the character of the man in a very remarkable manner, she having never had any acquaintance with him. His heart was very much humbled and contrited, even more than he had known before, and for several days the contrition increased.

One day, soon after, while riding along the public highway, he felt so burdened he dismounted, and knelt down in a secret place, and wrestled in prayer for deliverance. A little light broke into his heart; he carefully watched this appearance, and ultimately experienced a change in his feelings, for "God gave him another heart."

The difference in the circumstances which I have noted is very apparent: one sought and obtained a change of heart, but it was miraculously bestowed upon the other. I am a constant reader of "The Friend," and often appreciate its contents. In "The Friend" of Second Month 5th, mention was made by one of the contributors, of the profit to be derived, both by older and younger Friends, from reading the approved writings of Friends, which are published in the Friends' Library. This is in accordance with my views.

MARTHA COFFIN.

Thorntown, Ind., Second Mo. 10th, 1857.

A Library in Herculaneum.—The eruption of Vesuvius in the year A. D. 79, overwhelmed both Pompeii and Herculaneum. The volcano first threw out ashes, and these, saturated with the heated vapor which also came from the crater in enormous volumes, formed mud. This falling into Pompeii literally blotted it out. Later, the lava streams began to flow toward Herculaneum, burying the greater part of that city under ninety-five feet of lava; consequently it has never since seen daylight, though the theatre has been emptied of scoriae and can be seen underground. The streets and houses of Pompeii were opened after an entombment of more than eighteen centuries. At one point in Herculaneum the lava stream divided, leaving a large villa with its garden and porticoes, columns, statues, mosaics and fountains, and this being filled only with ashes has been opened to the light and its treasures removed to the Museum in Naples.

In the process of excavating the workmen found a small room which contained piles of what looked like charcoal sticks, and many of these they thoughtlessly destroyed. But some one, observing the regularity of arrangement, examined them more closely, and discovered upon them their Greek and Latin words. The rolls were carefully taken to the Royal Museum at Portici, and proved to be a valuable collection of manuscript books, the most important being several works of the Philosophy of Epicurus, a treatise upon Music, one upon Vice and Virtue, and one on Rhetoric by Philodemus, a Syrian philosopher. The first pages of nearly all these rolls are missing, but the titles are repeated at the end. They are written in columns from twenty to forty lines each, without punctuation or capitals to mark the sentences. The paper upon which they were written consists of very thin leaves of the papyrus pulp, frail of itself and charred by heat. It is exceedingly difficult to unroll them without breaking or injuring the writing. The Padre Piaggi invented a machine for this purpose which is very delicate and tedious in its operation. Of seventeen hundred and fifty papyri, but five hundred have been successfully opened. In the library with these were also found inks of curious designs, a stylus and its case, and busts in bronze of Epicurus, Zeno and Hermachus, bearing their names in Greek letters.

The Hard-worked Women of Europe.—Mary H. Norris in the Christian Advocate thus speaks of the labor performed by the women of the poorer classes in Europe:—

"Whether looking on the ordinary English village, with its pathetic and barren absence of land around the cottages; whether travelling through sunny France and watching women as "signal men" on the railways, or, shovel in hand, repairers of the road-bed; or in Belgium, gazing breathlessly as I saw women with bare feet traversing the tops of coal cars at the mines, their shoulders bent beneath huge coal-sacks, their arms knotted with muscle; or in Germany, viewing with admiration the highly cultivated plains, and with sadness the hundreds of women, many a one three-score years and ten, digging, weeding, plowing, under heavy raius; or in Switzerland, observing that cows, dogs, and women were the chief burden-bearers; or in Italy, noticing gaunt, sun-burned, bare-headed women, bared to the knees, standing in the wet rice-fields, or side by side with men, and under a burning sun, lifting the same heavy and primitive implements with which to break the hard earth into fineness; I have asked myself, 'What, indeed is womanly? What, indeed is manly?'"

Impurity in Ice.—Dr. Fränkel of Berlin has been making some examination of the impurity in different specimens of ice, as shown by the number of bacteria developed in a gelatine solution by the water obtained by melting.

The first ice examined was obtained from a lake-like expansion of the Spree above Berlin. The number of colonies of bacteria which originated from one centimetre of water varied from 80 to 6,300. This great difference probably depended on where the ice was found—whether near the bank or in the purer part of the stream towards the centre. Water containing so many germs would be condemned for purposes of common use. Moreover, there is reason to believe that the water itself from which the ice was taken was worse than the ice; for the Doctor found that on counting the germs in water and then freezing the water, the corresponding ice contained only about one-fifth the number of developable germs.

Ice made from distilled water was also tested; and this was found to be nearly free from germs; one centimeter of the water obtained by melting it not showing a single germ, in some cases; and the highest number present being only about 14. The author arrived at the conclusion that the common "raw" ice, such as is obtained from ponds and streams, should not be taken with food, or used in the treatment of wounds, on account of the large number of bacteria capable of development which it contains. Of course, if the water is pure before freezing, the ice itself will be so.

Adulteration of Butter.—Gelatin is used in parts of the West to adulterate butter, giving consistency and adding to the weight.

Accidents from Kerosene Oil.—Accidents always arise either from impure oils or from the improper use of the oil for the kindling of fires.

A case illustrating both is fresh in memory. On a hot day a quart can not half full of impure kerosene had been setting where rays of the sun came upon it. There was so much of naphtha and other volatile vapors arising from the oil as to fill the top of the can with explosive gases. A servant in lighting the fire poured a little upon the dying embers, when a flash, an explosion followed. The can was blown to the ceiling so as to cut a hole to the lath, and the garments of the person set on fire, and death soon followed.

In many cases there is burning without explosion, from the mere scattering about of the oil after it has caught fire. Real explosion is the exception. But a little of this highly inflammable vapor catches fire and sets fire to the oil, and the person is enveloped in the quickly spreading flame. Chemists and manufacturers have not been slow to detect the causes of these extra inflammable gases. Modes of refining were soon adopted by which a standard of perfect safety could be secured. Unfortunately the greed of some refiners led them to put on the market some of the unsafe compounds, because a price could be obtained for what would otherwise be a waste or very low-priced product.

Grape Disease.—The disease known as the Black Rot in grapes is the result of a small Fungus. A brown faint spot appears on the berry, which spreads over it. As soon as the berry shows any sign of the disease, the living threads or mycelium may be detected by the microscope, traversing the cells of the grape. At the terminations of these threads little cells are formed in which the spores or seeds of the Fungus are developed. These will germinate in water in the space of 3 or 4 hours and form new plants. To check the spread of the disease, it is recommended to gather and burn the infected fruit.

The Manufacture of Shot.—Shot are made of lead alloyed with a very small proportion of arsenic, which has the property of causing the melted lead as it falls through the fine holes of a sieve to form into globular drops. The lead hardens as it falls from the summit of the tower or building in which the shot are made; and is received into water at the base, which prevents the globules from being flattened by the concussion.

After the shot has reached the bottom it is at once lifted out by an elevator and thrown upon an inclined drying table, over which they slide, falling finally into a wire gauze rotating cylinder. Then they are rolled and ground together, and in this way the minute burrs upon them are removed. From the cylinder another elevator lifts the shot upon a screening table. This consists of a series of planes arranged at gradually decreasing heights. Between each two there is an interval.

The shot being started at the head of the highest plane, will, if perfect, roll from one plane to another, jumping over the intermediate spaces. If imperfect, however, it tumbles, and goes back to the melting kettle. The good shot, after passing this ordeal, reaches the separators. It should be explained that there are usually several tables, each being devoted to a different size of shot. The little leaden globes are next elevated to the top cylinder of a series, arranged on an incline. They are conical in form, and covered with perforated sheet brass. Each cylinder serves as a sieve for a particular size of shot, retaining that and allowing all smaller sizes to escape. The shifting goes on until each cylinder has picked out the particular class of shot to which it is adapted.

Explosion of Old Shells.—Lately there burst at Thionville, near Metz, an old shell, preserved from the year 1870, which killed a boy playing near. The authorities therefore made a search for any shells kept as memorials, and found more than a hundred. Their possessors are mostly unaware of the danger incurred in keeping these unexploded shells, gathered from the battlefields, so that it is a wonder more accidents have not occurred. All those found are to be carefully exploded by the military authorities.

Weasels.—In May, 1878, a pair of small weasels took up their abode near my house (near the Delaware River below Trenton). My first intimation of their presence was the marked diminution in the number of ground-squirrels. Then a young chicken, now and then, was found lying dead, with a hole in its neck. The cry of "Weasel!" was set up, but none were seen for some time. During the first week in June, as I was looking for birds' nests, I spied one of these animals running in the path before me. Like a flash it disappeared in a stump that extended into the path. It was evident that this weasel had its home here.

Soon after this the weasels transferred their quarters to a rats' burrow under a pig-sty, not far off, and made a radical change in their habits and diet, in so far as they now fed exclusively upon the rats in the neighborhood. There was found in their new quarters a large pile of rats' bones, and, as subsequent experience proved, these little weasels effectually cleared the premises of that terrible pest. My dog, however, was constantly on the watch and finally worried the weasels so that they again sought new quarters. In September I found them again, and this time they had made a new home under a large oak growing on the border of a meadow. Here they seemed to be living wholly upon crickets, frogs and mice, particularly the pretty white-footed or smaller jumping mouse. The number of common black crickets and grass-hoppers destroyed by them was enormous, and this fact went a great way towards recommending the animal as being really sometimes as beneficial as it was at others destructive. Certainly this one family of weasels did me no harm. They destroyed half-a-dozen young chickens, I know, but this is offset by riding me of a plague of rats, and then of the grasshoppers I have mentioned.

Quite late in the month, while standing on the border of a wide stretch of meadow, the grass on which had lately been mown, I saw a jumping mouse give an enormous leap, and no sooner had it touched the ground that it leaped a second time, with even greater energy, but not in the same direction. Going quickly toward it, I was surprised to see a little weasel bound nimbly over the grass. As it turned out, there were three of these animals near each other, and undoubtedly associated together at the hunt. On my remaining quiet the weasels resumed their hunt, and one of the three in concert, flushed the mouse several times, before it reached the thicket near by, which, I hope at least, afforded it security against their tireless persecution.—*C. —A Spiritualist Exposed.—The New York Times states that a woman named Ross has been holding some remarkable spiritualistic exhibitions at Boston, which have excited the wonder of some scientific and literary men. Suspensions of fraud having been awakened in the minds of some of her visitors, a party of twelve agreed to attempt an expose. A moment or two before the signal was given, one of the party was conversing with what professed to be a "materialized spirit." The young man seized the "shadow" by the hand and drew it into the middle of the room. At the same instant the light was turned on, and the different performers seized. Four boys and a little girl were found inside the curtain, who during the evening had figured as deceased friends and relatives.

"The mystery of the cabinet was also solved. It consisted of a curtain drawn across one corner of the room where the walls were apparently solid. Investigation showed that by an ingenious mechanical contrivance the board could be lifted, leaving an open space into a closet in the back parlor. In the melee one of the party was quite severely cut by broken glass, but beyond this no injury was received by any one. Mr. and Mrs. Ross made no attempt at explanation, but refunded the money paid by each person who had witnessed the seance."

—Denominational Schools.—The ecclesiastical authorities of the Catholic Church in this country are using much effort to have the children of Catholic parents educated in schools under their supervision. But as many of their people are poor, they wish the expense to be defrayed out of the public funds. One attempt in this direction is the recent introduction into the Legislature of New York of an Act which contains a clause that "The schools established and maintained by the New York Catholic Protectorate shall participate in the distribution of Common School Funds in the same manner and degree as the Common Schools of the City and County of New York." It will probably be vigorously opposed by those who think that every denomination should support its own sectarian schools; and that a departure from this course foreshadows the destruction of the present common school system.

—Observance of Christmas.—We have a day called Christmas without any Bible sanction—a purely Roman Catholic day, on which more sin and sacrilege and pagan foolishness is committed than on any day in the year. If it were the will of God to observe Christ's natural birthday, we might expect to read, "Remember the Christmas day, to keep it holy." If it had been the judgment of the framers of [the Methodist] Discipline, we would find it there—but not a word. When Protestants observe these days, they ignore the New Testament entirely, and on the authority of the Catholic traditions turn to those things that made Paul afraid: "Ye observe days." * * * I am afraid of you." (Gal. iv. 10).—J. H. C., in Christian Advocate.

—Armaments vs. Peace.—The Herald of Peace speaks of the folly of equipping and maintaining armies and fleets, with a professed object of preventing war. It says: "They fill Europe with inflammable materials, which they are heaping higher and higher every year, in the form of rival armaments, and all the while declare that that is the only way to prevent a conflagration? Just as well recommend us, as a security against fire, to store up in our cellars and closets any quantity of gunpowder, dynamite, petroleum, and lucifer matches. We flatter our military masters by talking of them as our brave defenders against invasion and attack, while, in fact, they are the very men who provoke and almost invite attack by their miserable mixture of loud bluster and cowardly alarm. Forgetting the words of the wisest of men, that 'a soft answer turneth away wrath, but grievous words stir up anger,' we admire and applaud language of menace and defiance from the tribune and press as the vehicle of a 'spirited' policy."

When the creature and its works are in the grave, when self is entirely dead, then the Creator is the most glorified.

THE FRIEND.

THIRD MONTH 26, 1887.

On page 211 of the present volume of "The Friend," is an article by our friend Adam Spencer, relating to the general condition of the Society of Friends; and in particular pointing out some of the causes which led to the separation in Canada Yearly Meeting. Among these he mentions the introduction of doctrines at variance with those heretofore held by our Society; and also the difference in judgment among Canada Friends as to the adoption of the revised discipline of New York Yearly Meeting of 1877, for which many of them were not prepared.

As this article seemed to be a clear statement of important facts, and to be written in so mild a manner as to give no unnecessary offence, it was admitted into our columns. Soon after its publication, we received a letter from a member of New York Yearly Meeting, who was uneasy lest our readers should conclude "that the faith and practice of our [New York] members was in an intellectual belief and acceptance of the Atonement, without the reception of the Lord Jesus in the heart, as our ever-cleansing, heart-changing power."

We forwarded the letter to A. Spencer, who says in reply: "I was not treating of the standing of New York Yearly Meeting as to doctrine; but its official act of revising its discipline is not approved by the members of Canada, who are loyal to Friends' principles."

We hope this explanation will prove satisfactory to our New York Friend.

From a comparison made some years ago of the revised Discipline of 1877 with that before in force, we are not surprised at the want of approval manifested by Canada Friends. The impression it made upon us was, that in rewriting the doctrinal statements contained in it, there had been an effort to eliminate that which was distinctively "Friendly." While the statement in the revised Discipline might contain very little that a sound Friend would object to, yet the frequent omission of that which was characteristic of the spiritual views of the Society, created alarm and uneasiness. We are, therefore, not surprised that many of the Canada Friends, as A. Spencer states, "are of the opinion that the wording [of the Discipline of 1877] is so ambiguous and defective as not to be a true exposition of the doctrines and practices of Friends."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Richmond Hotel, in Buffalo, New York, was destroyed by fire before daylight on the morning of the 18th instant. Several of the guests and other occupants perished in the flames or were killed or injured by jumping from the windows. The flames spread to the St. James Hall, adjoining, and burned out several firms. The total loss is estimated at $400,000.

Two slight earthquakes were felt at Charleston and Summerville, in South Carolina, at 9 o'clock on the morning of the 17th instant. The tremor was sharper in Summerville than in Charleston, but no damage was done. On the evening of the 18th, another shock was felt at Summerville. It was the severest felt there for two months.

The Governor of Tennessee has signed the bill submitting to the people a prohibition amendment to the Constitution. The election will be held in the Ninth Month.

In the Illinois House of Representatives on the 16th instant, a bill for the submission of a prohibitory amendment to the Constitution at the next general election, was defeated by 78 yeas to 65 yeas.

The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania has sustained the conviction of Samuel Johnson of murder in the first degree. Johnson was indicted, tried and convicted of the murder of John Sharpless, of Chester. The Court said, among other things: "The trial throughout appears to have been conducted with due regard to the rights of the prisoner, and we find nothing in the judgment that would justify a reversal." The criminal will now have no hope of his life being spared, except through the clemency of the Board of Pardons and the Governor.

The capital punishment law in Maine has been repealed, and imprisonment for life is substituted for death in all cases of murder in the first degree. "Such convicts, however, are to be kept in close confinement, away from all associations," and no pardoning power is left to the Governor and Council unless the convict is proved innocent.

A heavy white frost has nipped early vegetables in the northern and middle counties of Florida and South-east Georgia.

The floods in Dakota continue. All attempts to dislodge the ice gorge above Mandan have proved futile, and telegraphic communication with that place has been cut off. All the lowlands between Mandan and Bismarck were flooded, and the Boston syndicate property, including a flouring mill and some fifty residences, elevator shops and everything south of the track, was submerged. At Pierre the river was higher than at any time since 1881.

The Salvation Army in Nevada City, Nev., has been required to pay a license, the authorities holding that their "praise meetings" are "shows."

The deaths in this city last week numbered 436, which was 20 less than during the previous week, and 21 less than during the corresponding period last year. Of the whole number 226 were males and 210 females: 251 adults and 185 minors: 65 died of consumption; 51 of pneumonia; 26 of old age; 20 of diseases of the heart; 18 of bronchitis; 14 of cramp; 14 of inflammation of the brain; 14 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 14 of typhoid fever, and 13 of Bright's disease.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½'s, 100½; 4's, registered, 127½; coupon, 128½; 3's, 101; currency 6's, 126½ a 136½.

Cotton was quiet but firm, at 10½ cts. for middling uplands.

Petroleum was dull at 6½ cts. for 70 Abel test in barrels, and 8½ cts. for 110 test in cases.

Feed was in light supply and firm with a fair demand. Sales of 4 cars prime to choice winter bran at $19.75 a $20 per ton. Quotations: Bran, western winter, spot, per ton, $19 a $20; do., spring, spot, $18 a $18.50.

Flour and Meal.—The movement in flour was slow and unsatisfactory, but prices were steadily held. Sales of 250 barrels Ohio, clear, at $4; 125 barrels do. straight, at $4.40; 125 barrels Indiana straight, at $4.35; 375 barrels winter patent, at $4.62½ a $4.75; 125 barrels Minnesota, clear, at $4, and 500 barrels do. patent, at $4.75 a $5. Rye flour was quiet, at $3 per barrel for choice.

Grain.—Wheat ruled steady, No. 2 white closing at 89½ cts. bid and 90 cts. asked. Corn was unchanged, No. 2 mixed closing at 45½ cts. bid, and 46 cts. asked. Oats was dull but steady, No. 2 white closing at 35½ cts. bid and 36½ cts. asked.

Beef cattle were fairly active, at 4 a 5½ cts. Sheep were in fair demand; extra, 5¼ a 5½ cts.;

good, 5 a 5½ cts.; medium, 4¼ a 4½ cts.; common, 3½ a 4 cts.; lambs, 4¼ a 7½ cts.

Hogs were active; Western, 8½ a 8¾ cts.; State, 8 a 8½ cts.

Milch calves were firm at 5 a 8 cts. Milch cows were fairly active at $25 a $50.

FOREIGN.—At midday, on the 15th instant a remarkable darkness enveloped London. It was as dark as midnight in the entire region of Charing Cross, Whitehall and the Strand, the atmosphere being pitchy black. In the east and southwest portions of the city it was somewhat clearer. Snow was falling heavily at the time.

The English Cabinet has decided upon a land purchase scheme based upon revised rentals. Under this scheme, therefore, landlords will fare worse than they would under Gladstone's bill.

On the 21st instant, W. H. Smith gave notice that the Government would move that the new Irish Crimes bill have precedence over all orders of the day.

John Morley at once gave notice that he would move an amendment to the Government's motion to the effect that the "House decline to set aside business in favor of a measure increasing the stringency of the law in Ireland whilst no effective security is taken against the abuse of the law by the exaction of excessive rents." It is the intention of the Parnellites and a large section of the Gladstonians to oppose the coercion bill at every stage, even to force a division on the formal motion for permission to introduce the bill. All the parties have issued urgent whips.

Earthquake shocks were felt at Munich and in its vicinity on the 15th instant. At the same time a heavy snow storm prevailed throughout Bavaria and Wurttemberg.

Letters from Prague refer to an earthquake on the 19th instant around Pezibram and say that the village of Birkenburg was destroyed, the inhabitants taking refuge in Prague.

It is stated that a new alliance between Germany, Austria and Italy places each of these Powers on an equality. All three will undertake the protection of individual interests, the infringement of which might disturb the peace of Europe.

The Russian Embassy in London has received despatches confirming the reports of the discovery of a plot to assassinate the Czar and the arrest of the ringleaders. These despatches say that no actual attempt was made to kill the Czar, as the plot had been discovered before he left the palace.

The police have become alarmed at St. Petersburg. They have been informed that numerous widespread bands of Nihilists are ready for immediate action.

Two shocks of earthquake were felt on the 17th inst., at Quenados, on the Island of Cuba.

Selections from the Diary of Abigail W. Hall.

Fifth Mo. 7th, 1852. Our good friend, Hannah Warner, is visiting the families composing Goshen Preparative Meeting; accompanied by our friends Pennock and Sarah Passmore. There being three of us here members of that meeting, we were, this morning, kindly remembered with a visit. Encouraging language flowed—words fitly spoken. She believed the hour of temptation was being passed through, and patience under it was recommended. Precious promises did our dear friend revive.

11th. To-day was our Quarterly Meeting which, through favor, I attended; and not only attended but was made a partaker of the good things handed forth, both immediately and instrumentally. He who formerly "blessed and brake, and handed to the disciples and the disciples to the multitude," was, I believe in the midst and ministered unto our wants severally. Which favor, I trust, many of us were sensible of, and for which gratitude flowed unto Him whose mercies are new unto us every morning: great is His faithfulness. Had the company and labors of our friends Samuel and Morris Cope: both of whom were engaged in testimony. In our last meeting, too, there seemed such a united travail and exercise for the "prosperity of Zion, and the enlargement of her borders, that I thought we had indeed cause to thank God and take courage; trusting and believing that a way will yet be made for his poor afflicted Church and people where, as to the outward, some of us can hardly see any. "Do good, O Lord, unto those that be good, and to them that are upright in heart."

[At this date, Sixth Mo. 5th, 1852, after alluding to some length, to the sickness and death of John Whitacre, one of the pupils at the school, A. W. Hall thus dwells upon the solemn event and lesson:]—"Most of yesterday I sat in the room with him. The scene was an affecting one. How I craved it might be blessed and sanctified to me, and to us all, that hearts of flesh might be given us, and the stony heart taken away. If scenes of this kind do not arouse, what will? We may feel affected and alarmed at the time, but too soon forget. I have craved, according to my feeble measure, it may dwell with us, inciting us daily to increased diligence to work while it is called to-day. "To-day, if ye will hear His voice, harden not your hearts."

7th. Have the Committee with us; it being the usual time of visiting our meeting and school. Their being with us never felt more acceptable; having been left pretty much to ourselves, since we came together; and having just passed through the scene above alluded to, they can feel with us and help us to bear our burden. Still I desire not to have it lightened: but that it may accomplish "that, whereunto it was sent;" for I do most truly believe, we are thus spoken unto, in order that we flee from the wrath to come. Strengthen and enable us, O Heavenly Father! to bow very low before Thee; humbly beseeching thee to fit and prepare, through whatever means thou mayest see fit, for thy kingdom, when time to us here shall be no longer. Thomas Evans was, I thought, excellent in our meeting yesterday morning. He pressed upon us the necessity of watchfulness, with a life of prayer, as a preparation for death, opening Scripture passages so clearly, that the least child could understand. I united with our dear friend in his exercise; and do desire to profit by what I heard.

24th. Our week-day meeting. To the mercy and goodness of our Heavenly Father, may I set up my Ebenezer, and say: Thou hast helped me; even to lift me this day as out of the mire and the clay, to set my feet upon a rock, and to put a new song into my mouth, even praise unto my God. Thou didst help to deliver, though fearfully and tremblingly, thy little message. Thou didst also give me to know, whilst in doubtings and distrustings, and in framing of Thy word in my own will, that my wisdom was foolishness unto thee. "Increase my faith," O Lord! in thy power and might; and give me to know that thou art able for thy own work, and that, it is that alone which praiseth thee.

Seventh Mo. 22nd. Time is rapidly passing away. Oh! that the certainty of this, and the length of that eternity unto which we are all fast hastening, might inspirit us to live the time lengthened out to us here to his glory who gave us a being; and who stands graciously disposed to help and to save us, with an everlasting salvation. Saying, "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

26th. I think I can in truth say, sincere and fervent desires have been raised, not only this morning but many times during yesterday, that I may be helped to overcome my many weaknesses and frailties; yes, every hindering thing that is retarding my good progress heavenward; that the "watch" may be more continually kept: for, it seems as though I make no progress, but fearing continually because of the oppression of the enemy. Why the contest is suffered to be so great, is alone known to Him with whom we have to do. Oh, dearest Father! look down with an eye of tender compassion on thy poor child. Make a way for my escape, if consistent with thy most holy will! Thou alone knowest the deep plunges I have been and am passing through.

30th. Yesterday was our Monthly Meeting. I took my seat with nothing good at command; feeling moreover very poor and empty. Suddenly my attention was arrested, with the account we have left us, of the poor widow, who cast into the treasury the two mites, and how it was testified of her, she hath cast in more than all the rest, "even all her living." As the subject opened, it seemed I must revive it for the encouragement of some poor soul who had met with us this morning; feeling as though they had little or nothing to offer. For the encouragement of these, how these words ran through me: "She has cast in more than they all, even all her living." These words I repeated, with a little more. Whilst the subject was before me, and fearing I should "sink," how plainly did I see that hand, which was reached out to help and save Peter, extended for poor me! Our meeting was a good one. Several communications followed with gospel power and authority. But O! the fears that have since pervaded my mind, that mine was not thus in the power of the Anointing! The awfulness of handling the word deceitfully, has bowed down my poor soul this morning as in the very dust. Keep me, O Heavenly Father! keep me from falling, either on the right hand or on the left, and let thy fear continually preserve me.

Ninth Mo. 6th. Have been comforted and encouraged since last entry. In the first place, from a little dream I had a few nights since, in which I heard through the mouth of my dear friend, Wm. Evans, this language spoken to me: "I will keep thee on the right hand" and "I will keep thee on the left." On awaking, it seemed like a "sabbath of rest," because of the quiet feeling that pervaded my mind. Since that, I have received such a good letter from dear J—E—! in which he says: "I fully believe divine compassion regards thee; and that thy sighs, and thy tears, and even thy physical ailments, are not unnoticed. That I crave thy strength may be renewed and revived by a sense of his mercy, and that thou mayest hold up thy head in hope. We are said to "be saved by hope;" and let us not suffer the enemy to rob us of this precious anchor to the tossed and tribulated mind." Yesterday was a quiet day, though surrounded with much care, unusually so. On retiring to rest, and many times through the day, was my heart lifted up in prayer unto Him, from whom cometh help, and to whom all my exercises are known and I humbly hope, regarded. Keep me, O Heavenly Father! through this day, and every day thou seest meet to lengthen out to me; that so, at last when this checkered scene closes, I may be admitted into a resting place with Thee, and with those who have gone before, being found worthy. Of which number are some, I trust, near and dear to me.

10th. It is better to suffer wrong than to do wrong. I should have felt more comfortable this afternoon, if I had quietly received, this morning, some things which seemed hard to bear. I did receive it, I trust, in a right disposition; but the sin lay in speaking of it afterwards. The temper or spirit which prompted to this was a wrong one, being a spirit of pride. I wanted a little pity or praise. Ah! how much there is within me to be slain! I have seen my weakness afresh, in that light which does not deceive.

24th. Attended, yesterday, the marriage of Benjamin Hoopes and Elizabeth Walter. It was conducted throughout in a solid, orderly manner. An evidence, I thought, was vouchsafed in the meeting, of the owning and overshadowing of ancient goodness. Samuel Bettle and Samuel Cope ministered. The latter acceptably to my panting soul. Which exercise I even dared vocally on the bended knee to pour out in prayer. The awfulness of which still remains with me. Be pleased, dearest Father, to "keep the door of my lips," and let me not, through a willingness to serve thee, put forth a hand unbidden.

Tenth Mo. 5th. This morning commences the examination of the children. It has been an arduous session. Fears have attended that there has been less ability rightly to perform my part. May I be more concerned to seek for strength from Him, who alone can give it. We have a number of the Committee with us, whose countenances gladden.

10th. Attended this morning the little meeting at Goshen, of which I am a member. To me it was a season of favor; during the greater part of which I was allowed to "sit under my own vine," where none could make afraid. Oh, how good it seemed! Unexpectedly a few words arose, which, from the feeling attending, seemed not for myself alone; and in great fear, I arose and delivered them. Hope I did not do wrong! Think I can say, I never felt more like the passive clay; so that, "do with me as seemeth good," was the covering and clothing of my "quieted" soul.

I thought we had a comfortable time at our breaking up at Westtown. At the close of our evening reading, previous to retiring to bed, William Evans was engaged in testimony from the Scripture, "My meat is to do the will of Him that sent me, and to finish his work." How was my heart broken! and tears flowed under the power of the word preached. It is thy Spirit alone, O dearest Father! that giveth life. "Quicken us according to thy word;" for thy word is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart." How I long that this kind of ministry may be continued to us as a people! and that we may, O Heavenly Father! be preserved unto thee, a living people, fed and nourished alone by thee.

It will be remembered that when Finney, in his young manhood, was persuaded by an uncle of his to unite with the Freemasons, the argument advanced was, that if he belonged to the order he would discover it to be an advantage to him, for he would find friends everywhere. Now, this feature of the connection running so strongly as it does into mere favoritism and selfishness, cannot be said to be such an one as should commend it to the Christian. Its working may be seen in the following circumstance quoted from the American Freeman, of 1854. An Indiana correspondent writes:

"In hauling a load of pork to the depot a year or two since, I found the rush of wagons so great that the delivery was fully three days behind. This was a serious matter to me, for I could not lose so much time from my business, and was seriously weighing the propriety of going on to Cincinnati with my load, when the freight agent, learning from a casual remark of mine that I was a Freemason, was kind enough at once to order my errand attended to, and in three hours I was unloaded, and ready, with a light heart, to set my face homeward. Is it not an admirable thing, this Masonic spirit of brotherly love?" To this, the Masonic editor adds: "Verily it is. We have seen it in many varieties of form, but our kind-hearted brother's is but an every-day experience of Masonic practice."

Surely this doctrine is of another sort from that of the Apostle who had been instructed in the secret place of the Most High. "In honor preferring one another," is his counsel to the "called of Jesus Christ" in Rome. And again, speaking to Timothy, he says: "I charge thee * * that thou observe these things without preferring one before another, doing nothing by partiality." Yet in the instance just quoted, we find one man unjustifiably bestowing preference on another, and wronging all who were there before him, and the favored one felicitating himself over that manifestation of "brotherly love" whereby he had gained three day's time, and saved the expense of waiting his turn, while others were correspondingly obliged to lose both the time and expense. Finney remarks:

"A man who can travel about the country and make himself known as a Freemason for the purpose of being indulged, and finding the best place in a hotel, or the best seat in a railroad car, or the best stateroom in a steamboat, must be a selfish man, and cannot be a Christian—for a selfish man is not a Christian. Let it then be understood that Masonry in its fundamental principle, in which its moral character is found, is not reformed, and can not be reformed without destroying its very nature. It cannot be a part of general benevolence, but stands unalterably opposed to the highest well-being of society in general. The same, let me say, is true to a greater or less extent of all secret societies, whose members are bound by oath or pledge to treat each other with a favoritism that ignores the rights of others."

It is pretty generally known that Freemasonry sets up a claim to venerable antiquity, Solomon, for instance, figuring extensively in their ceremonies, and it being claimed that Hiram was a Grand Master of a Grand Lodge of Stone Masons, that John the Evangelist was a member of the order, and so on. But, after the Morgan exposure (1826) when there was a thorough ransacking of the records of the past by both sides: "Not the faintest ray of any historical document or monument could be found," says Myron Holley, "to sustain these pretensions back of 1717. In that year, at the Apple Tree Inn, in London, some ingenious romancers set up the institution, with its odd rituals, secret grips, monstrous oaths, professions of philanthropy, sanctity and hoary antiquity." That form which now exists is commonly spoken of as Speculative Masonry, and the most that can be said of its descent is, that for centuries back brotherhoods of stone-masons did exist; yet the order as now existing is not at all such as was formerly made up of associations of simple artisans.

Steinbrenner, a great Masonic historian, after much research, frankly admits that Speculative Freemasonry dates no further back than 1717. The Masonic writer of the article "Freemasonry" in Johnson's Cyclopaedia, also concurs by saying: "That the name Free and Accepted Masons, and the present ceremonials and government of the craft, are of modern origin, not having existed further back than the beginning of the 18th century, is certainly true." Finally, the Freemason's Repository, candidly says, that the legends and the ceremonies which associate the ancient Hebrew worthies with the organization, or which in any wise connect it with the building of the Temple, are "altogether absurd." This claim to a great antiquity, and to the alleged connection of worthy historic characters with the order, has imposed upon many. A colored man once said to the compiler of this essay, that Christ and some of the Apostles were members of the craft!

Concerning the benevolence of Freemasonry, we have seen that charity is specially enjoined as bestowable upon themselves, while, on the other hand, that which Christianity requires is universal in its nature and necessarily impartial. Apparently the money paid for the degrees of Masonry is largely devoted "to the erection of Masonic temples, support of Grand Lodges, and for refreshment for the craft." One who examined the report of the Treasurer of the Iowa Freemasons, two years ago, said, that "it shows a large sum is collected from the membership for mere running expenses. Of the whole amount received about 95 per cent. is paid for that purpose; nor does it appear that any thing was given for benevolence or to aid distressed Masons."

A worthy minister, H. H. Hinman, who has felt specially called to write and speak upon the evil of Christians allying themselves with secret, oath-bound organizations, lately remarked:—"That though the number annually initiated and made Masons is large, the number who withdraw, are suspended or expelled, nearly equals it, indicating a wide-spread dissatisfaction among the members of the order, and that about five-sixths of all who are made Masons give evidence of disappointment and disaffection." Many men of note will be claimed as members of the order, as Washington and Chief Justice Marshall were, but their inattention to, or virtual withdrawal from it, will not be generally known. As Finney remarks: "It is no doubt true that many men have joined them, and, when they have taken a sufficient number of degrees to have the impression entirely removed from their minds that there is any secret in Freemasonry worth knowing, they have become disgusted with its shams, its hypocrisies, its falsehoods, its oaths and its ceremonies, its puerilities and its blasphemies; and they have paid no further attention to it."

One who wrote to Finney, said: "I merely write you as a man, and professed Christian, to say that you are doing God service in your attacks upon the institution of Masonry. I am a Mason, but have long since been convinced that it is a wicked, blasphemous institution, and that the Church of Christ suffers from this source more than from any other. You know that the oaths and scenes of the lodge are most shamefully wicked; and a Christian man's character, if he leaves them, is not safe in the community where he lives. You can make what use you please of this; but, perhaps, my name and place of residence had better not be made public, for I fear for my property and my person." Finney adds: "Among all the letters that I have received on this subject, I do not recollect one in which the writer does not admonish me not to publish his name. And this in republican America."

Oh! the lowness and meanness of those who are embracing, with all the ardency of affection, the sensual pleasures of this life.

Epistolary Correspondence.

The two letters by Charles W. Thomson, recently published in "The Friend," in presenting the state of things in London Yearly Meeting, shows clearly that matters there are similar to what they have been for some years on this side of the Atlantic.

Every part of his letters is good, but the description of his own experience in the conflict has peculiar weight—"I have found it impossible to preserve serenity of mind and true quiet, in which growth and progress may be known on the Christian's pathway, and always be in contact with unsound principles. So that it has often been my place to keep silence when I could not assent to what was going forward." Such has been the experience of many Friends who preferred to bear their part in silent suffering, than to contend as the case demanded. To be in constant contact with unsound principles is hazardous. To contend with it engenders a spirit of contention; and to wink at it involves a loss of eyesight, or the loss of discernment between thing and thing.

Many, besides our friend, have failed to see how opposites can be united. There can be no true spiritual union between those on the one hand who are endeavoring to uphold and to live out our principles, and those on the other hand who are seeking to undermine and destroy the foundation principles of Society. It is well known that these two opposites exist at the present time in many places in the same camp. If such a divided and weakened condition exists in London Yearly Meeting, and that body desires in the future, as in the past, to exercise a care over the membership of the Society at large, by issuing a general epistle, must not it, as well as others, "first come to a sense of its own condition and needs, so as to seek aright help for itself, before it can be fitted to help others?"

It is no new thing for people to change their religious principles, but it is passing strange that any in membership should not only depart from, but try to undermine and destroy, Friends' principles, and still make the mistake in calling themselves Friends.

Since it is true that without Christ we can do nothing that will advance his kingdom in the earth, may there be a faithful abiding in Him, the Vine, and such a submission to the care and purging of the Husbandman as to know a right establishment and growth in the truth as it is in Jesus, and thus be enabled to fill our proper places in his Church, to the glory of God.

The Diffusion of Plants.

The natural diffusion of plants, if rightly considered, is a forcible illustration of Divine economy and goodness.

We find our woods interspersed with many curious and interesting specimens that flourish in the shade. The meadows are furnished with others that luxuriate in sunshine. Places that are marshy have those that are adapted to such conditions, among them some whose flowers are of rare beauty, such as Marsh Marigolds, Rhexias, and Habenarias. Our "barrens" have their "Moss Pinks" and Saxifrages that grow on no other kind of soil. But all these, whether from woods, marshes, barrens or meadows, give way under drainage and tillage, and in their places come myriads of weeds of different sorts, that follow in the wake of cultivation. Perhaps nearly all of these that thus grow, if permitted, in our fields and about our dwellings, are from the "old world." They could have no footing on our continent till the land was disturbed by spade or plow, and manured to suit them, and it seems presumptuous to imagine they thus attend the footsteps of man without a beneficent purpose.

Among those most wide-spread on our fields, are the wild carrot and daisy. When allowed undisturbed possession, such plants continue and their seeds are ready to start fresh possessions wherever the winds may carry them.

But after many years of close observation, I know of no instance in which they have not yielded to careful culture, in the course of which the fields were well set with grass. For a time, while a neighborhood is undergoing a renovation in farming, we may see some clean grass fields, while others are white with the bloom of these weeds, and perhaps the Erigeron among them. But gradually they leave the fields altogether, and only enough remain in uncultivated spots, to take possession in case man leaves the fields to lie waste.

The Mallows, Burdocks, Chenopodiums and other rather unwelcome visitors about our buildings, contain medical virtues that would alleviate our ills, if we but knew them. It costs but little care to keep them nearly suppressed, and it may be well for us that a few remain to place some within reach when needed. Almost the only plants that can be called troublesome, are some with stoloniferous roots. The Canada Thistle, in the North, and the Solanum Carolinense in the South, maintain their hold so tenaciously, as to tire the efforts of the farmer to suppress them. All other sorts yield to the plow and give farmers who are not disposed to invite vexation from imaginary evils, no trouble. Their presence in limited quantities is a source of abiding gratification to the lover of nature, for

"Who but He that arched the skies,
And poured the day-spring's living flood,
Wondrous alike in all His tries,
Could rear the daisy's purple bud;
Then fling it unrestrained and free
O'er hill and dale and desert sod,
That man in all his walks might see
At every step the hand of God?"

For "The Friend."

The proposition recently made by the Representative Meeting of New England Yearly Meeting (larger body) that a conference should be held at Richmond, Ind., in the Ninth Month next, by members of it and similar Representative Meetings, including those of London and Dublin Yearly Meetings, to consider the subjects of peace and arbitration among nations, has awakened reflections on the past.

More than forty years have now passed away since a considerable number of Friends of New England Yearly Meeting, against whom no charge of unsoundness in doctrine had been brought, were driven from their brethren by actions which cannot be justified. How healing to the Society at large would it be if the Spirit of the Prince of Peace so prevailed in the Representative Meeting first alluded to, as to animate it to take steps to rescind all unjust measures which have been passed, and thus prepare the way for the restoration of peace and unity among those within its own borders who ought to be brethren! How would such a course prepare the hearts of those who might be engaged in it for the advocacy of the principles of peace among others!

In a document setting forth the causes which led to the division which occurred in New England in 1845, prepared by the Meeting for Sufferings of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, and adopted by the latter in 1849, a copy of which was sent to each body, the following observations occur—which have lost none of their force by the lapse of time:

"We all profess to act under the government of the same blessed Head of the Church who laid down his life for our sakes, and taught us that we should lay down our lives for one another; and we believe that if all classes stand open to the softening influences of the love of God, through his mercy and goodness, everything that has divided and alienated from each other may be entirely removed, and a re-establishment on the right foundation witnessed in that faith and love and unity, which in former years bound together the members, and the different Yearly Meetings of our Society."

Extract from a Letter.

I trust, there are a goodly number in various parts, that are alive to the support of the doctrines and testimonies of Friends; that are concerned for Zion's prosperity, and who do "prefer Jerusalem to their chief joy." May the hands of these be strengthened by the Hand of the mighty God of Jacob; and may the number of these be increased. Oh that more of the beloved youth, and others also of riper age, might be awakened to a realizing sense of the importance of these things! That they might bow their necks beneath the yoke of Christ and so become fitted and prepared of Him, the great Master Builder, (like stones hewn and squared in the mountain) to fill places of usefulness in his house. That so there may be a succession of standard bearers to take the places of those that are removed and are being removed from works to rewards; who having borne their burden faithfully in the heat of the day, and occupied the talent or talents committed unto them, have received and will receive the gracious answer of well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord and into thy heavenly Master's rest. "Verily there is a reward for the righteous; verily He is a God that judgeth in the earth." Oh that none may be so unwise as to reject the calls and invitations of the good Master; for, if this course be persisted in, they may be set aside, (though He followeth in mercy and forbeareth in mercy and waiteth long to be gracious unto the children of men) and others called in to fill the places and wear the crowns designed for them.

It is very unsafe for any to stand against conviction, or against what has been clearly made known to them to be their duty; no excuse will avail; the Lord knows what is best for us, and for the good of his cause. He will not require anything of us but what He will enable us to perform. If happily we be found faithful to the requirements of duty, we shall receive a rich reward of peace, comfort, and true enjoyment, in Him the beloved of souls. His holy cause will be promoted by us, to God's glory, honor, and praise. We indeed are nothing, and can do nothing of ourselves that will advance the cause of Truth and righteousness in the earth.

Learning, and natural gifts or parts, are not to be relied on in the work; though when sanctified in us by the great Refiner, who sitteth as a refiner and purifier of silver, and made subservient to his will, they may be useful in his Hand who doeth all things well. He placeth every member in the body as it pleaseth Him. "The body is not one member, but many." The eye cannot say unto the hand, I have no need of thee; nor the head to the feet, I have no need of you. "If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? If the whole were hearing, where were the smelling?" "Nay, much more those members of the body which seem to be more feeble are necessary." 1st Cor. 12th chapter.

All the different members of the body being in their proper places, working in harmony together, will be promotive of the good of the whole. I trust I do feel an honest concern for the cause of Truth, and for its promotion in the earth: that it may be exalted above and over all that stands in the way or hinders its arising. The enemy and adversary of all good strives to prevent this: he is a subtle enemy: and may we be concerned and engaged to watch against him in the true light, which will discover him in his approaches and appearances, and give strength to withstand him, though he be a potent enemy. The Lord's power was before the power of the enemy, and is above him, blessed be his holy name. He is not wanting on his part, but will prove Himself faithful and true to his truly devoted servants and handmaids, wherever their lot is cast; and, though deep trials and provings may be their portion, will (as their trust and confidence is in Him and in Him alone) never fail them nor forsake them. He will make a way for them where there appears to be no way. He will cast down the mountains of opposition, and will remove the hills of difficulty, and will make a way for the deliverance of his oppressed seed. Let all these deeply tried ones stand still from all the reasonings, cogitations and will of the creature, and rely in living faith on the arm of Omnipotence. "Stand still and see the salvation of God."

May the weak ones and the little ones everywhere be encouraged to trust in the Lord, who will, as they are thus found depending upon Him, increase their strength and their faith also. These with all the faithful will have cause at times and seasons (through the mercy and goodness of God), to joy and rejoice in his salvation.

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 123.

POWER OF EXAMPLE.

Our blessed Saviour commanded his hearers, "Let your light so shine before men, that others seeing your good works may glorify your Father who is in Heaven." The example of an upright Christian, is often a more powerful means of convincing others of the reality of religion than any preaching.

The Young Men's Christian Magazine describes the case of a young man who had become an infidel, and rejected the Bible and its teachings. In his father's house a young woman resided who was a relative of the family. Her fretful temper made all around her uncomfortable. She was sent to a boarding school, and was absent some time. While there she became a true and earnest Christian. On her return she was so changed that all who knew her wondered and rejoiced. She was patient and cheerful, kind, unselfish and charitable. The lips that used to be always uttering cross and bitter words now spoke nothing but sweet, gentle, loving words. Her infidel cousin George was greatly surprised at this. He watched her closely for some time, till he was thoroughly satisfied that it was a real change that had taken place in his young cousin. Then he asked her what had caused this great change. She told him it was the grace of God which had made her a Christian and had changed her heart.

He said to himself, "I don't believe that God has anything to do with it, though she thinks He has. But it is a wonderful change that has taken place in her, and I should like to be as good as she is. I will be so." Then he formed a set of good resolutions. He tried to control his tongue and his temper, and keep a strict watch over himself. He was all the time doing and saying what he did not wish to do and say. And as he failed time after time, he would turn and study his good cousin's example. He said to himself, "How does it happen that she, who has not as much knowledge or as much strength of character as I have, can do what I can't do? She must have some help that I don't know of. It must be as she says, the help of God. I will seek that help."

His seeking was not in vain; for He who is long-suffering, and abundant in mercy, was pleased to hear and answer his petitions.

A somewhat similar incident is related of one who had gone to live with her aunt when she was a self-willed, thoughtless, headstrong young girl, leaving the house of her parents because they opposed her marriage to a young man who proved as she soon found, entirely unworthy of her love. The aunt, who was a Christian in life as well as in profession, received her lovingly, and with patient and gentle kindness, and good sense gradually led her to see the error of her course and to receive in love the lessons she endeavored to impress, till in the end they brought forth fruit an hundredfold, and the niece became a warm-hearted and faithful Christian. And when some one asked, "under whose preaching was she converted," with a smile she replied, "Under nobody's preaching; it was under Aunt Mary's practising."

A writer in referring to this incident, remarks, "There is a world of meaning in the answer, for example is ever more powerful than precept, and a holy life is the mightiest of all arguments for religion. "It wasn't master's sermons, but it was master's life that did it," said a servant—who had been awakened to think of her sin—of her master who was a clergyman. Christian reader, can it be said of us that our home life is a daily sermon which every one in the house can read?"

An anecdote is told of a native of Madagascar, who had embraced Christianity; and who was asked by a sea-captain what it was that first led him to become a Christian. "Was it any particular sermon you heard, or book which you read?"

"No, my friend," replied the chief, "it was no book or sermon. One man, he a wicked thief; another man, he drunk all day long; big chief, he beat his wife and children. Now thief, he no steal; drunken Tom, he sober; big chief, he very kind to his family. Every heathen man get something inside him, which makes him different, so I became a Christian too, to know how it feel to have something strong inside of me, to keep me from being bad."

An interesting illustration of the convincing power of an upright, consistent life, is related by W. W. Smith in a communication to the Sunday School Times, as follows:—

"I have just come home, this wet day, from Toronto, and as I cannot stir outside, I must give you the history of a Jew as a Toronto merchant gave it to a friend and me this morning. We were talking of Christian character, and the merchant said: "I never was so surprised as with M—, a travelling dealer—a peddler, if you choose so to call him—a Jew; and the most Jewish-looking Jew I ever saw. He was in here with his pack, and after showing some of his samples, he was doing up his pack with such exceeding care and neatness that I could not help taking notice of it and said to him; 'You take great pains in doing up your things very neatly.' 'Yes,' he said; 'I do all things decently and in order.'

"The merchant was surprised to hear a New Testament motto from a Jew, and said to him, very pointedly, "where did you learn that?"

"The peddler looked up with a calm smile and said: 'I learned dot vere I learned 'Coom unto Me all ye dot labor and are heavy laden, and I vill gif' you rest;' and vere I learned 'Dere is no oder name given under heaven among men vereby ve can be saved.'

"Oh!" said the merchant, "I am so delighted to hear you say so. I did not know that you were a Christian." And then he was anxious to learn something of the history of this son of Abraham. He said when he was young he lived in London. He always had an admiration for a true Christian character. He saw a difference—in truth, integrity, and kindness—between those who were Christians and those who only called themselves so. And this thought, this admiration, wrought in his mind, though he said nothing about it to any one; but secretly he made this resolve: 'When I get older, and marry, I will marry a Christian woman.' Time passed on, and though he did not marry, he came to New York. There he was engaged in some way of dealing, and boarded in a house where the man and his wife were church-going people, and where there were other boarders, none of whom, however, seemed to be Jews. He went to the synagogue on Saturday, and on Sunday he staid in his boarding-house and did nothing. He could not do business, and he said 'he would not be seen on the streets among the loafers.' And he sometimes felt very dull and 'lonesome.' So he said to the landlord one Sunday evening, 'I feel very lonesome when you go out; I have nobody to talk to me. I will go with you to church.' 'Oh, no!' said the man, afraid that what he would hear might only provoke greater hostility in his mind toward Christ and his doctrines; 'you are not going with me to church. You had better not go.' 'Yes,' said he, 'I will go with you. You will let me go!' So he went with him.

"The Scripture read that night was no other than that read by the Ethiopian, and commented on by Philip, the fifty-third of Isaiah. M— paid the most devoted attention to the reading and the exposition. When he came home, he said to the man of the house: 'I read that chapter in my Hebrew Bible, and I find it is the same as I heard to-night. If my Hebrew Bible is right, and Mr. Robinson's English Bible is right, then Isaiah saw the Messiah coming, not to be a great king, but to suffer for men's sins.' And from that point he went on, till he found Christ precious to his own soul, and offered himself for membership.

"There is one thought I would like to insist on, in this connection, and it is this: the value of Christian example and character. Those Christians in London will never know in this world how the eyes of a young Jew—one of the most unlikely people in the world—were on them, and how he was noticing their conduct and words and spirit; and though perhaps he would have resented any words addressed to him on religious subjects, the Spirit of God was using the daily influence of their lives to give the first impulse toward Christ of a spirit ill at ease with itself, and hungry for something it did not possess. We may not be eloquent, we may not be influential, we may not have many opportunities; but we can 'live' Christ; and, so living, be a means of leading and blessing others."

While good example does exert an influence over others for good, there are many mournful illustrations of the truth, that a conduct inconsistent with his profession in a professor of religion, is often very hurtful to others. Ford describes the case of a man, whom he visited on his dying bed, and who passed away from this life in a state of despair. He ascribed the ruin of his soul to a popular preacher, who, on some public occasion, he heard deliver a sermon which deeply affected him; and whom, at the close of the service, he was delighted to meet at the house of a mutual friend. But great was his disappointment; the individual who in the pulpit was a Boanerges, in the parlor played the mountebank, and in either character seemed perfectly "at home." His adventures, jokes and anecdotes kept the company till past midnight in a roar of laughter. The consequence may be easily imagined. The unhappy man who was doomed to witness that incongruous scene, persuaded himself that Christianity was disbelieved by its professional advocates, and henceforth he treated it as unworthy of notice.

NOT FAR.

Selected.

Not far, not far from the Kingdom,
Yet in the shadow of sin,
How many are coming and going,
How few are entering in!

Not far from the golden gateway,
Where voices whisper and wait;
Fearing to enter in boldly,
So lingering still at the gate;

Gathering the strain of the music
Floating so sweetly along,
Knowing the song they are singing,
Yet joining not in the song.

Seeing the warmth and the beauty,
The infinite love and the light;
Yet weary, and lonely, and waiting,
Out in the desolate night!

Out in the dark and the danger,
Out in the night and the cold,
Though He is longing to lead them
Tenderly into the fold.

Not far, not far from the Kingdom,
'Tis only a little space;
But it may be at last, and forever,
Out of the resting-place.

* * * * *
A ship came sailing and sailing
Over a murmuring sea,
And just in sight of the haven
Down in the waves went she:

And the spars and the broken timbers
Were cast on a storm-beat strand;
And a cry went up in the darkness,
Not far, not far from the land."

MIRIAM'S SONG.

Sound the loud timbrel o'er Egypt's dark sea!
Jehovah has triumphed—his people are free!
Sing,—for the pride of the tyrant is broken,
His chariots, his horsemen, all splendid and brave,—
How vain is their boast; for the Lord hath but spoken
And chariots and horsemen are sunk in the wave.
Sound the loud timbrel o'er Egypt's dark sea!
Jehovah has triumphed,—his people are free!

Praise to the Conqueror, praise to the Lord!
His word was our arrow, his breath was our sword.
Who shall return to tell Egypt the story
Of those she sent forth in the hour of her pride?
For the Lord hath looked out from his pillar of glory,
And all her brave thousands are dashed in the tide.
Sound the loud timbrel o'er Egypt's dark sea!
Jehovah has triumphed,—his people are free!

MY HOME.

Selected.

This is the place that I love the best,
A little brown house, like a ground-bird's nest
Hid among grasses, and vines and trees,
Summer retreat of the birds and bees.

The tenderest light that ever was seen
Sifts through the vine-made window screen—
Sifts and quivers, and flits and falls
On home-made carpets and gray-hung walls.

The morning-glories and scarlet vine
Over the doorway twist and twine:
And every day, when the house is still,
The humming-bird comes to the window-sill.

In the cunningest chamber under the sun
I sink to sleep when the day is done;
And am waked at morn, in my snow-white bed,
By a singing-bird on the roof o'erhead.

Better than treasures brought from Rome,
Are the living pictures I see at home—
My aged father, with frosted hair,
And mother's face, like a painting rare.

Far from the city's dust and heat,
I get but sounds and odors sweet.
Who can wonder I love to stay,
Week after week, here hidden away
In this sly nook, that I love the best—
The little brown house like a ground-bird's nest.

Memories of the Prairies.

Prairie fires formed a marked feature of frontier life. After the early frosts of Autumn had killed the luxuriant vegetation that covered the plain, it was soon dry as tinder and ready to flash into furious conflagration at the touch of any accidental spark or wilful brand that might fall upon its extended borders.

When the surging flames held possession of these great fields of many miles in extent, the scene was grand and beautiful beyond description, and sometimes became fearfully so to the few scattered settlers in their way.

I well remember one great fire that was started near our place. An old "son of Erin" had settled, the spring before, on the prairie a little east of us, and had probably never seen or even heard of fire upon the prairie until one beautiful first-day evening after the Autumn frosts and the dry days of Indian Summer had made the whole plain one great "tinder box," when one of his sons, a mere lad, set fire to the grass just below their little field. The breeze was brisk, and in a moment the fire was beyond control. It spread rapidly, until the wild meadows for a mile away were one surging sea of fire. The dusky shades of evening were put to flight by the flashing light of the flames. When the old man, a devout catholic, looked out on the strange scene, his terror knew no bounds; he exclaimed, "The day of judgment has come; the world's on fire, and our priest, he's at Dubuque," and fell fainting to the floor. As soon as he revived a little he again saw the flickering fire light and fainted again and again during that long night of terror to him. A newly broken field protected his buildings, but away over the dry meadows for miles around the fire flew, fanned by the wings of a brisk wind, to spread alarm and danger among his neighbors.

When fire was first started on a great grass grown prairie, it ran away in the form of a wedge—the point pushing forward before the wind with great speed, while the sides spread out more slowly as they were less directly in its course. Thus long lines of light are soon formed, and behind them a pointed field of fire-blackened sod, still smoking in a hundred places where any more slowly burning material chanced to lay. But the regular form and straight lines of fire are soon changed and modified by many varying circumstances; a little change in the currents of air carries other fiery heads forward, possibly outstripping the first, better grass may feel the flames in one place, then another; here a little hill-slope and there a valley, hurried on, or retarded the beautiful destroyer in his course; for fire is at least one creature that can run faster up hill than down. With all these and many other accidents, all regular form is broken and the plain is lit up by belts and bands and bodies of fire in endless variety; in one place crackling and roaring through a rich meadow of tall grass, before a brisk breeze, in another, slowly creeping back against the wind, a little bright border to a brown hillside. Great clouds of smoke roll away, which at night are painted in glowing tints by the light of their own parent flames; or black and lowering float away into the half vanquished darkness. These scenes were often grandly beautiful, and fearfully so to the poorly protected pioneer.

A common manner of defense against these fires was made by plowing a few furrows around the exposed sides of improvements and at a few paces distance, another similar line, and then, at a suitable calm time burn the grass from the intervening space, thus making what we called a "fire land," on which nothing remained to feed the flames; but despite all our care there were times when our utmost efforts were required to keep the devouring element at bay, or to vanquish it when it had gained an entry into some fence row or field; and among the hardest labors of my life I remember some occasions of fighting prairie fires. Nature has almost everywhere spread a living "fire land" around the borders of the timber-belts and groves; the fringe of hazel brush that creeps out from the woodland and lies between it and the prairie is mostly impenetrable to fire, and saves the timber beyond it from destruction.

But there were times when the destroying element did gain admittance to the jealously guarded timber lands, and then if it chanced in the midst of a dry season, as a great calamity it befell these sparsely timbered regions, and when an ominous smoke was observed rising from some piece of woodland, or when the dread news came that fire was raging in the "timber" pressing indeed was the employment of any good citizen, if it was not at once laid aside to go out to battle with the fiery enemy, and the war was sometimes a long and weary one, waged against the allied forces of fire, wind and weather. Not only were the fallen leaves and dry trash burned, but a vast amount of dead wood was consumed that would have furnished the best of fuel to the needy settlers, and worse still, nearly all the young timber was killed over all the region swept by the fire, and this was deemed no small matter in a land of broad prairies and narrow belts of woodland, with the nearest known coal field a hundred miles away, and no means of easy transportation at hand. Not a plank of pine lumber had then come to us from the great forests of the north, and not a strand of wire had yet been stretched for fence: so that for building, fencing and fuel we looked to our woods alone for supply. But all is now changed.

The great value and importance of the timberlands were generally over-estimated, and with some individuals, this degenerated into the meanest of miserliness. I have known old pioneers possessing large bodies of the best woodlands where hundreds of cords of fallen and perishing timber lay wasting, yet who could not be induced to part with one load, though offered twice its value by a needy neighbor, and in its use themselves observed the strictest economy.

The inhabitants of the prairies in early times cherished a deep aversion to these timber misers as well as to "land speculators" in general. Many indulged this antipathy to such a degree that they did not scruple to trespass on their lands to any extent that their own safety would permit. An example of the extent of this sentiment occurred in Muscatine County. Four hundred acres of the best timber-land on the Wapsi-Nonock (Wolf Creek) was owned and held for extravagant prices by some man in the East, who finally dying, the land was sold by his supposed heirs; but other claimants denied their right to it or to sell it, and a suit was begun so no title could be given. Then the people of the neighboring prairies began to take from it the "down timber" as they needed fuel; then to cut what they desired; and the raid upon it became general, and without any effort at concealment or any apparent scruples of conscience, they strove with each other to gain the largest possible share of the spoils. The suit continued in law for a number of years, and when ended and the title made good, not one load of desirable wood remained upon the whole tract, and the land was scarcely worth the taxes due on it. Every tree had been felled, and every log and limb that was worth the taking was gone, but the lines and limits were strictly observed and scarce a sapling belonging to an actual settler had suffered, though he may have lived miles away upon the prairie; for ordinary "timber stealing" was one of the most despised crimes. Thus we see how popular sentiment may be warped and turned into strange channels by a few favoring circumstances.

T. E. BUNDY.

For "The Friend."

The Converted Convict.

Several months ago some of our friends in Iowa paid a visit to the Prison at Anamosa; and there met with a convict who had been condemned to imprisonment for life, but who seemed to be truly repentant for his former wicked course. One of the visitors has since received two letters from the prisoner; some extracts from which may prove interesting to the reader, as evincing the power of Divine Grace to restore to spiritual life those who had gone very deep into the pit of corruption. The first letter, dated "June 13th, 1886," says:—

"Dear Sir, and Christian friend: I now take the earliest opportunity (according to promise) to write to you. I do assure you I am unworthy of your Christian love, therefore I feel greatly indebted to you, also to Christian friends that were with you for the sweet Christian counsel you gave me in that memorable visit you paid Anamosa Prison. I also heartily thank you for the tract given me "On the fear of God." I have read it again and again. In doing so, alas! I find the mistakes of my life have been many—wilfully breaking the commandments of God—"Thou shalt fear the Lord thy God." Oh! had I but taken the fear of God ever before me cherishing that fear with humble reverence of spirit before Him, it would have saved me from falling into those irreligious and immoral practices which led me to last within the confines of these prison walls. Although I am brought to the lowest degraded state of humanity, through the folly and error of a sinful life, yet I rejoice to tell you from heartfelt experience, that the ever merciful and compassionate Saviour hath lifted me up out of the horrible pit of sin and misery, hath now owned and adopted me into the fold and family of his believing children. Oh! to Grace how great a debtor, daily I'm constrained to be.

"Dear sir; I rejoice to tell you I have found my lost talent which has for many long years been cast away amongst the vain and sinful pleasures of this world. I am now earnestly laboring to the best of my ability to improve that talent by taking advantage of every privilege that is afforded me. While thus employed I receive the blessings of a loving Heavenly Father, whose eyes are over the righteous and his ears open to their cries. These are comfortable words to my soul. "No good thing will I withhold from those who walk uprightly." Grand thing to be a Christian, owned and blessed of the Lord, being fed daily upon the Bread of Life, drink daily at the Fountain of living waters, thus refreshing the weary travellers while plodding their journey from earth to Heaven.

"Dear sir; I am still writing at odd times (in brief) the history of my life, and full account of my conversion, which, when done according to promise, I shall deliver into your hands, trusting that you will get it sent broadcast through the land, with God's blessing attending, that some poor sinner may be brought to accept the salvation so freely offered by a loving Saviour, who never turned one away that ever asked Him for his forgiving Grace."

The second letter, written on the 25th of Eleven Month, says:—

"Most Worthy Friend: I now make bold to again write to you. Though long it has been since I received your welcome letter, yet I have it still by me, and often read it, because in it I find religious instruction and good counsel; for the same I am greatly indebted to you. I also wish to inform you that I am still writing my two lives—the bad, and (best of all) the good life. It is somewhat slow work having to do it in the evenings, the light being poor to write by, and worse still a poor writer; nevertheless I have written 25 pages, and right glad am I now I have got over on the bright side. Many were the tears I shed while writing such a sinful life. I have been much in prayer while writing, feeling the need of the guidance of the Holy Spirit to guide my thoughts and tongue aright; that whatsoever I say or do may be done to the praise and honor of Him (Jesus my Saviour) who hath been pleased to spare my unprofitable life. The Lord has blessed unworthy me while I have been writing at this portion.

I divide the evening into three parts—writing, reading and prayer. Oh the blessings God doth richly bestow upon me day by day. I feel a desire to give an exhortation before I close my portion of writing to my unknown readers, asking God's blessings to go with it, that others may see and believe what a merciful Saviour ever reigneth on high, both able and willing to save to the uttermost even the vilest of the vile. I am the spared monument of his mercy and grace, to testify of a truth that the blood of Jesus cleanseth from all sin.

This is Thanksgiving Day. We had a good sermon delivered to us by the Presbyterian minister of this city, after which we sat down to an elegant dinner. Poor, unworthy me did go to my cell and return thanks to the Giver of all good gifts. I no more sow, nor reap, nor gather into barns, yet my Heavenly Father feedeth me day by day. My path through this prison that leadeth to Mount Zion is scattered with blessings on every hand, here a little and there a little;

all of which helps to tighten the cords of faith and trust. Who can blame me for speaking or otherwise writing to tell the loving kindness and tender mercies of Almighty God so richly bestowed upon me."

The History of Californian Borax.

BY ARTHUR ROBOTOM.

My visit to the great borax lake in Slate Range Mountains, California, was one of the most interesting journeys I think I ever made in my life, and the accident of my making this journey arose in the following manner. In the year 1874 I visited the borax deposits in Nevada, and was on my way to San Francisco, when during the journey I was interviewed by a reporter of a Winnemucca newspaper, who, without my knowledge, sent on to San Francisco the following particulars concerning my visit in his paper, and which were duly reproduced before my arrival in the "Californian Alta," of San Francisco:—"Arthur Robotom, of Birmingham, paid our town a visit a few days ago, on a prospecting tour, to discover if any borate of soda or borate of lime exists in this section. He was much struck with the number of hot springs that are to be found all through the Humboldt Valley. The borate of soda and borate of lime are known to exist at Hot Spring station on the Central Pacific Railroad, also at Columbus and other parts of this State; and no doubt if the hot springs of Humboldt Valley should prove to give off vapors that produce boracic acid, or that borate of soda is to be found in the alkaline beds which exist all over the district, a new and profitable trade will spring up. The article of borax has been well known all over the civilized world; still but very few people know of its origin. In 1818 Count Lardarel discovered how to prepare boracic acid from the Lagoons of Tuscany, and made a princely fortune by it. This boracic acid was shipped to England and France and converted into refined borax by boiling in large pans, and crystallizing in vats. Tincal was the article used in making borax before boracic acid was discovered. This article is found on the dreary plains of Thibet, in Asia, and sent on sheeps' backs across the Himalaya Mountains to Calcutta, and thence to England. About 20 years ago borate of lime was discovered in Chili, and found its way to England, Arthur Robotom being one of the first to introduce it into that country. A. Robotom will also visit the Hot Springs, Wadsworth, Columbus and San Francisco."

The result of this having appeared was that the morning after my arrival in San Francisco my hotel was fairly besieged with persons who were anxious to interview me in my capacity as a borax expert. After many interviews with individuals who professed to hold land said to be rich in borax, I decided to visit and inspect the great Slate Range district, and after making all my arrangements I left San Francisco, proceeding Southwards by steamer down the Pacific coast, and after a pleasant journey arrived at Los Angeles or City of Angels, an old Mexican town. Los Angeles is now, however, peopled principally with Americans, who drive a considerable trade with the teamsters who visit the interior. At this time the Southern Pacific Railway was not made, and this section of the country could be traversed only by the aid of mule teams; the Slate Range lay about 240 miles inland, and the whole country was infested with a band of ruffianly bandits and robbers, composed of the very refuse of society from all parts of California and Nevada. Under these circumstances I soon discovered that my only chance of travelling with any safety was to assume the role of what is known in this part of the world as a "busted" miner, "busted" being a convertible term for ruined, and derived probably from "burst," or broken up. I was also informed that on some parts of the journey, hay was worth £50 per ton, and water two shillings per bucket, and that it would be better for me to walk, and much safer. Adapting myself to the circumstances, I started in my disguise and travelled with a mule team over a very rough country at the rate of from 12 to 14 miles per day, and arrived at length, without any remarkable adventure, at the shanty kept by Jim Bridger, some 42 miles from the Slate Range, and which is situated on the main road to Cerre Gorda, a wild looking spot, without any other road, the country being covered with the oleaginous plant known as greasewood, and the only animal life being represented by the dismal owl and the deadly rattlesnake! Not a very pleasant prospect, I thought, but I afterwards found when sleeping out in this part of the country that by surrounding myself with the ashes of a greasewood fire or a horsehair rope, that as far as the rattlesnakes were concerned there was no danger, as these reptiles, stangely enough, will never cross the ashes of a greasewood plant, or a rope made of horsehair. While as to the owl his existence was naturally a pure matter of indifference to me, so far as my comfort was concerned.

After a short stay at Jim Bridger's shanty I again proceeded, steering for the Foot Hills, some 22 miles from the shanty, then onward through a great cañon, or divide, partly covered with salt, on emerging from which I found myself on the border of the most important borax lake yet discovered in the world. I was met by John and Dennis Searle, two men belonging to the California discovery army that sprang into existence in the year of 1849, and whose members are known by the name of "Forty Niner's." These men, masters of almost every kind of handicraft, had made their way to this great lake with a view of exploration. Consequently, though I can claim to be the first Englishman who visited the borax lake, the honor of discovery does not rest with me. I stayed some time in the hut of these men, and together we examined the ground. I very soon discovered natural borax of the finest quality in a pure state. The borax I found was crystallized borax, in the same form as the regular borax of commerce, and is the only known deposit of natural borax yet discovered in the world. In the centre of the lake is a bed of salt about five miles long; on the outside of this salt is a deposit of carbonate of soda, and some thousands of acres of land covered with crude borax, from three inches to two feet thick.

Before leaving California I arranged to buy 280 acres of this borax land; I returned to England as quickly as possible, made arrangements to go out again, formed a small company who put up works, and I anticipated making about a million by it, and before long we began to ship large supplies of borax to Liverpool, London, and New York. The price, however, suddenly came down to £26 per ton, the lowest price it had ever been sold for, while the carriage alone from the lake to San Francisco at this time was about £16 per ton of 2000 pounds. This was a paralyzing condition of affairs that quite stunned me. I had made a very large contract for some hundreds of tons to a large firm in England, but before the arrival of the ship with the first parcel the firm failed, and I found myself, to my horror, with some hundreds of tons of borax left on my hands that I could not get rid of, the bankers and financial houses holding the documents all pressing for sales to be made! My golden dream of making a million faded away, and left me meditating the bitter realities of impending ruin!

Touching the labor uses of borax, it is mainly used in glazing all descriptions of porcelain, china-ware, pottery, &c. Blacksmiths use it for welding iron and steel. It is used for welding the seams of copper and iron tubes; in the manufacture of hats, jewelry, artificial diamonds, and the plates for affixing artificial teeth. The finest marble cement is made from borax. Farmers, graziers, &c., use it for washing cattle; and provision merchants for arresting or preventing decomposition in their hams, &c. The foregoing will, I trust, awaken people to an interest in this most valuable product of the earth.—Chemical News.

—Friends' Free Library at Germantown.—The Annual Report of this useful institution shows that 564 volumes have been added to the Library in the past year. The same care has been exercised as in former years to exclude works of fiction, and those of unsound or dangerous tendency. Its popularity is shown by the number of persons using it, which averaged 457 per week; and by the number of books taken out which was 12,870. Of these, 1,725 were works of History; 2,030 Biography; 2,793 Travels; 1,312 Science; 2,110 General Literature; 2,900 Juvenile.

—Peace Movement.—The American Peace Society has issued a circular to the Peace Societies of Europe, recommending them to memorialize their respective Governments to attempt arbitration if negotiation fails to secure peace. The circular states that it seems to be a duty of societies organized for the promotion of peace, "to protest against the warlike attitude of Christendom, as a causeless and unreasonable jeopardizing of the peace of the world."

—Providing for War.—The Christian Statesman, after mentioning some of the enormously expensive schemes for military preparations, that have been introduced into the Congress of the United States, makes the following comments:

"All these preparations are proposed and discussed, and demanded by the majority of our people, without a word of protest, or even regret, in view of the waste and wickedness caused by war, and of the awful responsibility involved in the wholesale destruction of human life. The war policy is the accepted and settled policy of the United States, as well as of other nations, for the settlement of international disputes. While millions are voted for military preparations, not a dollar is proposed to promote among the nations a general disarmament and the establishment of courts of international arbitration. Yet how much more reasonable the latter policy than the former. We long to see one nation enlightened enough to say: 'We will prepare for peace, not for war. If any question arises between us and our neighbors we will refer it to arbitrators, and will, in all cases, abide by their decision.' Such a nation, in this age, would be secure from wanton attack. The cause of justice would be better served by such a course than by the arbitrament of battle, for war decides only who is strongest, not who is right. And is God's providence to go for nothing in such an argument? We have inscribed 'In God we Trust' on our later coins. Do we trust Him? Is his favor of no value? his displeasure not to be feared? What an opportunity for America to throw the weight of her great example and her growing influence on the side of the Peace, in the scales where the fate of millions hangs trembling on the decision of weak or angry princes! The whole war policy of the world to-day is wicked and suicidal. Immediate and complete disarmament, with a resort to arbitration in cases of dispute, is the unquestionable duty even of the European nations. Her favored position, and the improbability and needlessness of war in her case, make it far more imperatively the duty of the United States. For these reasons we condemn the proposed legislation as un-Christian and barbarous, and deplore the public sentiment which urges its passage."

—The Charity Ball in Philadelphia.—As the Germantown Hospital and Dispensary had been designated as one of the recipients of the funds from a Charity Ball, held in Philadelphia some weeks ago, the following protest against receiving any part of this money was presented to the managers of that institution, signed by all the Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Methodists, Baptists, and other ministers of Germantown:—

"Public announcement having been made that the Institution under your care has been named as one of the four beneficiaries of the Charity Ball to be given the present winter, we herewith express the earnest hope that you will not accept any part of the proceeds of said entertainment should the same be tendered you. In making this request, we do not venture to call in question the benevolent motives either of those who may have this entertainment in charge, or of others who may have generously contributed their means thereto. We are nevertheless assured that the giving of a great public Ball, with its expensiveness and its sensuous accompaniments, is by no means a good economic or moral method of accomplishing the object professedly had in view. Especially on moral and religious grounds do we deprecate such an entertainment, believing that to countenance it, whether by our presence, or by participating in the proceeds, must prove injurious to the Christian profession we make, as it must also operate to defeat any endeavors which may be put forth to do away with those ballets of the theatres and low music halls, which are so productive of gross evil in the community. At whatever apparent pecuniary sacrifice, let us take heed to the apostolic admonition 'that no man put a stumbling block or an occasion to fall in his brother's way.'"

The Christian Statesman says:—
"A good deal of discussion followed the reading of the paper, four of the fifteen managers, (Friends) being opposed to acceptance. One of these was the President of the Board. The managers generally, however, decided that they had signified their intention to take the gift, at a meeting of the Board two months before the Ball was given, and that there was nothing further for them to do in the matter."

THE FRIEND.

FOURTH MONTH 2, 1857.

In the instructive Memoir of Christopher Healy, he describes the first occasion on which he attended a "Friends' meeting," being then not quite 15 years old. He says:

"When I saw Friends sitting around me in solemn silence, I was much struck with it, and with the very great difference there was between what I now saw, and all that I had ever before seen in religious meetings. In every meeting that I had previously been at, there had been no silence, no waiting on the Lord, and no preparation for the solemn duty of worshipping Almighty God; but they went right away to singing, or praying or preaching; and when they were done, hurried off without ceremony, and without taking any time for solemn reflection, that they might profit by what they had heard. But here all was changed."

"I looked very attentively at the Friends in the gallery; and when I saw the solid gravity with which they sat, and especially after I had observed that tears were trickling down some of their cheeks, although there had not been a word spoken, I said in my heart, surely these people have something in them which I know nothing about. And I felt an earnest desire in my heart, to know what that something was; and where they got it from; that if it were possible I might get some too, and come to know what it was, that made the tears run down their faces, without any of the common means having been employed to produce such effects. Thus the Lord began to open my spiritual eyes, by first kindling holy desires in my heart to know and understand the mysteries of godliness; and, blessed be his holy name, He not only raised these desires in my heart, but by the insinuating of his Holy Spirit, He gave me an understanding of one mystery after another, as I was able to receive it, until I was brought, through Divine Grace, and by the revelation of his light and love and power in my soul, to set my seal to all the doctrines and testimonies which He raised up Friends in the beginning to uphold before the nations of the earth." "On this day I was first made sensible of a true conviction; and saw the dawn of the true gospel-day arise in my soul."

There have been few ministers of modern times who have labored more extensively and effectively in their Master's cause, than Christopher Healy. There are we believe, many of our readers who can recall with tender emotion the precious baptizing power of Christ that attended his ministry. Yet it was not by any outward words, but by the evidence that those whom he had come to visit were sitting in heavenly places in Christ Jesus, that he was convinced of the efficacy of that Divine power which had operated upon the Friends of that meeting; and that a desire was awakened to experience it for himself. Where this living Power, the Spirit of Christ himself, reigns in the hearts of men, it will season their whole behavior, and will have a powerful influence to attract sincere seekers after the Truth. Our blessed Redeemer said, "Let your light so shine before men, that others seeing your good works may glorify your Father, who is in Heaven." Those who are filled with his holy Light, will, without any effort or even consciousness of their own, emit some of the radiance which has its source in the Fountain of all good.

How needful it is then, that all those who profess the name of Christ, should seek to dwell so continually under his government and in union with Him, that they may attract and not repel those in whom good desires may have been raised, or in whom the Spirit of the Lord is working to redeem them from sin, and to lead them into the path of self-denial and submission to the cross of Christ!

If C. Healy had found, at the meeting he described, a body of careless, lukewarm professors, would not the effect have been to repel him—to raise doubts as to the reality of the religion they professed?

The Apostle, in speaking of the benefits to the Church of the ministerial gifts bestowed by its Head, enumerates amongst them, "the perfecting of the saints," and "the edifying of the body of Christ." Hence it appears, that in addition to the convictionment of the careless and unbelieving, an important part of the work of the ministry, is the confirming the faith, strengthening the hands, and "edifying"—building-up—those who are already members. We have been interested in a thoughtful article in "The Sunday School Times," which emphasizes this view. It compares some who are more zealous to add new members to the Church, than to promote the spiritual life of those already there, to the unwise farmer who is always buying new land, and never half cultivating the land he owns. And it adds: "Yet the cause of Christ would be more largely promoted by the uplifting of the standard within the Church, than by extending the bounds of the Church."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A telegram from Washington says that a recent decision of the District Commissioners to strictly enforce the statute revoking liquor licenses upon a second conviction of violation of the law against selling liquor on the first day of the week, caused every saloon in that city to be closed on the 27th ult. "One prominent restaurant keeper threw his place open to police inspection, and the other saloons had their curtains raised so that the public and the police could look in at all hours of the day and see that no liquor was selling."

The total number of immigrants who arrived in the United States during the eight months which ended with Second Month last, was 221,409, against 156,942 during the corresponding period of the preceding year.

The total value of the exports from the United States during the twelve months which ended on Second Mo. 28th, was $729,807,559, against $663,669,941 during the preceding twelve months. The total value of imports for the twelve months which ended Second Mo. 28th, was $670,257,534, against $607,721,128 during the twelve months which ended with Second Month, 1886.

Quarantine against cholera in Chili, established on the Isthmus of Panama and in Peru, makes it necessary to despatch the United States mails to Chili via Rio de Janeiro.

The steamer Scotia, from Naples for New York, with 1200 passengers and merchandise, went ashore at about a quarter-past four o'clock on the morning of the 26th, on the outer bar a mile west of the Blue Point Life Saving Station, on the Long Island coast. It appears that the steamer had experienced terrific storms for more than a week. She had suffered much damage, many of her passengers had received broken limbs and been otherwise injured by the tossing about they received, and on the 24th the machinery gave out. Then, it is said, the captain decided to run the steamer ashore. The passengers were all safely removed and taken to New York.

A great revival in the lake carrying trade is reported from Chicago, and vessels command a premium. "A vessel that could have been bought for $80,000 eighteen months ago, will readily bring $100,000 now." Forty-six new vessels, all steamers except three, representing an aggregate capacity of 98,000 tons, and costing $6,500,000, are in course of construction at various ship yards.

It is believed that thousands will be added this year to Alaska's population, as mining and exploring are to be energetically prosecuted.

A poor season for maple sugar is predicted by a correspondent from Vermont of the Boston Morning Journal, who states that the great depth of snow everywhere is likely to prove a great hindrance to sugar making. The snow in the woods is still from five to seven feet deep. The State of Vermont usually produces about 11,000,000 pounds of maple sugar annually.

A special despatch to The Voice, dated Sacramento, Third Mo. 14th, says: "California's Legislature has nearly concluded its session. Among the important measures indicating the character of its tendency on the liquor question was the bill introduced by Senator Rose for the increase of the appropriation for the Viticultural Board from $20,000 to $30,000. Senator Rose is a member of the Viticultural Board, and said that the wine industry is one of the most important in the State; that our producers need information about foreign wines, and other knowledge to carry on their business successfully, which the State ought to provide. Senator Vrooman urged that other struggling industries ought not to be burdened for the sake of the alcoholic liquor business. The increased appropriation was made. Any law or appropriation that the wine men want, they get."

On the 23rd ultimo, in the New York House of Representatives, a High License bill was passed by a vote of 70 to 56; one Democrat voted for and three Republicans against the bill.

A local option election held in Frederick County, Virginia, on the 28th ult., was carried by the Prohibitionists by nearly 300 majority.

Thomas Stewart was convicted recently at Burlington, Vt., of 91 offences against the prohibition law, and fined $910 and costs, with an alternate sentence of over 3000 days in the workhouse.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 473, which was 37 more than during the previous week, and 44 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the whole number 248 were males and 225 females: 262 adults and 111 minors: 63 died of consumption; 50 of pneumonia; 32 of diseases of the heart; 22 of old age; 20 of convulsions; 17 of bronchitis; 16 of inflammation of the brain; 18 of marasmus; 15 of measles;

15 of apoplexy; 13 of congestion of the brain, and 10 of typhoid fever.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½'s, 109½; 4's, registered, 128; coupon, 129; 3's, 101; currency 6's, 126½ a 136½.

Cotton was quiet but firm, at 10½ cts. for middling uplands.

Petroleum was quiet but steady at 6½ cts. for 70 Abel test in barrels, and 8½ cts. for 110 test in cases.

Flour and Meal.—The flour market was dull, and prices favored buyers. Sales of 250 barrels Ohio, clear, at $4; 375 barrels Ohio and Indiana straight, at $4.25 a $4.40; 375 barrels winter patent, at $4.60 a $4.75; 125 barrels Minnesota, clear, at $4, and 500 barrels do patent, at $4.70 a $4.90. Rye flour was in moderate request and steady at $2.75 a $2.85 per barrel: 100 barrels choice Pennsylvania sold at the outside rate.

Grain.—Wheat advanced slightly: No. 2 red closing at 89½ cts. bid and 90 cts. asked. Corn was steady but quiet; No. 2 mixed closing at 45½ cts. bid, and 46 cts. asked. Oats were quiet and without change; No. 2 white closing at 35½ cts. bid and 36½ cts. asked.

Beef cattle were inactive, at 4 a 5½ cts.

Sheep were in poor demand, 4 a 6 cts.; lambs were in poor demand, 4½ a 7 cts.

Hogs were firm at 8 a 8½ cts. for Western; 8 a 8½ cts. for State; 7½ a 8 cts. for sloppers.

FOREIGN.—On the 22d ultimo, in the English House of Commons, William Henry Smith, the Government leader, moved that the bill for the amendment of the criminal law in Ireland have precedence over all orders of the day. A debate followed, in which W. E. Gladstone denounced the use of closure to curtail the debates on the urgency motion and coercion bill. The Ministry decided to permit a prolongation of the discussion, but will insist that the House forego its Easter vacation unless the Coercion bill be passed before the holidays. A section of the Gladstonian party is discontented with Gladstone's half-veiled approval of the plan of campaign. The English House Rulers and the Farnellites are pleased with the speech.

On the 25th John Morley's amendment to the Government's motion to grant urgency for the Coercion bill, was rejected by a vote of 349 to 260. Three Unionists voted against the Government and seven others were absent.

DIED, at the home of her parents, Minneapolis, Minn., on the 31st of Twelfth Mo. 1886, ELLA M., only daughter of Alfred H. and Eliza J. Lindley, and a member of Minneapolis Monthly Meeting. Although she had been for some time in poor health, her cheerfulness and activity prevented her friends and nearest relatives from realizing that her departure was so near. But the messenger of death found her ready. For she gave her friends the assurance that in life or in death all would be well with her.

Selections from the Diary of Abigail W. Hall.

Eleventh Mo. 10th, 1852. A week ago on Second-day, since I returned to Westtown; where our large family have again assembled. Think we shall number near one hundred girls, and more than that number of boys. It seems a great and weighty undertaking; I want that I should be fully alive to it, and that my part may be performed faithfully and honestly in the sight of Him, who sees and knows all things; and who can strengthen the feeblest of the flock. Strengthen me, O Heavenly Father! to make straight steps to my feet; that so I be not the means of turning any one out of the way; but that I may by a consistent life, influence to thy praise.

Attended yesterday our Quarterly Meeting. On behalf of our dear young people, how was all within me poured forth! that, some of them in an especial manner, might be met with, even as one formerly was, and led to cry out, "what wilt thou have me to do?" for I believe there is a work a great work for some of them, to bring honor to his name, unto whom they have so long done despite. Think I never heard our dear friend, David Cope, more excellent; as well as others; among whom was our aged friend Hannah Gibbons.

15th. Have endeavored since last entry carefully to walk; and am not conscious of having offended, without it was this morning in speaking of some hard things I had to bear! I am sensible that it is better to suffer patiently and quietly; and this is one thing I must learn. Then I believe "the Lord will fight for me," and I shall "hold my peace." Seeing the Lord is no respecter of persons, but that He careth for all his children alike, those who are desiring above all things to be his, and to serve Him acceptably, He will never forsake, but will take up and care for. So do, O Heavenly Father! for thy poor child, who feels afresh this morning, that thou alone art my helper, and my deliverer, and theifter up of my head. Let integrity and uprightness preserve me in all my doings; then may I wash mine hands in innocence, and so compass thy holy altar.

17th. This has been a comfortable quiet day; but yesterday, through unwatchfulness, I felt uncomfortable. Because I spoke of the weakness of a brother, condemnation followed, and I suffered for it.

28th. First-day evening.—Our afternoon meeting just closed. Now alone in my own room, my tears and prayers have been poured forth for help and deliverance. Show unto thy poor suppliant child, every thing, O Heavenly Father! that is obstructing the circulation of thy pure life in my soul. Fit and prepare me a vessel unto thee. Thou knowest that I am willing to follow thee, if only an evidence be granted, that thou markest my path, and that thou ownest my feeblesteppings.

Twelfth Mo. 2nd. Went to our Monthly Meeting, feeling poor and discouraged. Early after taking my seat, the account we have of the young man who came to Jesus, enquiring what good thing should he do to inherit eternal life, with this part of the reply, "Sell all that thou hast, come and follow me, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven," pressed so on my inward ear that I thought the command seemed to be to revive it. But oh! my poverty was such I feared to go forth. While doubting and fearing, unexpectedly there was brought to remembrance, the Scripture account we have of Martha's manner of serving her dear Lord and Master. She sat not at supper with Him, but "served." And if I was bidden to do thus, why refuse? So I obeyed, and handed, though in great fear, the little forth which seemed given me. I sat down feeling relieved. But the enemy was soon at work; causing me again to doubt. Several communications followed, but none seemed to help me, till dear David Cope arose, and my exercise was carried out, to the relief of my poor burdened exercised soul. Whereupon my heart did secretly return thanks. Keep me, O Heavenly Father! and suffer me in no way to grieve thee.

16th. Instructed and encouraged by taking up the Life of Mary Neale, and opening to: "May the pure life of Truth raised in thy soul, be tenderly cherished by strictly watching against every thing that has a tendency to grieve, deaden, or oppress this pure Seed of life; and carefully waiting for the dew of heaven or spiritual manna, by which it is nourished and refreshed; as well as that Divine instruction by which we can become wise unto salvation, please God, and bring glory to Him, which is the glorious end of our creation."

First Mo. 6th, 1853. Upon assembling in meeting this morning, poverty and leanness so beset me that I abhorred myself. Thus I struggled till near the time for meeting to close, when the command seemed given to speak in his name whom I feared to disobey. I arose, and never was I more sensible of being helped. May I be sufficiently thankful for the favor, and not only be humbled under it, but be found walking more and more in the fear of the Lord all the days of my life.

18th. Oh thou! who art giving me more and more to see myself as I am seen in thine holy eyesight, enable me to turn from every sin which doth beset, and run with patience the race set before me; looking unto thee, the author and finisher of our faith. My short-comings, be thy omissions or commissions, blot out of thy book of remembrance; and this not only wherein I have come short in serving thee, but also my fellow-creatures. My heart, this morning, is bowed within me, under a sense of this, and that selfishness is too much interwoven in my nature. How unlike the blessed example set before us by thy dear Son, who went about doing good not only to the souls, but to the bodies of men. Enable me more and more to count not my life dear unto myself, that I may finish my course with joy, &c.

Second Mo. 10th.—Fifth-day. Our meeting just closed. During the latter part of it I was closely exercised; and through unfaithfulness, I fear, obtained no relief. Many Scripture passages were brought to remembrance; and one seemed so to dwell with me, and to revive again just at the close of the meeting with so much force, that I believe relief would have been obtained had I just dropped it; but while trying to get ready, meeting closed. Thus I go, halting along.

21st. Was brought, yesterday, to feel the necessity of being very careful that I in no way grieve or offend the pure witness for Truth. As this is my daily concern, I believe I shall witness a growth therein. Thou, O Heavenly Father! alone knowest the deep wading of thy poor child. When thou art pleased to say, it is enough, can I not, and will I not, praise thee, as on the bank of deliverance! If consistent with thy most holy will, hasten the day: for my captive spirit longs to be set free.

[Perhaps there is no one thing in these Selections more noticeable, than the frequent intercessions of our friend to the Father of mercies and God of all comfort: so that "watching unto prayer with all perseverance," as enjoined by the Apostle, seems largely exemplified in her devotional life. Who can doubt but that this, was in large measure due the secret of her growth and experience in the Lord Jesus, in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge! There are no more availing weapons in the Christian warfare, than prayer and supplication to One, who is a God that heareth and answereth prayer, who regardeth the sparrows of his creation, and who hath all power in heaven and in earth. In view of this, a poet has written:

"Who that knows the worth of prayer,
But wishes to be often there?"

It is not difficult to understand that such a life of godly consistency and purity before Him, who is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart, must lead to a deepening, and an advancement in the life of righteousness, of those who seek the glory of a King immortal and invisible, and who alone can qualify and put forth in a service, which should alike bring peace to the servant, and praise and honor to the Master. The sequel proves, that A. W. H.'s hunger and thirst after righteousness was, in measure, satisfied.]

Third Mo. 7th. Should be glad, if able, to recount the favors of yesterday, while feeling unfit even to speak of them. But remembering what a dear friend once said to me that it is the altar which sanctifies the gift, I can but desire that what I say or write, may be sanctified by Him, who knoweth the frailties and weaknesses of his children, and who in mercy compassionates their low estate. At our afternoon meeting we had our dear friend Wm. Evans; who is attending with a minute the meetings in our Quarter. He was very excellently engaged in testimony—dividing the word aright. His communication did so come home, answering as face to face in a glass, to some of us, that it seems as if I cannot speak of it. Nevertheless desire to remember these words that were addressed to Daniel, alluded to in it: "Thy prayer is heard, and I have come for thy words." No mortal knows the deep exercises, and repeated baptisms my poor soul is passing through! but oh! if the time cometh when I am to reap, "faint not," O my soul! neither "grow weary."

8th. "What I say unto you, I say unto all, watch." I have greatly desired that I be found daily, yea, hourly, waiting and watching as at the posts of thy doors; that so I may experience a growth, and an advance in my spiritual journey.

14th.—Second-day morning. Helped throughout yesterday. Was exercised but without obtaining relief. I fear there is wanting on my part more living faith. Have remembered this morning, the many mighty miracles performed by our Saviour on those who possessed it; how they were helped and healed. Renewed desires are raised, to be enabled to cast more wholly my care on Him, who puts forth and goes before, his humble depending children.

17th. During our meeting this morning, the enemy seemed very busy; causing me, if possible, to wander in thought from that state of waiting we should all be found in, when thus met together in our religious meetings. This is no new thing for me, of latter years particularly. No mortal knows the combats I often experience, sometimes for a whole meeting through. Then, again, He who sees and knows the struggle, arises unexpectedly for my help; which was the case this morning, just at the close of our meeting. The prayer of one formerly was revived in the ear of my soul: "Feed me with food convenient for me," &c. I remembered also the condition of the poor man, that "sat by the way-side begging." It seemed applicable to my own situation. I was instructed.

In speaking, last year, upon the subject of secret societies among the colored people of the South, John G. Fee, President of Berea College, Kentucky, deplored the fact that the orders abstract large sums of money and greatly impoverish the people, without giving them any real benefit in return. In illustration he presented the case of the colored people in a town in interior Kentucky, where, according to the statement of one of their own ministers, they are paying eight times as much for lodgers as they expend for religious purposes; and this, said he, when the great mass of these people are living in squalid huts, and their children instructed in an old factory as a school-room.

J. Blanchard, who I believe is the President of Wheaton College, Illinois, in the course of an address at Saratoga, a few months ago, said upon this subject: "There are 190 secret societies in the city directory at Washington, our seat of government. There are 84 in the city of Louisville, and these cities are not exceptions. The ex-slave population are crazed with them. Thousands on thousands of colored mothers now take in washing, and toil to feed their children and board their husbands, whose wages are devoured by the secret orders, one man often belonging to from one to twenty of them. The African Methodist Episcopal Church of Saratoga ask aid of the Christian public while a majority of its trustees pay dues to secret societies. This deluge of secret orders calls on every lover of God and his country for profound, prayerful study and reflection." It may be added that J. Blanchard's address was delivered as a plea to induce secret temperance lodges to drop what little secrecy they have, "that all may unite in open work after the example of Christ."

That quite a number of educated ones among the colored people have seen the folly of the lodge connection, and have withdrawn therefrom, appears from the following remarks of H. H. Hinman, written last winter to the American, of Washington, from Selma, Alabama: "Whatever may have been the previous convictions of those engaged in the education of the colored youths of the South, they have with great unanimity concluded that the vast multitude of secret societies that absorb so much of the time, means, and attention of the colored people, are simply pernicious, and with that conviction comes the more general one that all secret societies are out of place in a republican government, and out of harmony with Christian principles. Such certainly are the convictions of the able men who conduct the schools of this city, and such is the growing conviction of the pastors of the churches. Two of the men who came here to take charge of the Baptist Theological and Normal School, were Royal Arch Masons. One made public renunciation of his Masonic obligations, and the other told me that the objections to the secret lodge system were unanswerable, and he proposed never to go into another lodge, and that he heartily sympathized with my work."

The writer of the above also spoke of meeting with the Presiding Elder of the African Methodist denomination, in a neighboring district. He is the editor of a good paper called the Southern Independent. In reference to the lodges, his testimony was, that "he had joined about every secret society he had heard of, including Masonry to a high degree, and had given them all up from the conviction that they were injurious to the cause of Christianity and public morals." In Memphis, last year, several colored ministers, renouncing their connection with the lodges, were subjected to some very rough treatment. The manifestations of mob violence resulted in two other ministers withdrawing, one of these saying in his published renunciation of all fellowship with the lodges: "The best secret that I learned in joining was, that it was no place for a Christian. So I came out after trying in vain to get satisfied with them."

Dr. Charles Jewett, in his book, "Forty years' Fight with the Drink Demon," gives the following testimony showing that the secrecy feature of secret temperance societies greatly hinders the temperance cause:

"Another movement which lost us the active co-operation of thousands of excellent and able men, was the substitution of close for open organizations. Prior to the formation of the order of the Sons of Temperance, all our public meetings were open to the world. * * * * Seven-eighths of our weekly temperance meetings now are held in private rooms. Few of the aged are there to give the proceedings the dignity and gravity which their presence generally confers, and the children are left at home; and worst of all, the drinking portion of the community, the very portion which we wish to influence by our arguments and appeals, are excluded. They have not the password. * * * Those petty rivalries which are now frequently occurring between the different orders where they exist in the same community, and often between subordinate and neighboring organizations of the same order; and those unbrotherly strifes for office and honors which too often occur now, were unknown in the open organizations—absolutely unknown. * * * In less than fifteen years the style of operation I have described, open temperance work, so far revolutionized the public opinion of Massachusetts that the license system was abolished in more than three-fourths of the counties of the State. The old style of operating gave place in the years 1840-41 and '42, to the Washingtonian system, and that very soon to the Sons of Temperance and other forms of close organization, and they have had the field almost exclusively for over twenty-five years; and what is the present status of temperance in that State as compared with what it was in 1843? It may be doubted whether we are stronger at the polls now (1872) than we were twenty-five years ago. For myself I believe that had the work of reform been prosecuted for the last twenty-five years in New England in open organizations, with such added provision as experience might have suggested, the liquor traffic could have been crushed before the public attention could have been diverted from that issue by the great struggle for the preservation of the Union.*"

The foregoing was written about fifteen years ago, at the time that the women of the country, long suffering in their homes from the drink oppression, felt roused to the endeavor to rescue their husbands and sons from the enslaving and sinful habit. Their methods are all open, they profess to be dependent upon the favor of the Almighty for his blessing upon their endeavors, and without doubt the eyes of the people have been opened so to invite them to stand against the cruel adversary, as that encouraging progress has been made. How far it may be the province of Friends to directly co-operate with the organization must be left to the individual conscience. We all wish them well, and desire they may be kept out of "every false way."

It may be alleged that while the opposition of Charles Jewett to secret temperance associations, as late as fifteen years ago, may have been well based, they are nevertheless quite harmless at the present time. This may be answered by a statement made by a writer in the Christian Conservator, a paper of the United Brethren. That denomination holds a testimony against secret orders, but as there seem to have been some signs lately of a weakening in its faithful maintenance, the writer in question proceeds to show that it would not be safe to count on the harmless character of the "minor" orders. He instances the fact that three years ago, a certain meeting-house was built, and a good degree of interest was shown in religious matters, until, two years later, a lodge of Good Templars was organized in the town. Nearly every member of the meeting joined the lodge. Very soon the prayer meeting was given up, and for three months there was no gathering at all in the meeting-house. Then on a Seventh-day there was a session of the county lodge, the meeting members were out in their full regalia, and the streets were crowded. On First-day the meeting-house was re-opened, but the zealous paraders of the lodge were too tired to be present. Hence, even though the secrecy feature of the temperance lodge covered little or nothing that was morally reprehensible, the fact that the claims of the lodge were such as to cause the members to neglect the assembling of themselves together for religious worship, would not allow it to be accounted "harmless."

Deacon Sam Fay.

For "The Friend."

Under the above title, a contributor to the Illustrated Christian Weekly gives a brief narrative of the working of Divine grace in transforming an apparently worthless character into a vessel meet for the Master's use. The change noted was as striking in its results, though differently wrought out, as was instanced in the experience of Jacob Parsons, an account of whom, also taken from the above mentioned journal, was last year printed in "The Friend," and has been lately issued as a tract by Friends' Tract Association. Such narratives may well incline us to pause ere we speak of this or that degraded or profane person as "a hopeless case." The following is abridged from the original account.

J. W. L.

Samuel Fay was born nearly sixty years ago, in the very heart of Alabama's black belt, not far from Montgomery. He was a slave, and wore his chains for nearly forty years, not being able to read a word or write his name. By the time he was old enough to work he had taken such dislike to the cotton field and the overseer that he resolved to hire his time, so having argued with his master, he left home and engaged himself to work in a printing-office. He soon came to be press-man and served continuously in the same office till he saw that hand-presses were about to give place to steam-presses, when he engaged to learn the carpenter's trade. As he was obliged to pay full wages to his master while learning his trade, he would often work all day at the bench and at night work the press, and frequently for weeks at a time have not a wink of sleep except as now and then, while the boy fixed the rollers, he would bow his head on a pile of paper and rest for a moment. Three men are still living in the city of Montgomery, who, at different times, were connected with the office in which he worked, and each one has told me (says the narrator), before and since his death, that he has never seen his equal either in powers of endurance or excellence of work.

He was very anxious to excel as a carpenter, but in those days it was not the custom to teach a colored apprentice much beyond the coarser parts of the trade. To overcome this, when dinner-time came he would often feign sickness, and lie down on the bench, as if to rest, but the moment the shop was empty he would jump up and proceed to examine the fine work that was going on, and often he would take it carefully apart, and having seen how it was done, would put it together again, and when the workmen returned he was, apparently, fast asleep on the bench as if nothing had happened in their absence.

He came to be a master-workman, and some of the largest and most expensive buildings in Montgomery were built wholly by his hands.

Until the time came when he witnessed a change of heart, Samuel Fay was a man of almost ungovernable temper. In the days of slavery he was known as a "dangerous negro," and every new overseer was warned in regard to him. In those times he always went armed with some sort of a weapon, and it was a standing vow with him to kill any man that attempted to lay hands on him, and then be hanged himself and go at once to hell.

In this darkened state Samuel continued until about ten years ago, taking no interest in religion, and very rarely consenting to accompany his wife and daughter to the meeting-house of the Congregationalists, of which denomination they were members. Finally, however, with an honest purpose in his heart, he resolved to go to a certain meeting and give good heed to what should be delivered. Under God's blessing he was thoroughly reached, and then without delay he decided to become a church member.

Gradually the tendency to excessive anger disappeared, and religion became a real thing with him. He said in explanation, "A few years ago I made me up a little prayer and I have prayed it every morning since then, and though many have wronged me, I have had no trouble with any one." It was found that this prayer was the so-called "Eleventh Commandment." "A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another." It was about the time that he made up or made use of his little prayer, that many of his old friends were heard to say, "How gentle the ways of Sam Fay are becoming." And while he was growing in gentleness it also became noticeable how his concern for the right order of meeting matters and every thing pertaining to the interests of the people developed. Especially was he the children's friend. He died the latter part of last autumn, and, says the narrator, "So much had he come to be a part of our best life that, in our homes, in the church, and on the street, we feel lost without him."

The Freedmen's School at Aiken, S. C.

The Friends' Intelligencer gives an interesting account of the hardships and sacrifices that were encountered by some of those who went from the North during and shortly after the Civil war, to engage in the great work of educating and elevating the Freedmen of the South. Among these was Martha Schofield, of Bucks County, Pennsylvania, who has been mainly instrumental in building up the flourishing school at Aiken, S. C., which, at its last report, had 324 students on its roll. She left New York on her mission, in the Tenth Month, 1865, in a Government steamer, and landed at Port Royal, S. C., from which place she was conveyed along the coast to Wadmalaw Island, where 1500 colored people that had followed Sherman's army had just been placed. She says:—

"The Superintendent had arrived the day before with boxes of clothing contributed by friends of the freedmen in the North and Canada. I had an associate, a woman who came in the same vessel with me. For one week our trunks remained unpacked, as from daylight until dark we clothed the naked and fed the poor. Rations had to be supplied, for no crops were growing, the desolations of war were on every hand. The next week we opened school in the double parlors of a private house. The only white family on the Island was six miles away and an "order" prevented any others landing. Colored troops were for months on guard before the door. I named it the 'Garrison School,' in which soon we had over a hundred pupils. One morning, an old man came and said, 'Missus, please give me sumfin to lay a man out in,' and, whilst getting a suitable article, I asked, 'What did he die with?' The reply was, 'Small-pox, ma'am.' 'There we saw it in all its horrors among those colored soldiers left for us to feed and care for, as the white officers ran away and the Superintendent had to be on other islands.'

Having put her hand to the plow, Martha never swerved from the path of duty, and although in her first year's experience she had to pass through war and pestilence and famine—for the latter, too, had made its visitation, and for weeks oysters and acorns and worm-eaten hard-tack constituted the whole bill of fare,—nevertheless the fall of 1866 found her again leaving her northern home to resume her philanthropic mission,—this time on Edisto Island. The hardships of the previous year were paralleled in this new field of labor. With scarcely any shelter, the destructive hand of war having demolished all the sash in the only house available for the school, and with an insufficiency of food, life among the Freedmen was filled with trials and hardships.

In the fall of 1867 she took up her work on St. Helena Island. It proved to be a malarious coast and season. She says: "I remember one day having to let 27 of the pupils go out and sit on the bank until the chill went off. In a fortnight I found myself unable to rise in the morning, and ten weeks passed before I could be carried down stairs and out into the sunshine. My sister had been telegraphed for, and for weeks the little spark of life rested in the Father's will. It was severe malarial fever, going, later, to my lungs and leaving me with hemorrhages. There was life enough left for my work, but the coast was no longer the place. My friends, who knew, said Aiken was the only place for me, and in 1868 an auxiliary branch of the Freedmen's Commission 'adopted' me."

Of the work at Aiken she writes:—

"There has scarcely been a moment when it would do to leave the watch tower, when eye and brain and thought did not have to be kept on the alert; for the Schofield School has grown up in the midst of enemies, with hate and prejudice and misjudgment hurled against it with the strong forces of public opinion. But it has grown, it still lives; the work that I came to do has been tried with all that was best within me. And yet it does not seem my work that has done the good, but the Power that only used me as an instrument. The way was made plain, my Light was clear, doubts seldom beset me, fear had no place, the thing to do was put before me and the prayer for strength to do it was always answered."

Besides the teachers in the regular schools there is a teacher of sewing for the girls and one of industries for the boys. All the boys of suitable age can find work in the printing-office, carpenter-shop or shoe-shop, so as to learn those trades. Many of the churches of the colored people in the State raise enough funds to send the most promising boys or girls of their congregation to the school, thus preparing them for teachers. During the summer vacation these open schools in their own homes or neighborhood for the free tuition of the children of the congregations. The patrons of the Schofield School being all poor, the tuition charges are necessarily nominal. The students in the advanced grades pay 50 cents per month, the primary pupils 5 cents a week (when they can). How entirely inadequate the income thus derived is to meet the expenses of the school may be seen in the Financial Statement of last year, in which subscriptions are put at $2,889.93, and tuition from students at $139.78!

For "The Friend."

A Spring Ramble.

The weather during the Third Month had been so cool that vegetation had been more slowly developed than in some former years; but feeling the need of exercise in the open air, and hoping that a change of thought and scene would be helpful to the physical system. I wandered forth from my home on the 26th of the month.

Our village is built on a low ridge, from which the ground falls away both to the North and South. On the Southern side, at the foot of the first slope, is a spring which tradition says was a favorite resort of the Indians in former years. They, and the primeval forest in which they pursued their game, have passed away, but it still remains to mark one of the spots where the waters accumulated in the ridge above, find an outlet.

As the mind turns to the years long past, and muses on the scenes that have been witnessed by this spring, there comes into remembrance the beautiful lines of Bryant, on "The Fountain," so truly descriptive of Nature, that many of them could scarcely be more appropriate, if this spring had been the fountain from which the poet's mind drank in his inspiration. For, if not immediately at the fountain-head, yet not far off, "the wild-vine" still trails over the tangled thicket, the "spice-bush lifts her leafy lances," the trunks of "oak" and "hickory" spread a "canopy" over the waters, and the maple bursts into a flash of scarlet flowers." But the change has come which the poet describes:—

"So centuries passed by, and still the woods
Blossomed in spring, and reddened when the year
Grew chill, and glistened in the frozen rains
Of winter, till the white man swung the axe
Beside thee—signal of a mighty change.
Then all around was heard the crash of trees,
Trembling awhile and rushing to the ground,
The low of ox and shouts of men who fired
The brushwood, or who tore the earth with ploughs;
The grain sprang thick and tall, and hid in green
The blackened hill-side; ranks of spiky maize
Rose like a host embattled; the buckwheat
Whitened broad acres, sweetening with its flowers
The August wind."

The spring-head is now a neglected piece of swampy ground, from various parts of which the water oozes out, lazily running through channels which are almost choked with frog spittle and similar forms of vegetable life. Some masses of these were thickly studded with small bubbles of air, and in other places the delicate slender lines of green thread floated on the water, dividing and subdividing, but so weak that, when lifted from the water which supported them, they sunk into a shapeless mass of green ooze. A portion of this was transferred into a bottle of water, for closer examination; and, when placed under the microscope at home, it presented many points of beauty and interest.

The Confervee, as the family of Frog-spittles are termed, belong to the Alga, one of the simplest forms of vegetable life, but, like all the others, full of interest to those who study their forms and habits. The specimen I had preserved, when placed on the microscopic slide, appeared as branching plants, the main stems of which were composed of comparatively large cells placed end to end in a single row, each with a small green spot on the sides. At intervals along the main stem, side branches or tufts of similar structure were placed, each of which was constructed of a single row of cells like the parent stem.

Mingled with these in the field of view, were long zig-zag lines of square objects, each touching its neighbor at only one corner. In some cases the separation had become complete. These were plants in the process of dividing themselves up into numerous new and independent ones, according to the peculiar mode of growth of this division of the Alga.

On another part of the slide were hundreds of little round cells, each with a central dot. And shooting about among the mazes of this wilderness of vegetation, were little oval animalcules, darting hither and thither with an uncertain and apparently aimless motion.

Returning from this digression to the spring itself, as I followed the small rivulet, I was pleased to notice the bright green leaves of the Water Starwort (Callitriche verna) floating on the surface, and attached by thread-like stems to the earth beneath. The orange-colored anthers of this plant, which are formed in the axils of the leaves, had not yet appeared, but they will probably soon be here, as the plant commences to flower early in the spring, and continues to grow and bloom till autumn.

Leaving the stream, I crossed a swampy clearing, where the stems of last year's Cat-tails were still standing. The buds of the Spice-wood (Lindera Benzoin) tempted the passer by to try their pleasant taste; and in the grass at his feet, were numerous specimens of the curious purple spathes striped with green, of the swamp cabbage (Symplocarpus fatidus). These were welcomed as the first of the floral harbingers of spring. The long mass of fibrous roots of this plant sink deeply into the wet and spongy soil, below the reach of frost; and from the crown of these, the spathe, itself, half buried in the earth and mud, shoots up, with little regard to the temporary cold that may prevail on the surface. The head of flowers is so closely enfolded in the thick and fleshy envelope, and the entrance is so protected by the tip of the spathes, which not only over-arches, but often is almost coiled down upon it, that there is little risk of injury, whatever winds may blow. The cold days we have lately had, in which the surface of the ground was hard frozen, did not seem to have affected these hardy plants; and the faded condition of the anthers, from which the pollen had escaped, showed that they had been in bloom for a number of days.

Inside of the snug retreat furnished by one of these spathes, a spider had spun his silken lines, reaching from the central column of bloom to the inner surface of the envelope—an interesting illustration of how early in the season these active insects commence their labors.

On the inner side of a piece of bark that had fallen from a fence post, I observed some closely woven silk cases filled with small eggs of a pale flesh color. These were probably the eggs of a spider which had placed them there before the beginning of winter, and left them to be hatched by the warmth of the next spring weather, at a time when the insects on which they subsist will also be present to supply them with food.

The hanging spikes of flowers of the Candle Alder (Alnus Serrulata) had developed enough to show the individual florets with their stamens, but these were not yet sufficiently mature to discharge their pollen, which, a little later in the season will scatter through the air as a cloud of yellow dust, when the bush is shaken. But as I pursued my walk, I found on the sloping side of a bank, many of the tiny plants of the Shad-Blossom or Whitlow-grass (Draba verna) not only in bloom, but in some of them the seed-pods had already followed the flowers. From the centre of a little circle of hairy leaves at the ground, a tiny thread-like flower stem shoots up, along which the white cruciform flowers are developed. This plant is a humble member of the great Cruciform family, to which the mustard radish, turnip, and many other well-known plants, belong. It is a favorite with the botanist because it is one of the very earliest of our Spring flowers.

Business Prospering and the Soul Declining.—I had engaged, said the late John Ashworth of Rochdale, the well known author of "Strange Tales" to preach at ——— lately. A gentleman not noted for liberality, met me and took me to his house in a two-horse carriage. I at once saw that I had known him as a worker long years ago. So I said, "It is a pity, sir, you troubled to fetch me with two horses; one would have served."

He said, "But the horses and carriage are for use; and I have others beside these."

We swept up to a grand house, and my host left me for a short time amid a blaze of costly pictures. Finding me looking at a picture which had three oxen and three sheep in the foreground with heath and sky around, he said, "Are you interested in pictures, Mr. Ashworth? I gave £400 for that, what do you think of it?"

I replied, "My occupation familiarizes me with pictures. Beef and mutton are dear in these parts, for these creatures to cost £400. £400 at five per cent., is £20 a year. I know four needy Christian widows in Rochdale to whom that sum, in the form of 2s. a week, would prove a rich boon; while the blessing secured to you by their prayers would be a fine exchange for their hanging there."

My host observed, "That is a strange way of looking at the subject."

I said, "But you will have to look at it in that light."

He asked, "When?"

I answered, "When the great Master comes." He seemed abashed, and said, "But is it wrong to buy such things?"

I replied, "No, if one takes care first to devote a good portion to the Lord, and to the poor." I said, "You are reported to have prospered much, sir, and to have reached so many thousands a year."

He said, "More than that."

I asked seriously, "Do you give away a tenth?" He replied, "No; who could give a tenth? John Ashworth, if you had £10,000 in one year, could you give away a tenth? No, no, not you!"

I answered, "Making no boast of it, I take care to give more than a tenth from less than £560 a year. Sir, I knew you as a praying man in ——— long years ago. Are you as happy now as you were then? and do you give as much in proportion as you did then?"

He candidly said he was not and did not. Our after intercourse was subdued and serious, and I heard last week of his giving £50 here, and £50 there, and a £100 to a third object.

"For Whom I shall Dip the Sop."—Literally, "the morsel." No incident of Oriental meals is more celebrated in Western narrative than the giving of the morsel, or sop, to a table-neighbor, as a mark of favor. It is said that the Shah of Persia, when in London some years ago, could not break himself entirely of the habit, but insisted on passing some morsels to the fine ladies near him, to the danger of their fine dresses. Scarcely a traveller, and certainly no resident, in the East, can escape this Oriental courtesy at meals. Since the dishes are generally either stewed or cooked almost to pieces, the fingers can easily tear off a morsel. This is dipped in the sauce, thus becoming the sop, and is thrust directly into the favored one's mouth. If the mouthful is large, the sauce or gravy is apt to run down the receiver's beard. The present writer has often received the sop at an Oriental meal, and cannot say that, considering the other customs, there is anything uncleanly or repulsive in it. A common mode, however, both of helping one's self and giving the sop to one's neighbor, is to take two pieces of bread, and take up the morsel between them, the pieces of bread serving as spoon, or knife and fork. The giving of the sop, or morsel, seems to be an old Greek custom, as well as an Oriental one. The custom goes back to the time of Socrates, if not to that of Homer.—S. S. Times.

The old manuscript from which the following lines are taken, has endorsed upon it in the handwriting of the late Nathan Kite, the words—"Samuel J. Smith, Poet." So that it may fairly be assumed that he was the author of them.

LINES

On hearing a Sermon preached by Thos. Scattergood, in North Meeting-house, First-day, Feb. 22d, 1801.

"Before the Sabbath shall return again
By whom 'twas made, thy soul may be required."
Thus spake the preacher, in prophetic strain,
A warning by the Holy Ghost inspired.
With fervent zeal his glowing speech was fired,
On future retribution much he dwelt:
Insensibility ashamed awakened,
The alarming sound awakened conscience felt,
And many a prostrate soul did in contrition melt.

To me, perhaps, is the dread summons sent,
To appear before the tribunal on high!
But sons of sorrow, why need we lament
To close this scene so full of misery?
Yea, where's the man that can with steady eye
Pierce thro' the gloomy horrors of the grave?
See burst asunder Nature's every tie,
And sink undaunted in oblivion's wave,
Nor feel a secret wish, his wretched barque to save?

But when a proceed these terrible alarms
That in my breast such mighty conflicts raise?
Tis guilt which thus the King of terrors arms,
'Tis conscience to his dart its sting conveys.
When of my past, my unimproved days,
I scrutinize the unflattering account
O God! my 'stonished mind with fear surveys,
Of sin and sorrow what a vast amount!
Divine Redeemer, wash me in thy healing fount!

Were not thy mercy equal to thy might,
How vain, O Lord, were all my hopes of Heaven;
Down to the abysses of eternal night
My vital part by strictest justice driven!
But lo! thy gracious promise has been given
That contrite sinners shall receive thy grace,
Their crimes expunged, their frailties all forgiven,
On angel-wings beyond contracted space
To soar in realms of light, and sing eternal praise.
—From the Pigeon-hole of Obscurity.

THE LIGHT THAT IS FELT.

A tender child of summers three,
Seeking her little bed at night,
Paused on the dark stairs timidly,
"O, mother, take my hand," said she,
"And then the dark will all be light."

We older children grope our way
From dark behind to dark before;
And only when our hands we lay,
Dear Lord, in Thine, the night is day,
And there is darkness nevermore.

Reach downward to the sunless days,
Wherein our guides are blind as we,
And faith is small and hope delays;
Take Thou the hands of prayer we raise,
And let us feel the light of Thee.

—John G. Whittier.

THE MIDNIGHT HYMN.

Selected.

In the mild silence of the voiceless night,
When chased by airy dreams, the slumbers flee,
Whom in the darkness doth my spirit seek,
O God! but Thee?

And if there be a weight upon my breast!
Some vague impression of the day foregone—Scarce knowing what it is, I fly to Thee
And lay it down.

Or if it be the heaviness that comes
In token of anticipated ill,
My bosom takes no heed of what it is,
Since 'tis Thy will.

For O! in spite of past and present care,
Or anything besides, how joyfully
Passes that almost solitary hour,
My God, with Thee.

More tranquil than the stillness of the night,
More peaceful than the silence of that hour,
More blest than any thing; my bosom lies
Beneath Thy power;

For what is there on earth that I desire,
Of all that man can give or take from me?
Or whom in heaven doth my spirit seek,
O God! but Thee?

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 124.

WARNINGS.

It is one of the evidences of the Lord's goodness that He does not permit those who are rejecting his government to go on undisturbed in the way they have chosen, but visits them from time to time with the reproofs of his Holy Spirit; and oftentimes by outward warnings and chastisements, calls upon them to return to Him in whom alone there is safety and peace. An instance of this is related by Elizabeth Collins in her memoirs respecting a person whom she knew. Her narrative is as follows:—

"A singular instance of the love and mercy of Almighty God, as also of his just judgment, in the case of a young man, happened in my early life. He lived at a public house, and was one who took great delight in company, vanity, and horse-racing. One day, as he and one of his companions were running horses, at the end of the race ground he was dashed with great violence against a tree, the horse taking the opposite side from that he expected to go, which brought his head directly against the tree. He was taken up and carried into a house for dead. A doctor was sent for, who gave no encouragement of his recovery; but after a time he revived, and in a few days recovered his understanding.

Oh! the distress and anguish he was then in, having no other prospect, but shortly to be summoned before an offended God, to receive the sentence, 'Depart from me thou worker of iniquity.' Bitter were his moans, and sore his lamentations, and fervent his cries for mercy. I went to see him in his distress, when it was not in the power of man to relieve him. His petitions were for mercy and for time: he asked only for one year that he might live a new life, be an example and warning to his companions, and honor and glorify his God and Creator. The Lord in mercy heard his petition, and in great condescension granted his request, even to a miracle, as it was thought impossible for him to be raised, and gave him not only one year but several.

"For a time he lived a sober, watchful and orderly life, but for want of breaking off from his old companions, and living a more retired life, he at length by little and little fell away and got into the same paths of folly and dissipation. He was not, however, suffered to go on long in this way, for one evening as he was riding with several of his companions, one of whom he expected to be joined in marriage with in a few days, his horse, without any fright that they could discover, ran off; threw him in the road and killed him. I was told he never drew breath after they reached him, that they could discover. This event happened in the evening, after spending the First-day afternoon in lightness and vanity.

"As this solemn instance of Divine mercy and justice has from time to time been revived in my remembrance, I have thought it best to commit it to writing, as a caution and warning to my dear children, to beware of loose and unprofitable company, and of breaking their covenants."

A warning of a different kind, yet very impressive, is said to have been given by Mahlon Hockett, of North Carolina, a valuable minister in the Society of Friends. The account is given to a friend in Philadelphia, by the late Nathan P. Hall of Ohio, is as follows:—

"Mahlon had a neighbor who was in the practice of neglecting week-day meetings. He had built a new house, and had fixed to move into it on a day of the week-day meeting. In the morning, one of the children was at Mahlon Hockett's on an errand. Mahlon said to the child, "Father will be at meeting to-day?" "No," said the child, "Father is going to move into the new house, and he can't go to meeting." "Tell thy father," said Mahlon, "he must go to meeting, he must go to meeting, and if he don't go to meeting, before night he won't have a new house to move into; and tell thy father, Mahlon Hockett says so." The child delivered the message, but it did not turn the father from his purpose. A load of goods was taken into the new house, and with it two of the children who were left there whilst the father went for a second load. Returning with this, he saw the house in a blaze. The children, with some coals of fire, had lighted some straw near the house, and the fire had spread to the building, which was destroyed.

Daniel Stanton mentions in his Journal that some great men in Philadelphia were concerned in fitting out vessels for the wicked business of privateering. This brought a deep engagement on his mind, and it came upon him as a weighty duty, to go to one of these men, faithfully to warn him against this unrighteous way of getting riches. He says:—"I got a friend to accompany me, and cleared my spirit of a heavy burden: he pleaded for the practice, but used me civilly. A new vessel was fitted out sometime after, called the Tartar, which was much talked of to do great matters in privateering; but, as I have been informed, she sunk before she got out to sea, and many or most of the people on board were drowned. I had peace of mind for having discharged my duty, although I much lamented the unhappy circumstances of these poor fellow-mortals, losing their lives in such an evil undertaking."

The Life of John Pemberton relates the peculiar circumstance of a public warning delivered by him to the people of Londonderry in Ireland in 1784. He says in his Journal, under date of Fourth Month 20th; "Reached Londonderry and concluded to prepare to fulfil what appeared my duty. And my kind friend James Christy, having prepared some wrapper, had it made up in the form of a cloak; and thus I passed through two gates and the main street of the city. We walked slowly, and my mind was covered with much solemnity and awe. At some places I proclaimed repentance to the inhabitants. Some appeared struck with admiration, but not the least affront was offered, nor any mob followed. Coming at length near my quarters, my mind being very quiet, I was free to turn in, but soon found I was not fully released. The Lord has been merciful, and I trust, accepted a part of the service that engaged my mind. It was very humiliating; yet I was favored with great composure in the performance of it."

"The next day, the exercise continuing with me, after much solid weightings, about the tenth hour I passed through two other gates of the city, and through two or three streets where I had not been before, as also the main street again; and several times had some little matter to express, warning the people to remember the mercies of God, and to turn to the Lord of Hosts, lest his righteous judgments overtake them, as they had been poured forth in other countries. The people were very civil, and though it was their market-day and the time of the assizes, and the streets about the market-place, in particular, pretty full of people, yet no taunt or insult was offered."

The substance of what John Pemberton delivered to the people on this occasion, is thus stated in a memorandum in his own hand-writing, found among his papers.

"Repent, repent, O! all ye inhabitants of Londonderry, and of this land, while the Lord's mercies are continued to you."

To some who gathered about him at one of the gates, he expressed that he believed it was required of him to be as a sign to the people.

The following notice of the same occurrence, is from the Hibernian Journal of Sixth Month 19th, 1784.

"Some time ago, a gentleman handed to us the following for insertion. We now give it without alteration or animadversion. 'About 10 days ago something very remarkable occurred in this city (Londonderry). An eminent Philadelphia Quaker who had been sometime in Ireland, passed through most of the streets, covered with sackcloth, and repeatedly called upon the inhabitants, "Repent and turn to God." What makes it extraordinary is, that those who have conversed with this Quaker have found him a remarkable intelligent person of extensive information, and entirely remote from every symptom of insanity. He declares he came from America on purpose to admonish the people of Ireland and particularly Londonderry. It is not unworthy of note that sometime before the memorable siege of that city, an eminent Quaker of that day called William Edmundson visited the town and passed through the streets nearly in the same manner.'"

Prompt Payment of Small Bills.—A wealthy banker in one of our large cities, who is noted for his large subscriptions to charities, and his kindly habits of private benevolence, was called on one evening, and asked to go to help a man who had attempted suicide. They found the man in a wretched house in an alley not far from the banker's dwelling. The front room was a cobbler's shop; behind it, on a miserable bed in the kitchen, lay the poor shoemaker, with a gaping gash in his throat, while his wife and children were gathered about him.

"We had been without food for days," said the woman, when he returned. "It is not my husband's fault. He is a hard-working, sober man. But he could neither get work, nor pay for that which he had done. To-day, he went for the last time to collect a debt due him by a rich family, but the gentleman was not at home. My husband was weak from fasting, and seeing us starving drove him mad. So it ended that way," turning to the fainting, motionless figure on the bed.

The banker having warmed and fed the family, hurried home, opened his desk, and took out a file of little bills. All his debts were promptly met, but he was apt to be careless about the accounts of milk, bread, &c., because they were petty. He found that there was a bill of Michael Goodlow's, for repairing children's shoes, $10. Michael Goodlow was the suicide. It was the banker's unpaid debt which had brought these people to the verge of the grave, and driven this man to desperation, while at the very time the banker had given away thousands in charity.—The Record of Christian Work.

After the Lord had opened my heart, and I came in part to understand the Holy Scriptures, and to have a feeling of that Holy Spirit in which the holy penmen wrote them, and a sympathy with the spirits and exercises of the righteous therein mentioned, I took great delight in reading them, and having a good memory, could thereby the better deal with priests, and with professors. I had many disputes and reasonings with persons of several denominations, both in Yorkshire and other parts in my travels, so that through these disputes, and much reading, my mind was rather too much in the letter, and not altogether so much in spirit and in power, as it should have been; for which I met with a gentle caution from the Lord, which was thus: I heard a voice from the Lord, as plain as if one had spoken to my outward ear, "the fowls of the air lodge in the branches." This being repeated to me, I besought the Lord to show me what was the meaning of that voice which I heard; and the Lord, the mighty God, showed me in his condescending love, that the Scriptures, even all of them which were written as the holy men were moved of the Holy Ghost, sprung from the living root; yet those who rested only in the letter, and came not to be acquainted with, and live in, and minister from the same Holy Spirit, are outward, dead, dry, airy and foolish. This gentle check was of great service to me; not so as to make me decline reading the Scriptures, but that I should not have overmuch dependency on them; and to caution me against the neglect of waiting for the help of the Holy Spirit, the root and pure spring of the right and living ministry, which reaches the heart and carries the true evidence with it to the believers that it is of God; which that of the letter cannot do of itself.—J. Richardson.

Artificial Fruit Jellies.—Commercial "currant" jelly is now composed of dried apples, water, glucose, tartaric acid, carmine or aniline sugar, gelatine. Mix, boil and strain. Other fruit jellies are made by diminishing the tartaric acid and substituting other coloring matter.

The "dried apples" used in the manufacture of these jellies, consist very largely, if not altogether, of dried skins and cores—the refuse of the large evaporating establishments (as we have learned by a thorough inspection of the latter).

These jellies are far from being wholesome, and the whole business is a fraud on the public at best. We appeal to every true housewife and mother to avoid the cheap stuff and to rely henceforth on home-made fruit jellies. Buy good fruits and you can easily make all the wholesome jellies that your family will need. The formula is simple and the preparation easy. Here is Dr. Edson's recipe: "Take juice of fruit, freshly expressed, white sugar a sufficiency. Boil some time, strain and cool rapidly."—Orchard and Garden.

A Battle with a Whale.—The New York Herald recently published an account extracted from a private letter of the captain of the whaling bark Winthrop Poole, of New Bedford, of a severe battle with a whale. The letter is dated Albany, West Australia. The captain says:

"On the 12th of September, three boats put after a whale, which, when it was struck, went for the loose boat in charge of the second mate, C. A. Sparks of Provincetown, capsizing it with its tail. Not content with this however, the whale dived down, and, rising, bumped the boat from beneath until it was shaken to pieces. That not being enough to show his temper, it dived again, and in a few minutes the crew of the boat commanded by the chief mate, John A. Cook, of Provincetown, were startled by seeing a gigantic jaw on either side of them, and in a second or two their boat was cut in half and they were struggling in the water. Fortunately no one was in the waist of the boat, and so none were injured.

A gale was blowing at the time, or else the boat would have been saved. The whale was evidently dying, but the weather became so bad that nothing could be done beyond getting the men in. The remaining crew picked up the crew of the first boat wrecked and made for the ship, while a boat from the vessel put off to save the first mate and his crew. When the mate was found he had been clinging for an hour to a part of the boat with one finger in the cork hole. He stated on being picked up that he could not have held on many minutes longer. The weather had now become so bad, that, although but a quarter of a mile from the ship, it took more than an hour for the relief crew to return. The whale got clear, carrying away with it 375 fathoms of line, and was never seen again.

Manna.—Sicily is the chief source of manna; in that country the trees are cultivated in plantations, and when about eight years old they begin to yield. Cuts an inch and a half to two inches long are made in the bark, cutting through to the wood. One cut is made daily, beginning near the bottom of the trunk, with each succeeding cut about an inch above the former one. The thick, syrup-like juice exudes from the cuts and hardens on the bark into white, spongy flakes, which, when hard enough are removed and dried still further before they are packed for commerce. It consists mainly of a form of sugar called manite, and has mild, laxative properties.

Lake Superior Wild Fruits.—Last July I made an overland trip through the wild country between the western extremity of Lake Superior and Hunter's Island in the international channel. I made careful notes on the flora of the region, especially upon the wild fruits.

I was much surprised to find that the wild black-cap raspberry, Rubus occidentalis, is entirely absent from this long strip of country, although the wild red, R. strigosus, is everywhere very common and fruitful. Even on an exposed side of Hunter's Island, British America, this red raspberry covered a half acre or more and was loaded with fruit. Blackberries were entirely wanting. Three wild strawberries were collected.

Several forms of the Amelanchier or service berry (June berry) occur in this territory. Of the few-fruited service berry, Amelanchier Cana- densis, var. oligocarpa is the most singular and promising. Towards the last of July the fruit of this was very palatable on Hunter's Island and in the region adjacent. The fruits were as large as Clinton grapes, and were borne in profusion, and the bushes, four or five feet high, are apparently as hardy as the pines with which they grow. My Indian guide informed me that the Indians are very fond of this fruit, eating it raw and making it into pies.

I found but one sort of crataegus or hawthorn in fruit, the typical C. tomentosa. The fruit is small, dry and seedy, but the Indians eat it raw.

Of currants, three species are common: The red currant, Ribes rubrum, occurs both in swamps and on high lands, but usually only a single bush in a place. The fruit is not abundant enough to furnish food for the Indians. The common wild black currant, Ribes floridum, is frequent, but the Indians appear to make no use of its fruit. Indeed, the Indian estimate of it is conveyed in their name Shigkaniman, "skunk berry." The Ribes prostratum, valuable as a botanical curiosity only, occurs in the coldest swamps.

A single little gooseberry, Ribes oxycanthoides, was found once or twice. It must be more common than my observation would show, however, as the Indians seem to know it well and eat it.

There are no plums in the country, and but two cherries, the choke cherry, Prunus Virginiana, and the bird cherry, P. Pennsylvanica. The latter of these is the more common, especially farther northward. The fruit of the choke cherry is eaten raw by the Indians.

The most remarkable of all the fruits which grow in northern Minnesota are the blue-berries or huckleberries. These are all of the "low bush" or "high land" sorts. They occur almost everywhere in dry, open woods, yielding an abundance of most delicious fruits. The species are two, Vaccinium Canadense and V. Pennsylvanicum. The latter is much the more common. At one place in the crevices of bare rocks I found another sort with jet black and very sweet fruit, apparently a variety of V. Pennsylvanicum. These blue-berries, especially V. Pennsylvanicum, furnish a wonderful example of the dwarfing influence of high latitudes and the consequent increase in productiveness. At Lansing, Mich., they grow from two to three feet high, bearing a few scattered, dry, insipid little berries. On an island in the international channel, I found V. Pennsylvanicum growing by the acre, not over six or eight inches high, and bearing a profusion of closely-packed racemes two inches long. I could pick the berries by the half-handful at a time. They were very large, many of them measuring one-and-two-thirds inches in circumference! Their flavor was very rich and aromatic, and the skin tender. I think that they were the most delicious wild fruits I ever ate. So far as possible, I secured seeds of these and all other fruits for planting in our experimental gardens. There were no grapes in the country.

—L. H. Bailey Jr. in the American Garden.

Cattle Ranches.—A Wyoming rancher says: In choosing a range a novice would be likely to prefer a level plain, where grass could grow in all places, but old cattlemen prefer a rolling country, with high bluffs here and there. The reason is that snow is likely to cover the entire surface of a level plain, but is nearly certain to be blown from the tops and at least one side of hills, leaving the grass bare. A cow is not an animal of remarkable intellectual attainments, and will starve when the ground is covered with now an inch deep, it never seeming to occur to it that a few strokes of its hoofs would uncover the grass. A horse or mule will do this, but it seems beyond a cow's reasoning powers. High bluffs give excellent shelter in storms, and prevent cattle from drifting. As to climate, a cow can live wherever a buffalo can, and any range formerly habited by the buffalo is a good one for cattle.

—Accidents with Pistols.—A sad accident is recorded by the papers as having occurred at Dayton, Alabama; where some children were playing with an old pistol. One of the boys had loaded the pistol to shoot a rabbit. He afterwards laid the weapon, which had not been discharged, on the mantel in the room of his sisters. A day or two afterwards, while the girls were dressing to go to a party, another brother, who did not know of the pistol being loaded, playfully snapped it at one of his sisters, and the ball went through her heart, killing her instantly.

On this circumstance The Christian Statesman says: "The pistol is out of place in civilized society. It is an odious and mischievous relic of barbarism. Its most terrible fruits are not, as in the foregoing instance, the purely accidental sacrifice of life, but the murders for the commission of which it affords the ready means and the continual temptation. Enlightened legislation will yet prohibit the manufacture and sale of pistols, and perhaps other firearms, as needless and mischievous implements of death."

—Doctrine of Apostolical Succession.—The light value placed on this matter by the Reformed Episcopalians is shown by the following extract from one of their organs: "Ever since Dr. Muhlenberg said, when hearing of the action of Bishop Cummins, 'the succession has gotten out,' the question of that succession has been one of far more importance to Protestant Episcopalians than to us. That we have got the real thing there can be no doubt, but that it has done us any good, more than it has done to those who have so highly valued it, may be very seriously questioned."

"Is it not time that Christians should pass by such puerilities and concern themselves with the far graver matters which press so urgently upon all those who have experienced the great salvation there is in Christ, and the responsibilities which that salvation imposes upon them?"—The Episcopal Recorder.

—Association for Colored Orphans.—The Fifty-first Annual Report of this useful institution, under the care of Women Friends of Philadelphia, shows that "The Shelter," as the home for those who are being trained by it is termed, still continues to be occupied by its little tenants, who are kindly watched over and carefully instructed. The number of children at the commencement of last year was 83, and at the close 75. There had been no death among them during the year.

—Saloon Influence in New York City.—The Secretary of the Church Temperance Society of New York, has published a statement which the Evening Post has investigated and believes to be substantially correct, that there are in the city limits 8,688 licensed saloons, and 511 stores which sell liquors, which is an average of one saloon to 28 voters. This does not include the numerous places where liquor is sold without license. The Christian Advocate says if these liquor shops were all placed in line, they would give an unbroken front of more than 38 miles: It adds the following comments: "The power exerted by these saloons is greater than all other powers put together, and it is an almost unmixed power for evil. Each saloon-keeper has a retinue of impecunious patrons ready to do his bidding. There are other forces that rule in the city of New York, but no one force is as great as that of the saloon."

Christian humility is a state in which, of all others, man can most acceptably approach the Lord's presence. Then let us all sink deeply into it.

The Light of Christ in man, as the manifestation of God's love for man's happiness, is the peculiar testimony and characteristic of the people called Quakers; their great fundamental in religion; that by which they have been distinguished from other professors in their time, and to which they refer all people about faith, worship and practice, both in their ministry and writings; that as the fingers shoot out of the hand, and the branches from the body of the tree, so true religion, in all the parts and articles of it, springs from this Divine principle in man. —Wm. Penn.

THE FRIEND.

FOURTH MONTH 9, 1887.

In one of the Exchanges which come to the office of "The Friend," an anecdote was recently published of a young woman, under conviction for sin, who was advised by the preacher, simply to substitute her own name for the words, "world" and "whosoever," in the text, "God so loved the world that He gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believed in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life." The result was, an assurance in her own mind that she was saved.

Similar incidents are frequently to be met with; but in many cases they do not convey to the mind of the thoughtful reader that assurance of safety and salvation, which some teachers of the people seek to inspire. For in endeavoring to apply such advice to his own case, the important practical question comes to the mind of such an inquirer, am I such a believer in Christ as the text here speaks of? The outward facts recorded in the Scriptures of truth may be believed by me, just as I would believe any other well-authenticated historical narrative. The doctrines taught therein I may accept, as I would those of a treatise on philosophy to which my own reason responded. But both of these acts of my mind may be performed without that change of heart which our Saviour declared to be necessary, when He said, "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of Heaven."

Our Saviour further declared, that no man could come to Him, except through the drawing of the Father; and this coming means far more than that historical belief which results from the action of reason alone. It must flow from the submission of the heart to that Divine power, which in great love and compassion is extended to every man, condemning for sin, leading to repentance and amendment of life, enabling the humble recipient to overcome temptation, purging out sin and corruption, and bringing into closer and closer union with God and Christ.

It is to those who thus walk in the light of God, that the promise is given, that they shall know the blood of Christ to cleanse them from all sin.

The woman referred to in the commencement of this article may have known a measure of this true religious experience, and may have had good ground for believing that she had entered the "narrow way" which leadeth to life eternal; but if her life was spared, she would find that constant watchfulness, and a steady warfare against "the world, the flesh and the devil," must be maintained, to keep from falling away. It is a dangerous kind of teaching, which leads people to place their hopes on Scripture promises without fulfilling the requisite conditions; and which leaves out of view the conflicts and humiliations that attend the Christian's course.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The public debt statement shows a reduction of $12,808,467 during Third Month. Total cash in the Treasury, $453,117,086.

The Secretary of the Interior has requested the Secretary of War to place the western portion of the Indian Territory, including Oklahoma, "under the jurisdiction and control of a single army officer, with instructions to exercise extreme vigilance in the matter of preventing an expected invasion of the Territory by boomers during the coming spring and summer."

The New York World is astonishing its brother journalists with some striking statistics as to the still steady growth of its enormous circulation. For example, during the quarter ending Third Month 31st, the total number of copies printed was 18,913,073, against 15,997,450 the corresponding period last year, a gain equal to about a million a month. During the Third Month alone the number of copies printed was 6,791,273, which is a greater circulation than the paper had for the entire year of 1882.

The six thousand or more carpenters in Chicago went on strike on the morning of the 4th instant, for eight hours and 35 cents per hour. Of nearly 400 employers in that city, only 90 have expressed a willingness to come to terms with the men.

The winter now about closed was, by all testimony, the hardest ever experienced by the rugged Maine lumbermen. A man who is employed as a scaler says, he was three days coming twenty-eight miles on foot. The path on which he travelled was higher than the snow on each side. He says if he swerved six inches to the right or left he went down his full length, and that he had to crawl back on his hands and knees to the road. Every little way he would come across a horse or a pair of horses that had got out of the road. A place had been shovelled for them to stand and a bough house built over them, and there they were left to wait for a claw, or a freezing that would bear them. He overtook a man who had his horse loaded on a sled and ten men hauling him. Sled-loads of supplies were left in the road, the horses taken off, a place dug for them in the snow, and fed from the supplies of flour, meal, or anything that a horse could eat.

John Godfrey Saxe, the Vermont poet, died in Albany, N. Y., on the 31st of Third Month. He was in the 71st year of his age.

The Senate of New York, on the 31st ultimo, passed the Crosby High License bill by a vote of 18 to 14, and the bill now goes to the Governor. Two Republicans voted with the Democrats against the bill.

The saloon-keeper in Maine is likely to travel a thorny path under the new feature of the Prohibition law there. He cannot sell liquor without a United States license, and under the new State law, the possession of a United States license is all the evidence required to convict him of being a rumrunner. The books of the internal revenue officers are open to public inspection, and the moment the saloon-keeper takes out a United States license he pleads guilty of breaking the State law.

Nineteen families in three precincts of Calhoun Co., Texas, are reported to be "in a condition of starvation, occasioned by the drought." The report is verified by affidavits from leading citizens.

On the 4th instant, Edwin H. Fittler was inaugurated Mayor of this city, to which office he was elected in the Second Month last. Henceforth the sole executive power will be vested in the Mayor, who is authorized to appoint a Director of the Department of Public Safety, a Director of the Department of Public Works, and a President and four Directors comprising the Board of Public Charities and Correction.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 441, which was 32 less than during the previous week, and 19 less than during the corresponding period last year. Of the whole number 214 were males and 227 females: 243 adults and 198 minors: 51 died of consumption; 44 of pneumonia; 38 of diseases of the heart; 23 of old age; 22 of inflammation of the brain; 18 of convulsions; 15 of bronchitis; 15 of apoplexy; 14 of marasmus; and 12 of croup.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½'s, 110; 4's, 129; 3's, 100½; currency 6's, 126½ a 137.

Cotton was quiet but steady, at 10½ cts. for middling uplands.

Petroleum was quiet at 6½ cts. for 70 Abel test in barrels, and 8½ cts. for 110 test in cases. Opened, 63½; closed, 63½. Highest, 63½; lowest, 63½.

Flour and Meal.—Flour ruled steady, but demand was principally to meet the immediate requirements of the home trade. Sales of 125 barrels Pennsylvania family, at $3.75; 125 barrels Pennsylvania, roller straight, at $4.25; 125 barrels Ohio, clear, at $4; 250 barrels do. straight, $4.40; 125 barrels Indiana straight, at $4.25; 375 barrels winter patent, at $4.65 a $4.75; 125 barrels Minnesota, clear, at $4, and 625 barrels do. patent, at $4.70 a $4.90. Rye flour was quoted at $2.85 per barrel for choice.

Grain.—Wheat was fairly active, No. 2 red closing at 89½ a 89½ cts. Rye was dull and quoted at 53 cts. for No. 2 Pennsylvania. Corn was quiet; No. 2 mixed closing at 46 a 46½ cts. Oats were quiet but steady: No. 2 white closed at 36½ a 36½ cts.

Beef cattle were fairly active and firm, at 4 a 5½ cts. Sheep were active and ¼c. higher, at 42 a 6½ cts. Lambs were active at 5½ a 7½ cts.

Hogs were active and ¼c. lower: Western, 8½ a 8½c.

FOREIGN.—On the 28th and 29th of last month, W. E. Gladstone, in the British House of Commons, strongly opposed some of the positions taken in the Government Coercion act. The strength of his reasoning was admitted by the Conservatives, and keenly felt by the Unionist Liberals. On the 31st, it was announced that the cabinet had decided to abandon that clause of the bill which provides for the changing of the venue from Dublin to London in certain classes of criminal trials, thus practically removing the greatest cause of the Liberal-Unionists' opposition to the bill.

On the 1st instant, closure was carried by a vote of 361 to 253, and the first reading of the Coercion bill was agreed upon without division. All the members on the front Opposition bench, with Gladstone leading, left the House, followed by a large body of Liberals.

The prosecution against Dillon, O'Brien, Crilly and Redmond for their connection with the plan of campaign, has been abandoned.

Legislation for Alsace-Lorraine is to be again delegated to the Reichstag. A bill will shortly be introduced to restore the status existing prior to 1879. The autonomous legislation of the Provincial Committee and the Secretaryship of State are to be abolished. If the Provincial administration be modelled after the Prussian Provincial Governorships, the post of Statthalter will become doubtful. While France discusses Germany's permanent possession of Alsace-Lorraine, Germany desires greater security against French agitation.

Antoine, a delegate elected for Alsace-Lorraine to the German Reichstag, has been expelled from the German Empire, on account of his hostility to the Government. The circumstance has caused a profound sensation in Paris.

Advices received in Berlin from St. Petersburg, fully confirm the report that another attempt has been made upon the life of the Czar. It is learned that on the 29th ultimo, while the Czar was exercising in the park connected with the Gatschina Palace, he was fired upon by an officer of the army, the ball passing close to his person. The officer was immediately seized by attendants and imprisoned.

A wholesale merchant of St. Petersburg, reputed to be worth millions, has been shot and killed by a man to whom he refused to give 80,000 roubles towards the Nihilist fund. The murderer has been arrested. Other Russian capitalists are fearful of suffering a similar fate. They are receiving letters threatening them with immediate death if they do not comply with demands to furnish money for "the common cause."

Three cases of Asiatic cholera have been discovered in Pesth, Austria, and the nature of the malady in each has been clearly established. Much alarm prevails in consequence.

According to a telegram from Quebec, the snow blockade on the Intercolonial Railway is "unprecedented," and all travel on the road is stopped. There is also a snow blockade on the Canadian Pacific Railway.

W. E. Whitcher, ex-Commissioner of the Dominion Fisheries, has published a letter in Ottawa in regard to the construction of that part of the Treaty of 1818, covering the rights of American fishermen in Canadian ports. Whitcher says that "such a thing as preventing people from selling bait to Americans, or preventing the latter from purchasing it, was never contemplated. What the framers of the treaty designed to do was to prevent American fishermen from fishing for bait, with seines or otherwise, within the three-mile limit."

The Eighteenth Annual Meeting of the Indian Aid Association of Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, will be held in Arch Street Meeting-house, Philadelphia, on Fifth-day, Fourth Mo. 21st, 1887, at 8 P. M. Friends generally are invited to attend.

RICHARD CADBURY, Clerk.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

A Stated Meeting of the Committee having charge of the Boarding School at Westtown, will be held in Philadelphia on Seventh-day, the 16th instant, at 2.30 P. M.

The Visiting Committee will meeting at the school on Third-day the 12th inst. Conveyances will meet trains leaving Broad St. Station at 2.47 and 4.55 P. M. Fourth Mo. 1887. WM. EVANS, Clerk.

Friends attending the Yearly Meeting can be furnished with simple meals, both before and after the sittings of the meeting, at moderate charge (15 cents) in the second story of the central part of the Arch Street Meeting-house. Meals will also be furnished for those attending the Meeting for Sufferings and the Select Meeting, the previous week.

FRIENDS' LIBRARY.

No. 142 NORTH SIXTEENTH STREET.

In Tenth Month last, the Committee of the three city Monthly Meetings issued an address in relation to the Library Building, then approaching completion, and the provision that had been made for receiving meeting and kindred records on deposit. Since that time alterations have been made in the building to meet certain criticisms, and it has been furnished and opened. The record room has been shelved in such a way as to give each book the exclusive use of a pigeon-hole, in which it will be labeled and placed on its side. This will preserve the books much better than the usual plan of standing erect and will facilitate research.

As the Yearly Meeting has recently supplied the Monthly Meetings with new books for recording births, marriages and deaths, this appears to be a suitable time for depositing all records not in use, including minutes, in a central and safe place.

Over 100 volumes having already been received from five of the Quarterly Meetings, interested Friends are invited to inspect the premises on Third-day, the 19th inst., from 3 to 6 P. M. The undersigned will be present and explain the arrangements, which can be recommended with confidence.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

Until further notice the stage will connect with the 7.02 and 9.03 morning trains from Broad St., to convey passengers to the School; and at other times when timely notice is sent to J. G. WILLIAMS, Supt.

MARRIED, Third Month 17th, 1887, at the young woman's parents, in a meeting held by appointment of Young St. Meeting, Canada, JOSEPH HENDERSON of Norwich, to ANNA PENNINA, daughter of Joslua and Asenath H. Clayton.

DIED, on the 27th of Ninth Month, 1886, at his residence in Media, Delaware Co., Pa., JACOB SMEDLEY, in the 85th year of his age. He was an elder and member of Chester Monthly Meeting of Friends, Pa.

—, on the 18th of Third Month last, MARY W. PEROT, widow of the late William S. Perot, in the 83d year of her age, a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia.

—, at his residence in West Philadelphia, on the 18th ultimo, RICHARD LINDSEY NICHOLSON, in the 57th year of his age, a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia.

—, at her residence, near Muscatine, Iowa, on the morning of the 22d of Third Mo. 1887, LYDIA THOMPSON, aged 82 years, a member and elder of Muscatine Monthly Meeting. This aged pilgrim bore a weight of suffering for many years, as only the Christian can. She longed to depart and be with Jesus, and we doubt not is now enjoying the presence of her Saviour.

—, in Tuckerton, N. J., Third Month 29th, 1887, MARY BARTLETT, a member of Little Egg Harbor Monthly and Particular Meeting, in the 74th year of her age.

—, Third Month 30th, 1887, KESIAH, wife of John R. Brown, in the 71st year of her age, a member of Salem Monthly Meeting of Friends, Iowa. Her health had been failing for several months; her quiet and guarded life gave evidence that her day's work was going on with the day. She was strongly attached to the principles of Friends, and her diligence in the attendance of our religious meetings, when very feeble in health, was truly exemplary. Though unable to converse with her family and friends during the progress of the disease, they have the consoling hope that their loss is her eternal gain. Truly a pious, benevolent and virtuous mother is gone.

Selections from the Diary of Abigail W. Hall.

Third Mo. 21st, 1853. A beautiful spring morning. Oh, that I were more fully prepared to enjoy the beauties and bounties of a kind Providence! yea, not only enjoy, but return thanks unto Him, whose mercies are new unto us every morning. Aspire, O my soul, more and more after holiness; without which we cannot see the Lord, nor his wonders, neither his wonderful works to the children of men.

24th. Fifth-day afternoon.—Awoke this morning under feelings of depression, remembering it was meeting day, and that I had not wherewith to “come before the Lord, or to bow myself,” &c. Unexpectedly was brought to remembrance the fowls “which have neither store-house nor barn, and yet God feedeth them.” It did a little revive, yet still a feeling of great poverty attended, and continued to attend throughout our silent sitting together. Near the close of the meeting remembered the language of Queen Esther: “I have not been invited unto the king now for these thirty days.” Oh? that I may yet find favor, and be allowed to speak to the King immortal, and to plead for myself and people.

28th. It is of the Lord’s mercies that we are not consumed, because his compassions fail not. With thankfulness, may I acknowledge the favors of yesterday; and which through mercy are still extended, even that feeling which hath no fellow—quietness and peacefulness. Oh how precious! may I do nothing to dissipate it. Set a watch, O Lord! before my mouth, keep the door of my lips.

Had the company and labors of our dear friend Samuel Cope, at both our morning and afternoon meetings. He was accompanied by his wife, who is a precious friend, and one I much love. In the morning Samuel spoke, not lengthy, yet excellently and suitably to the children; and that which they could all understand. I could travail with him in his exercise; and oh! the desires I felt that the “word might not return void;” believing it was the language of the Spirit unto us, or the bread of our Heavenly Father’s preparing. I felt through our morning meeting, my spirit burdened and exercised; and again in our afternoon gathering. In great fear, I once more ventured forth. Eye thy leader, seemed the command from on high, and I will help thee. Some little stepping stones were shown, which encouraged, and I followed on, the dear Master going before, at least so it seemed to me. Can I be deceived! Didst thou not, O Heavenly Father! support and help? It was but little that was called for; but to me it seemed much. If what was offered was accepted, I asked in humility and fear an evidence: even that our dear friend S. C. might follow! He did so, carrying out my exercise. It was as a little seal; and all I asked for. How my spirit was broken and humbled under a sense of the Lord’s tender mercies still extended, in order to help, strengthen and uphold! Follow on, oh my soul!

[While this answer to her entreaties, with others in these Selections, could not but be comforting and encouraging to our dear friend, being perhaps granted in condescension to her weak faith—and there are not a few examples of such tender dealing recorded for our learning in the Holy Scriptures—yet it will not be wise for all, thus to wait and look for similar outward confirmation of their vocal exercises being in the right line, even so far as being owned by solid experienced Friends may go. No two are taught and proven precisely in the same school; for “there are diversities of gifts” and “differences of administration” in the Divine economy, and have been from the beginning. Thus the heavenly condescension shown to Moses, to Gideon, to doubting Thomas, with others also of Scripture record, was not manifested to all. Such examples are truly encouraging to the humble, faithful, Christian pilgrim, who, trusting to the grace and mercy, and seeking the glory of Him, who putteth forth and goeth before, know Him to be their ever-present and all-sufficient Counsellor unto eternal life.]

Fourth Mo. 1st. Yesterday was our Monthly Meeting. It was a season with me, in which flesh could not glory. I struggled indeed for my life, through the forepart, against apathy and deadness. Unexpectedly to myself, the words were sounded, “Arise, O thou sleeper, and call upon thy God, if so be we perish not.” It seemed to me, this was to be sounded in order to arouse some of us, who were sitting in an easy, indifferent, unconcerned state, while others had been toiling and rowing. For these, the word of encouragement arose, to look and trust to that God who was mighty to save, and able to deliver even unto the uttermost. A little more presented, but fearing to exceed what was given, I here stopped.

Fifth Mo. 12th. Help me, if consistent with thy most holy will, to bring the dear children unto thee. It seemed as though I could almost see, this morning, during our silent sitting together, thy hand extended to bless and to gather the children; and all who are willing to become as such.

16th. Endeavored throughout yesterday to know and keep my place. An exercise of spirit prevailed through both our morning and afternoon meeting, that I may be made a living worshipper, even in spirit and in truth; for such the Father seeketh to worship Him. Then, as regards opening my lips in public, may I be kept! Suffer me not, O Heavenly Father! to speak one word unless thou biddest. And if it please thee thus to make use of me, a poor unworthy creature, strengthen me, I pray thee, to go forth in thy fear, nothing doubting. “My words,” said our blessed Master, “are spirit, and they are life.” Let such alone proceed from me, with no mixture of the creature. That thou alone may be glorified, humble and lay low every thing that pertaineth not to thee: for I sensibly feel that self must be more and more slain. Remembering the Scripture: “Sell all that thou hast, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven.”

19th. It is with gratitude I acknowledge the goodness and mercy of my God. My mind during our sitting together in our meeting was favored with stillness. Oh! how sweetly and comfortingly, near the close, was this language of the Psalmist sounded: “The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: He leadeth me beside the still waters,” &c. The intimation seemed to be to revive it; which I did, fearing not. Trust I did not do wrong, from the feeling which attends since being quiet and peaceful. Upon retiring to my room after meeting, and opening Friends’ Library Vol. XI, at an Epistle of John Burryeat, my eyes unexpectedly lighted on these words: “He that continues unto the end, shall be saved; and he that is faithful unto death, shall have the crown of life.” It seemed encouraging, and as such I received it.

Sixth Mo. 13th. In my distress, upon taking up a book to read, my attention was unexpectedly arrested with these words of Henry Tuke: “I can say that I sympathize with thee in thy various exercises, from within and without; but thus it behooves some to suffer, that they may be the better qualified to speak a word in due season, to the weary traveller; and patiently undergoing the various exercises allotted in Infinite Wisdom, may experience them ultimately to terminate in the increase of joy and peace. One thing I find, that the longer I live, the more I am reduced to that state which breathes the language: Lord I am a child; sometimes with an addition like that of, I cannot speak; though at others the more resigned language will prevail: Take me and lead me where thou wouldst have me to go.”

This last expression of our friend is, I think I can say, the sincere breathing of my burdened soul. If baptisms being passed through, are preparatory for cleansing and purifying the vessel, so that one of honor unto thee may be brought forth, O Heavenly Father! sustain I pray thee through and over all, that I may be what I am unto Thee.

[A. W. H., under date of Sixth Mo. 16th, thus intercedes for the dear children so responsibly placed under her care: “Keep them, O Heavenly Father! as lambs of thy fold and sheep of thy pasture! Strengthen the feeblest aspiration after Thee! Preserve them in the way they should go! And for us who are placed over them, keep us, we pray thee, in Thy fear and guidance, that so we may be as way-marks, and ensamples to the flock."]

19th. Our morning meeting just closed. While I have found it needful to speak to some of the dear children respecting their behavior therein, my own condition seems the most pitiable. Oh! the struggle for life throughout the meeting. Surely there is nothing tends more to humble, and to show unto us our dependent condition, than to be thus left to ourselves—to feel our weaknesses, and to contend with our soul's adversary. May it tend to more close searchings of heart, with sincere and fervent breathings to be helped and kept.

Seventh Mo. 4th. Endeavored throughout our meeting yesterday to maintain the patient struggle; no light as yet dawning on my path. Felt afraid in the evening that my strength was lessened by not keeping patient enough under provocation—one of the children behaving to me very unhandsofly. Before retiring to rest, the child condemned her conduct and desired to be excused. I found that I, too, had something to do. May more watchfulness mark my steps. Think I can say, that sincere desires have been raised, to be found living daily and hourly, as in the sight of my Heavenly Father. To feel no condemnation, and an assurance that come the midnight cry when it may, all will be well; what a support in the hour of extremity! May I witness more of the Lord's preserving power to attend. Keep me continually, O Heavenly Father! being afresh made sensible I cannot keep myself one moment.

5th. Favored last night with a quiet comfortable rest. Oh! that my heart was more alive to gratitude, for the many and multiplied favors and blessings showered down upon me.

Wanderings in China.—No. 1.

A book with the above title, written by Constant F. Gordon Cumming, abounds in interesting details which give much insight into the domestic life, and peculiar superstitions of the people of China, and which explain some things that seem strange to those who have been brought up under different influences. From its pages the following information is condensed:

The interest of the streets of Canton cannot be surpassed, though most of them are dirty and all are narrow, some being only about six feet wide! and many not exceeding eight feet! Even this is further reduced by the singular but very effective manner of hanging out sign-boards at right angles to the shops, some suspended like the signs of old English inns, and some set upright in carved and gilded stands at the corners of the shop. They are just great planks, ten to fifteen feet in height, some black, some scarlet, some blue, some white, and a few green, and on which are embossed strange characters in scarlet or gold, which, though perhaps really merely stating the name of the shop, appear to our ignorant eyes both beautiful and mysterious!

Some shops hang up a great pasteboard model of their principal goods: a satin skull-cap or a conical straw hat denote a hatter, a shoe for a shoemaker, a fan or an umbrella for the seller of these; a huge pair of spectacles or a great gilded dragon, each convey their invitation to all comers. Some streets are all given over to the workers in one trade—they are all ivory-carvers, or coffin-makers, or purveyors of strange offerings for the dead or for the gods.

I believe the chief secret of the fascination of these streets lies in the fact that you see right into every shop, so that whenever you can turn your eyes aside from looking right along the street, and can gaze either to right or left, each shop frontage of ten feet reveals a scene which would make the fortune of the artist who could render it faithfully.

Here a shop is not merely a receptacle of articles for sale, it is also a manufactory, where, if you have leisure to linger, you can watch each process from the beginning; and if the various things in common use among these strange people strike us as quaint, much more curious is it to see them actually made.

Moreover, limited as is the space in these tiny shops, each has at least three shrines set apart for family worship. At the threshold is a tablet to the Earth Gods, before which, on certain evenings, are set red tapers and incense sticks. Within the home are the Ancestral Tablets, and the altar of the Kitchen God, each of which requires many offerings and an ever-burning light. A vast multitude of shops have also an altar to the God of Wealth.

The names of the streets are touchingly allegorical. Here is the street of Everlasting Love, the street of Ten Thousandfold Peace, of Benevolence and Love, of Accumulated Blessings, of a Thousand Beatitudes. Special streets are consecrated to "the Saluting Dragon," "the Dragon in Repose," "the Ascending Dragon." A peculiarly unfragrant street, in this unsavory city, is characterized as the "Street of Refreshing Breezes!" The value attached to numerous descendants is suggested by the streets of "One Hundred Grandsons," and the still more auspicious "One Thousand Grandsons."

Picture to yourself a vast city, with miles and miles of such streets, all so narrow, that the blue sky overhead seems but a strip, which in many places is shut out by screens of matting or boarding, extending from roof to roof, casting deep shadows which intensify the wealth of color below.

The streets are paved with long, narrow stone slabs, but with no causeway for foot passengers, for riders are few and far between: and as to chairs, they block up the streets, so that the patient crowd must step close to the shops to let them pass. With the exception of a few wealthy tradesmen, who indulge in silks and satins of divers colors, all the crowd are dressed in blue, and all alike have quaintly shaven heads, and a long plait of glossy black hair, which for convenience is sometimes twined round the head during work, but must always hang full length when in presence of a superior. A closely fitting black satin skull-cap is apparently an essential part of the costume of a well-dressed tradesman or domestic servant. There is no drowsiness here—all are intent on their own business, and hurry to and fro, yet never seem to jostle or even touch one another.

The multitude of busy tradesmen hurry along, each carrying on his shoulder a pole, from which are suspended his very varied goods.

Thus a confectioner, or baker, has two large boxes, with trays of good things; a fishmonger carries two large flat tubs full of live fish, that most in favor being a long, narrow, flat fish, resembling a silver sword; or perhaps he carries two trays of bleeding fish, cut up into portions suited to the humblest purses, and smeared with blood to make them look fresh and inviting. The stationary fishmongers keep their fresh-water fish alive in tubs, which are not only full of water, but through which a running stream is made to trickle ceaselessly. The locomotive butcher likewise has two trays of raw meat, divided into infinitesimal portions of dubious animals. The gardener brings his flowers and vegetables slung in two large flat baskets, the artificial florist carries his in a box with trays, and rings a sort of small bell as he goes along; and the barber carries his quaint scarlet stool, brass basin, and razors, ready to do any amount of shaving and hair-dressing in the open street.

One singular feature in the streets of Canton is the multitude of blind beggars, who go about in strings of eight or ten together—literally the blind leading the blind. I met a gentleman the other day who assured me that he once saw six hundred of these blind beggars, all assembled to share a beneficent distribution of rice.

We passed by exchanges of money, whose sign is a huge string of gilt cash like those in use here, and which are worth about a thousand to a dollar; and we lingered long, watching jewelers making exquisite ornaments of kingfisher's feathers, green and blue, inlaid like enamel on a gold ground. A few steps further we paused beside an ivory-carver, producing the most delicate and costly work, undisturbed by passers-by. Next we halted to see the processes of rice being husked and pounded by foot-mills, and wheat ground to flour by bullocks turning grindstones which are placed one above the other. The oxen are blindedfolded to save them from giddiness.

It was so odd to be standing in the street and to look in at a narrow frontage, past a party of men quietly dining, and to see away into the long perspective of a far back store, wherein at least a dozen of these primitive bullock-mills were working in a line. Beyond the blue haze and gloom of this interior we could see bright sunlight in the inner court, where the women were spinning cotton. Then we turned into a glass-blower's house, and watched the glass being blown into the form of a huge globe, and afterwards cut in pieces and flattened in a furnace.

Another whole street is devoted solely to the sale of feathers of all sorts—but especially of peacocks and pheasants, chiefly those of the silvery Amherst pheasant, which is found on the Yang-foo River, and the Reeves pheasant; the male bird of the latter has two beautiful feathers of extraordinary length (from four to five feet) which are worn on the stage by actors as a head decoration.

We saw a gay marriage party, the bride's chair gorgeous with scarlet and gold, and her wedding gifts carried in scarlet boxes, all supposed to be full. Soon after we met a great procession in honor of some idols, which were conveyed along in gaudy cars, and preceded by crowds of small boys carrying lanterns and banners. Then a funeral overtook us, with mourners all dressed in white, bearing the dead in the massive wooden coffin which had probably been given him many years previously by his dutiful children, and which even now was not on its way to burial, but to be laid in the City of the Dead, there to remain in its own hired house, rented at so much a month, perhaps for years, till the priests choose to announce that the auspicious moment for burial has at length arrived, when it may be laid in a horse-shoe-shaped tomb on some bleak hillside.

It is very true that morality is inseparable from the gospel, but it is equally true that it is not the gospel itself. They should be distinguished but not divided. We have no reason to expect Christ's presence, but where his gospel is.—Selected.

Ancient Advices.

From Friends of the Yearly Meeting held in Philadelphia the 18th of Seventh Mo. 1745. To women Friends of the Quarterly and Monthly Meetings belonging thereunto.

This meeting being under a weighty concern for the promotion of Truth, and increase of obedience to ancient principles of self-denial, recommends the reading of former advices from this meeting against pride and superfluity in garb, language, and manners, that our primitive plainness may still distinguish us from such as have a life in the customs and vain fashions of this world. Remembering our forefathers and elders in Christ were called unto holiness, and suffered great persecution, for that which some in our day thinks little of. Let us but consult the dictates of the Spirit of Christ, which is one in all; and as many as are governed by it, are careful they do not offend in any branch of the testimony our worthy ancients had to bear. We tenderly advise to a diligent attendance of religious meetings to wait upon God; from the neglect of which necessary duty proceeds a lukewarm disposition and declension from the way of Truth. Be careful likewise, we entreat, not only to attend yourselves, but bring your children and families with you, even while young. Signed by order of said meeting.

MARY JORDAN, Clerk.

And now dear friends and sisters, you that are or may be overseers in your particular meetings, be not discouraged, neither regard the hard speeches or reflections you may meet withal, but let your eye be to the Lord, and the bent and concern of your minds be for the honor of his name, and for the exaltation of his blessed Truth; and herein take courage in the Lord Jehovah, in whom is everlasting strength; that so in the spirit of meekness and love, and wisdom of God, you may reprove and admonish all within your limits that walk not according to Truth, either in life and conversation, or apparel, and the God of all our sure mercies bless your labors therein, is the earnest travail of our spirits.

Signed in behalf and by appointment of said meeting by HANNAH HILL, Clerk.

The Catacombs.

Underlying the Campagna, west and southwest of the Imperial city, and within six miles of its walls, are the hidden resting places of the early Christians. Of Greek derivation, the name denotes the depressed surface of the ground beneath which these passages were tunneled. To the passer-by along either the Via Appia or Nomentana, there is nothing to indicate the vast realms of the dead which, like the buried cities of Campania, were for six centuries wholly unknown—an accidental discovery made in 1578, revealing to the amazed inhabitants of Rome the existence of other cities concealed beneath their own suburbs.

By a flight of some twenty stone steps, you descend from the glowing sunshine of the Campagna to the murky gloom of the hidden cemeteries, of which there are some 45, which, with an average width of 2 by 3 feet, and a height of 5 feet, diverge in labyrinthine paths whose combined length is over 545 miles.

The rock in which these subterranean galleries are hewn, is the granular tufa of igneous formation—softer than the stony tufa overlaying it; and more compact than the sandy stratum in which the arenaria are found, the latter being totally distinct from the catacombs, which have been supposed by some to have been an accumulation of these previously existing sandpits for burial purposes.

On either wall of these subterranean aisles are horizontal recesses, varying with the age of the occupant, and parallel with the tunnel.

Antedating, as well as including, the persecution of the Caesars, the Catacombs were the chosen cemeteries of those who, unlike the Roman of that age, deposited not the ashes but the bodies of their dead.

In some certain instances these subterranean galleries are found underlying each other in successive layers, in some cases seven deep. Such was the value of ground near a city of two millions, that the abodes of the dead were built downward, as in these days. By the same cause, the houses of the living are lifted by as many or even more stories into the air.

"The end," writes Mommsen, "of the Catacomb graves is connected with the end of the powerful city. Poverty took the place of wealth, and the wasted Campagna now offered room enough, without descending far below the surface."

Guarded by Roman law, which reserved the right of visiting the sepulchre, even when the property on which it stood had been alienated, the Christian cemeteries were comparatively free from desecration, thus proving safe harbors in times of persecution. That they served this end is confirmed by the broken flights of steps, as if to elude pursuit, as well as by the intercommunication which was secured by opening before separated catacombs, so that the fugitives could pass from one to the other.

Now and then one sees widened spaces by which chapels were formed for the brief worship of the dauntless refugees.

"Miles upon miles of graves,
Leagues upon leagues of tombs,
The cross upon each conqueror's brow,
Lights up the Catacombs."

Seven millions of these loculi or resting places (for the Christians laid to rest, while the Pagan buried his dead) have already been brought to light.

To what magnitude must the early Church have grown within less than four centuries, after the Missionary Apostle offered up his life on the spot beyond the Southern Gate, which is now known as the Tre Fontano!

Priceless lessons are, to all time, to be learned from this "Pompeii of ancient Christianity," as Stanley has characterized the Catacombs.

More eloquent than the classic marbles that grace the galleries of Rome, and which were brought to the World's Capital from the plundered museums of peace, are the rude inscriptions, that were often only scratched upon the stone slabs that sealed the now empty loculi, which once held all that on earth was dearest to the hounded disciples of the Nazarene.

The hidden life to which these inscriptions witness, tells us that the lone procession, that, guided by the dim torch, threaded these narrow subterranean streets, was mightier than the proud legions which, in the clear light of an Italian sun, marched along the Appian Way, on their triumphant return from world-wide conquests.

Would you know the spirit of these witnesses who endured to the end "for his sake?" Ascend the magnificent stairway of the Vatican. Upon one side are the marbles stripped from the now dismantled tombs that line the Via Appia for a distance of five miles from its exit out of the Porta Sebastiano.

Tenderly do these pagan marbles breathe the universal sorrow that attests the kinship of the race—"Bene merenti"—"To the well deserving;" "Dulcissime filie;" "To the sweetest daughter." Hands are clasped in a final adieu in that "Vale, vale eternum vale," that speaks no hereafter. Upon the opposite wall are emblems of a deathless faith—the shattered marbles, taken from the loculi of the Catacombs, symbols of a quenchless joy; the palm-branch; olive leaf from the land of unfretted peace; the open Bible, well read and loved; the Shepherd carrying the sheep on his shoulders; type of the infant's gentleness—rescuing from sin and death.

No emblems of suffering, not even the prized cross and crucifix, are found in these early records.

Hope, joy and rest—victorious forces—defeating Roman cruelty and death's gloom; far-seeing faith, catching the light of endless day; from the dungeon darkness of the Catacombs.—C. C. Saller, in Church Union.

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 125.

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN BELIEF AND CONVICTION.

The following incident illustrates the great difference there is between a theoretical assent of the mind to the truths of religion, and that living conviction of their reality which flows from the revelations of the Light of Christ, and the experience of his work in the heart.

A minister of great ability, who, years ago, preached in the vicinity of New York, was remarkable for the earnestness with which he set forth the doctrine of self-denial, and the cross. This was distasteful to some of his hearers, one of whom, in consequence for a long time absented himself from the congregation. One morning, he concluded again to go and hear the preacher, that he might ascertain whether his preaching was any more to his taste than formerly. The discourse was on the "narrow way, and of a new creature in Christ, or eternal condemnation." During the sermon, the question was forced on the conscience of the hearer—"How is it with myself? Does this man declare the real truth? If he does, what must inevitably follow from it?"

These thoughts took such hold on him, that he could not get rid of them in the midst of his business or amusements. He at last resolved to go to the preacher and ask him upon his conscience if he was convinced of the truth of that which he preached. He went and said to him with great earnestness, "I was one of your hearers when you spoke a short time since of the way of salvation. I confess to you, you have disturbed my peace of mind, and I cannot refrain from asking you solemnly before God and upon your conscience, if you can prove what you asserted, or whether it was unfounded alarm."

The preacher, not a little surprised, informed him that it was the doctrine of Holy Scripture, and therefore infallible truth. "What then is to become of us?" replied the visitor. The word "us" startled the preacher, but he rallied his thoughts, and began to explain the plan of salvation. But the inquirer, as though he had heard nothing of what the preacher said, interrupted him in the midst of it, and repeated with increasing emotion the anxious exclamation, "If it be truth, sir, I beseech you, what are we to do?" Terrified, the preacher thought, "We! what means this we?" But he endeavored to stifle his inward uneasiness and resumed his exhortations. Tears came into the eyes of the visitor, he smote his hands together, and exclaimed, "Sir, if it be truth, we are lost and undone!" The preacher stood, trembling and overwhelmed with astonishment. He soon, however, knelt in supplication with his visitor, after which the latter departed.

The preacher then shut himself up in his closet, and for two weeks was not seen by his congregation. He then appeared before his hearers, pale and worn by inward conflict, and acknowledged to them that before his recent experience, he had never really entered in at the strait gate. The Light of Christ had shown him in measure the difference between the wisdom of man, and the grace and power of God.

This striking narrative brings to mind the somewhat similar case of Taulerus, a celebrated preacher who resided at Strashburgh, Germany. About the year 1340, when in the height of his popularity, he became acquainted with a layman of deep religious experience, who saw that Taulerus preached from a knowledge of the Scriptures, and by the aid of his own reason; and that he knew not experimentally those truths which he so eloquently and learnedly proclaimed to the people. The labors of this layman were blessed to the opening of the eyes of his friend, who ceased for a considerable time to minister to others, and passed through a season of retirement and humiliation in which he was divinely instructed in the things of God, and prepared to speak, now in the demonstration of the Spirit, and with power. He saw that while he had proclaimed to others the necessity of self-denial and perfect submission to the Divine will, his own life had not corresponded therewith; and that to love, honor and obey God, had not been his ruling principle.

Alas, how often is it, that even in labors professedly undertaken for the glory of God, and the good of others, self-seeking enters in, and mars the service! And how apt is the Enemy of all good to suggest feelings of pride, when the servant has been helped to do his Master's will, as if somewhat of the glory belonged to him! The necessity of watching against this temptation is strongly shown by the experience of a minister from this country, who went to England on a religious visit about the year 1825. Whilst there he was much favored in his ministerial labors. The late John Barclay remarked of him, that "— — has been with us as one of our Early Friends, nay as one of the old prophets, &c." After this he went over to Ireland, and there also was favored in a remarkable manner, but suddenly, after one of his meetings, he seemed to lose all sense of religious feeling; so that his further labors were necessarily stopped, and he was compelled to return home. He returned to America on the same vessel in which he had before crossed the Atlantic; and the captain was greatly impressed with the change in his passenger. For, while he could talk intelligently of scenes and incidents in his travels, yet when anything was said on religious subjects, his mind appeared to be an entire blank. His home afterwards was with an experienced Elder, and it was his impression, as related by his daughter, from whom the account came, that when the preacher had been so highly favored in his meetings in Ireland he had taken the honor to himself, and in consequence had been smitten with this humbling dispensation spiritually, as Herod was outwardly, when he gave not God the glory. Prayer is the vital breath of faith.

GROWING OLD GRACEFULLY.

Softly, oh softly the years have swept by thee,
Touching thee lightly with tenderest care;
Sorrow and death they have often brought nigh thee,
Yet they have left thee but beauty to wear.

Growing old gracefully,
Gracefully fair.

Far from the storms that are lashing the ocean,
Nearer each day to the pleasant Home-light;
Far from the waves that are big with commotion,
Under full sail, and the harbor in sight;
Growing old cheerfully,
Cheerful and bright.

Past all the winds that were adverse and chilling,
Past all the islands that lured thee to rest,
Past all the currents that swept thee, unwilling,
Far from thy course to the Land of the Blest;
Growing old peacefully,
Peaceful and blest.

Never a feeling of envy nor sorrow
When the bright faces of children are seen;
Never a year from the young world'st thou borrow—
Thou dost remember what lieth between;
Growing old willingly,
Thankful, serene.

Rich in experience that angels might covet,
Rich in a faith that hath grown with each year,
Rich in a love that grew from, and above it,
Soothing thy sorrows and hushing each fear;
Growing old wearily,
Loving and dear.

Hearts at the sound of thy coming are lightened,
Ready and willing thy hand to relieve;
Many a face at thy kind word has brightened—
It is more blessed to give than receive;
Growing old happily,
Ceasing to grieve.

Eyes that grow dim to the earth and its glory,
Have a sweet recompense youth cannot know;
Ears that grow dull to the world and its story,
Drink in the songs that from Paradise flow;
Growing old graciously,
Purer than snow.

DISARMAMENT.

"Put up the sword!" The voice of Christ once more Speaks in the pauses of the cannon's roar,
O'er fields of corn by fiery sickles reaped
And left dry ashes; o'er trenches heaped
With nameless dead; o'er cities starving slow
Under a rain of fire; through wards of woe
Down which a groaning diapason runs
From tortured brothers, husbands, lovers, sons,
Of desolate women in their far off homes,
Waiting to hear the step that never comes!
O men and brothers! let that voice be heard;
War fails, thy peace; put up the useless sword.

Fear not the end. There is a story told
In Eastern tents, when autumn nights grow cold,
And round the fire the Mongol shepherds sit
With grave responses listening unto it;
Once, on the errands of his mercy bent,
Buddha, the holy and benevolent,
Met a fell monster, huge and fierce of look,
Whose awful voice the hills and forests shook.
"O son of peace!" the giant cried, "thy fate
Is sealed at last, and love shall yield to hate."
The unarmed Buddha, looking, with no trace
Of fear or anger, in the monster's face,
In pity said: "Poor fiend, even thee I love."
Lo! as he spake the sky-tall terror sank
To hand-breadth size; the huge abhorrence shrank
Into the form and fashion of a dove;
And where the thunder of its rage was heard
Circling above him sweetly sang the bird;
"Hate hath no harm for love," so ran the song;—
And peace unweaponed conquers every wrong.

—John G. Whittier.

DIVINE PROVIDENCE.

Weary deserts we may tread,
A dreary labyrinth may thread,
Through dark ways underground be led;
Yet if we will our Guide obey,
The dreariest path, the darkest way,
Shall issue out in heavenly day.

NOBODY KNOWS BUT MOTHER.

Nobody knows of the work it takes
To keep the home together;
Nobody knows of the steps it takes,
Nobody knows—but mother.

Nobody listens to childish woes,
Which kisses only smother;
Nobody's pained by naughty blows,
Nobody—only mother.

Nobody knows of the sleepless care,
Bestowed on baby brother;
Nobody knows of the tender prayer,
Nobody—only mother.

Nobody knows of the lesson taught
Of loving one another;
Nobody knows of the patience sought,
Nobody—only mother.

Nobody knows of the anxious fears,
Lest darling may not weather
The storm of life in after years,
Nobody knows—but mother.

Nobody kneels at the throne above
To thank the Heavenly Father,
For the sweetest gift—a mother's love;
Nobody can—but mother.

Gain.

"Character is every thing," said an American statesman, when dying and glancing back over an eventful life. "He that overcometh shall inherit all things" is an eternal law.

A paper passing under our eye brings an illustration of the truth before us in a pleasing manner.

"Shine, sir?"

And a bright, manly-looking lad of nine summers stepped up to a gentleman in the Grand Central Depot, New York, and casting his large brown eyes up into his face, asked, "Shine, sir?"

"I want my shoes polished," said the gentleman.

"Then I would be glad to shine them, sir," replied the boy.

"Have I time to catch the Baltimore and Ohio train?"

"No time to lose, sir. I can give you a good job before it pulls out."

"Certain of it?"

"Yes, sir. Shall I?"

"Yes."

And in a pair of seconds the boothlack was down on his knees, and placing his box in operation was at work.

"Don't let me get left," said the gentleman.

"I won't, sir," replied the boy, as he plied both brushes with rapidity.

"What's your name?"

"Paul Fay."

"Is your father living?"

"No, sir, he is dead—no one but mother, I and the children. The train is going, sir."

The gentleman reached his hand in his pocket, and drawing out a silver half dollar handed it to the boy, who pulled out a lot of change, and began to count out the correct amount. The gentleman moved off toward the train, fearing he would get left, and before the little fellow could get to him the train pulled out.

Two years later the same gentleman was called to New York on business. He had forgotten the little boothlack and his forty-five cents change.

As he wandered up the street the second day after his arrival he was approached by a lad, who said:

"Were you ever here before?"

"Yes, bubby," was the reply.

"When?" the boy asked.

"About two years ago."

Selected.

"Didn't I shine your shoes at the Grand Central Depot?"

"Some boy did."

"Well, I am the boy, sir, and I owe you forty-five cents. I tried to get to the train, but I couldn't—honestly I couldn't—and here is your money. I was afraid I would never see you again. I didn't intend to keep your money," and saying this the boy pulled out a lot of change, and taking forty-five cents, proffered it to the gentleman.

The letter, written in Atlanta, Ga., which relates the above incident with its pleasant sequel, mentions the recent death of Mr. —, one of the most upright and honored citizens of that city. He was the boy who many years ago blacked the New York gentleman's boots at the "Grand Central," and returned the "change."

The fact that the New York gentleman was so pleased with little Paul that he adopted him and educated him, only adds a circumstance to the biography of a boy who probably would have grown up a good man without the aid of wealthy friends. One act of simple integrity illustrated his character—and his sacrifice to principle was gain, here and eternal.—Youth's Companion.

The Compassion of the Shepherd of the Flock.

TO FRIENDS,—He that is weak and foolish among the lambs, continually ready to wander, both out of the pastures and from the fold, and thus to betray his life into the hands of the enemy; he who is continually scattering and squandering away what the Lord in mercy gathers for him, and freely bestows upon him; who, through drowsiness and carelessness, hath lost the benefit of and forfeited the sweet and tender visitations of the Most High, and is now become dry, dead, barren, thick, earthy; O my God! let that soul feel the stirrings of the spring of life, and find some encouragements from thee, to hope in the free and large mercies of the Shepherd of Israel; who casteth not off his sheep because of their wanderings, because of their backslidings, because of their infirmities, because of their diseases, nay, not because of their hardness; but pursues them with his love, findeth them out, visiteth with his correcting hand according to their need, woundeth with his sword, and melteth in his fire, until He hath made them tender and pliable, and then He pours in the fresh oil of his salvation and sweetly healtheth them.

O my friends and brethren in the pure life! be faithful to the Lord in returning Him all the incomes of his Spirit; follow on in every drawing of his love, while any of the virtue of it lasts upon your spirits. Walk with Him all the day long, and wait for Him all the night season. And, in case of erring from Him, or sinning grievously against Him, be not discouraged; for He is a God of mercies and delighteth in pardoning and forgiving much and very often. What tender mother can be more ready to forgive and embrace the child, that appears broken and afflicted with her sore displeasure! Yea, He gives brokenness, He melteth the heart, that He may be tender towards and embrace it in his arms of reconciliation, and in the peace of his Spirit.

O my dear companions, and fellow-travellers in spirit towards the land of the living! all the motions of the life are cross to the corrupt part—dwell in the life, draw the yoke close about your necks, that ye may come into unity with the life, and the corrupt be worn out. Take the yoke, the cross, the contrariety of Jesus upon your spirits daily; that that may be worn out which hinders the unity, and so, ye may feel your King and Saviour exalted upon his throne in your hearts; this is your rest, peace, life, kingdom, and crown forever.

ISAAC PENNINGTON.

The Story of a Bible.

"Did he leave any message for me?"

"Yes, and he cursed the day that he ever saw you."

This was the answer given by a nun to a lady in London under the following circumstances, which were related to me by a gentleman of culture and piety as we were sailing along the coast of Norway, from Trondhjem to Bergen, in and out among the beautiful fjords and snow-capped mountains:—Monsignor Capel was asked by a lady of position in London, "How can I find peace of mind?" Instead of pointing her to Christ and telling her that he atoned for our sins on the cross, he bade her dismiss such unwelcome thoughts and attend places of amusement. One day she followed a crowd of people into Exeter Hall, expecting to have her mind diverted from serious thoughts about the future by a musical entertainment. She was surprised when she found herself in a great religious meeting. Annoyed at this, she attempted to get out, but in doing so she knocked some umbrellas on to the floor, and abashed took her seat. Her attention was soon riveted upon the speaker. He spoke of Christ's suffering on the cross as an atoning sacrifice, and of God's willingness to pardon, and by his Holy Spirit to change our hearts and fit us for heaven. She was deeply moved, and at the close she said to some one near her: "Can I speak to the gentleman who has just addressed us?"

Soon after, in conversation with her, he said:—"You will find the truth which I have mentioned often repeated in the Bible."

"But I have no Bible," she replied.

He quickly handed her his own, saying, "I have pleasure in giving you mine."

Sometime after this the high Catholic dignitary, remembering the advice he had given this lady, sent the priest to inquire about the state of her mind. Instead of needing his help, he soon found that she was able to direct him in the way of life. Before leaving she gave him the Bible that had been given her at Exeter Hall, and begged him to read it with prayer, and to trust alone in Him who "bore our sins in his own body on the tree." Some time after she received a note from the priest asking her to call upon him. As she was about to take her son to Eton College she did not accept the invitation at the time.

When she called, some weeks after, she was shown into a room where there was a coffin, and in it the body of the priest. Beside it a nun was kneeling in prayer. The lady approached and asked:—"Did he leave a message for me?"

"Yes," was the reply. "He wished me to say, if you called, that he died in the full faith of the Catholic Church, and that he cursed the day he ever saw you."

The poor lady turned away greatly distressed, saying to herself: "If I had gone to his bedside when he sent for me, I might have pointed him to Christ, and he might have been saved through faith in Him; and now, alas! it is too late; I fear through my negligence he is lost forever." This reflection produced such an effect upon her that it destroyed her peace of mind, which she sought to overcome by foreign travel. One day in Rome a lady approached her and said:—"Do you remember standing by the coffin of Father —, and the dreadful message delivered to you?"

"Yes," she replied, "and it has followed me night and day."

"But it was not a true message. The words he bade me deliver to you were these:—'Tell her that I bless the day I ever saw her, and that I die in the full faith of Jesus Christ. Tell her that the Bible she gave me was the means of leading me to trust alone in him for pardon. Tell her I shall meet her in heaven;' and then," added the nun, "he gave me that precious Bible, which has also been the means of leading me to see myself a lost sinner and Christ as my only Saviour. Will you forgive me for telling you that falsehood?"—Herald and Presbyter.

Honor to Parents.—A little boy, about nine years of age, entered one of our city coal yards with a large bucket, with which he went up to the superintendent, and, asking to have it filled with coal, handed the money to pay for it. "What are you going to do with the coal, my little man?" asked the manager. "I am going to carry it home to mother, sir," was the ready answer. "But it is too heavy for you," said the man; "you had better run home for somebody to come and help you." "I have nobody at home but my mother, sir; and I am sure I had rather carry it than my mother should, if it was twice as heavy," answered the noble boy. "Then make two trips, and take half at a time," still urged the considerate clerk. "No, sir, I had rather not," was the reply, "for then I shall be late at school, and I promised mother that I would get back with her coal before the school-bell rings, and so I will," said the earnest, thoughtful child, as he hurried off with his load. Happier no doubt he was in thus doing his duty, than he could possibly have been in the game of marbles, which he had given up to help his widowed mother.

As I passed out after him, I thought, what a priceless treasure is such a son as that. However poor his mother may be in other respects, she is rich in having such a little son; and I am sure God will bless him in thus honoring his mother.

Diamonds and Smugglers.—"Chambers' Journal" gives some interesting stories of smugglers and their methods:

"Please to hold my baby whilst my husband helps me to open my trunks; he will be quite good if you will shake his rattle," said a lady passenger to the officer who was waiting to look over her travelling gear.

And that officer good-humoredly did as he was requested, shaking the rattle to the great delight of the little one. The rattle in question, which, fastened to a ribbon, was tied to the child's waist, was filled with gems of great value, a mode of smuggling that at that time was too simple for detection. A clever female, attired in the costume of a Sister of Mercy, was passed over by the officers because she had no luggage worth examining. She possessed, however, a fine string of beads, which, with downcast eyes, she kept telling. Safe on land, she was affectionately welcomed by two persons dressed in costumes similar to her own. Need it be told that she was a smuggler, and that her beads were so constructed that each held a diamond weighing seven or eight carats? Another ingenious person lit upon the plan of placing a few precious stones in a toy kaleidoscope, which had been given to a child, who carried it ashore in safety. An extensive system of diamond smuggling was at one time carried on from Canadian ground by the aid of homing pigeons. The discovery of this illicit trade was made accidentally by a farmer, who happened to shoot one of the birds, and on examining it found that there was fastened to its leg a quill containing a number of diamonds. A clue being obtained, the local habitation of the pigeon proprietors was discovered and their mode of business put an end to. The scheme, stated simply, was to fly every week or ten days a flock of a dozen or fifteen pigeons, each carrying about half-a-dozen gems. As the duty on diamonds amounts to ten per cent., the trouble taken to smuggle these gems into the United States does not seem so very remarkable. The value of the precious stones, honestly imported into the States, is between eight and nine million dollars per annum, and it has been calculated that gems to half that sum escape payment of duty.

Chinese Bridges on the River Min.—Near Foo Chow is "the Bridge of Ten Thousand Ages," about one-third of a mile in length. It consists of a series of 49 ponderous piers built of huge blocks of granite. The space between them is spanned by enormous granite slabs, some of which were 45 feet in length and 3 feet square. Already this bridge has resisted the rushing timber-laden floods of 900 years, and still it stands firm as of yore—no sign of any weak point in the wonderful structure.

A similar bridge on the same river having been somewhat damaged by a great flood, it was necessary to place one of these monster slabs, 28 feet in length, by about 6 in width and 3 in depth. The boat on which it had been floated down stream was raised above the water-level by the insertion below her of layers of barrels. The builders had exactly calculated the height of a certain high tide, and when the right moment came, the boat slipped between two newly repaired piers, slid the stone into its place, and passed on in safety, minus its cargo.—Wanderings in China.

A Test for Milk.—Dairymen and others who do not believe in the power of milk to rapidly absorb and become contaminated by surrounding noxious smells will do well to try the following simple test, the results of which will probably convince the most sceptical: Take a wide bowl or soup plate to the cow-stable when you go to milk; pour into it a pint of fresh milk, set it on the floor or at the height of a milk-stool, so as to expose it fully to the air of the stable. If the day is close and heavy and the milk is cold, and the stable not cleaned out and aired, the result will be surprising. Take it to the house and try to drink it.—The Independent.

Celluloid from Potatoes.—By boiling peeled potatoes for 36 hours in diluted sulphuric acid, and then drying the material in blotting-paper by pressure, it is converted into a substance resembling celluloid.

Sunshine.—There is no better medicine, no greater purifier, no better friend to good health, cleanliness and long life than sunshine. There is an old Spanish proverb which says: "Where the sun does not enter the doctor must," and the truth condensed to that statement is a whole lecture on the health of the home. Sunshine costs nothing, is refreshing, invigorating, life-giving to both sick and well. People have somehow got the idea that nothing is valuable which does not cost something, and are too likely to value all blessings by the money value they represent.—Western Insurance Review.

Salmon.—The power that the salmon possesses of ascending waterfalls is the subject of some interesting details by Prof. A. Landmark, director-in-chief of the Norwegian fisheries. He states that in certain cases salmon have been observed to ascend to a distance of 16 feet, and he feels this to be true from having seen them leap over two masts which were 34 feet apart, and which had been placed across the river at about 16 feet above water, at Hollefos, upon the Drams, at Haugsend. He says, even, that certain salmon, on ascending a vertical fall, are capable, if they meet the fall at right angles with the muzzle, of remaining a minute or two in the midst of the mass of falling water if they do not succeed in passing over the fall at a single leap.

Learning to Rest.—I asked a studious young woman who a few years ago had stood at the head of her class, what she considered the secret of her success in the school-room. I knew well enough that her natural endowments had been in many respects inferior to those of her competitors and thus judged that there must be a secret somewhere.

Imagine my surprise when she answered not a word, but led the way to her own room, the door of which she threw open and pointed to a rustic motto on the wall above her head "It is there" she answered at last, and I read, "Learn to Rest."

"When the time came for our examination," she said, "My companions were tired and flurried from over-study and sleepless nights, but I was fresh and my thoughts collected and readily put into work because I had laid the foundation of my knowledge long before, and reared the structure very slowly, with care to take pure and undisturbed rest from study at proper hours. When I went to walk I did not take a book in my hand, and when I rode I was not constantly seeking to recall certain portions of studies to mind for fear I might forget.

The jealous ones laughed and assured themselves of an easy victory when they saw me throw aside my books and romp for hours with the little ones or go out alone for long rambles in the fields. They could not see how two hours of my intense application afterwards were worth five of theirs between the hours of ten and three at night, after a day in the school-room and an evening in the parlor with book in hand."

I wish I could impress these words upon the thoughts of every ambitious young scholar in the land. It would save so many weary headaches and heart-aches, so many grievous failures at the very last, and so many shattered lives.—Christian at Work.

The Breeding-ground of the Auks.—A visit to a mountain where thousands of these birds had built their nests is thus described.—"On a bright summer day my companion and myself took to a boat and rowed toward it, over the smooth, transparent water, between beautiful islands, followed by the screeching of the startled gulls. High above us, on a towering ridge, we saw the watchful ospreys; by our side, on right and left, along the shore cliffs, the sitting eider duck. Finally, we came to the populous part of the mountain, which is from three hundred and twenty to three hundred and thirty feet high, and saw really immense numbers of birds sitting on the ridges. The higher parts of the cone were covered with a brown spoonwort; and as we approached the shore the birds drew back thither, and suddenly disappeared from view, as if by concerted agreement. When we had reached the shore and landed, and were wondering what had become of the hosts of birds, we found the ground burrowed all over with holes that looked like common rabbit holes. We soon learned that they were the entrances to the nest chambers of the auks. The holes are large enough to permit the birds to pass through, and then widen on the inside, so as to give room for the nest and the two birds. As we climbed toward the height, the tenants first carefully and anxiously peered at us, then slipped out and threw themselves screaming into the sea, which was soon covered, as far as the eye could reach, with birds whose cry resembled the noise of a gigantic surf or of a raging storm.—Christian at Work.

—The Bible as a Text-book.—A clerical writer in The Christian Advocate condemns the introduction into schools of "Lesson leaves," and other helps, as substitutes for the Bible itself. He complains that "it has been almost banished, and we are flooded with uninspired commentaries and leaflets.

—Prohibition.—The Philadelphia Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church adopted a report advocating the prohibition of the liquor business by constitutional amendment.

—The Legislature of Tennessee has resolved to submit a prohibition amendment to the constitution of the State to the vote of the people. Among the numerous petitions addressed to the Legislature asking for this legislation was a long one from one hundred and sixty-one convicts in the State Penitentiary. They told the Legislature that the crimes for which they were serving various terms of imprisonment were due to strong drink, and they prayed that when they should be released the same fatal temptation might not lie in wait for them as they emerged into the light and joy of freedom. It must have been a most effective plea.

—Worldly Amusements.—Excepting the gladiatorial shows and certain idolatrous associations, do not the objections made by the primitive Church to the fashionable pastimes of their times hold with equal force against the worldly amusements of today? Is it not as true of the theatre, the dance, the games of hazard, and the immodest dress of fashionable women in our receptions and assemblies, as it was of the amusements of pagan society, that they do violence to the moral feelings of Christians and the decencies of Christian life? Do they not breathe the same unholly spirit? Does not frivolity reign in them? Are they not incompatible with the proper seriousness of the Christian character? Are they not hurtful to mind, morals, and especially to spirituality? To these inquiries the man whose conscience recognizes his obligation to aim at the glory of God in his recreations, as in all other things, must give a decidedly affirmative reply.—Chris. Advocate.

—Theatrical Morality.—A recent number of The Christian Advocate contains a letter on this subject, written from Los Angeles, California, by one of its correspondents, which says:—

"On the 28th Dec., 1886, I started from San Antonio, Tex., for California. At El Paso, a theatre troupe—fifty-eight in number—boarded the train for Los Angeles. In the orchestra were a few Germans, with whom I got in conversation about one and the other thing. One of these men was very intelligent and well informed. He told me he had travelled nine years with that troupe. I asked him if he had a family. He said that he had a wife and eight children—two sons and six daughters. I asked him if any of his sons or daughters were with the troupe, or playing on the stage anywhere. He looked at me for a moment, and then deliberately said—(listen and hear it, you theatre-going Christians): 'Sir, my daughters are all dead, and it was hard, very hard for me to bury them one after another; but rather than to have my sons go on the stage, I would bury them too. You see these young men and women; by their conduct you see what they are. We have some young and innocent girls in the troupe, but how long will they be able to resist the influence surrounding them before they are dragged down to where the others are—to the lowest level of immorality?" This man only repeated what Barrett, Stephan, and other actors said before him."

—Canadian Dispute.—Apart from the merits of the case, the existing state of feeling between Canada and this country on account of the fisheries is very much to be regretted. So strong is the feeling that there is reason to fear actual collision between thoughtless and hot-headed men.

How much better would it be to commit the whole matter into the hands of arbitrators, and abide by their decision.

The United States set a very good example to the civilized world in consenting to the Geneva Arbitration, and it does not speak well for our wisdom that within so short a time after the death of General Grant we should fall back into the old rut of retaliation which has marked the history of mankind with bloodshed and untold suffering.—Chris. Statesman.

The Canadian Government has forwarded a proposition to the Colonial Office in London, concerning the fisheries dispute with the United States, wherein it is suggested that Great Britain should at once propose to the United States the settlement of all questions without reserve by the appointment of a commission to consist as follows: One delegate to be named by the Governor and Council of Canada, one from Newfoundland, by and with the consent of Great Britain; two from the United States, and one from some independent European Power. With such a Commission, it is said, all questions could be satisfactorily adjusted. It is understood that Germany is the Power which Canada would prefer as referee.—The American.

—We are Brothers.—A letter of sympathy inclosing a subscription to the sufferers at Charleston, by John Brown, Jr., son of John Brown, of Harper's Ferry, says:

"Please accept and bestow as in your judgment shall appear best. This is a slight token of the kind feeling which I know possessed the heart of John Brown and of each one of his family toward the people of the South. It was only against her slavery that he or any of his kindred cherished a sacred animosity. Chattel slavery—a wrong for which the North and South were responsible—has ceased, expiated in the blood of brethren. The storm of fratricidal war which closed that scene in our country's drama has left us, we may hope, a clear sky and a land that shall evermore be made glad and beautiful by the sunshine of righteousness—right and fair dealing by all toward all."

Colonel Young accepted the gift and presented it to the Confederate Home, which is now being repaired by contributions from all parts of the country. In closing his letter, Col. Young said: "I thank you very sincerely for your contribution, but yet more for the spirit that prompted it. It shows, indeed, that peace and good-will have returned to this nation."—Christian Advocate.

THE FRIEND.

FOURTH MONTH 16, 1887.

A recent writer in one of the religious periodicals complains that the Bible has been almost banished from schools professedly instituted for its study, and that its place has been largely filled by "uninspired commentaries and leaflets."

We apprehend there are few believers in Christianity who do not set a very high value on the sacred record. It contains the history of the most important events in the annals of man—his creation, the dealings of the Almighty with the people whom He chose to preserve on the earth a knowledge of Himself, the coming of our Saviour in the flesh, the doctrines He preached, and the account of their spread in the early years of the Christian era. Independently of religious considerations, there is no book in existence a knowledge of whose contents is so important to all; and which is therefore so worthy to be studied for the sake of the information it contains, for the ennobling sentiments with which it abounds, and the practical advices which are to be found in its pages.

But beyond all this, believing that it is true of the New Testament, as is declared of the Old, that "holy men of old wrote as they were moved of the Holy Ghost," and therefore that both "are profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for instruction in righteousness;" the sincere follower of the Lord Jesus, who is longing for instruction and help in the way to the kingdom of rest and peace, is often led to turn to these blessed writings, that he may be edified thereby; and at times it pleases Him (from whom alone all good comes) to bless them to the comfort and instruction of his servants.

But it is to the Lord we must look for spiritual knowledge and for divine instruction and support. Unless the openings of his Spirit accompany our perusal of the Scriptures of Truth, we will not be edified thereby, whatever knowledge of an outward kind, or whatever intellectual culture we may derive therefrom. Every experienced Christian, or earnest seeker after heavenly things knows how differently he is impressed at different times in reading or meditating on the Bible. Sometimes the Spirit opens to him a depth of meaning, and a spiritual instruction in passages, with which he may be very familiar, but which never before impressed him in the same manner. Sometimes a tenderness or warmth of feeling is awakened, in reading parts of the Bible, which at other times have no power to produce such an effect. Hence it was that our early Friends, while encouraging the reverent perusal of the Scriptures, with the mind turned to the Lord, looking for his Light to be shed on their pages; were careful to uphold the view, that they were not the primary rule of faith and practice, nor the source of spiritual life to the soul, but that all their authority rests on that Divine Light and Power from which they emanated, and that to understand their true meaning, especially on points of doctrine, a measure of that same Light must be communicated by Christ to the soul. For Christ is the "true Light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world." He not only shows the evil that is to be avoided, but unfolds to his obedient disciples the mysteries of his kingdom, so far as it is needful for them to know and understand. Indeed, without the help of the Scriptures, He is abundantly able to instruct and guide all those in every nation who will obey his Divine monitions in their hearts, even although in his providence, they have never seen the Bible, or know of his outward coming in the flesh. For, as the apostle declares, "The grace of God which bringeth salvation, hath appeared unto all men, teaching them" all that it is essential for them to know.

Isaac Pennington, in relating his own experience, tells us that from a child he had desired to be found walking with the Lord; and he thought that by getting the directions of Scripture into his mind, and applying himself to the strict observation of them, he might obtain what he desired. And he had built up for himself a system of doctrines. But at length the Lord, in his love and goodness "brought me," he says, "to a fuller sense of my want of his spirit and power, and dashed all my religion in pieces"—"but, then was the Lord preparing for me that day of mercy, which since, in his tender goodness, is broken in upon me. And now, the eye which He hath opened in me seeth, that the Gospel is a ministration of the Spirit and power of the Lord Jesus Christ; and that he who would be his disciple indeed, must be turned to his Spirit, and receive the immediate light and shinings of his Spirit into his vessel; and must feel the law of life, the holy laws of the new covenant, not comprehended outwardly in his mind, but written inwardly in his heart by the finger of God's Spirit. And, being written in his heart, they have power over his heart, and cause him to obey them; so that, being here, he cannot possibly but fulfil the holy directions of the Scriptures, he being in that from which they came."

The substitution of the study of "uninspired commentaries" for that of the Bible, of which the writer to whom we have referred, complains, is an illustration of that tendency of the human heart which leads it to depend on the exercise of its own intellectual powers in acquiring Divine knowledge, rather than on a humble waiting on the Spirit of Christ. The very same tendency is shown by those who think to become wise in spiritual knowledge by studying the Bible itself, without dependence on the enlightening power of Christ. Not that any outward helps are to be rejected as useless, but that the chief dependence should ever be placed on Him who is emphatically the Teacher of his people, who alone has the key of David and can unlock all the mysteries of his kingdom.

Owing to the sickness of the writer of the article, "An Inquiry into the Character and Tendencies of Secret Societies," the remainder of it will not appear at present.

In the Selections from the Diary of Abigail W. Hall in No. 35 of The Friend, the sickness and death of one of the pupils, John Whitacre, is referred to as having occurred in Sixth Mo. 5th of 1852. A friend, who was a pupil at the school at the time, says that there is a mistake in this date; and, on referring to the printed "Catalogue" of the school, we find it states that J. Whitacre deceased on the 6th of Fourth Month of that year.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—In regard to the fisheries question it is understood that information has been received to the effect that England sustains the position taken by the Canadian authorities, and is in no wise disposed to make the concessions requested by our Government. This question has been considered by the Cabinet with a view to the advisability of suitable action by the President under the provisions of the retaliatory act. The alleged demand of Great Britain for the possession of Tortugas Islands, or the payment by the Haytian Government of $1,000,000 in settlement of old claims, has also been considered. A correspondence will be opened with Great Britain on this subject.

The New York correspondent of the Public Ledger, a few days since, writes: "One of the questions in 'the street' is: What has become of all the trade dollars? Up to this time the Sub-treasury here has received but about $2,700,000 for redemption, and the applications now have well nigh ceased. The few sums that are offered come, for the most part, by express from the country. The theory is, that when the coin was marketable at 85 cents many were melted and turned into a solution for the slivering of the backs of looking glasses, while others were converted into articles of use and ornament. The coin being 900 fine and containing 420 grains, it was cheaper to use the trade dollar than to purchase bullion."

An extensive movement is in progress among the people residing along the coasts of Narragansett and Mount Hope bays to secure such legislation in the Rhode Island General Assembly as will prevent trap and seine fishing in those waters. It is stated that food fish are becoming very scarce, and that because of the extensive operations to supply the markets of New York and Boston with fish, the supply in towns and cities in the vicinity of the coast is limited, and the food very high priced; that, in fact, the supply comes from the New York and Boston market, after the fish have been taken from these waters and sent to the wholesale dealers.

At a convention of the peach growers of Warren and Hunterdon counties, New Jersey, held in Belvidere last week, it was admitted that the outlook was favorable for an unusually large crop of fruit, especially peaches.

The great drought in Texas continues, and now "extends from the far western grazing lands across the State for a distance of 800 miles into the pine regions bordering Louisiana, but decreases in severity as it approaches the prairies, from which section complaints are of recent date." In the worst part of the drought-afflicted belt the "roadways are covered to the depth of several inches with dust, the fields are barren even of weeds, while strings of cattle almost too poor to stand up are travelling constantly in search of grass and water."

Returns of the election held in Rhode Island on the 6th instant, give Davis, the Democratic candidate for Governor, 973 majority over the Republican and Prohibition candidates. There was no election for Lieutenant Governor, Secretary of State, and in several districts for members of the Legislature. A second election was held on the 9th instant, which resulted in giving the Democrats a majority in the Legislature. The Senate will stand 19 Republicans and 15 Democrats, and the House 28 Republicans and 41 Democrats, or 47 to 56 in Grand Committee in favor of the Democrats. This will insure the election in "Grand Committee" of the Democratic candidates for general offices who failed of an election on the 6th instant.

Returns of the Michigan election indicate that the Republican State ticket is elected by a plurality of about 8000. The prohibitory amendment is stated by the Detroit Evening Journal to have been defeated by 3676 votes. The friends of the amendment, however, claim it was carried by a decided majority, but that thousands of ballots for the measure were counted as against it.

The large vote for the Prohibition amendment in Michigan is ascribed to the efforts of female workers at the polls. "Surprising stories are told of how they stood in line snatching ballots with 'no' on them from the hands of passing voters, substituting 'yes' ballots, and following the ticket up to the ballot box to see that the voter did as they wished."

Senator-elect Reagan, of Texas, has written a letter avowing himself a Prohibitionist.

On the 10th instant two earthquake shocks were felt at Burlington, Vermont, the first at about half-past 2 o'clock, the second, ten minutes later. "The second shock was very heavy, resembling the concussion from a large gun, followed by a jar of fifteen seconds' duration. Doors and windows rattled, and those living in the third story of blocks say the buildings seemed to sway to and fro. People ran into the streets in a panic, many supposing that a terrific explosion had occurred near by."

The deaths in this city last week numbered 450, which was 9 more than during the previous week, and 36 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing 219 were males and 231 females; 253 adults and 197 minors; 76 died of consumption; 54 of pneumonia; 26 of diseases of the heart; 24 of convulsions; 18 of old age; 15 of inflammation of the brain; 14 of measles; 13 of marasmus; 11 of apoplexy; 10 of paralysis, and 10 of croup.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½'s, 110½; 4's, 129½; 3's, 100½; currency 6's, 126½ a 137.

Cotton.—Demand from spinners was light at 10½ cts. for mid-landing uplands.

Flour and Meal.—Demand for flour from the local trade continued of a hand-to-mouth character, but prices were unchanged. Sales of 125 barrels Pennsylvania family, at $3.75; 125 barrels do., roller straight, at $4.25; 250 barrels Ohio, clear, at $4; 125 barrels do., straight, $4.40; 375 barrels winter patent, at $4.65 a $4.80; 125 barrels Minnesota, clear, at $4, and 500 barrels do., patent, at $4.75 a $4.90. Rye flour was sold at $2.75 a $2.85 per barrel as to quality.

Grain.—No. 2 red wheat closed at 89½ cts. bid and 90½ cts. asked. No. 2 mixed corn closed at 45½ cts. bid and 46 cts. asked. No. 2 white oats closed at 38½ cts. bid and 38½ cts. asked.

Beef cattle were in poor demand at 4 a 5½ cts. Sheep were inactive at 4 a 6 cts.

Lambs were fairly active at 5 a 7 cts. Hogs were dull. Western, 8½ a 8½ cts.

FOREIGN.—On the 9th instant, W. E. Gladstone issued to the miners in the north of Great Britain, a majority of whom are his enthusiastic followers, a letter which amounts to a manifesto. In it he says:

"It is the first time when a coercion bill, if passed, is to be passed by England's vote alone, against the voices of Scotland, Ireland and Wales. It is the first time when such a bill will have been passed under the sanction of the householders at large, who were never enfranchised before the last elections—in 1885 and 1886. It is the first time coercion has been proposed without any attempt by the Ministry to show—what we know they cannot show—a state of exceptional and flagrant or growing crime. If England is to coerce Ireland for crime, Ireland can reply that relatively to population she has less crime than England."

On the 11th instant, a great demonstration was held in London, against the Irish coercion bill. Estimates of the attendance at the meeting vary, but it is certain that 150,000 persons, including lookers-on, were present. The procession took an hour and a half to file into Hyde Park, in which fourteen platforms had been erected for the speakers. No disturbance occurred and the people dispersed quietly.

Bismarck is reported to have said recently: "Two months ago I feared there would be war. I do not now. Still we must be prepared for war. We never know what is to happen. Who could have expected a few years ago that the Pope and I would become faithful allies?"

A disturbance occurred at the town of Zabern, Alsace, on the 7th instant, during which a number of recruits hauled down the German flag from the official buildings. About twenty men were concerned in the affair, several of whom have been arrested.

The town of Kutj, in Austrian Galicia, has been almost completely destroyed by fire, about one thousand persons being made homeless. The fire was of incendiary origin.

An explosion of dynamite on the 7th instant, at Taganrog, Russia, set fire to a row of houses. The flames spread rapidly, and before they could be extinguished one-third of the town had been destroyed.

The Vienna correspondent of the London Morning Post says a report is current to the effect that another attempt to murder the Czar was made on the Marsky Road, in St. Petersburg, on the 7th instant, and that a student and a woman were arrested who were carrying bombs under their plaids.

The Annual Meeting of the Association of Friends of Philadelphia and its vicinity for Relief of Colored Freedmen, will be held at Arch Street Meeting-house on Second-day evening, the 18th inst.

Friends generally are invited to attend.

FRIENDS' LIBRARY,

No. 142 NORTH SIXTEENTH STREET.

In Tenth Month last, the Committee of the three city Monthly Meetings issued an address in relation to the Library Building, then approaching completion, and the provision that had been made for receiving meeting and kindred records on deposit. Since that time alterations have been made in the building to meet certain criticisms, and it has been furnished and opened. The record room has been shelved in such a way as to give each book the exclusive use of a pigeon-hole, in which it will be labeled and placed on its side. This will preserve the books much better than the usual plan of standing erect and will facilitate research.

As the Yearly Meeting has recently supplied the Monthly Meetings with new books for recording births, marriages and deaths, this appears to be a suitable time for depositing all records not in use, including minutes, in a central and safe place.

Over 100 volumes having already been received from five of the Quarterly Meetings, interested Friends are invited to inspect the premises on Third-day, the 19th inst., from 3 to 6 P. M. The undersigned will be present and explain the arrangements, which can be recommended with confidence.

JOHN H. DILLINGHAM, Custodian.
Philada., Fourth Mo. 4th, 1887.

The Eighteenth Annual Meeting of the Indian Aid Association of Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, will be held in Arch Street Meeting-house, Philadelphia, on Fifth-day, Fourth Mo. 21st, 1887, at 8 P. M. Friends generally are invited to attend.

RICHARD CADBURY, Clerk.

Friends attending the Yearly Meeting can be furnished with simple meals, both before and after the sittings of the meeting, at moderate charge (15 cents), in the second story of the central part of the Arch Street Meeting-house. Meals will also be furnished for those attending the Meeting for Sufferings and the Select Meeting, the previous week.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

Until further notice the stage will connect with the 7.02 and 9.03 morning trains from Broad St., to convey passengers to the School; and at other times when timely notice is sent to J. G. WILLIAMS, Supt.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE.

Near Frankford, (Twenty-third Ward,) Philadelphia. Physician and Superintendent—JOHN C. HALL, M. D. Applications for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board of Managers.

DIED, on the 24th of First Month, 1887, at his residence near Fallsington, Pa., MAHLON MOON, in the 73rd year of his age, a member and elder of Falls Monthly Meeting. Although from his youth he had been a thoughtful and religiously inclined Friend, yet he felt sensible of many frailties and shortcomings, but through redeeming mercy he was enabled to go down to the grave in quiet peace, with his heart filled with love toward God and man. For several months before his death he was in feeble health, but strong in the faith of the efficacy and glory of the religion of our Saviour whom he had through life endeavored to serve. Shortly before his death he remarked, that the expression of Paul had been repeatedly before his mind: "Looking unto Jesus, the author and the finisher of our faith, who, for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God?"

At his residence near Plymouth, Washington County, Ohio, on the 22nd of Third Month, 1887, THOMAS BOWMAN, in the 77th year of his age, an esteemed member of Plymouth Monthly and Particular Meeting of Friends. This dear Friend endured a long and painful illness with Christian fortitude and resignation to the Divine will, and retained his mental faculties to very near the close, leaving the consoling evidence to surviving relatives and friends that his end was peace.

—, at her home in Chesterfield, Morgan Co., Ohio, on the 25th of Third Month, 1887, ELIZABETH, wife of Ellwood Dean, in the 70th year of her age, a beloved member and elder of Chesterfield Monthly and Particular Meetings. She had been in declining health for some time, and had felt that her hold on life was loosening; and, although the summons came at an unexpected moment, we believe she met the call with her lamp trimmed and burning, prepared to enter in to the marriage supper of the Lamb. The loss sustained by her husband is very great. She had been his faithful and affectionate helpmate for almost fifty years; often accompanying him on his journeys to distant parts as well as nearer home, entering into his labors of gospel love. Her removal is sensibly felt by many friends, to whom she had endeared herself by her cheerful disposition and earnest Christian sympathy. Her mind was vigorous, and her judgment remarkably clear, and we feel that her place in the church and in the community will not soon be filled. "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord, from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors, and their works do follow them."

—, Third Month 30th, at her mother's home in Winona, Ohio, CLARA J. HARRIS, daughter of Lucina Harris, in the twenty-fifth year of her age. She was favored with the peaceful assurance that all would be well with her. At times her sufferings were hard to bear; but she seemed very patient, and at one time said, that she did not suffer more than was good for her—that she could bear it all for His sake. Redeemed of the Lord and her days' work done.

Selections from the Diary of Abigail W. Hall.

Seventh Mo. 9th, 1853. In my sleep last night was much in company with my dear departed mother, as is often the case. It seemed on waking as though I had really been with her. Her precious sweet spirit seeming so near, as I have been busily engaged this morning, it has comforted and cheered. Sincere and fervent desires have been raised, that I may be helped so to live that there may be a reunion with her when done with time in a never-ending eternity, and a being forever united with the spirits of the just made perfect, and to Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant," &c.

11th. Feel my spirits a little lightened, by being brought in measure to feel; and enabled also to ask help and strength to bear all my burdens, both those that pertain to the flesh and to the spirit. In our morning meeting, I once more dared to open my lips in a few words; the burden of which made my poor tabernacle tremble.

18th. A quiet feeling seems in mercy dispensed this morning; though feeling sensible that I have nothing to boast of but infirmities. Unexpectedly was brought to my remembrance, he account we have left us, of Mary going unto the sepulchre while it was yet dark; and how the stone was found rolled away, &c. The remembrance of this circumstance, and the opening of it to my understanding, as well as the feelings attendant, gave encouragement. Unlooked for to our meeting, I was introduced into exercise; and had vocally to declare for the help and encouragement of some doubting, distrusting mind present, "If the prophet had bid thee do some great thing, wouldst thou not have done it? how much rather, wash and be clean." Was enlarged a little further, though in great fear. After which was favored to feel peaceful; which is all ask.

Eighth Mo. 1st. As I sat in our morning meeting yesterday, this text was livingly revived: "Ye ask and receive not, because ye ask amiss," &c., followed by these words of the dear Master: "Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you." There seemed a command to revive it, but feeling it so applicable to my own state and condition, and there being those present of the worldly-wise—many strangers—I had about concluded I could not open my lips. When, as though a voice had spoken it, I heard the words of Pilate to the people: "What shall I do then with Jesus, which is called Christ?" with their answer, "Let him be crucified." Ah, how these last words sounded! If this, I was about to do, bore any relation to crucifying afresh the dear Son of God, the very thought brought me on my feet; and in the fear and dread of the Eternal I bore my testimony. Since which, O! how I have been buffeted by that cruel adversary, who seeks to lay waste the whole heritage of God. May I be helped and strengthened, not only in word, but in all my actions, to preach Christ to the people; showing forth my faith by my works.

15th. I can adopt the language of the prophet where he says: "I am very jealous for the Lord God of hosts," &c. In the first place I am very jealous over myself; then over every thing which does not bring honor unto Him, to whom all honor is due. I often see things in our meetings in regard to the behavior of the dear children, which distress me; then my own situation often weighs heavily, being unable to attain to anything but an outward stillness; though I strive not to settle down under it. And can but believe that as the exercise is rightly maintained, a helping hand will be extended. In the after-part of our morning meeting, I was given a little to feel the preciousness of true living faith. "If ye have faith as a grain of mustard-seed," said our dear Saviour, "ye shall say unto this sycamine-tree be thou plucked up by the root, and be thou planted in the sea, and it shall be done." The remembrance of this precious declaration, seemed a little to animate to seek after it. Press forward, O my soul!

22nd. I thought during our morning meeting yesterday, there was more of ability than sometimes, to ask a little help. Near the close of the meeting I ventured forth with a few words. Hope I did not do wrong. Oh, the fear that attends these offerings! fear to give, and fear to withhold. After meeting my heart was tendered and broken before the Lord, with sincere desires to be kept and preserved on every hand.

24th. "Cleanse thou me from secret faults." Increased desires are felt after purity and holiness: that so I may be made a fit temple for the Lord my God to dwell in. If iniquity be regarded or given way to in any wise, the Lord will not hear me. Strengthen me, O Heavenly Father! with night in the inner-man; that I may lift up a standard against my soul's enemy, who is seeking continually to destroy and to lay waste thy kingdom.

26th. Yesterday was a day of unlooked for favor to my poor soul. He who has all power in heaven and on earth, was pleased to arise for my help and deliverance, so that the broken bones were made to rejoice. Near the close of our meeting, there seemed a command given to stand forth on behalf of my dear Lord and Master. While trying the fleece, the meeting I found was breaking up. I feared, after the favor I had received, to let it separate without delivering the little message which seemed given; so arose with: "The life, dear children, is more than meat—the life of the precious immortal soul. And with a little more, I sat down. After which was favored to feel quiet. On retiring after meeting to my room, was again comforted and encouraged in reading these words of John Crook, which I accidentally opened upon: "I have this to say to thee, thou poor soul, Keep thou thy own habitation with God, in the measure of his grace committed to thee. Shut out all that would interrupt thy communion with God, and follow those things which are of good report and which make for peace; these things follow. Keep in love with all those that love the Truth and are tender of it, and seek its advancement above all; who have no end to self, nor to this world, nor the things of it; but unto purity and holiness, and a close walking with God in Spirit; and thy temptations will wear away, and those broken bones shall be set again unto a firmer union with God and his truth and people, than ever thou wast in before. Then the broken bones shall rejoice and thou conclude, that in faithfulness God hath suffered thee to be tried, that thou mayst learn obedience by all that thou hast suffered, and understand it was to make thee abhor thyself more than ever thou couldst have done, had not these things befallen thee; that, with Job, thou mayst attain to a knowledge of God beyond the hearing of the ear; which will reward thee double for all thy sufferings and trials, and make thee keep close unto the Lord and to the fellowship of saints for ever," &c.—Friends' Library, Vol. XIII, page 266.

Ninth Mo. 9th. Altogether unworthy as some of us are of the mercies of our Heavenly Father still extended towards us, we are remembered for good from time to time. Thou openest thy hand, and satisfieth the desire of every living thing. Yesterday was a day of favor. The evening previous, who should arrive but our dear friends William and Elizabeth Evans! They have come to pay us a little visit and attend our meeting. Just at meeting time came our friends, Samuel and Ann Cope; also Hannah Davis, from West Chester, and William Scattergood, from Concord. It seemed remarkable how they should all be drawn to come sit with us in our meeting; neither knowing of the others coming. Elizabeth, Samuel, and William, all spoke; E. first, quoting: "Draw nigh unto God, and He will draw nigh unto you." Encouraging some in an especial manner, for whom she was led into close and near sympathy, to bring their troubles unto the Lord; who would sustain and make a way where none could be seen. Said, "The Lord shall fight your battles, and ye shall hold your peace." Enlarging in a very instructive and encouraging manner. My spirit was melted, humbled and broken, under the power of the word preached; and while I felt unworthy of even a crumb, I was allowed to partake. Samuel followed with this apostolic declaration: "For our rejoicing is this, the testimony of our conscience, that in simplicity and godly sincerity, not with fleshly wisdom, but by the grace of God, we have had our conversation in the world." Upon which he instructively enlarged. "I am the Vine, ye are the branches," &c., William arose with; and spoke of the favor and the mercy it was to be permitted to be engrafted into Christ, the true and living Vine, &c., &c. Both of the last were deeply instructive communications, wherein, also, counsel and tender encouragement flowed toward the dear children, that they, in their little measure, be found supporters of our Christian testimonies; showing the suffering our early Friends underwent in support of them, &c. The meeting closed in solemn supplication, from dear E. E. So that it did seem to me there was abundant cause to thank God and take courage.

15th. Whilst I desire to be social and pleasant with all, as far as Truth allows, may I be more and more guarded over my words and actions. The little strength which has been mercifully vouchsafed, has been lessened of late, by giving too much latitude to my tongue, "an unruly member, and boasteth great things." I have been made to feel, this day, that I have nothing to glory in save infirmities. May this sense not be withdrawn, till self is laid where it ought to be. Oh how unlike am I to Him, who "made himself of no reputation," and who went about doing good, not only to the bodies but to the souls of men.

Eleventh Mo. 7th. More than a month has elapsed since last entry was made, and what shall I say? If it had been a month of advance in my good journey, how I could rejoice! While there has been a struggle from day to day, in passing about among my friends, to keep best things uppermost, I cannot feel I have attained to what I ought. And since my return to this place, about a week since, truly it may be said, "many things" have "cumbered" to cause a fear for many of us, that the "one thing needful" would be forgotten. In our meeting yesterday morning an exercise of this kind pervaded my mind, but without relief: it may have been all for myself. Afterwards how did these words of the aged patriarch, when pressed by some famine, again and again pass through me: "Go again and buy us a little food." That bread which cometh down from God out of heaven and nourishes up unto eternal life, was what my soul panted after, and craved for us all.

8th. "Lord, make me to know mine end, and the measure of my days, what it is, that I may know how frail I am." Very unexpectedly last evening I had a slight hemorrhage, which did some alarm; though the desire was felt to keep quiet, to turn inward, and see how it was with me. Whereupon I felt as though I had nothing to clothe me with. Be merciful to me a sinner, was the breathing of my spirit. I am yet spared to see the light of another day. Enable me, strengthen me, O dearest Father! to work out my soul's salvation with fear and trembling; that the midnight cry may not find me unprepared.

The existence of slavery as a recognized institution in Chinese domestic life is to me an altogether new idea, and yet I now learn that it is a most real fact—a system of absolute, hereditary slavery, from which there is no possibility of escape for three generations, though the great-grandson of the original slave is entitled to purchase his freedom if he can raise a sum equal to the price at which his master values him. The slave-market is supplied from the families of rebels and of poor parents, who, in very hard times are driven to sell their sons and daughters.

Many also are the children of gamblers, who are sold to pay gambling debts. A large number have been kidnapped from distant homes, and though this offence is criminal, it is constantly practised. Under pressure of extreme poverty, girls are sometimes sold for about £1, but the average price of both sexes ranges from £10 to £20, according to health, strength, beauty and age. Before a purchase is effected, the slave, male or female, is minutely examined, and made to go through his, or her paces, to prove soundness in all respects. Should the result prove satisfactory, the purchaser becomes absolute owner. He can sell his slave again at any moment, and for any purpose, or should he see fit to beat him to death, or drown him, no law can touch him, for his slave is simply his chattel, and possesses no legal rights whatsoever. Instances have actually come to light in which ladies have thus beaten their female slaves to death, but the action is looked upon merely as an extravagant waste of saleable property. In wealthy houses, where there are generally from twenty to thirty slaves, kindly treatment seems to be the general rule; but in smaller families, where only two or three are kept, the treatment is often so harsh that slaves run away, whereupon the town-crier is sent through the streets to offer a reward for the capture of the fugitive. He attracts attention by striking a gong, to which is attached a paper streamer on which all particulars are inscribed. Sometimes street placards are pasted up, with a full description of the runaway. Here, as in other slave-owning communities, parents have no rights whatever to their own children, who can be taken from them and sold at the will of the master. So the system of slavery is absolute, and its victims may be the children of fellow-citizens, and in the case of gamblers, of boon companions.

The City of Canton is divided into thirty-six wards, each separated from the others by fire-proof walls. At short intervals I notice a tall scaffolding in connection with a little watch-tower, and I learn that these are fire look-outs. Each watchman has a gong whereby to give the alarm to all the others in case he detects a fire, and by a certain code of striking he makes known in what quarter it lies. Then from each of the forty-eight guard-houses of the city two men hurry off to assist the regular fire-brigade, who are said to be a very efficient and courageous body of men, both here and throughout the empire; and indeed there is every inducement to energy in subduing fires, for apart from all general considerations concerning danger to life and property, every official in the neighborhood knows that his personal rank is at stake, as every fire sufficiently large to destroy ten houses must be reported at Peking, and should the conflagration have been allowed so to spread that eighty houses have been burnt, every officer in the city is degraded one step. Very severe punishment is also meted out to those persons through whose carelessness the fire has originated. No matter how respectable is their position in life, they are condemned to stand daily in the open streets for a period of from one to four weeks, wearing the ponderous wooden collar—the canque—just as if they were thieves.

While at Canton, an invitation from a very wealthy mandarin gave our authoress an opportunity of visiting a Chinese home of the very best type; and very puzzling, she says, it would be to describe. It covers so much ground, and there are so many open halls, consisting chiefly of pillars and ornamental roofs, scattered promiscuously about, among paved courtyards, decorated with flowers in pots; and then there are walls pierced by oddly shaped portals, formed like octagons, or circles, or even tea-pots, and all placed at irregular intervals, never opposite one another; and then shady morsels of garden with all manner of surprises in the way of little ponds and angular bridges and quaint trees. Then somehow, quite unexpectedly, you find yourself in highly ornamental suites of small rooms which seem to have originally been one great room, sub-divided by partitions of the most elaborate wood-carving, and furnished with beautiful polished black wood, and hangings of rich materials.

Such homes are in fact the patriarchal encampment of a whole clan, to which all the sons and brothers of the house bring their wives and there take up their quarters, living together apparently in very remarkable peace.

"Presently our host, who is very friendly to foreigners, and from intercourse with them, is less punctilious than most Chinamen on the matter of being seen speaking to his women folk, led us aside, and presented us to his most kindly and courteous old mother, who conducted us to her apartments, her son accompanying us. He then introduced us to his little bride, aged thirteen. His matrimonial ventures have so far been unlucky, two previous wives having died very early. This one seems a nice, bright little lady.

"Our host next led us into his fine large garden, which is all dotted over with delightful little summer houses, with picturesque double roofs much curved up and with a wealth of fine wood-carving—beautiful black wood furniture like polished ebony, with scarlet embroidered draperies; here and there a window of delicate pearly oyster-shells set in a fine lattice-work, so as to form a translucent screen. Shady trees overhang cunningly contrived miniature streams and lakes, with fanciful bridges, one of which is constructed in zig-zags, as an emblem of the much esteemed dragon. It is a wonderful garden to be the property of a private citizen, in the heart of this great crowded city!

"The dragon-bridge and the quaintly shaped portals are not the only lucky emblems which are here cherished. A couple of tame deer, which symbolize happiness, and several gorgeous peacocks, which denote exalted rank, enliven the garden. Some geese are also admitted as being emblematic of constancy, for which reason they figure among the gifts of a bridegroom to his bride.

"Returning to the house, or rather to one of its many scattered portions, we find an abundant luncheon awaiting us, but only the gentleman shared it with us. Even the fine old mother could not venture so far to depart from the customs of well bred Chinese ladies as to cross the threshold, though she just glanced in to see that we were happy.

"Leaving the gentlemen to finish their wine, we rejoined the ladies, who now, in the absence of any lord of the creation, were much more at their ease. They were sitting, as is their custom in one of their bed-rooms (also handsomely furnished with polished black wood and beautifully carved bedsteads). They gathered round us to examine such jewels as we wore, and to show us theirs, and were pleased by our admiration of their glossy hair being ornamented with artificial flowers (one had natural flowers), and valuable hairpins of gold, pearl, or jade-stone.

"But their chief pride evidently centered in their poor little "golden lily" feet, reduced to the tiniest hilt in proof of their exalted station. Of course, the so-called foot is little more than just the big toe, enclosed in a dainty wee shoe, which peeps out from beneath the silk-embroidered trousers. Whether to call attention to these beauties, or as an instinctive effort to relieve pain, I know not, but we observed that a favorite attitude in the zenana is to cross one leg over the other, and nurse the poor deformed foot in the hand.

"As they could scarcely toddle without help, their kindly-looking, strong, large-footed attendants were at hand, ready to act as walking-sticks or ponies, as might be desired."

There is a regular class of "foot-binders"—women whose profession it is to produce this horrible distortion, with the aid of long bandages of cotton cloth, and in the hands of an unskilful binder the process of torture is indefinitely prolonged. In any case there is generally great swelling of the foot and leg, and torturing corns and other forms of disease. Yet such is the force of distorted public opinion and the iron rule of fashion, that sometimes when in Christian schools, the teacher (filled with compassion for a girl who cannot work by reason of the pain she is enduring) ventures to remove the bandages, then the tears flow still faster, for to remove these destroys her prospects in life—her value in the marriage market, where she would be despised as a large-footed plebeian! The lily-foot is thus the "guinea stamp," and, moreover, is a standard of artificial beauty as decided (though by no means so injurious) as tight-lacing in some countries nearer home. Though the custom is known to have been in force for fully a thousand years, no one knows which of the legends referring to its origin is authentic.

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 126.

Theodore Parker relates an instructive incident that occurred to him in his childhood.

"I saw a little spotted turtle," he writes, "sunning itself in the shallow water. I lifted the stick in my hand to kill it; for though I had never killed any creature, yet I had seen other boys, out of sport, destroy birds, squirrels and the like, and I had a disposition to follow their example. But all at once something checked my little arm, and a voice within me said, clear and loud, 'It is wrong.' I held my uplifted stick in wonder at the new emotion, till the turtle vanished from sight.

"I hastened home, and told the tale to my mother, and asked what it was that told me it was wrong. She wiped a tear from her eye, and taking me in her arms, said, 'Some men call it conscience, but I prefer to call it the voice of God in the soul of man. If you listen and obey it, it will speak clearer and clearer, and always guide you right; but if you turn a deaf ear or disobey, then it will fade out little by little, and leave you in the dark without a guide. Your life, my son, depends on heeding that little voice.'"

The wonderful difference which it makes in the life and character of a man, whether he heeds the instructions of this Heavenly Guide, or whether he follows the path of self-indulgence and despises its teachings, is shown in a narrative furnished to the Christian Advocate of Eleventh Mo. 25th, 1886, in which Archibald S. Allison relates his own experience and that of a school-fellow. The incident which gave rise to it occurred while walking out for exercise with his son. He says:

"As we were turning a corner to go down to a bridge, from which, after a heavy rain, a fine view of the river could be seen, we met a man about my own age, so shabby and wretched-looking that my son drew back as he came near. He called me Archie, a name that my boy had seldom heard applied to his father, and I said, 'Good afternoon, Horrie!' As soon as we had passed, my son cried out, 'Why, father! how did that tramp dare to call you Archie?'"

"My answer interested him greatly. It was this: 'Edward, that tramp, as you call him, and your father were once bosom friends, chums at school, and thought as much of each other as you do of Tom Walters; and if I had not become a Christian, and he had, he might have been better than I, and I as bad as, or worse than he is.'"

"Tell me all about it," said he.' And this is the simple tale I had to tell:

"Horatio Palmer and I were born in the same place, Springfield, Mass., and our fathers were partners in business for several years. We went to the same school, and, as we each had uncles in Greenfield, we both spent part of our vacations on farms not more than two miles distant from each other. He called me Archie, and I called him Horrie.

"When we were about sixteen I learned to smoke, and taught Horrie. I have always been sorry that I learned, as it cost me a great struggle to quit, and I could not do it till my health was much harmed by it; but I am even more sorry that I taught him.

"One day he showed me a pack of cards, the first I had ever seen. After that we met by appointment, and smoked and played cards many an hour when our parents little dreamed where we were, or what we were doing.

"We did not do anything worse when together, till one day Horrie produced a flask full of brandy, of which he and I drank till we were both intoxicated. His father was out of town, and he managed to conceal it; but I could not. My uncle saw me in that condition.

"The next time he met me he talked with me a long time, and asked me many questions. He pleaded with me and begged me to stop. He showed me that I was in the sure path to ruin, and made me see it and feel it.

"I made up my mind to do only what I thought was right; what I would be willing everybody should know; and I kept praying and looking through the Bible till I found this promise, 'Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out.' When I read that I believed it, and felt that I did come and that I was not cast out.

"The next time I met Horatio I told him all about it. He laughed and joked and told funny stories until he almost made me laugh too. But when he could not quite succeed, he began to sneer at me; said that religion would do for girls; but he would have more fun yet. Finally he drew out a flask, tasted the contents, and playfully tried to make me drink. I saw that he and I must separate, and we did. I have always felt friendly to him, and used to lend him money now and then, till I found he spent it all for rum."

"By this time we passed the new building of the Fifth National Bank.

"There, Edward," said I, 'Horatio's father left him the ground on which that bank stands. It has since brought $40,000, but he drank and gambled it all away and is now not worth a penny. In the winter he stays in the Almshouse, and in the summer works just enough to get money for liquor.

"I will add this, Horatio Palmer is the wreck of one of the brightest and most prepossessing young men our section of the country ever contained. If he had given his heart to God all things would have been different."

The missionary, Ellis, who labored among the inhabitants of some of the islands in the Southern Pacific, says that the first time the inconsistency of war with the spirit of Christianity was really perceived by him, was when some of the natives who had listened to his preaching brought to him their weapons of war, and proposed to destroy them; "for," said they, "if we embrace this gospel, we can never use them more!" The influences of his early education had blinded his eyes to this inconsistency; but when his savage hearers listened to the benign precepts of Him who came to bring peace on earth, the Spirit of Christ quickly showed them that there was no place in his kingdom for war and the brutal passions it promotes; and thus made them, in this particular, wiser than their outward teacher.

Obedience to this heavenly Guide often proves the truth of the saying of the Apostle, that "Godliness is profitable for all things, having the promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come." The Christian Intelligencer tells of a dry-goods firm which fifty years ago was in active business in New York, the head of which, James Suydam, one day said to his partners, "We must restrict our operations. I find that the demands upon my time are such that I have not the requisite leisure for my religious duties, and I cannot go on in this way." The other members of the firm consented, and the reduction was made. Just two years from that time there was a great financial storm which engulfed nearly all the business houses of the city. But this firm safely outrode the storm, and found that what they had done out of religious convictions was really a matter of the soundest policy, though they were not aware of it at the time.

The following table of comparative rainfalls at various stations in the United States, showing an increase rather than a diminution during the latter years, with his interesting comments thereon, were prepared by the late Dr. George Martin of West Chester, Pa., and originally contributed by him to the Delaware County Institute of Science, in Fourth Mo. 1882. It is thought desirable, by at least one of his friends, that they should be preserved in the columns of "The Friend."

Delaware Co., Pa.

A Summary of the Rainfall for a series of years at Ten Stations in the United States.

The influence upon the climate of the denudation of the land of its timber, has excited the interest of many persons, and numerous statements have been put forth giving the result upon the rainfall and the drying up of the streams. As most of these are based upon theory, and not upon accurate observation, the following tables have been prepared from the Record of the Pennsylvania Hospital, Philadelphia, and from the published tables of the rainfall in the United States, by the Smithsonian Institution, as a contribution toward a more exact knowledge. From these it will be seen, that in all but one of the ten stations given, the mean rainfall of the first half of the series is less than that of the last; and in this exceptional case, the mean of the first 27½ years of a period extending from 1814 to 1867, inclusive, is only $\frac{24}{100}$ of an inch in excess, while at Philadelphia in a series of 57 years, from 1825 to 1881, the last half is $3\frac{1}{100}$ inches in excess of the first. It is to be presumed that no one will doubt but that the number of acres of woodland were very much less in the vicinity of these stations during the later years of observation; and if so, the destruction of the timber cannot have diminished the amount of rain.

The "Dewpoint," or proportion of moisture in the air, has been found to be greater in a wood than in the open fields, but this probably results from obstruction to the currents of air by the trees, which prevents the exhalations from the leaves and ground from being rapidly carried away, and can have but little if any influence in causing rain, although it might possibly change the course of a local storm passing near it. Ground rich in humus, as it is in old woodlands that have not often been burned over, is very retentive of moisture, and rain falling on it would be largely absorbed, which would lessen the amount to run off and diminish the freshets; but that it would increase the flow of the springs is not so certain. I have no means of reliably ascertaining the changes that have taken place in the volume of the streams during the years noted, and the opinion varies greatly among the older people as to whether they have diminished or not; most of them, however, thinking that they have, but memory is a very unreliable guide, and it is greatly to be desired that some of our Scientific Associations should establish a system of measurements by which, in after years, the truth could be determined.

The Stations noted* were selected as having the fewest omissions and longest records, and without reference to any theory on the subject.

* West Chester, the last Station on the list, was not included with the previous nine to which the concluding paragraph more particularly refers, but was noted in a supplementary paper. The observations and record at that place, which was the home of the doctor, were probably made by himself.

The practical question in reference to ancestry is, not whether a man has reason to be proud of his ancestors, but whether his ancestors would have reason to be proud of their descendants. S. S. Times.

LINES
For "The Friend."
Composed by MARTHA A. WILSON, while at Friends' Boarding School, near Barnesville, Ohio.

Calendar of Eighteen Earnest,
Hanging here upon the wall,
One by one thy leaves have fallen,
And to-night, the last must fall;

For the ticking, ticking, ticking,
Of the time-piece in thy room
Warns thee, that at hour of mid-night
Thou shalt meet thy final doom.

Thou thy mission hast accomplished,
And we hear this voice from thee:
"I am going, only going,
Where my predecessors be;

To the silence and the darkness
Which no mortal eye may scan;
Going only in obedience
To the universal plan.

Only one short year I've lingered,
In my place upon the wall;
Every month one leaf has fallen,
And to-night the last must fall.

My companions all have left me,
I must meet my fate alone;
Yet I would not linger longer,
Or my present state bemoan.

But to mortals watching by me,
I have something I would say;
Something I would have you ponder
As you journey day by day.

It is this: 'I go before you,
And ye all shall follow me;
As my summons comes at mid-night,
So your summons, too, may be.

Hourly have I watched the coming
And the going of the few
Who within these walls have gathered,
For a purpose high and true.

And have kept a daily record
Of events I've witnessed here;
This I leave you, read the pages,
All are traced distinct and clear.

What to you has been forgotten,
You will find my records bear,
Words ye've spoken, deeds committed,
Written with the greatest care.

Some there are, ye'll greet with gladness,
Some there are ye'll meet with pain;
Resolutions, kept or broken,
Sometimes loss and sometimes gain.

Seeds that you have strewn around you
All unconsciously while here;
You will see have grown and blossomed,
And a harvest doth appear.

As the sowing, so the reaping,
Some of good, and some of ill;
Progress either up or downward,
Never any standing still!

But I now must cease my speaking,
For the midnight hour draws near;
And I leave you, sadly leave you
To the swiftly coming year—

My successor, who stands waiting
At the portals of the door,
Only waiting for the echo,
'Thou shalt know thy place no more.'

'Know thy place no more forever,
Through the ages yet to be,'
Is the sad and solemn sentence
Borne on airy wings to me.'

On the Big Horn.

[In the disastrous battle on the Big Horn River, in which General Custer and his entire force were slain, the chief Rain-in-the-Face was one of the fiercest leaders of the Indians. In Longfellow's poem on the massacre these lines will be remembered:

"Revenge?" cried Rain-in-the-Face,
"Revenge upon all the race
Of the White Chief with yellow hair!"
And the mountains dark and high
From their crags re-echoed the cry
Of his anger and despair.

He is now a man of peace; and the agent at Standing Rock, Dakota, writes September 28th, 1886: "Rain-in-the-Face is very anxious to go to Hampton. I fear he is too old, but he desires very much to go."

The years are but half a score,
And the war-whoop sounds no more
With the blast of bugles, where Straight into a slaughter pen,
With his doomed three hundred men,
Rode the chief with the yellow hair.

Oh Hampton, down by the sea!
What voice is beseeching thee
For the scholar's lowliest place?
Can this be the voice of him
Who fought on the Big Horn's rim?
Can this be Rain-in-the-Face?
* * * * *

O chief of the Christ-like school!
Can the zeal of thy heart grow cool
When the victor scarred with fight
Like a child for thy guidance craves,
And the faces of hunters and braves
Are turning to thee for light?

The hatchet lies overgrown
With grass by the Yellowstone,
Wind River and Paw of Bear;
And, in sign that foes are friends,
Each lodge like a peace-pipe sends
Its smoke in the quiet air.

The hands that have done the wrong
To right the wronged are strong,
And the voice of a nation saith:
"Enough of the war of swords,
Enough of the lying words
And shame of a broken faith!"
* * * * *

The Ute and the wandering Crow
Shall know as the white men know,
And fare as the white men fare;
The pale and the red shall be brothers,
One's rights shall be as another's,
Home, school and House of Prayer!

O mountains that climb to snow,
O river winding below,
Through meadows by war once trod,
O wild waste lands that await
The harvest exceeding great,
Break forth into praise of God!

—John G. Whittier.

The Work of the Spirit.—Canon Hoare, in speaking of the co-operation of the Holy Spirit in the work of the ministry says it "produces a holy solemnity throughout the Church. Do we not sometimes know what it is to have a solemn sense of the presence of God in the midst of us? When Solomon's temple was consecrated, 'the glory of Jehovah filled the house of God,' and I verily believe that there is something of the same kind very often experienced amongst ourselves. It is something that cannot be produced by natural means, such as music, or even good reading, for it is supernatural, being the direct result of the Holy Spirit working with his people. It is experienced, though it cannot be defined; it is felt, though not understood; it is an undoubted reality, though not produced by any human instrumentality. It was well described by three infidels who were sent over by an infidel club at Leeds to hear old Henry Venn preaching at Huddersfield, who went back and reported to their infidel friends, 'Truly God is in that place, though we know Him not.' When this is mercifully bestowed by the Spirit we shall feel no necessity for all the artificial stimulants which it is the fashion to introduce in order to bring about what people call 'a lively service.' What we really want is not so much a lively service as a living one, and this life can only be found in the companionship and co-operation of 'the Spirit that quickeneth,' that Spirit described in our creed as 'The Lord and Giver of life.'"

For "The Friend."

Samuel J. Smith.

I noticed in last week's issue, a small poem supposed to be written by the Friend whose name stands at the head of this article. He deceased about a half a century ago; and I well remember, whilst a school-boy, of occasionally passing by his residence, "Hickory Grove," situated on the road leading from Rancocas to Burlington—about a mile from the latter place.

In the published Memoirs of Thomas Kite, he speaks of paying a visit to Hickory Grove, the then residence of a sister of the deceased, but it should have been his cousin.

Samuel Joseph Smith lived a somewhat secluded life, seldom going from home; but he was nevertheless well posted in all that was current in literature and politics. He might be called a shy man, mixing little with the world; and, like the Bard of Mantua, would go out of his way to avoid meeting people; but few were more interested in the welfare of the whole human family. He seldom rode to meeting, preferring to walk; but he always kept a coach for his friends and those travelling in truth's service. English Friends were particularly desirous of partaking of his hospitality, and were charmed by his brilliant conversation and instructed with the variety and extent of his information. During his lifetime, it was said he wrote, or at least published too little; and after his death a collection of his writings appeared which possess considerable merit. He cared little for fame, but his memory is revered by his friends; and few have been a brighter example of disinterested benevolence.

The agency of secret societies such as the Ku-Klux Klan in fomenting disorders, and in preventing the resumption of amicable relations in the Southern States, after the civil war, is well known. Within a few months there has been reported from South Carolina the existence of an oath-bound organization among some of the colored people, their object being that of plunder, all being bound to murder the person who should detect them in the committal of their misdeeds. Iniquitous as is such an association among the negroes, it is paralleled by that of the Panhandle conspiracy (just revealed) among the trainmen of a portion of the Pennsylvania Railroad, west of Pittsburg. Systematic plunder was their purpose, and death on the rail (as alleged) the penalty to be visited upon any member who should expose the workings of the conspirators in any particular.

There seems to be no doubt that secret societies have operated to perpetuate Ireland's social and political grievances as much or more than any other agency. A late writer upon Irish Home Rule, Archibald McCullagh, states that two preliminary steps seemed essential to the solution of the Irish problem. The first was the breaking up of the large estates, best accomplished by a law abolishing primogeniture and entail. "The second thing," he says, "which Ireland needs is a more amicable and Christian spirit between Roman Catholics and Protestants. They are lamentably deficient in this particular. Good men should aim to suppress such secret societies as Orangeism and Ribbonism as detrimental to the best interests of society, inasmuch as they feed the fires of religious bigotry, and tend to produce social disorder."

The secrecy feature of the Knights of Labor organization has been much under discussion. Recently the official organ of the order declared, upon this point: "The only secret it has is the names and persons of its members, and if the Church will secure the abolition of the black-listing system practiced by employers and by which a known Knight of Labor is unable to get work, we will abolish the password, and make all our meetings open. The order has no secrets; its object and purposes are published to the world daily." Nevertheless, more light is needed upon this matter. The ways of the Knights of Labor do not meet with the same approval in the eyes of disinterested people, as do the open methods of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. These seem to be animated by a more fraternal animus than do the "knights."

Another wide-spread secret organization, which bodes no good to the country, is that one of a military character known as the Grand Army of the Republic. Not to incur the displeasure and lose the votes of this great order, has influenced a great deal of unwise legislation in Congress and the State Legislatures. Perhaps no veto by any President ever met with the more cordial approval of people of all parties (not directly interested in the measure) than did that of the late wholesale pensioning bill. Yet the State Encampment of Illinois, in the arrogance of its presumed power, was so bold as to resolve: "That this Encampment, directly representing 26,000 veteran soldiers of Illinois, demand that Congress pass the so-called Disability Pension bill, the veto of the President notwithstanding, as an act vital to the interests and honor of the country," &c.

College Fraternities, with a secrecy basis, make many of our young men early familiar with the taking of an oath, and, it is probable, pave the way for their induction into the so-called beneficial, secret societies, especially that of the Freemasons. One who has examined into the matter states, that where the college fraternities thrive and prosper, the interest in the regular college literary societies decreases. The secret fraternities partake more of the nature of clubs; they must have their annual banquets, at great expense; their badges or other insignia, set with precious stones, and of course very costly. For such baubles a parent may struggle for the education of his son, and a whole family make sacrifices the year through. The initiation ceremonies, like those of their seniors, are such as are not becoming intelligent, dignified persons.

The managers of Harvard College have lately been obliged to take action against a secret fraternity of that institution, as its initiatory ceremonies included so dangerous and injurious a performance as jumping blindfolded into water of unknown depth, even in the winter season. Some years ago, a student of the college, while being initiated, was told that at the end of his journey he must jump off a precipice. Before reaching the place the young man became unconscious, and was so seriously affected mentally that he was obliged to leave college, and for years was afflicted with trouble of the brain.

Before concluding, it may be well to state that the following religious denominations, in addition to Friends and Mennonites, disapprove of or condemn all secret societies. They are the Free Methodists, Wesleyans, Scandinavian Conferences of the Lutherans, Disciples (in part), Christian Reformed, Dunkers or German Baptists, Primitive, Seventh-day, and Scandinavian Baptists, Seventh-day Adventists, Moravians, Plymouth Brethren, Associate, Reformed, and United Presbyterians, United Brethren in Christ, and some local congregations principally of the Congregationalists and (regular) Baptists.

Summing up the matter, we conclude that secret societies are needless to the Christian, as they are wasteful and expensive in the distribution of their income. They are at variance with the duties we owe the Church as well as the home. Uniting with them, we become unequally yoked in a sworn brotherhood with unbelievers, contrary to the counsel of the Apostle; and where religious ceremonies are part of the ritual, the name of Christ is frequently suppressed. Such associations tend to selfishly build up a privileged class, and are liable to be so misused as to defeat the ends of justice. Their oaths in many cases are unlawful and sacrilegious, and their penalties barbarous, vindictive, and murderous. Their titles, attire and ceremonies, lead away from that simplicity which is in Christ. Obviously a Friend has no place in the "lodge" of a secret association.

For "The Friend."

A Reminiscence of Christopher Healy.

There are, no doubt, many who did fully respond to what was said in "The Friend" of Fourth Mo. 2nd, 1887, relative to the instructive memoir of Christopher Healy.

"He describes the first occasion on which he attended a 'Friends' meeting,' being then not quite 15 years old." "There have been few ministers of modern times who have labored more extensively and effectively in their Master's cause. There are, we believe, many of our readers who can recall with tender emotions the precious baptizing power of Christ that attended his ministry."

The above brought very freshly to remembrance a remarkable meeting appointed by him in 1843, which was largely attended; many of the company were not members with us. He arose with the language, "Men and brethren, what shall we do to be saved?" opening clearly our views as a religious Society. He said, "he was aware there was a variety of beliefs, and felt willing to express his." Also some of our testimonies were clearly opened. He spoke in an impressive manner on war; also of the names of the days, and of the months,—“some of them derived from heathen names.” Another subject he mentioned, was that of giving flattering titles unto men:” he said, “we do not read in the Bible of Mr. Paul, Peter or John, but simply their names,” &c.

He arose the second time, saying: “There was another subject that had impressed his mind unexpectedly, and some might think it strange to mention it in a religious meeting”—“it was of so much precious time wasted in reading newspapers.” He said, “he was not going to say it was wrong to read some parts, but it was a great mixture; and some parts might be called pernicious reading.” “In travelling about he had been pained to see those advanced in life, whose locks were white with age, and whose time could not be long here, poring over the news,” and “whether after reading their Bibles, they felt like taking up the newspaper;” and added, “he did not want any one to immediately decide or come to a conclusion in this matter, but to think of it in the silent watches of the night, when their heads were laid on their pillows," &c. After a solemn silence the meeting closed.

Would it not be well for some in this day to consider the last mentioned subject, and not give too much time to reading such, and thereby destroy the relish for something better?

There is much to be found in the approved writings of Friends, which will strengthen the good desires often raised in the heart, to follow their dear Lord and Master; and as any are obedient to His "still small voice," they will be made "quick of understanding in His holy fear," and ability given to follow on "in the footsteps of the flock of Christ's companions."

Unsent Prophets.

"I have not sent these prophets, yet they ran; I have not spoken to them, yet they prophesied." It is written, "How shall they preach except they be sent?" and for ages men have been trying to answer that question, but with indifferent success. Men may be voluble, eloquent, popular, and persuasive; they may be invited, called, petted, and flattered, and yet their lives prove fruitless, and their ministry a delusion and a snare, unless they are sent of the Lord God.

Every servant of God is sent. The Lord appoints him for his work, tells him what to do, and where and how to do it; and the man who is obedient to this heavenly call of God labors effectually and will be honored, and owned of God in his work. But the man who is not sent, though he may be called and salaried, will not be blessed and prospered of the Lord. The world may approve him, but in the great day of God he shall hear the solemn words, "I never knew you."

How many persons there are who, though they assume to preach the gospel, can neither feed the flock of God nor win sinners to Christ! They are not sent; and the worldliness, starvation and death which pervades the churches where they minister, furnish abundant evidence of the fact. They are of the world. Their desires and hopes are worldly; they seek to please men and, are not the servants of Christ. Whatever they may have, they lack the unction of the Holy One, the power of the Spirit of the Lord of Hosts. God has not called them nor commissioned them; he does not strengthen them or bless them; he will not crown their labors with fruitfulness, nor bestow on them his glorious reward.

This may seem to some a light thing, a matter of individual choice; men may suppose that the ministry of God's Word is a trade to be learned, a profession to be chosen, an office to be sought; but such persons "do greatly err, not knowing the Scriptures, nor the power of God." Would it be a light thing for a man to represent himself as the ambassador of a king who never knew him and never commissioned him? Would it be a light thing in business, for a man to claim to be agent and representative of a person who had never given him authority or mentioned his name? Would it be a trivial matter for a man to transact business, and make agreements and treaties in behalf of some mighty potentate, who had given him no authority whatever for so doing? And shall it be esteemed a trivial matter for a man to palm himself off as a servant of the Lord Almighty without authority, endorsement or recognition from on high? Let us solemnly inquire concerning this matter, and see to it that we have the Lord's call and the Lord's commission, and then we may hope to have the Lord's benediction on our labors, making them fruitful to the glory of his name.—Herald of Truth.

"I appeal to the consciences and understandings of all impartial people, if our belief be not the most just, merciful and true, that however it pleased God to send his Son, a light into the world, at that time more eminently than before, yet that He was so far spiritually manifested in all ages, as the Word of God nigh in the heart, and great commandment in the consciences of men, as [that those] who believed and obeyed, obtained remission of sins and eternal salvation. This is clear; for if no man could ever see or know the Father but the Son, and he to whom the Son reveals Him, then because many of the holy ancients both spiritually saw and knew God (otherwise they could never be saved) it follows, that Christ did in all ages reveal God."—Wm. Penn.

Natural History, Science, &c.

A Floating Island.—One of the wonders of Henry's Lake is the floating island, says a correspondent of the San Francisco Call, writing from the Snake River country of Idaho. When we camped at night a lovely island was within a stone's throw of us. We decided to explore it in the morning. The soft green carpet, the drooping willows and stiff little pines, so near the shining surface of the cool blue water, filled us with a desire to rest in their shade. When morning came the island was gone. Five miles away we could see the little trees waving in the wind that had wafted them to the opposite side of the lake. The wind changed, however, and the mysterious island came on its daily orbit and rested, while all nature was hushed that lovely afternoon near where we had first seen it. We paddled a raft of logs to its border. It was circular in shape, and 300 feet in diameter. The outer edge was a tough sward, and so thin that it gave down under the weight of a man and let him into the water boot-top deep. A few feet from the edge it would support the weight of a horse. The floating mass was found to be a mat of grass roots overspread with a thin layer of decayed vegetable matter. The small trees rocked and swayed from side to side as we walked around them. As we approached the island a large number of swans were seen to swim away. There seem to be two kinds—white and gray. Their guttural calls could be heard five miles. In the wake of some that evidently were filling the office of mother, as they floated majestically away, were following the cygnets, fluffy and round like bunches of tow. In the grass near us was a swan fluttering and crying as she stretched out her long neck and spread out her broad white wings. She splashed into the water when we were twenty-five feet distant and disappeared. When we next saw her she was far out on the lake swimming rapidly, with three or four very small young ones close behind. She had managed to get them out of the nest and into the water and they had followed her. They were not one day old. In the nest from which they had been hurried were five eggs not yet hatched. Two white, soft, flat bills had just broken through the hard shell.

An Extensive Farm.—In the extreme southwest corner of Louisiana lies one of the largest producing farms in the world. It runs 100 miles north and south and is owned and operated by a syndicate of Northern capitalists. Their general manager, J. B. Watkins gives an interesting account of this gigantic plantation. "The 1,500,000 acres of our tract," he said, "was purchased in 1883 from the State of Louisiana, and from the United States government. At that time it was a vast grazing land for the cattle of the few dealers of the neighborhood. When I took possession I found over 10,000 head of half-wild horses and cattle. My work was to divide the immense tract into convenient pastures, establishing stations or ranches every six miles. The fencing alone cost in the neighborhood of $50,000. The land is found to be best adapted to rice, sugar, corn and cotton. All our cultivating, ditching, &c., is done by steam power. We take a tract, say half a mile wide, for instance, and place an engine on each side. The engines are portable and operate a cable attached to four ploughs, and under this arrangement we are able to plough thirty acres a day with only the labor of three men. Our harrowing, planting, and other cultivating is done in a like manner; in fact, there is not a single draught horse on the entire place. We have, of course, horses for the herders of cattle, of which we now have 16,000 head. The Southern Pacific Railroad runs for thirty-six miles through our farm. We have three steamboats operating on the waters of our own estate, upon which there are 300 miles of navigable waters. We have an ice-house, a bank, a shipyard and a rice mill."—St. Louis Republican.

Pressure of Gas in Gas-wells.—In a paper on the pressure and composition of natural gas, read before the Engineers' Club. Dr. H. M. Chance stated that there are no records of the gas-pressure first shown by the larger wells. The recorded pressures were nearly all observed after the gas had been blowing off for some weeks, months, or even years; and the pressure then shown by a gauge is evidently no measure of the pressure under which the gas exists in the rock, for the gas soon becomes exhausted from the immediate vicinity of the well, which then draws its supply from a considerable distance, and perhaps through bands of rock of such texture—and perhaps even through the clay filling of crevices—that the pressure shown at the well may be only a fraction of the actual pressure. Hence, while recorded pressures range from about 600 down to 200 pounds per square inch, there is every reason to believe that the actual pressures are perhaps from 500 to 1000 pounds per square inch, or even in some cases much greater, but still being less than the maximum as limited by depth. This maximum is very much less than the pressure necessary to effect liquefaction, and the supposition that the gas exists as a liquid must therefore be abandoned.

The Bulrush Caterpillar.—Among the most curious productions of New Zealand is the singular plant (called by the natives Awheto), the Spheria Robertia, or bulrush caterpillar. If nature ever takes revenges, one might imagine this to be a case of retaliation. Caterpillars live upon plants, devouring not only leaves, but bark, fruit, pith, root and seeds; in short, every form of vegetable life is drawn upon by these voracious robbers. And here comes a little seed that seems to say, "Turn about is fair play," and lodges on the wrinkled neck of the caterpillar, just at the time when he, satisfied with his thefts in the vegetable kingdom, goes out of sight, to change into a chrysalis and sleep his way into a new dress and a new life. A vain hope. The seed has the situation. It sends forth its tiny green stem, draws its life from the helpless caterpillar, and not only sends up its little shoot with the bulrush-stem capped with a tiny cat-tail, but fills with its root the entire body of its victim, changing it into a white, pith-like vegetable substance. This, however, preserves the exact shape of the caterpillar. It is nut-like in substance, and is eaten by the natives with great relish.—Julia P. Ballard in St. Nicholas.

Wood Alcohol.—Improvements having been made in the refining of wood alcohol, it is being largely used, it is said, to replace the ordinary alcohol. Fears have lately been expressed that it is being used in pharmacy as a substitute for alcohol in tinctures.

The Blue-jay.—In the Atlantic Monthly, Olive Thorn Miller describes in a lively manner the habits of a tame blue-jay, especially its strong propensity to bury small objects out of sight—a survival probably of that natural instinct which leads it in a wild state to bury acorns and nuts. She says, "Nothing can be droller than the air of concern with which he goes around the floor, picking up any small thing he finds—a burnt match, a small key, stray pins, or a marble, and seeks the very best and most secluded spot in the room in which to hide it. A pin he takes lengthwise in his month. He has no doubt about the best place for that; he long ago decided that between the leaves of a book is safest. So he proceeds at once to find a convenient volume, and thrusts the pin far in out of sight. A match gives him the most trouble. The place usually decided upon is an opening between the breadths of matting. It is amusing when he chanced to get hold of a box of matches, accidentally left open, for he feels the necessity and importance of disposing of each one. It is not so pleasing, however, when, in his hammering, he sets one off, as he often does; for they are parlor matches, and light with a small explosion, which frightens him half out of his wits. He finds the oddest hiding-places, as in a casket, between the wheel and in its frame; up inside the seat of a stuffed chair, to reach which he flies up on to the webbing and goes up among the springs; in the side of my slipper, while on my feet; in the loop of a bow; in the plaits of a ruffie; under a pillow. Often, when I get up, a shower of the jay's treasures falls from various hiding-places about my dress,—nails, matches, shoe-buttons, and others."

Items.

—Bigotry.—Leases on the estate of the Earl of Hchester, the Lord Lieutenant of the County of Dorset, (England) are said to contain the following clause: "And he (the lessee), his executors, administrators or assigns, or either of them, shall not permit, or suffer to be erected or established on the said hereby demised premises, or any part thereof, any chapel, meeting-house or other edifice, or apply any building at present thereon for the assembly or worship of any sect of Dissenters from, or Non-conformists with, the Church of England, whether Presbyterians, Independents, Anabaptists, Quakers, Methodists, or of any other denomination whatsoever."—The British Friend.

—Peace of Europe.—The London Friend quotes from the Family Herald as follows: "The conditions of life are gradually changing, and the very madness which has made Europe into a huge barrack may work its own cure. The burden will probably grow so intolerable that the most imbruted of citizens will ask themselves why they bear it, and a rapid revolution may undo the work of centuries."

In commenting on this, it remarks that, there are symptoms that the present military system is becoming increasingly unpopular; but it adds, "If our hopes are justly raised as we observe these things, should we not also tremble?"

"Slavery might have been abolished in the United States without bloodshed, long before it was, if only the Christian churches, North and South, had done their duty, and honestly endeavored to suppress it. We know how far they were from doing this, and how fearful the consequences have been. Is it not the same now in Europe—in England—with regard to war? If the churches now would do their part faithfully, who can say what benign results would follow?"

—“Spiritual Mediums.”—Bills have been introduced into the Legislatures of Pennsylvania and New Jersey, making it unlawful for spiritual mediums (so-called) to pursue their deceptive practices for gain.

—Capital Punishment.—In Maine, imprisonment for life is substituted for the death penalty in cases of murder.

—Congress of Christians on Secret Societies.—A call was issued, signed by numerous prominent clergymen and professors of various denominations, for a "National Christian Congress;" which was held at Chicago on the 30th of Third Month, "to consider the nature and principles of the secret lodge system, and its influence on the Christian religion and civil liberty."

—A Methodist Meeting-house among the Aztec Indians.—The municipal authorities of Zachiapulo, an old Aztec town among the Sierras of Mexico, had given a large lot to the Methodists, on which they had erected a meeting-house designed for the use of the Indians. Bishop John F. Hurst was present at its dedication. "It was filled with people, of whom he says [in The Independent], "I doubt if there was one complete Spanish auditor in the assembly. The people were Indians, descendants of the very Aztecs whom Cortez found here three centuries and a half ago, and whose offspring has occupied these mountains ever since. There is no such prejudice against Protestant missionary work among them as exists among the intensely Spanish Mexicans, where the Roman Catholics still hold large sway."

"Our service was peculiar in many respects. The old Aztec tongue, which in literature is commonly called here Lengua Mejicana, is the language of the home and of business. Many understand Spanish, but the most do not, and all prefer to use the dear old speech of Montezuma's day, when no Cortez had caught sight of the sandy dunes where Vera Cruz now stands."

Bishop Hurst's address, delivered in English, was translated into Spanish by one man, and then retranslated into Aztec by another who knew not the English language.

This meeting-house is said to be the first Protestant one in Mexico for the exclusive use of Indians in the old Aztec language. The dealings of their Spanish conquerors with the Indian races of Mexico have not been productive of good will, and the Indian view, everywhere, is drifting away from Romanism, and all the doors are now open for work among the Mexican Indians, who number, to-day, three-fifths of the twelve millions constituting the population of the Republic. Certainly this introduction of the Gospel by American Protestants, among the Aztecs of Mexico, is one of the ironies of history. The Spanish Inquisitor is gone, and Protestants from the United States are coming in to take his place."

—Japanese and Chinese.—The Bishop of Shanghai says, that the difficulty of spreading the Gospel in Japan, consists in a "too inquiring and skeptical mind," but in China "in complete indifference, and a feeling that the Chinese possess and know all that is worth possessing or knowing."

—Paid Preachers.—An editorial article in The Independent, in speaking of the difficulty that exists in supplying ministers for small congregations, says:

"We have been long convinced that the error lies in the assumption that an ordained pastor must always expect to live from the Gospel. If these country parishes are to be provided with efficient pastors, they must, in many cases, be men who get their own living chiefly as their people do, as farmers or mechanics."

The Society of Friends is happily freed from the perplexities that beset many others; since it holds the doctrine that it is the prerogative of the Head of the Church to qualify and send whom He pleases into the work of the ministry; and that the preparation for this service is wrought by his own Spirit in the hearts of his servants, and does not prevent them from earning their own livelihood by the labor of their hands.

Crooked Habits.—While shaking hands with an old man the other day, we noticed that some of his fingers were bent quite inward, and he had not the power of straightening them. Alluding to this fact, he said, "In these crooked fingers there is a good text for a talk to children. For fifty years I used to drive the stage coach, and these bent fingers show the effects of holding the reins for so many years."

THE FRIEND.

FOURTH MONTH 23, 1887.

PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING.

The meeting of Ministers and Elders convened on 7th day (Fourth Month 16th.) Several strangers were in attendance. The meeting was a comfortable one, in which there was no long communication; yet a number of Friends briefly expressed the concerns and exercises which had rested on their minds. Some of these were in the line of encouragement to those who were under burthens. Others were in the direction of upholding the testimony of our Society to the right qualification for the exercise of Gospel ministry—even the immediate extension of the Divine command, and of the Heavenly help which the Lord administers to those whom He calls into his service.

The meetings for worship on the First-day of the week, in the different meeting-houses in the city were largely attended and some of them were satisfactory, and indeed, very favored occasions; but it was distressing to those who believe in the truth of the doctrines held by our Society, to hear proclaimed (not however by our own ministers) in one or more instances sentiments such as the Yearly Meeting of Philadelphia has repeatedly borne testimony against, and the tendency of which, if permitted without rebuke, would be to introduce into our borders the same confusion and divisions which have attended their promulgation in other parts.

On Second-day, the 18th instant, after the opening business, the meeting was informed that an epistle had come to hand from a Yearly Meeting in Kansas. As there had been no correspondence heretofore between Philadelphia Yearly Meeting and this body, it was referred, according to the custom in such cases, to a committee for examination.

The Minutes of the Meeting for Sufferings were then read, they showed the continuance of active efforts to disseminate a knowledge of the principles of Truth, by the preparation and dissemination of suitable books and pamphlets. They had printed during the year editions of the memorial of Abigail W. Hall, Youthful Piety, Memoirs of James Gough and Christopher Healy, Letters of John Thorp, The Testimony of the Society of Friends in America in 1830, and the Essay on Religious Labor adopted by the Yearly Meeting a year ago. Of the latter, more than 17,000 copies had been distributed. In addition to these, about 3000 volumes and 2000 pamphlets had been sold or given away, and sent to various parts of our country.

The acknowledgments which had been received from various places, manifest that there are many in different parts of the Society who unite with the principles laid down in the Essay on Religious Labor; although many of those who have departed from our ancient manner of worship, oppose the doctrines which condemn their practices.

Two appropriations had been made during the past year out of the Charleston Estate, to aid in building or repairing meeting-houses—one of $400 to Cane Creek Monthly Meeting, and one of $200 to Holly Spring Monthly Meeting, both in North Carolina. In both cases, the Trustees had received assurances that the meetings held in the houses which were repaired or rebuilt, were held in accordance with the former practices of Friends.

The Report of the Trustees under the will of Charles Willits, contained in these Minutes, set forth, that their efforts had largely been directed to the preparation and issuing of a monthly periodical called "The African's Friend," of which 5000 copies are printed; and the distribution of this and of tracts selected from those published by the Tract Association of Friends of Philadelphia, in the Southern States and in Liberia, Africa.

A concern had arisen in the Meeting for Sufferings lest the retaliatory measures in reference to the Canadian Fisheries, which the President had been authorized by an Act of the late Congress to enter upon, might lead to increased ill-feeling between the two countries, unless exercised in a moderate and Christian spirit. This had led to the preparation of a suitable address to him, which was personally delivered by two members of the committee, who had a satisfactory interview.

That body had also been brought under exercise on account of the military spirit which seems to be spreading in our country; and on account of the demoralizing exhibitions, and other evils that abound in the City of Philadelphia; but no definite action had yet been taken on either of these subjects.

The proceedings of the Meeting for Sufferings during the year were very satisfactory to the Yearly Meeting. Approval was expressed both of their efforts to spread a knowledge of our doctrines and principles; and of their care to testify against the evils which threaten the prosperity of our people.

A committee was appointed to examine and settle the accounts of the Treasurer.

A report was then read from the Committee appointed by last Yearly Meeting on the subject of certificates of removal, as sent up for consideration by Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting. This contained four regulations designed to relieve Monthly Meetings of some of the difficulties in which they are placed by the present disorganized condition of Society. These were separately considered, and with much unanimity adopted, there being but a slight expression of disapproval with any of them.

The remaining proceedings of the Yearly Meeting, it is expected will be given in our next number.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, in his quarterly report just issued, says: "In round numbers the consumption of distilled spirits, domestic and imported, in this country is shown to have increased from 43,000,000 gallons in 1840, to 72,000,000 in 1886; of wines from 4,800,000 gallons to 22,000,000, and of malt liquors from 23,000,000 to 642,000,000. The consumption per capita during the same period decreased, as regards distilled spirits, from about two and a half gallons to about one and a-quarter gallons, and increased as regards wines from twenty-nine hundredths to thirty-eight hundredths gallons, and malt liquors from less than one and a-half to more than eleven gallons."

On the morning of the 18th instant, about 3000 carpenters in Chicago resumed work on the basis of eight hours and 35 cents per hour.

Governor Hill, of New York, on the 12 instant, sent to the Assembly a veto of the Crosby High License bill. He objects to the bill that it is special legislation, in that it applies to only two cities of the State—New York and Brooklyn—and that its forfeiture clause is clearly unconstitutional.

The Catholic News, of New York, under date of Rome, Fourth Mo. 18th, has the following cable despatch:

"The Pope has decided the question of the Knights of Labor in favor of that organization. This decision will stand so long as the present method pursued in furthering their aims prevails. The document of Cardinal Gibbons has been endorsed. The Pope further decides that in Canada, where a mandament had been issued against the Knights, the members of the Order will receive absolution on promise of obedience to future decisions of the Holy See. If the Knights identify themselves with theories now being disseminated by certain agitators, this decision in their favor will be revoked."

On the 13th instant, two Friends deputed by our Meeting for Sufferings, called upon the President, and presented an address advocating a settlement of the Canadian fishery question "by arbitration or in some other peaceable way," and deprecates any action under the provisions of the Retaliatory bill which might possibly result in war and bloodshed. It also protests against the use of the public funds for fortifications, naval vessels and munitions of war. The President promised the committee that he would give the subject full consideration.

The prairie fire in Kansas, which started in Graham County, has swept northward into Norton County, making a path from 2½ to 7 miles wide, "a great roaring sea of flame rolling in tremendous sheets under the impetus of the high wind which prevailed all day and night." Thousands of cattle, thousands of tons of produce, and over one hundred houses and barns have been consumed, and, it is said, fifteen human beings have perished.

A tornado passed over the country between St. Clairsville, Ohio, and Wheeling, West Virginia, a distance of ten miles, on the afternoon of the 15th instant. A funnel-shaped cloud, with cone downward, struck St. Clairsville at 3.15 P. M., and travelled eastward, demolishing houses and levelling trees and telegraph poles. Martin's Ferry suffered more severely than St. Clairsville, and five persons were injured, two perhaps fatally. Other casualties were reported at different points, but no loss of life. Comparatively little damage was done in Wheeling, the town being sheltered by high hills.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 591, which was 141 more than during the previous week, and 152 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the whole number 303 were males and 288 females; 299 adults and 292 minors; 67 died of consumption; 78 of pneumonia; 35 of diseases of the heart; 32 of measles; 31 of inflammation of the brain; 32 of convulsions; 25 of old age; 19 of marasmus; 18 of bronchitis; 22 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 17 of typhoid fever; 16 of Bright's disease, and 11 of croup.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½'s, 110¼; 4's, 129¼; 3's, 101; currency 6's, 126 a 136.

Cotton sold in a small way to spinners, at 10¼ cts. for middling uplands.

Petroleum was quiet at 6½ cts. for 70 Abel test in barrels, and 8½ cts. for 110 test in cases.

Flour and Meal.—Flour was steady, but without activity. Sales of 125 barrels Pennsylvania family, at $3.75; 250 barrels Ohio, clear, at $4; 125 barrels do, straight, $4.40; 375 barrels winter patent, at $4.50 a $4.75; 125 barrels Minnesota, clear, at $4.20; and 500 barrels do, patent, at $4.70 a $4.90. Rye flour sold in a small way at $2.75 a $2.85 per barrel as to quality.

Grain.—Wheat, No. 2 red closed at 92½ cts. bid and 92½ cts. asked. No. 2 mixed corn closed at 46½ cts. bid and 46½ cts. asked. No. 2 white oats closed at 37½ cts. bid and 38 cts. asked.

Beef cattle were fairly active at 4 a 5½ cts. Sheep were inactive at 4½ a 6 cts. for wool, 3½ a 4½ cts. for sheared.

Hogs were dull. Western, 8¼ a 8½ cts.

FOREIGN.—Sir George Trevelyan, one of the Unionist leaders, and formerly Chief Secretary for Ireland, has written a letter on the coercion bill which is tantamount to a manifesto against that measure.

On the night of the 16th instant, the Marquis of Hartington made a speech at Edinburgh in which he stated his conviction that the time had not yet arrived when it was possible for the Unionists to act as a party or to propose a final solution of the difficulty. Before that time arrives the revolutionary party in Ireland, supported by the still more revolutionary party in America, must be confronted and overthrown.

"That conflict," the speaker said, "is now being renewed and must be decided in one way or the other before the field will be vacant for the final solution of either of the agrarian questions which are the real root of the Irish troubles, or for the concession to the Irish people of those extended powers of self-government which we, as well as any other portion of the people of the Kingdom, are perfectly willing to grant to Ireland, Scotland or England."

The official returns of Irish agrarian crimes for the past three years are given as follows: For 1884, 762; 1885, 944; 1886, 1056.

Sir Bernhard Samuelson's amendment to the Crimes bill, to the effect that the bill, if passed, would increase the disorder in Ireland and endanger the Union and the Empire, and therefore should be rejected, was defeated in the House of Commons on the night of the 18th instant, by a vote of 370 to 269, and the second reading of the Crimes bill was agreed to without a division.

A settlement of the Afghan question has been effected by the governments of Great Britain and Russia. By the terms of this settlement, England assents to the Russian demand for that branch of the Oxus now held by the Afghans, in exchange for which concessions will be made of territory on the northwest frontier.

Advices from Honolulu, received by steamer at San Francisco, state that a political confederation has been ratified between the Samoan Islands and the Sandwich Islands.

It is reported from Mexico that a syndicate composed of Chicago capitalists and United States army officers has purchased a tract of 5,000,000 acres lying in the States of Coahuila, Durango and Chihuahua, in Northern Mexico. The tract is traversed by the Mexican Central, and also by the International road, which Huntington is building from Eagle Pass to Laredo. Of this tract 1,000,000 acres is the finest cotton land in the country. A company composed chiefly of Hartford, Conn., capitalists, has bought 500,000 acres, lying in Sonora and Chihuahua, all grazing and agricultural land. A purchase of 235,000 acres has been made in the western part of Chihuahua by the Utah men. "As this tract is adjoining the Mormon colony, the purpose of the purchase can be readily guessed."

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

Until further notice the stage will connect with the 7.02 and 9.03 morning trains from Broad St., to convey passengers to the School; and at other times when timely notice is sent to J. G. WILLIAMS, Supt.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE.

Near Frankford, (Twenty-third Ward,) Philadelphia. Physician and Superintendent.—JOHN C. HALL, M. D. Applications for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board of Managers.

DIED, at the residence of his son-in-law, John Williamson, Centerville, Cedar County, Iowa, on the 15th of Third Month, 1887, JONATHAN BUNDY, an elder and member of Hickory Grove Monthly and Particular Meeting, in the 84th year of his age.

This dear Friend, throughout a chequered and eventful life, remained fervently attached to the religious Society of Friends and its principles, often imparting kindly counsel to his fellow members; and evincing the reality of what he remarked shortly before his close, "I have endeavored in my feeble way to walk in the straight path, and if there is any thing in my way I know it not." And by other expressions leaving a comforting hope in the minds of his surviving friends that, through Infinite mercy, he was gathered with those who "have come out of great tribulation and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb."

Selections from the Diary of Abigail W. Hall.

Eleventh Mo. 13th, 1853. "Give us this day our daily bread." Oh the hungry and the thirsting for the bread of life! Thou, who alone knowest the condition of thy poor child, look down with an eye of pity, and regard her feeble petition. "Satisfy me early with thy mercy that I may be glad and rejoice all my days"—all the days thou seest meet to continue me here, be they few or many.

19th. My feelings have been solemnly stirred and awakened by hearing of the sudden and unlooked for death of my very dear friend and sister, Susan L. Wood. "I am distressed for thee my brother, very pleasant hast thou been to me," &c.

22nd. Returned from the city yesterday, whither I went, in company with J. and H. Snowdon, to attend the funeral of our dear friend S. L. Wood. The body was brought on from Funesasah, where she had been residing with her husband for the past year. Bless this dispensation, O Heavenly Father! seemed the prevailing desire of my troubled soul. Living testimonies were borne over her grave by our friends Elizabeth and Thomas Evans. Elizabeth commenced with: "I heard a voice from heaven saying unto me, Write, Blessed are the dead which lie in the Lord from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors, and their works do follow them." She spoke of the careful upright walking of this our dear friend, and of the many seats left of her labors. Yea, some of our dear young friends were as very seals themselves, &c. I felt as though I could almost exclaim, how just, how true!

Thomas followed with: "Daughters of Jerusalem weep not for me," &c. This, too, was a just and true testimony. Few, I thought, so early in life, could have had such testimonies borne over them. Truly I said in my heart, "wisdom is the gray hair, and an unspotted life is old age." And, "Let me die the death of the righteous," and may my last end be like unto hers.

Twelfth Mo. 12th. Have been passing along for days without any sensible evidence of good. Remembered on retiring to bed last night to my comfort, these expressions of our dear Susan L. Wood, near her close: "Nothing seems to rise up in judgment against me." For the actions of the day there was nothing that condemned me: so a little confidence seemed to spring up in my heart to commend myself another night, unworthily as I felt myself to be, to the care and keeping of Israel's unslumbering Shepherd.

15th. "I am the way, the truth, and the life, no man cometh unto the Father but by me." "By me if any man enter in, he shall go in and out and find pasture." These two texts of Scripture dwell much with me through our meeting this morning; also the remembrance of the bread and to spare, in our Heavenly Father's house. It rested so with me, that I was almost ready to revive it. Through fear I withheld. Not the fear of man, but a fear, O dearest Father! that thou called not for it. The "perplexed" state, the poor disciples formerly were in, is often my condition.

26th. Yesterday was a day of much quietness. Do with me as seemeth Thee good, was the covering of my spirit. Early after taking my seat in our meeting, I was exercised; but whether for myself, or for those assembled, I seemed unable to tell. When unexpectedly was presented, the willingness of those to release the "colt," when they found "the Lord hath need of him," and straightway he was sent. As the subject opened, it conveyed instruction; and I was encouraged, though in much fear, to venture forth with my little offering: "If thine eye be single thy whole body shall be full of light." "Walk while it is called to-day," &c., this, with a little more, I uttered. The quiet feeling which followed, gave a hope I had not done wrong, though I was sensible of not conveying quite all which seemed given. But my dear Master did not upbraid; a lesson in future, to follow simply on. The wisdom of this world is foolishness with God.

First Mo. 4th, 1854. In our week-day meeting, these expressions of a dear young woman on her death-bed presented: "The greater the struggle, the brighter the crown." It so dwelt by me, that for a while I did not know, whether for the encouragement of some like myself, it was to be revived! however it passed away: but that followed which did not; and in the fear and dread of the living God, I ventured forth with: "My God hath sent his angel, and hath shut the lions' mouths, that they have not hurt me: forasmuch as before him innocency was found in me; and also before thee, O king, have I done no hurt." I also spoke of the favor it was to keep a conscience void of offence toward God and toward man. I desire to know this state for myself; so that while preaching to others I may not become a castaway.

9th. At our afternoon meeting we had the company of several dear concerned Friends. Among them were Elizabeth Stroud and E. Passmore, who are now engaged visiting meetings in our Quarter; both were exercised in short lively testimonies. It seemed as though I could see the hand of the Lord in engaging them together in this work. May He keep them and help through to his honor, and the relief of their burdened souls.

16th. I think I can say that on retiring to my bed last night, and leaving it this morning, my eye was unto the Lord for help; that He would be pleased to keep and uphold me by the right hand of his righteousness. I flee unto Thee to hide me, thou who alone knowest my secret sorrows, and the deep discouragements passed through. Preserve me in innocency, O Lord! that so, with acceptance, I may approach Thee and thine altar.

23rd. ——— attended our meeting both morning and afternoon; and in both of which she ministered—not life, it seemed to me, but death to the hearers. I could think of little else during our morning meeting, but Saul's armor—not proved: and in the afternoon, the feeling was even worse. These words were sounded in my inward ear, "Behold, the heaven of heavens cannot contain thee, how much less this house which I have built." It seemed to me here was a building, a godly structure to look upon, but not of God. I could see no way but to give utterance to part of what I felt.

Second Mo. 13th. Afresh awakened to my own state and condition. I clearly see the necessity of more close watching. It is better to suffer wrong than to do wrong. Where there is a patient enduring of hard things, how it tends to advance us on our good journey! so that I want more and more to open not my mouth respecting others, unless I can speak well of them, and be more concerned to hide the faults I see. May I seek for strength to live and walk every day aright. Then, with what holy confidence, can I look up and call God, Father! yea, a father and friend, that will never forsake me.

17th. A quiet feeling for the last few days has been dispensed. Under which secret prayer has again and again arisen for preservation; preservation not only during the Sabbath-day, but as well in the wintry season—both of which I have experienced within the last week or so. Third-day last was our Quarterly Meeting. I felt on awakening that morning, that there were good things in store for us, and not without a little sense, too, that something would be required at my hands, what I could not see; but the secret prayer was, strengthen, O Heavenly Father! for whatever thou may see meet to call for. Several dear Friends were sent to help us, William Evans, and Samuel and Morris Cope: at the sight of whom, my spirit was cheered, as with such helpers, I could not avoid hoping that the will, as to my part, would be accepted. On gathering into silence, I was favored to feel quiet; yea, a quietness not of my own. Oh how precious it was! Like Peter, formerly, I wanted "to tabernacle here." But soon my own exercise for religious labor continued so, I could not put it from me. Morris Cope early spoke, though it seemed in unison with my feelings, yet this little offering still lay at my own door. After he sat down and a time of silence, I saw no way but simply to revive it, which I did, I think I can say in the fear and dread of the living God. After taking my seat, how was I comforted and encouraged by our dear friend, Samuel Cope, taking up my concern; yea, my very words, and preaching so good, that I felt as though I could adopt the language of good old Simeon, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace," &c. After Samuel was through, dear William followed: "Obedience is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams;" from which he spoke powerfully. While I feel I have abundant cause to thank God and take courage, may it be in all humility and fear. Oh there is so much in me to be brought down and kept down, that I tremble when any little favor is shown; lest I say, "Mine own arm hath done this." Oh preserve me from taking up a rest here, and from every thing that exalteth itself.

20th. [In allusion to a funeral she had attended at this date, A. W. H. thus comments upon the solemn realities of death:] As this is a debt we shall all have to pay sooner or later, how have I desired, that this loud call may awaken some of us to more diligence; that we may be concerned so to live, that we will not fear to die. Renewed desires have been raised for myself, that I may be kept and preserved on every hand; that by a careful, consistent, upright walking, I may show forth a good conversation in Christ; and thus be inviting others to come, taste and see, that the Lord is good, and a rich rewarder of all who diligently seek Him.

25th. Through unwatchfulness last evening, in talking about things I ought not, I lay down in shame, and confusion covered me. I make this little note, that it may be to me a watchword in future. I have looked again with sorrow, this morning, on Him whom I have pierced. Forgive the iniquity of thy servant, and strengthen, O Heavenly Father! to be more careful and watchful in future. When led to reflect on our dependent condition, and that through the Lord alone we live, move and have our being, how necessary it seems that we be found living unto Him, who could as in a moment cast us into perdition. Let a sense and knowledge of this keep me in the way I should go.

For "The Friend,"

In the last [spring of 1879] few days I have been greatly interested by a glimpse of the working of the American Medical Mission among the women of Foo-Chow. It has always seemed to me that of the various means whereby the Red Barbarians strive to bridge over the chasm which separates them from the Chinese population, none is so full of promise of ever-increasing usefulness as this Mission, which so unmistakably proves to the people the kindly intentions of those who devote their lives to this labor of love.

But I had not before fully realized how very important a part in this good work must of necessity be performed by women, as they alone can be admitted to the sick-room of their Chinese sisters.

Not having heard much on this subject, I confess to having been slightly astonished one morning when, hearing that Dr. Trask and Dr. Sparr had come by invitation to breakfast, I found that these professional titles described two pleasant, kindly American ladies, one being a bright young woman barely twenty-five years of age! With true kindness to the stranger, they had brought me a lovely and most fragrant branch of the richest pomelo (which is a kind of very large orange blossom) as a specimen of Foo-Chow cultivation.

Within the last few months the senior doctor has had to perform about sixty surgical operations, some of which have been very difficult cases. She invited us to go and see the said hospital, which is a large, clean, airy room, where every possible care is taken for the comfort of the inmates. I was much struck by the bright intelligent faces of some of these, albeit worn with suffering; all seemed so truly grateful for the loving care bestowed on them.

Of the medicines administered by the Chinese doctors, we formed some notion on being informed that one of the industries of the Foo-Chow beggars is the rearing of snakes, which are purchased by the druggists and boiled down for medicinal use, just as in the old Gaelic legends! Snake wine (which is a preparation of wine and water in which snakes have been boiled to a jelly) is deemed a famous febrifuge; snake's flesh is also considered excellent diet for invalids. The snake is treated as we treat eels; its head is cut off, and its skin removed. The flesh is then fried or boiled, but instead of being eaten plain, it must be mixed with minced chicken.

Here and there, among the numerous odd varieties of street-stall, we see a quack doctor, who, seated beneath a great umbrella, offers infallible remedies for every evil that flesh is heir to. He deals largely in acupuncture and cupping with wooden cups. As regards internal medicines, he proves his stores genuine by displaying the skulls, paws, horns, skins, and skeletons of divers animals—such as bears, bats, crocodiles, tigers, bits of bark and roots, bunches of herbs, &c.

But of course there are some genuine medicines in use. Foremost among these is a tonic of the nature of gentian root, to which almost supernatural virtues are attributed. This is the famous ginseng, which is the dried root of a wild herb, the Panax quinquefolia, of which considerable quantities are imported from Corea, Tartary, and the United States, but that which is found in the Chinese Empire is the most highly prized of all. It is an imperial monopoly, and is sold to the ginseng dealers for its weight in gold.

But to counterbalance one real tonic, the Celestials have a score of eccentric medicines. Thus in a list of 78 animal, 50 mineral, and 314 vegetable medicines enumerated in one of the standard Chinese medical works translated by Dr. Hobson, of the London Medical Mission, I find such curious items as "dried red-spotted lizard, silk worm moth, parasite of mulberry-trees, asses' glue, tops of hartshorn, birds' nests, beef and mutton, black-lead, white-lead, stalactite, asbestos, tortoise-shell, human milk, stags' horns and bones, dogs' flesh, and ferns," all recommended as tonics. Burnt straw, oyster-shell, gold and silver leaf, iron filings, and the bones and tusks of dragons are stated to be astringent.

In truth the Chinese have little sympathy with bodily anguish, and are by no means sure how far the care of such sufferers, and the endeavor to alleviate their pain, may be pleasing to the gods, or accounted an act of merit. For, like the Jews, who asked, "Did this man sin, or his parents, that he was born blind?" they look upon all grievous bodily or mental affliction as the just punishment of some heinous offence committed in a previous state of existence.

So even blindness, which is fearfully common, receives small heed of pity. There is, indeed, an asylum provided for a certain number of sufferers, but the dole of food which accompanies the right to a wretched roof is so very small, that it is absolutely necessary to supplement it by begging; consequently, the inmates go about in companies of about half-a-dozen, walking single file, each man guided by the man in front of him, while the leader feels his way along the street with his stick. It is a most literal case of the blind leading the blind.

As regards the healing of the sick, supernatural aid is often sought in preference to administering drugs, especially at the time of the feast of the nativity of the God Shing Wong, which is celebrated at midnight. Kind relations bring the garments of their sick friends to be stamped with the great seal of the god—who, by the way, has two seals, one of copper and one of jade, and a price is charged for an impression of the jade seal. The raiment thus consecrated is carried back to the sick, who being therein clothed, and endowed with great faith, sometimes do recover!

Somewhat akin to this, is the only recognized cure for carpenters who are afflicted with ulcers. Within the walls of a monastery in Canton stands the venerable Flowery Pagoda, which was built in the sixth century by Loo Pan, the great architect of the era. After death he was deified, and is now worshipped by all devout carpenters. When suffering from ulcers they visit his pagoda, pick out a morsel of ancient cement from between the bricks, powder it and swallow it, with a large admixture of faith!*

It appears, then, that, however well meant, the native dispensary cannot be regarded as a very valuable institution! As to other forms of Chinese charity, I hear of clothing clubs, soup-kitchens, distributions of rice, and caldrons of tea bestowed gratis on all thirsty souls; but the most characteristic form of benevolence consists in presenting coffins to the temples, to be awarded by the priests to the most deserving poor. This last is a very favorite way of accumulating merit, and is one which is immensely appreciated, as there is an assured respectability in the possession of a good coffin.

C. F. Cummings speaks very favorably of the sincerity and earnestness of many of the Chinese converts to Christianity; and relates the story of one who went about from village to village preaching the gospel. At various places he was stoned, and finally was arrested and thrown into the common prison on some totally false charge, for which, nevertheless, he was condemned to receive seven hundred lashes with a triple leather thong, making the punishment equal to over two thousand cuts. Being so lacerated as to be incapable of walking, he was carried back to Foo-Chow, where a foreign physician stated that so severe a case of scourging had never come to his knowledge. But though in such intense agony that he could not repress his groans, he never ceased to plead with all around him to turn to the Saviour, who could give the soul such perfect peace, though the body was racked with pain.

As soon as he was able to walk, he resumed his preaching work on the identical round where he had been so cruelly persecuted; and so greatly has his word been blessed, that ere many months had elapsed, four hundred of his countrymen looked upon him, as the instrument of their conversion.

The liberality of the native Christians has become proverbial among their heathen brethren. Thus in the case of one of the recent converts a eking, who for conscience' sake had given up lucrative post in connection with a Buddhist temple, for three years he continued in extreme penury, gaining a scanty living as a cobbler. At last, much to his surprise, and without any solicitation on his part, he was appointed paymaster of his "banner," a post which, in the hands of a Chinaman of average honesty, proves highly lucrative, owing to sundry customary perquisites squeezed off the pay of the bannermen. When to their amazement they not only received their pay in full, without deduction, but were actually credited with some gain on the exchange, some set him down as a fool, but others maintained that "certainly he must belong to the religion of Jesus." He had not then openly professed his faith, but such generosity was deemed conclusive evidence.

* How strangely the superstitions of East and West correspond! In the autumn of 1855, the daily paper record how at the Chapel of Knock in Ireland, said to have been recently honored by an apparition of the Blessed Virgin, and now a favorite place of pilgrimage thousands of devotees are picking out fragments of cement from the chapel wall, which cement being reduced to powder and swallowed medicinally, is credited with many miraculous cures!

For "The Friend."

The subject of settled pastors among Friends having claimed the attention of the Society in different portions of the land, I feel like adding my views along with others in protest against a course which, to me, appears so inconsistent with the views of our branch of the church as accepted for generations past. I believe it to be the prerogative of the great Head of the Church to minister unto the people through whom He will; and a settled pastor gives pre-eminence to one person to the restriction of others upon whom the Lord would lay his hand and give the message.

A settled pastor implies a paid ministry. This gain hinders a growth in the ministry from among others of the same body. It leads to a man-ministry and a one-man-ministry. All this the advanced views of the Society of Friends (have ever held) has a tendency to limit the power and influence of the Holy Spirit.

A pastor, who is acknowledged as such, has a feeling that he is not doing all he is paid for if he does not give vocal utterance at every meeting he attends. Again, those who are in the body of the congregation feel that they are occupying the time of the pastor if they say anything. Thus many upon whom the Master may lay his preparing hand, are kept from speaking, whilst the supported pastor feels he has to speak whether he feels the call and anointing or not.

"Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty." The apostle says, When you come together let one come with a psalm, another with an exhortation, another with a revelation and so on, each to give place to each as the Lord leadeth.

When the subject was brought up in our last Yearly Meeting, (New York) one of our prominent ministers, resident near New York City, strongly opposed it. I have found, by conversing with others since, that there are a large number among us who feel the same way, but by reason of a shrinking publicity, they had nothing to say in the meeting. These were of the younger members amongst us too, which fact is very encouraging. I trust that when the subject comes before us in future, we may have the courage to faithfully speak our convictions. The great want among us to-day, according to my feelings, is that of individual faithfulness, particularly in the attendance of meetings in the middle of the week. True loyalty to our King would lead us to rejoice as meeting-day came around; and except sickness or other unavoidable cause prevented, we would be found at the house of prayer, seeking for a blessing. Our Heavenly Father is as able to "raise up Judges now as at the first, and Counsellors as at the beginning." "His hand is not shortened that He cannot save, nor is his ear grown heavy that He cannot hear." Surely He is as able at this day to raise up from among us ministers and teachers, as He ever was, if we are faithful to Him.

If all keep a single eye to the Master of Assemblies and the Bishop of their souls, there will not be wanting those among us who will be gifted by Him for his service; and there will be no need of settling a pastor over a flock in order that they may have the ministry of the word among them.

We need to dig deep, as individuals, and get the true spiritual essence of Christianity. We want to let the Lord baptize and re-baptize our souls with the refining fire from above, that we may become vessels fitted for His use and service. We want to "come boldly to the throne of grace;" and as we are faithful stewards we shall find his work to go forward, and the Church built up, and the King Eternal glorified.

For "The Friend."

Memories of the Prairies.

During the long winter months abundant employment was found in cutting and hauling out a supply of fuel and fencing, &c. for the ensuing year; for the pioneer well knew that all his time and energies would, when spring came, be required in his fields, and in much needed improvements about his new home. And then the winter was by far the most pleasant and profitable season for this line of work.

Memory is well stored with vivid recollections of many days of hard, though not always unpleasant labor, in the timber, ("the timber is a term almost universally applied to the woodlands). It was the chiefest of winter work, and the early dawn of a bright winter day found the thrifty farmer with "chores" all done, a hearty breakfast disposed of, and he and his team ready for the labors of the day.

With the mercury well down among the teens below zero, the crisp snow screeched and whined under their feet, as if impatient at being disturbed, and before the first beams of the morning sun glittered over the white-robed plain, and were glanced back from a myriad of frost jewels that everywhere sparkled in frozen beauty, he was hurrying away upon his road to the woods. He might have one, two, three, four or many miles to drive, and one after another of his neighbors came in from the right or the left, from farmhouse and by road, until often, by the time the border of the woodland was reached, he was upon a highway thronged with a motley crowd, pushing on to their woodman-like labor.

There were ox teams and horse teams, long sleds and bob-sleds; there were men and boys, well dressed and poorly clad—some sitting closely wrapped in coats and quilts; some running beside or behind their teams to stir their chilling blood into warmer activity, and chatting merrily together from sleigh to sleigh. Upon entering the "timber" the order was reversed. One after another turned aside this way or that; the throng dispersed; the high road became a mere trail winding away to some distant timber-plot.

On reaching our place of labor we turned our team about, and gave them a bit of hay, brought along for their benefit, and very soon the measured strokes of our axes echoing among the wooded hills chimed in musically with the sound of others that began to ring out on the frosty air. From near and far there fell—a song of labor, to which, ever and anon, the crash of a falling tree formed a fitting chorus. The memory of those sights and sounds comes up pleasantly before me now.

We were soon warned by the vigorous exercise, and when the friendly sun looked through the top of some old tree, supposed to be due south of us, (our only time-piece) we fed our team and seated on the sunny side of a log, we ate with wholesome relish, our frozen dinner, and then again wielded the axe with renewed vigor. Once, while thus employed, we heard the distant baying of a hound. It came nearer and nearer, and presently a deer, apparently slightly wounded, leaped through the underbrush into an open space only a little way from us, on a gentle slope. It was instantly followed and seized by the hound. Both fell, and were for a moment enveloped in a cloud of snow thrown into the air, when the deer seemed to catch the dog upon his hind feet, and sent him whirling, over and over, several yards, down the hill, and was up and off out of sight, over the ridge, before his discomfited enemy had recovered his confused senses enough to know which way to look for it. Deer were sometimes, though rarely, seen on our prairie. During the winter that we lived in Salem, (1853) a deer was started in the timber west of the town, and being closely pressed, it followed a timber road that led it into one street of the village, and ran its entire length. All who saw it were too much surprised to offer any interference and the dogs were so bothered and confused in town, that the deer escaped into the fields beyond. There was comparatively little work done in the timber during the summer. One might then pass through the woods for miles without seeing or hearing a sight or sound of human life. There the air was hot and sultry, while upon the prairie there was nearly always a breeze that made the hottest days more endurable. It was only when compelled by necessity that we ventured into the mosquito infested wilderness to labor in the summer time.

In 1854 we found it necessary to cut and haul the material for two small houses, during the hottest season of the year, and it was an arduous task. Hordes of hungry mosquitoes seemed to be only awaiting their turn to attack any available portion of our bodies. They would almost cover our backs and shoulders as we worked, and easily drive their lean bills through any light clothing that the sweltering heat permitted us to wear; and I well remember standing guard with a leafy bough in each hand to drive them from my father and cousin while they were chopping, and it was no idle task, either. Large green-headed flies, and what we called "dog flies" were as relentless in their attacks upon our oxen as the mosquitoes were upon us. We cut logs and hauled to the bank of the Wapsi River, half-a-mile away, and there made a raft and floated them down to a saw mill some distance below, and we made up our raft on a piece of deep still water that washed the bank at a low level, and grassy place. Rolling in the logs, we secured them together with hickory withes. Each log as it was rolled in plunged far out of sight, then rose to the surface and was secured. Finally we came in turn to a large red oak. As usual, it went in with a splash and plunge from our sight, but not as usual to rise again and be floated away. It went straight to the bottom. We waited in vain, and pulled upon the withes we had fastened to it, but it never came up again, and we learned at this small expense, the scientific fact that our red oak timber was heavier than water. After that we would secure a red oak between two linn logs before we loosed our hold on it, and the greater bouyancy of the latter supported their heavy companion. In a low, rocky bluff near the corner of our timberlot, there was a wild-cat den, and judging from the abundance of tracks in that vicinity, it was quite populous. Well defined trails leading away from it, and every old log was a regular foot-path for them. But they were too wary to be often seen.

A neighbor of ours, an old hunter, once set a steel trap on the ridge just above this bluff, and on returning to their work the next morning, they found a very large wild-cat in its relentless jaws. He was furious with pain and rage, and two young men who first approached him fled in terror, thinking he would in his frenzy tear his leg away and leap upon them, but the old hunter coming up soon put an end to his life and sufferings; and for a long time after, his neatly stuffed skin ornamented the best room in their prairie home and added to the amusement of many curious guests.

The only ground-hog I have seen in Iowa made our acquaintance very strangely. He came out of the grass perhaps ten rods away from our newly built house upon the prairie, crossed the public road in a straight course to the front gate, came under it and crossed the door yard, climbed the steps (two or three in number) and entered the open door where several of us stood watching him. He crossed the room and took shelter under a lounge on the opposite side where he was captured and given to two strangers who chanced to be riding by, and saw this strange little incident.

The American badger was quite plentiful on the prairies in early times, but they soon vanished before the advancing settlements. They were very wild, and wonderfully expert in digging holes in the tough prairie sod or in the hardest of ground. I have seen one cover itself from sight, I think in less time than a man with a spade would make the same sized hole.

The Great Master.—"I am my own master!" cried a young man proudly, when a friend tried to persuade him from an enterprise which he had on hand; "I am my own master!"

"Did you ever consider what a responsible post that is?" asked his friend.

"Responsible—is it?"

"A master must lay out the work which he wants done and see that it is done right. He should try to secure the best ends by the best means. He must keep on the look-out against obstacles and accidents, and watch that every thing goes straight, or else he must fail."

"Well."

"To be master of yourself you have your conscience to keep clear, your heart to cultivate, your temper to govern, your will to direct, and your judgment to instruct. You are master over a hard lot, and if you don't master them they will master you."

"That is so," said the young man.

"Now, I could undertake no such thing," said his friend. "I should fail if I did. Saul wanted to be his own master, and failed. Herod did. Judas did. No man is fit for it. 'One is my Master, even Christ.' I work under his direction. He is regular, and where He is master, all goes right."

Let it be the language of every Christian heart—language which shall find its issues in appropriate actions—that wars shall exist no longer.

EVERMORE.

If there is one precious promise
That can soothe the aching breast
Of the faint and weary pilgrim
As his spirit sighs for rest;

As he, with a faith unclouded,
Views the far-off shining shore,
Where time's changing scenes may come not;
It is this one—"Evermore."

When our earthly hopes have vanished
With our fondest dreams away,
As the dew before the sunbeam,
Or the stars at dawn of day;

And our life seems as a bubble,
Tossed on time's deep-rolling wave,
There exposed to storm and tempest,
With no power to aid or save!—

O 'tis sweet to catch a glimmering
Of the bright and shining shore,
There to found our hopes immortal
On the rock of Evermore.

Though our strongest ties are broken,
While our firmest wishes decay;
And our earthly joys are fading
As the leaves of Autumn day;

And our friends are round us falling,— Gone a little while before;
O how sweet by faith to view them,
On the banks of Evermore!

When the dread decree is uttered,
(While the elements obey,
As they darken back to chaos),
"Heaven and earth shall pass away!"

Then, as hopes and fears are blended,
Happy he whose faith can soar
To a home all pure and changeless
Round the throne of Evermore.

DARK HOURS.

Oh my tried soul, be patient! Roughest winds
Fold over sweetest fruitage; heaviest clouds
Rain the most ample harvests on the fields;
The grass grows greenest where the wintry snows
Have fallen deepest, and the fairest flowers
Spring from old, dead decay. The darkest mine
Yields the most flashing jewels from its cell,
And stars are born of darkness, day of night.
Oh, my tried soul, be patient! yet for thee
Goes on the secret alchemy of life!
God the one Giver, grants no boon to earth
That He withholds from thee; and from the dark
Of thy deep sorrow shall evolve new light,
New strength to do and suffer, new resolves,
Perchance new gladnesses and freshest hopes!
Oh, there are times when I can no more weep
That I have suffered; for I know great strength
Is born of suffering; and I trust that still,
Wrapt in the dry husk of my outer life,
Lie warmer seeds than ever yet have burst
From its dull covering; stronger purposes
Stir consciously within, and make me great
With a new life—a life akin to God's—
Which I must nurture for the holy skies.
Help me thou great All-Patient, for the flesh
Will sometimes falter, and the spirit fail;
Add to my human Thy almighty strength,
When next I waver; rouse my faith as now,
That out of darkness I may see great light,
And follow where it ever leads—to Thee!

GOOD ADVICE.

When the weather is wet
We must not fret;
When the weather is dry,
We must not cry;
When the weather is cold,
We must not scold;
When the weather is warm,
We must not storm;
But be thankful together,
Whatever the weather.

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 127.

A very striking illustration of the continuance in modern times of Divine revelation is furnished by the case of Miles Halhead, a minister among early Friends, who was committed to prison by the Mayor of Berwick, for exhorting him in his own shop to desist from persecution. When brought before the court, the chief priest of the town desired permission of the court to ask him a question. To this Miles replied, "The Lord knows thy heart, O man! and at this present has revealed thy thoughts to his servant; and therefore now I know thy heart also, thou high priest, and the question thou wouldst ask me; and if thou wilt promise me before the court, that if I tell thee the question thou wouldst ask me, thou wilt deal plainly with me, I will not only tell thee thy query, but I will answer it." The priest said he would, and then Miles proceeded:—"The question is this: thou wouldst know whether I own that Christ that died at Jerusalem or not." To this the priest, wondering, said, "Truly, that is the question." Then Miles said, "According to my promise I will answer it before the court. In the presence of the Lord God of Heaven, I own no other Christ than Him that died at Jerusalem, and made a good confession before Pontius Pilate, to be the Light and Way that leads fallen man out of sin and evil, up to God eternal, blessed for evermore."

In the lively Memoirs of John Roberts, another of our early Friends, who was willing to endure suffering for the Truth's sake, there is preserved an account of some interviews which he had with the Bishop of Gloucester, a man who appears to have appreciated John's honest boldness and sincerity of character. At the last of these conferences the Bishop asked what it was that opened the heart of Lydia when she heard the preaching of Paul. John replied that it was the Spirit of our Lord Jesus Christ, the same spiritual key that opened the hearts of all the holy patriarchs, prophets and apostles, in ages past, and "the same that must open thy heart, if ever thou comest to have it truly opened." The Bishop evidently felt the force of these remarks, for he replied:—"It is the truth, the very truth, I never heard it so defined before. John, I have done you much wrong; I desire you to forgive me, and I'll never wrong you more." To this John replied, "I do heartily forgive thee, as far as it is in my power, and I truly pray the Father of mercies may forgive thee, and make thee his. As to the latter part, that thou wilt never wrong me more, I am of the same mind with thee; for it is in my heart to tell thee, I shall never see thy face any more." The Bishop died soon after.

This incident is the more striking from the fact that in the same conversation reference was made to the case of the jailor of Gloucester Castle, who had been very cruel to Friends, and illegally kept them in prison by not sending up their names for trial at the assizes. When at length this was discovered, the judge discharged the prisoners and very severely reprimanded him; and the jailor was overheard to say that if John Roberts ever came into the castle again, he should never go out alive. The turnkey meeting with John begged him, if he could possibly avoid it not to come to the castle a prisoner whilst his master was jailor—and John sent this message to him, "Tell him from me, I shall never see his face anymore." Soon after, the narrative says, it pleased God to take him away by death.

In these instances, it pleased the Lord to give to his faithful servant a sight of things which were shortly to come to pass. And such cases are more frequent than a sceptical generation are willing to admit. It is very needful to be on our guard that we do not mistake the excited imaginations of our own minds for Divine impressions; yet the Christian would lose one of his great sources of comfort and hope, if he were deprived of his belief in the immediate communication of the Divine will to him; and of his confidence in a perceptible communion with his Creator and Redeemer.

Under date of Sixth Mo. 1884, R. A. Beard, pastor of a Congregational Church at Fargo, Dakota, describes in The Independent, an experience of his own. He does not attempt to explain the origin of the impressions which so remarkably affected him, but simply relates the incident, as follows:—

In the year 1876, I was practicing law in the city of Columbus, O. I had been considering for some time the question of entering the ministry, and had finally decided to do so. After the decision was made I began to close up my legal business preparatory to entering upon a course of study in theology. One of the last cases I had on hand necessitated my going to Hillsdale, Mich., to take some depositions. Before starting, my wife and I had decided that, as I expected to take my theological course in Oberlin, I should stop at Oberlin on my way back from Hillsdale and rent a house for us to occupy while pursuing my studies in the seminary. My wife had also requested me to stop at Mt. Vernon, if time permitted, and see her father's family, as we had not seen any of them for some time. With these plans in mind, I went to Hillsdale, leaving my wife in her usual health.

I had no sooner got off the cars at Hillsdale than I had the feeling that I was wanted at home. I had often heard people talk about impressions, but I had no faith in them, and so I tried to drive the matter from my mind. I fought the feeling, and walked on up to a hotel. I ordered dinner, but could eat nothing, scarcely, for thinking and wondering. After eating my dinner and paying my bill, without being able to give a reason why I was so foolish as to be influenced by a mere "impression," I found myself on the way to the depot to be ready to take the next train for Columbus. I kept calling myself foolish and silly to be minding a mere "impression;" but nothing could change my determination to go home. As I had to go through Oberlin on my way home, I thought to myself, "Now I will stop here long enough to rent me a house," as I had planned to do. When the train arrived at Oberlin I got off, and as the train pulled out there came over me such a sense of oppression as is utterly impossible to describe. I would have given anything in my power to have been able to catch that train. It was then about seven o'clock in the evening, and I went to a hotel and got my supper. To do the business I stopped to do, necessitated remaining over night. But the more I thought of it the more I felt as if I could not do it. And yet I was attempting all the while to convince myself that I was foolish to think the "impression" I had meant anything. I got on the next train going to Columbus, leaving between ten and eleven o'clock that night. When the train reached Mt. Vernon I thought of getting off and staying over Sunday with my wife's parents—as it was Saturday night; but I could no more get off that train than if I had been chained to my seat. I went on to Columbus, and the nearer home I got the stronger seemed the "impression" that was controlling me. I now seemed absolutely controlled by this something. Walking up from the depot to my house, I kept walking faster and faster until I found myself running as fast as I could run. When I got near the house—daylight not having yet arrived—I expected to see a light through the transom of my front door, and, sure enough, there was one. That convinced me that something was surely wrong. I rang the door-bell, and my first words to the one who opened the door, were: "Is my wife sick?" The answer was, "Yes, she is very sick, and has been unconscious for about thirty-six hours." She remained unconscious for about twenty-four hours more, and died in seven days. Telegrams had been sent to me at Hillsdale, Oberlin and Mt. Vernon; but I did not stay long enough at any of the places to get the messages.

The Legend of the two Sacks.

There is an ancient legend that tells of an old man who was in the habit of travelling from place to place, with a sack hanging behind his back and another in front of him.

What do you think these sacks were for? Well, I will tell you.

In the one behind him he tossed all the kind deeds of his friends, where they were quite hid from view; and he soon forgot all about them.

In the one hanging round his neck, under his chin, he popped all the sins which the people he knew committed; and these he was in the habit of turning over and looking at as he walked along, day by day.

One day, to his surprise, he met a man wearing, just like himself, a sack in front and one behind. He went up to him and began feeling his sack.

"What have you got here, my friend?" he asked giving the sack in front a good poke.

"Stop, don't do that!" cried the other, "you'll spoil my good things."

"What things?" asked number one.

"Why, my good deeds," answered number two. I keep them all in front of me, where I can always see them, and take them out and air them. See, here is the half-crown I put in the plate last Sunday; and the shawl I gave to the beggar girl; and the mittens I gave to the crippled boy; and the penny I gave to the organ-grinder; and here is even the benevolent smile I bestowed on the crossing-sweeper at my door; and"—

"And what's in the sack behind you?" asked the first traveller, who thought his companion's good deeds would never come to an end.

"Tut, tut," said number two, "there is nothing I care to look at in there! That sack holds what I call my little mistakes."

"It seems to me that your sack of mistakes is fuller than the other," said number one.

Number two frowned. He had never thought that, though he had put what he called his "mistakes" out of his sight, every one else could see them still. An angry reply was on his lips, when happily a third traveller—also carrying two sacks—as they were—overtook them.

The first two men at once pounced on the stranger.

"What cargo do you carry in your sack?" cried one.

"Let's see your goods," said the other.

"With all my heart," quoth the stranger; "for I have a goodly assortment, and I like to show them. This sack," said he, pointing to the one hanging in front of him, "is full of the good deeds of others."

"Your sack looks nearly touching the ground. It must be a pretty heavy weight to carry," observed number one.

"There you are mistaken," replied the stranger; "the weight is only such as sails are to a ship, or wings are to an eagle. It helps me onwards."

"Well, your sack behind can be of little good to you," said number two, "for it appears to be empty; and I see it has a great hole in the bottom of it."

"I did it on purpose," said the stranger; "for all the evil I hear of people I put in there, and it falls through and is lost. So you see I have no weight to drag me down backwards."

How we got our Bible.

Let us begin by imagining before us the record chest of one of the early Christian churches, say Jerusalem, Rome or Ephesus about 120 A. D., when sufficient time had elapsed after the completion of the New Testament writings to have allowed most of the larger churches to have copies of their own. After collecting together such documents we should have some manuscripts of the Hebrew Old Testament books, several more of the Old Testament books translated into Greek, it being the most widely known language at the time. Again, we should also find a few rolls of the apocryphal books, not received as inspired, but written by holy men in the church and valued for their practical teaching. And lastly, either the originals or direct copies of the gospels, the Acts, the epistles of Paul, Peter and John, and the book of Revelation. It is from this source, the old record chest of nearly 1800 years ago, from which we get our Bible. The manuscripts, which are copies of the Scripture in the original tongue, are quite numerous, especially the Greek, and their age is rather a difficult question to settle.

There are three, however, plain, faded-looking documents with little about them to attract attention, but these three are among the greatest treasures the Christian church possesses—the oldest copies of the Bible in the world. They are named respectively the Vatican, Sinaitic and Alexandrine Manuscripts. They have been much used in the recent Bible revision, and none of them were accessible to those who prepared the Authorized Version in 1611. These three manuscripts are curiously enough in possession of the three branches of the Christian Church. The Alexandrine belongs to Protestant England, and is kept in the manuscript room of the British Museum: the Vatican is in the Vatican Library at Rome, and the Sinaitic is one of the treasures of the Greek church at St. Petersburg. The age of these manuscripts is generally supposed to be about 1500 years.

There are the ancient versions, that is, the translation of the Bible into the languages of early Christendom long before the oldest of our present Greek manuscripts were written; the old Syriac scriptures which were probably in use about fifty years after the New Testament was written, a version representing very nearly the language of the people among whom our Lord moved; also the Egyptian, Ethiopic and Armenian versions, and one of especial interest, St. Jerome's Latin Vulgate, the great "revised Bible" of the ancient Western church.

Toward the end of the fourth century so many errors had crept into the old Latin versions that the Latin speaking churches were in danger of losing the pure scripture of the Apostolic days, and its revision was undertaken by Jerome, one of the greatest scholars and holiest men of the day. He completed the New Testament in 385, and the Old Testament was afterward translated direct from the original Hebrew. No other work has ever had such an influence on the history of the Bible. For more than a thousand years it was the parent of every version of the Scriptures in Western Europe.

England had no complete Bible before Wycliff's days, early in the eighth century. The psalms and the gospels had been translated into Anglo-Saxon. Adam Bede and King Alfred the Great also translated, the latter expressing the oft quoted wish, "That all the free born youth of his kingdom should employ themselves on nothing till they could first read well the English scripture."

We next come to Wycliff's version toward the close of the fourteenth century. He translated from the Latin version without consulting the original Hebrew and Greek, and of course handed on its errors as faithfully as its perfections, but such as it is, it is a fine specimen of fourteenth century English. He translated not for scholars or nobles, but for the plain people, and his style was such as suited those for whom he wrote—plain, vigorous and homely.

The book had a wide circulation, and though the cost a great deal restricted its possession to the wealthier classes, yet it was generally accessible to all by the payment of money for the privilege of reading it. It created fierce opposition from the church. "God grant us," runs the prayer in the old Bible preface, "to Ken and to Kepe well Holie writ, and to suffer joyfulli some paine for it at the laste." What a meaning that prayer must have gained, when the readers of the book were burned with copies round their necks and men and women executed.

One hundred years after the death of Wycliff, William Tyndale was born. To him belongs the honor of first printing the English Bible, after translating it. He received no encouragement at home, but was determined that England should have the word of God spread among her people by means of this new invention of printing, but it had to be accomplished in exile. So in 1524 he left his native land never to see it again, and at Hamburg, in poverty and distress and constant danger he worked at his translation, which in the following year was in the printer's hands. The Bible was spread through England notwithstanding all the measures his enemies took to prevent it. But clerical influence was so strong against him, though he accomplished his work, he had to sacrifice his life, for in 1536 he was strangled and burnt to ashes, fervently praying with his last words, "Lord, open the king of England's eyes"—a prayer nearer to its answer than the martyr thought.

Three years after this a Bible is in every parish church; what a change has taken place. The Reformation was gaining ground, and little disposition to oppose the desire for a people's Bible. In fifty years we have a king of England himself directing a Bible translation in 1611, our present authorized version.

In 1870 the revision of the New Testament was commenced, and concluded in 1880, and four years later the Old Testament Company finished their work, so we have now a complete revised Bible.

It is not without purpose that God has so preserved his message; it is not without purpose that He raised up his workers to search out the manuscripts from the dusty libraries of convent and cathedral, to collect and compare them together with such toil and care, and then to render them into clear, graceful English for us, the very message which he sent to earth thousands of years since to comfort and brighten life. Truly it might be said, "Other men indeed have labored, and we have entered into their labors."—Christian Worker.

Practical Jokes.—Avoid practical jokes. They too frequently result in some dangerous accident or serious ill-feeling. The only kind of joke worth the name is one which is enjoyed on both sides, as the so-called practical joke rarely proves to be.

Any trick intended to place another in an awkward position is mean and despicable, and we always like to hear of such attempts recoiling upon their authors' heads.

The story is told of a celebrated New England doctor, who, when he was just commencing his career, received an urgent message to come and set a fractured limb. He hurried to the house, and found there a goose, whose leg had been broken by a bad boy with a brick.

The doctor was not at all disconcerted. He gravely examined and set the leg, and promised to call the next day. He made a number of visits to his feathered patient, and at length pronounced it cured. Then he handed in a bill, whose length, breadth and extent simply horrified the would-be jokers.

They had to pay, and the doctor remarked, in taking leave, that he thought of making a speciality of geese, and hoped they would send for him again to attend the next case they had.

This proved an effectual cure for practical joking.—Selected.

Beautiful Figure.—Albert Barnes, in his sermon on "Life at Threescore," illustrates the magnitude of eternal things as he approaches the end of life, compared with those which ordinarily occupy the attention of mankind, by the following beautiful figure:

The earth as it moves in its orbit from year to year, maintains a distance of ninety-five millions of miles from the sun; and the sun at its rising seems at all times to be of the same magnitude—to human view an object always small, as compared with our world.

But suppose the earth should leave its orbit and make its way in a direct line toward the sun. How soon would the sun enlarge its dimensions! How vast and bright would it become! How soon would it fill the whole field of vision, and all earth dwindle to nothing!

So human life now appears to me. In earlier years eternity appeared distant and small in importance. But at the period of life which I have now reached, it seems to me as if the earth had left the orbit of its annual movements, and was making a rapid and direct flight to the sun.

The objects of eternity, toward which I am moving rapidly enlarge themselves. They have become overpoweringly bright and grand. They fill the whole field of vision, and the earth with all which is the common object of human ambition and pursuit is vanishing away!

Krumacher tells a legend about a man named Eliab. He was rich. He was cunning in all the wisdom of the East. But he knew no peace. His heart was black with sorrow, and he often wished to die.

Then a man of God brought him an herb full of wonderful healing power.

But Eliab answered: "What is that to me? My body lacks not health. It is my soul that is diseased. It were better for me to die."

"But take the herb," said the man of God, "and heal with it seven sick men; then thou mayest die, if thou wilt."

So Eliab was persuaded. He sought out misery. With his wealth he succored the poor. By the healing herb he brought health to seven sick.

Then the man of God came to him and said: "Here now is an herb of death; take it; for now thou mayest die."

But Eliab answered: "God forbid. My soul longeth no more for death. For now I comprehend the meaning and the use of life."

—Religion and Business Success.—In 1867, at the close of the World's Exhibition, Napoleon conceived the idea of seeing what relation, if any, there was between manufacturers and their workmen which might be of value to men seeking successfully to conduct such enterprises. A jury consisting of eminent men appointed by the several Governments represented in the Exhibition was selected, and ten prizes of $2,000 each and twenty-four honorable mentions were to be awarded to those manufacturers between whom and their employees existed the greatest harmony combined with business prosperity. It was expressly stipulated that in making up the judgment of these awards religion, in any technical sense, was in no wise to be considered. On Faber's pencil establishment, the testimony was as follows:

"This establishment was seriously affected by the immoral and disorderly character of the workmen, and it dwindled until there were only sixty men employed, and the profits did not exceed $6,000 a year in value. At this point Faber himself took the management and directed his efforts to raising the moral tone of his workmen. His business profits, he testified, increased just in the ratio of his success in thus elevating the moral and Christian character of his workmen, and he found himself employing 500 at Stein and 275 at Goldsgrun with pecuniary results so satisfactory that to further benefit his workmen and show his gratitude to God, he erected a church for his workmen and their families at a cost of $23,000.

—Women Physicians in India.—There is need in India of competent women physicians. Graduates are welcomed from any country. So interested have the native Muhammadans become in the Lady Dufferin Fund for the founding and support of hospitals, that a Hindoo princess has given more than 150,000 rupees for the accommodation of women studying medicine in the medical college at Calcutta, and a Muhammadan publisher in Lucknow has given 15,000 rupees for a woman's hospital in that city. Thus far the pupils are mainly drawn from the missions. In honor of Queen Victoria's fiftieth year of reign, an immense sum of money is to be raised to help the suffering women in this part of her empire.

—George C. Haddock's Posthumous Work.—The murder of G. C. Haddock, as it is believed by the liquor men of Sioux City, Iowa, has been followed by such a revolution or awakening of public sentiment on the liquor question, as to accomplish in a few months what it might have taken him years to effect, if indeed he could ever have effected it. Then there were 50 or 60 saloons kept open in defiance of the prohibitory laws of the State. Now there is said to be but one open, and that was expected soon to be closed. The court has imposed fines of from $350 to $500 against all the saloon-keepers of the city, and ordered them to be imprisoned until the fines are paid.

—The Esquest of John M. George.—The bequest of the residue of his estate by the late John M. George, to Hicksite Friends, is now thought will amount to at least half a million of dollars. The object in view was the establishment of a boarding school in Eastern Pennsylvania for their own children, and such others as a committee of their Yearly Meeting may see proper to admit. It is expected that some action in reference to it will be taken by their approaching Yearly Meeting.

—Why I Became a Friend.—Under this heading Inazo Ota, a native of Japan, explains in The Interchange the circumstances and motives which drew

THE FRIEND.

FOURTH MONTH 30, 1887.

PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING.

The regulations adopted by the Yearly Meeting at its first sitting, respecting Certificates of removal, are so important in their bearing, that we purpose printing in full the Report of the Committee when it is published. In the meantime it may be said, that their object is to relieve our own Monthly Meetings in the difficulties they now experience in the transaction of their business, owing to the disorganized and degenerated condition of things which exists in some places.

They authorize the sending or reception of certificates to or from any of the meetings under our name, excepting such as the Yearly Meeting has decided are not entitled to its recognition. They give to Monthly Meetings the authority to decline the sending or reception of such certificates to or from meetings which have clearly and seriously departed from our doctrines and testimonies. They direct that members of Friends' meetings elsewhere, removing to reside amongst us, who cannot obtain certificates of removal from their meetings because these are not in correspondence with our Yearly Meeting, may be received on their application as persons convinced of our principles. And finally they direct that persons coming to live among us who have been accredited as ministers elsewhere, are to be received as members only; and that the recognition of their ministerial gifts should follow the same course of procedure as in the case of those of our own members to whom such gifts have been dispensed.

On Third-day (Fourth Mo. 19th) the former Clerks, Joseph Walton and Joseph Scattergood, were re-appointed.

The committee to whom had been referred the examination of the Epistle from a Yearly Meeting in Kansas, reported that it contained an expression of Christian love; and that they believed that the Friends from whom it came were entitled to the sympathies of Friends here; but that the way did not open to recommend its being read. They advised that the Clerk should be directed to return a kind, but unofficial reply. Their report was approved by the meeting. After this was decided upon, two Friends of Kansas, who were present, one of whom said that his name was attached to the Epistle (as Clerk), stated that they approved of the course pursued and believed it would not be unsatisfactory to the meeting that issued the epistle.

This was comforting and relieving, and the meeting passed on to the consideration of the Queries and Answers, the first four of which were gone over at this session.

There was no long communication; but many Friends had words of caution, exhortation or encouragement to enter in a brief way, and generally to the satisfaction and comfort of their hearers. The dignity and solemnity of the meeting were well maintained; and the sitting closed with a feeling that it had been favored of the Lord in the transaction of its business.

On Fourth-day (20th inst.) the remaining Queries were read and considered. During the course of the meeting much judicious advice was given, encouraging our members to mind the limitations which the Spirit of Truth would impose upon them, in their manner of living, and in the pursuit of their outward employments; and the command with its attendant promise was revived: "Seek ye first the kingdom of heaven and the righteousness thereof, and all things necessary shall be added." If these limitations were duly observed, failures in the prompt meeting of engagements, and in the payment of debts would seldom or never occur.

The observance of the rule laid down by our Saviour, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so unto them," would enforce strict honesty between man and man. In illustration of this, an incident was mentioned of the late Lloyd Mifflin, who was a clerk in the Bank of the United States at the time of its failure. From his position, he knew of the catastrophe that was approaching, but refused to take advantage of this knowledge, and sell the stock of the bank which he held, and thus throw the loss on an innocent purchaser. A caution was given to those who were intrusted with the care of money belonging to others, never to allow it to become mingled with their own. The only safe plan was to deposit it in a separate bank account, so that no check which an individual might draw for his own uses could possibly affect it. For want of attention to this rule, many persons have found trust funds under their care infringed upon; and some have appeared as defaulters who had been brought into that situation more by want of care, than through any evil design.

The acknowledgments, contained in the answers, of deficiencies in relation to a hiring ministry, led to the expression of advice on this subject. And the ground and root of all true Gospel ministry, as a Divine gift, and one of the manifestations of that Grace of God, which in different measures is given to all men, were set forth; and earnest exhortations were delivered, to the young especially, that they would so submit themselves to the heavenly visitations, as to be prepared for usefulness in the Church, and for admittance among the redeemed in the life to come.

Before this session closed, divers Friends were engaged in a lively manner in the ministry; some of them referring in a feeling manner to the many ministers and elders who had been removed from among us during the past year; and it seemed a fitting conclusion for the review of the state of the Church in our limits.

The adjourned meeting of Ministers and Elders in the afternoon of this day, was remarkably favored with a covering of deep and solemn feeling.

Fifth-day afternoon (21st inst.) was occupied with the reports on Education and Intoxicating Drinks, and one from the Committee on the Civilization and Improvement of the Indian natives. This latter gave the pleasing information that a new and more commodious school building had been erected to take the place of the one destroyed by fire in the early part of last year, that the cost of it had been met largely through the contributions of interested friends of the institution, and that the school had been successfully carried on in it during the past winter, with a family of 25 girls and 10 boys. The Yearly Meeting appropriated $1500 for the use of the committee.

On Sixth-day the Yearly Meeting's Committee on Education also received an appropriation of $1500 to aid in the prosecution of its work.

The Report of the Westtown Committee stated that the contributions to the Building Fund during the past year had been so liberal, that they had felt warranted in making a contract for the completion of the remaining (West) wing towards the Society of Friends one "trained in widely different social circumstances." He says:—

"In a northern island of my country, there is a little town which is well known among the Christian circles of the land. Here, some eleven years ago, an Imperial College was founded and several American gentlemen were engaged as instructors. By the earnest and persevering efforts of one of them, now deceased, the Bible was introduced as an appropriate work for the study of Ethics. So energetically and dexterously did this Professor work that within a year, a few of the students made a public profession of Christianity." "The American gentleman who thus planted the seed returned home after a year's stay, leaving his little flock with no visible guide or guard. They formed a Bible class, and as there was no ordained preacher, each preached whenever he had whereof to preach. Everybody who felt like praying, did so. They had no creed, except a covenant among themselves, embodying just the fundamental belief of evangelical Christianity. They had no music, no singing, there being no minister, there was no water baptism, no eucharist. The little church grew steadily and now numbers more than sixty members, including both sexes, but the organization is as primitive, plain and simple, as could be."

"Beginning my Christian career under such circumstances, it was with much disappointment that I attend the 'swell' churches of this country. I looked in vain for personal element in the congregation. The division of labor seemed to be carried even to matters of religion, so that while one party only talks, another only hears. Then, too, the rich display of costume, so contrary to the simple garb and the sombre color of our congregation at home, was peculiarly painful to my mind. I made ample allowance for the high standard of living in this country, but even after deducting all this allowance, there still remains many things that looked mere superfluities.

"I yearned for simplicity, for a place where religion is more personal, but I found none. In this dismal mood of mind, I was once walking with a friend, when as we passed a plain building, we saw several people coming out. I asked my friend what the building was. 'This is Friends' Meeting-house. The Quakers are nice people.' This was not the first time I heard of Quakers. Even while I was at home, I remember reading an account of William Penn signing the treaty with Indians. An article in Harper's Monthly about the rise of Friends, was not forgotten. From Carlyle, I learned to admire George Fox. Elizabeth Fry's name was more or less familiar. The only living Friend of whom I heard, was John Bright. These scrawpy informations, in addition to the phrase 'the spirit moves' which I often heard my teacher speak by way of joke, and the use of 'thee' and 'thou,' were all the knowledge I had of the Society of Friends; and all these flashed into my mind, when my friend said, 'This is Friends' Meeting-house.' The earliest opportunity to attend the Meeting was not neglected. What the first impressions of Quakerism were, it is needless for me to say. That I still attend it speaks for itself."

The Wrong Excuse.—Two workmen were talking about a comrade who had lately "got into trouble," as the saying is.

"He oughtn't to say he was led into it," said one; "he lent himself to it."

The remark struck me as a thoughtful one.

When a man, open-eyed, goes into dangerous places, associates with questionable characters, surely he lends himself to evil—he is not led into it.

Yet people often say regretfully, "Ah, poor fellow, he was led into it," when a man has committed a sin under the influence of drink. "He wouldn't have done it," they add, "if he'd been in his right senses."—Selected.

of the new buildings; which is expected to be ready for occupancy next winter.

A minute was read, embodying many of the concerns which had claimed attention, relative to the maintenance of our principles and testimonies, and the individual faithfulness of our members. It was adopted by the meeting as expressing the feeling of the body.

The meeting closed under a solemn covering.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The United States Court of Claims has decided the Chickasaw case, in which the Indians claim over $600,000, with interest, by reason of alleged improper disbursements of Chickasaw funds held in trust by the United States. The case arises from the transfer of the tribe in 1837 and succeeding years from Mississippi to the Indian territory, and involves a decision upon the legality under treaty stipulations of payments made in the emigration. The Court concludes that the Indians should have credit on their accounts for the sum of $240,168.

A new vault is to be constructed in the Treasury building at Washington, to accommodate the accumulation of standard dollars. It will have a storage capacity of 100,000,000 of these coins.

C. C. Woodworth, of Albany, head of the concern that makes postal cards for the Government, says that at the factory in Castleton, Pa., they manufacture between two and three tons a day year round. The largest order they ever filled for one city was 4,000,000 cards, or about twelve tons of paper, for New York. There are used there about 6,000,000 cards a month. Chicago comes next, with 3,000,000 cards in the same period. There are 450,000,000 postal cards manufactured annually. Two-cent postage did not lessen the use of postal cards, but checked the growth of their use for some little time. The check has been overcome, and the public are using more and more postal cards every day.

One of the latest quibbles resorted to for evading the law in Washington, D. C., against opening places of business on the first day of the week, turns upon the language used being "on the Sabbath-day." It is argued that under the old Hebrew law, this is the Seventh day of the week.

The rains which have filled the channel of Brazos River, in Western Texas, putting an end to the drought, have brought down hundreds of dead cattle, and the stream at Waco is covered with decomposing carcases. Sickness is feared.

Lately a large number of "temperance drinks" were analyzed by the chemist of the Massachusetts State Board of Health, and, according to Eastern papers, the result showed not a single one free of alcohol. On the contrary, one contained 44.3 of the intoxicant, several 40 per cent., and a large proportion more than 20 per cent.

A high license bill passed by the Delaware House of Representatives, has been defeated in the Senate of that State.

Local elections, at which license was a principal question, were held in many cities and towns in Illinois on the 19th instant. A majority of the cities declared for license, while the smaller towns all went for prohibition.

A local option election was held on the 25th of this month in four of the five districts of Rockingham Co., Virginia. The Ashby District gave 800 prohibition majority, and the Harrisburgh District 244. The other two districts are claimed by the Prohibitionists by smaller majorities.

The Governor of Iowa, in response to a letter of inquiry from the Secretary of the Central Prohibitory Committee of Texas, says that "in 80 out of the 99 counties of Iowa, prohibition is enforced, and in the remaining 19 counties it is partly enforced. The effects of prohibition upon the general welfare and habits of the people," he says, are decidedly wholesome."

The deaths in this city last week numbered 472, which was 119 less than during the previous week, and 99 more than during the corresponding period of last year. Of the foregoing 250 were males and 222 females; 246 adults and 226 minors; 67 died of pneumonia; 58 of consumption; 34 of diseases of the heart; 29 of convulsions; 20 of inflammation of the brain; 17 of old age; 17 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 17 of bronchitis; 16 of marasmus, and 13 of measles.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½s, 110½; 4s, 129½; 3s, 101; currency 6s, 126 a 137.

Cotton.—Spinners bought sparingly on a basis of 10½ cts. for middling uplands.

Flour and Meal.—The movement in flour continued slow and unsatisfactory, but prices were steadily held. Sales of 125 barrels choice winter extra, at $3.45; 125 barrels Pennsylvania roller, straight, at $4.25; 250 barrels Ohio, clear, at $4; 125 barrels Indiana, straight, at $4.35; 375 barrels winter patent, at $4.00 a $4.75; and 500 barrels Minnesota, patent, at $4.75 a $4.90. Rye flour sold in a small way at $2.75 a $2.85 per barrel.

White potatoes, per bushel: Early Rose, choice, 80 a 85 cts.; do. fair to good, 75 a 78 cts.; White Stars, choice, 65 a 70 cts.; do. fair to good, 63 a 65 cts.; Burbanks, choice, 68 a 70 cts.; do. fair to good, 63 a 65 cts.; Hebrons, choice, 63 a 70 cts.; do. fair to good, 63 a 65 cts.; Mammoth Pearl, choice, 65 a 70 cts.; do. fair to good, 60 a 63 cts.; Peerless, as to quality, 63 a 65 cts.; Florida, new, large, choice, per barrel, 56 a $7; do. do. large, fair to good, per barrel, $4 a $5; do. do., culls, $2 a $3.

Grain.—No. 2 red wheat closed at 92½ a 92½ cts. No. 2 mixed corn, at 46½ a 47½ cts. No. 2 white oats, at 37½ a 37½ cts. per bushel.

Beef cattle were fairly active at 4 a 5½ cts.

Sheep were active and ¼c. higher; wool sheep, 4½ a 6 cts.; wool lambs, 5½ a 7 cts.; sheared sheep, 3 a 5 cts.; sheared lambs, 4 a 6 cts.

Hogs were fairly active at a decline of ¼c. Western, 7½ a 8½ cts.

FOREIGN.—It is officially stated that Lord Salisbury, in a despatch sent to Washington on Third Mo. 24th, said that the British Government, understanding the action of the United States in denouncing the fishery articles of the Treaty of Washington to be, in a great degree, the result of disappointment at being called upon to pay $1,100,000, under the Halifax fisheries award, offers to revert to the old condition of affairs, without pecuniary indemnity, which offer, it trusts, will commend itself to the American Government as being based upon that spirit of good-will and generosity which should animate two great and kindred nations, whose common origin, language and institutions constitute as many bonds of amity and concord.

The London Times has printed a letter alleged to have been written by C. E. Parnell, in which the latter is implicated in crimes committed in Ireland. Parnell pronounces the letter a forgery, and denies that he sympathizes with the perpetrators of murders and other outrages in Great Britain.

A high degree of excitement has arisen in France, in consequence of the arrest by German police, of a French commissary, named Schnaebeles, near the boundary line between Alsace and Germany. In France it is alleged that Schnaebeles was enticed into German territory to secure the arrest. This is denied by the German papers. The subject is under investigation.

Farwana Khan, the Afghan commander, who was sent by the Ameer, with a force of 5000 men, to avenge the recent massacre of Gholam Haider Khan, the Governor of Maruf, by the Ghilzais, whose rebellion he had set out to suppress, was met and routed south of Ghuzni by the rebels.

The Khan of Dhir has rebelled against the Ameer. He has attacked and defeated the Khan of Bodshora, and captured one of the latter's villages and a quantity of breech-loading rifles.

The Vatican, in answer to inquiries as to whether the Pope was in favor of having a reconciliation effected with Italy on the basis of renunciation of the Papal claims of temporal power of the Pope, states that the Pope desires peace with Italy, but has never thought of abandoning the rights of the Church or the Papacy.

The police of Kieff and Odessa have discovered plots to kill the Czar by blowing up the imperial train in the event of the Czar's visiting Southern Russia.

A disastrous fire has occurred at Amantkeni, Asia Minor. Five hundred houses were burned and many persons lost their lives.

Slight shocks of earthquake continue to be reported at various points in the interior of Mexico.

Cholera has appeared at two places on the Mexican coast, having been received from a South American port or ports.

A special cable despatch from St. John's reports the defeat in the Newfoundland Assembly of the Prohibitory Liquor bill by the casting vote of the Speaker.

A telegram from Ottawa says the Dominion Alliance has decided that a total prohibition bill shall be introduced in the Dominion Parliament.

A special meeting of Protestant ministers was held on the 19th instant, in Montreal, to protest against a bill pending in the Quebec Legislature, which proposes "to place crucifixes in all courts of law, for the purpose of strengthening the oaths of witnesses." After a lengthy discussion, a petition in triplicate was drafted, to be presented to the Lieutenant Governor, the Legislative Assembly and the Legislative Council, "protesting against the bill, because it was a serious outrage on the religious convictions of Protestants; proposed to exalt the distinctive emblem of the Roman Catholic Church in the courts of justice; would destroy good feeling between Protestants and Roman Catholics, and would make trouble in the courts of justice, as the Protestants strongly object to it." It was also determined to bring the matter before the Presbytery Synod.

CORRECTIONS.—The marriage of Joseph Henderson and Anna P. Clayton, the notice of which was published in No. 36 of "The Friend," occurred on the 17th of Second Month, and not, as there stated, on the 17th of Third Month.

In the obituary notice of Thomas Bowman, published in "The Friend" of Fourth Month 16th, the age is given as in his 77th year. Our friend Thomas Hobson writes that he was in his 74th year.

NOTICE.

Friends having clothing, bedding, carpets, or anything that would be useful to Friends, Indians or Refugees; also suitable reading for such people, please forward to Friends' Book Store, 304 Arch St., Philada., so that they can be packed and shipped before the first of Sixth Month; and much oblige H. II. Bonwill, before she leaves for Indian Territory.

MARRIED. Third Month 28th, 1887, at Friends' Meeting, Paulina, O'Brien Co., Iowa, MARION SMITH, of Coal Creek, Iowa, to ALICE M. ROCKWELL, of the former place.

—, at a public meeting appointed to be held at the residence of the bride, No. 510 North Eleventh Street, Philadelphia, by authority of New Garden Monthly Meeting of Friends, on the 13th instant, WALTER L. MOORE, of Moorestown, New Jersey, and GUELIEMA HARVEY, daughter of the late Thomas M. Harvey.

[The frail health of the bride rendered it necessary that the marriage contract should be entered into at her residence.]

DIED. at her residence, near Springville, Linn Co., Iowa, on the evening of Second Month 22nd, 1887, REBECCA ASKEW, widow of the late Parker Askew, a beloved member and elder of Springville Monthly and Particular Meetings, in the 83rd year of her age. Though her last sickness was only of a few days duration, yet she several times expressed herself, that she desired to depart and be at rest; and her final close was remarkably peaceful and calm, leaving on the minds of her sorrowing relatives and friends the comforting assurance that He who, we believe, had been with her through a long and useful life, did not then forsake her, but was pleased to gather her unto Himself as a "Shock of corn fully ripe into the Heavenly Garner."

—, on the 3rd of Third Month, 1887, at her residence in Chester Co., Pa., MARY G., wife of Nathan Pennell, in the 53rd year of her age, a member of Concord Monthly Meeting. Conscious that her end was near, through redeeming love and mercy, she was enabled to say, "Thy will be done," and "I am going to the mansion prepared for me."

—, at her residence in Media, Delaware Co., Pa., on the 6th of Fourth Month, 1887, HANNAH M. STOKES, widow of the late John Stokes, and daughter of the late Jesse J. Maris. She was a member and elder of Media Particular and Chester Monthly Meeting, Penna.

—, on the evening of the third instant, JAMES ALLINSON, son of Samuel Allinson, deceased, aged 45 years, a member of Chesterfield Monthly Meeting of Friends, Crosswicks, N. J. Living, as this dear Friend manifestly did, so near to his heavenly Master, we cannot but feel an assurance that the summons, though unexpected, did not find him unprepared. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."

—, at his residence in Westmoreland Co., Pa., on the 7th of Fourth Month, 1887, BENJAMIN GILBERT, in the 87th year of his age. His wife, Lydia Gilbert, died on the 26th of Eighth Mo. 1882, in the 75th year of her age, after they had spent over 53 years of life's journey together.

Selections from the Diary of Abigail W. Hall.

Third Mo. 16th, 1854. A quiet good feeling, seems the covering of my spirit this evening. Never was I more sensible than throughout this day, of the gathering arm of our Heavenly Father to be around us; and that He has in this family, precious lambs of his fold, who are living daily in his fear. It seemed this morning, during our silent sitting together in meeting, as though I could almost hear their plaintive bleatings after Him. May I oftener than the day beg for strength to bring them unto Him; and in no way hinder or forbid them. A careful, consistent, upright walking, will, I believe, be instrumental in helping them forward, and go further than words.

17th. A beautiful spring morning! all nature seems lovely. How did my heart respond to the language of David, as it came before me while sitting at breakfast surrounded by the children: "Thy loving-kindness is better than life," &c. A feeling not at our command overspread in our morning collection. All was hushed, even the most restless and uneasy of the flock. Truly the acknowledgment could be, and was afresh raised, "I the Lord do keep it, lest any hurt it I will keep it night and day." And who is there that can harm us, if we be found followers of that which is good?

Fifth Mo. 10th. Attended our Quarterly Meeting yesterday. Never was I more unwilling to hear my own voice; and the enemy has not been wanting to whisper many things, all tending to cast down. Feel this morning that I can appear as poor Peter did: "Thou knowest all things, thou knowest that I love thee." Grant, O Heavenly Father! a little more confirming evidence, that thou didst gird and lead whither I would not. Suffer me not to make crosses for myself, or ever to be ashamed to acknowledge thee.

14th.—First-day. Our meeting just closed, was a season of conflict. Truly I can say, a "thorn in the flesh," a "messenger of Satan" was permitted to buffet; and so often is, when thus assembled, that truly I can acknowledge in me, that is in my flesh dwelleth no good thing. I remembered this day, the desirable condition of the poor woman who cried after Jesus. Though there was much to discourage her so doing, yet she continued her importunity; and Jesus not only heard but regarded her, saying: "Thy faith hath saved thee, go in peace." May strength be given to wrestle the whole night season through; that so there may be a prevailing, and help experienced to rise above the weaknesses of poor nature, which of myself I never can do; while "I can do all things through Christ strengthening me."

22nd. Received on Seventh-day, a letter from my dear friend and father in the Truth, James Emlen, holding forth the language of encouragement, in regard to my exercises on Fifth-day last. It was truly strengthening and confirming to be thus remembered; and the language of my heart has been, since the reception of this letter, "Good is the Lord, and worthy to be praised; for his mercy endureth forever." He hath condescended to my low estate, and through his servant, hath helped me. In this place, I bear my burdens much alone: being oft encompassed with great discouragement. Truly can I say, "Unless the Lord had been my helper, my soul had almost dwelt in silence." Oh Thou! who alone knowest the deep exercises and provings of thy poor child, keep near to support and direct, in every extremity. Show me, from day to day, the way wherein I should go, for I lift up my soul unto thee.

31st. My feelings have been afresh awakened this morning to the shortness of life, and the certainty of a never ending state of being in that world which is to come. The blessedness of those who, after serving their generation according to the will of God, have ceased from their labors, seemed to come before me, all tending to raise longing desires after holiness and heaven.

Sixth Mo. 9th. Feel comfortable and quiet this morning. Yesterday I was constrained to lift up my voice in vocal petitions. Thou alone knowest, O Lord! my deep exercises. To Thee I look for my support under them. While I desire not to be nursed or dandled, I have thought sometimes, and never felt more the need than yesterday, of a word of encouragement to help to bear up. But it seems that in this place or family, it is denied me. Thus tending to drive closer home unto Thee, O Heavenly Father! for if Thou only speaks peace, why need I fear? Thou hast helped me and carried through; and wilt Thou not continue to do so, to thy own praise and honor, and to the relief of my exercised and burdened soul!

10th. Though yesterday was a day of more care than sometimes, I was comforted in our collection for bed, to find a willingness, upon requesting the dear children to do so, to try to get still, that we might have a little quietness before we retired. It was a token that the prayer for preservation did arise from not a few hearts, and that our Heavenly Father did regard us, and that the canopy of his love was spread over us. For which favor my heart did secretly return thanks: with the desire that He would continue to keep us and watch over us; a sweet comfortable night's rest followed. If the Lord gives quietness, who can give trouble?

26th. Since last entry in my diary, I have passed through such seasons of doubt and discouragement that I have not felt as though I could pen any thing in this book. And though it is not yet a time of abounding, thought I felt a little lifting up of the cloud, and a liberty to go back, and revert to some of my exercises and trials, known to none but my Heavenly Father.

At our afternoon meeting yesterday, we had our dear friend Sarah Hillman, who is visiting the meetings in our Quarter. She was accompanied by our friends Joel Evans and Martha Wistar. Dear Sarah was excellent in testimony and supplication. Her concern for the dear children, was much in accordance with my own feelings respecting them: I, too, found that which comforted me. So that, may we all take a little fresh courage, and journey forward.

27th. Was favored last night with a comfortable rest; for which and for other multiplied favors and mercies, my heart hath been this morning afresh lifted up in gratitude. I was so much, during my sleeping hours last night, with my dear mother, that I feel this morning, as if I really had been with her. Indeed there is hardly a night but what I dream about her. Though I cannot desire her back to this world of care and trouble, yet no mortal knows how much I miss her! and had I not a Father and Friend in Heaven, how disconsolate should I be! to Him all my troubles are known. He helps bear and carry them. For, "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth those that fear Him." "He knoweth our frame, He remembereth that we are but dust."

Seventh Mo. 10th. Think I never had, as during our morning meeting, such a feeling of sleepiness to contend with: while not willing to let it be seen that I was thus tried. Oh it caused a struggle indeed! I never remember giving up in the least to this weakness and temptation; but I have been more sorely proved in this way, than I have dared to speak of.

[Our friend's struggles and conflicts on this account—several times alluded to in this Journal—may remind the reader of what the Apostle Paul has left us concerning the "thorn in the flesh, the messenger of Satan to buffet him, lest he should be exalted above measure." While we are not told what this was, we are instructed in that Paul "besought the Lord thrice, that it might depart from him." But without its being so done, he was answered, "My grace is sufficient for thee," &c. A preserving measure of this grace appears to have been vouchsafed to A. W. H., for she says, "I never remember giving up in the least to this weakness and temptation," &c. It is cause for thanksgiving as well as acceptance, that a sufficiency of this grace for their every need, is freely offered to all who truly and sincerely desire to use, and to walk worthy of it, and of the vocation wherewith we are called. Simple, faithful dependence on the grace of the Redeemer, is what all need, in order to overcome the enemies of our own houses, or the plague of our hearts, be they what they may: for as the obedience which is of faith, is yielded to its leavening, transforming power, it will bring salvation; yea, will build up and give an inheritance among all them that are sanctified in Christ Jesus.]

Remembered yesterday, this expression of a dear young woman on her death-bed: "I have had hard work to find my Saviour." One replied, but thou hast found Him! "Yes, I determined not to give up the struggle but with life." May I be helped to struggle on! I have a little faith yet to believe that victory will be given.

15th. Have been almost ready to say this day, under the weight of what I feel, though I die with Thee, yet will I not again deny Thee. Keep me, O Heavenly Father! in the hour of weakness. Strengthen me to resist the devil in all his transformations. Thou, O Lord, art stronger than he; and canst bind and cast him out. Give strength, if it please thee, O dearest Father! more faithfully to follow Thee, so as to overcome the many weaknesses that beset me.

17th. Good resolutions formed. But I fear too much in my own strength. Small deviations both yesterday and the day previous, have caused me secretly to cry unto the Lord for help and strength; and that I may be found continually watching unto prayer.

20th.—Fifth-day. An excessively warm day: so much so that some of the dear children could not see how they were to sit meeting. I encouraged them, previous to our going in, to try to keep still and quiet, not worry and fret about the heat; assuring them if they would, the better they would be enabled to bear it; and further added, that I myself had often been quieted in noticing the very quiet manner in which even some of the younger ones among them sat in our meetings. Had I only been faithful therein I believe I might have further encouraged such; yes, even with a little testimony. "Those that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength," &c., but I feared to venture, and whilst trying the fleece, again and again, the meeting closed. "Increase, O Lord, my faith." Thou wast good to me this day in giving a little strength to lift up my prayer unto Thee for daily bread, and to be delivered from temptation.

24th. Toward the middle of the meeting yesterday, a little matter seemed to present and rest with me, which I felt afraid to offer and yet to withhold. Oh how I crave a little more light on my path. No one knows the weakness, the fears, the misgivings, which do attend! I think I can say, I am willing to be made any use of my Heavenly Father pleaseth, if I may only be a part of the building; that building which is not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

27th.—Fifth-day. Opened my mouth in a few words in our meeting this morning, very unexpectedly to myself. A quiet, peaceful feeling having since attended, I hope I did not do wrong.

Wanderings in China.—No. 4.

Every man is supposed to have three souls, one of which at death goes forth into the world of darkness to undergo trial and punishment at the hands of the judicial gods of Purgatory. The second soul remains with the corpse in the tomb, while the third watches over the tablet which bears its name in the Ancestral Hall. Every large family has its own Ancestral Hall, quite apart from the family tombs. All round this hall are ranged shelves, on which stand rows of these tablets, representing many departed generations. They are all much alike, from the tablet of the Emperor to that of the poor student, consisting simply of a narrow upright wooden slab, on which are inscribed the name and the honorable titles of the dead—the slab being mounted in a richly carved stand.

Friends who desire to comfort their dead must therefore make separate offerings on behalf of each of his three souls—so they must by turns visit the grave, the Ancestral Hall, and the temple of Cheng Hwang, the deity into whose jurisdiction the soul has passed.

No one can be long in China before he discovers that Ancestral worship is the keystone of all existence in the Celestial Empire. It permeates all life, affecting even the most trivial details of everyday existence, and is an influence tenfold more potent for keeping the people in the bondage of gross superstition than all the countless idols of the land, inasmuch as it compels every man to be forever looking backward instead of forward, in fear lest he should by any action offend his very exacting ancestral spirits. In short, from his birth to his grave, the chief aim and end of every Chinaman is this constant propitiation of the dead. It has been well described as a most degrading slavery—the slavery of the living to the dead—a system of worship and sacrifices which must be offered ceaselessly, not necessarily from love to the departed, but in order to avert calamity should their displeasure be incurred by any neglect or departure from ancient custom. It is a system of fear which controls every act of life and all social organization, affecting alike the Imperial throne and the meanest coolie—in short, it is this system which has fossilized this vast Empire, and holds all China's millions frozen in its icy grasp.

No matter how bad a son may have been from his boyhood till the hour when his parents die—from that time forth his whole anxiety centres in appeasing their anger by such prayers and offerings as shall ensure their comfortable reception in the Spirit World—not for their sakes, but for his own, lest by any means they should return to torment him, accompanied by a multitude of spirits more vicious than themselves. For the dead are mighty, and will jealously avenge the smallest omission in the accustomed ritual in their honor. Thus the undutiful son is at once transformed into a most punctilious observer of every religious form required in ancestral worship.

For this reason, it is of the utmost importance to every Chinaman to leave a son, whose duty it shall be to offer the oft-repeated sacrifices which ensure his comfort in the Spirit World.

However Chinamen may differ on other matters, such as systems of religion, social position, dialect, &c., this is the one point on which all the four hundred millions are agreed—it is the one faith which all alike hold in awe and reverence, and which is indelibly impressed on their minds from their earliest infancy. It takes precedence of everything. The man who holds the most important government office is not only excused for its neglect, if he can show that he was engaged in some ceremonial connected with his ancestral duties, but should one of his parents die while he is in office, he is actually obliged to retire from public life for a period of many months—no matter how critical may be the public interests thus sacrificed to an iron custom!

When a man dies, the first care of his friends is to place at the door of the house a cup of cold water—a custom for which no satisfactory reason is assigned. Then a suit of really good clothes must be burnt, together with most of the dead man's wardrobe—his boots and shoes, bed and bedding, horses and houses, sedan-chair, opium-pipe, melon-seeds, and any other luxuries or necessities which he appreciated in this world, for all these things will be equally necessary in the Spirit World, where they cannot be obtained, though they can so easily be transmitted thither by the simple process of burning them. So the newly arrived dead is absolutely dependent on his male heir for all these things; and his reception in the Spirit World will be considerably better if he arrives well-clothed than it would be should he appear in beggarly want.

Many and great are the expenses to which a family is subjected through the death of one member. Not only, as we have seen, must they immediately burn all his best clothes (as it is understood that genuine articles should be sacrificed for his original outfit, though paper representations are equally efficacious later), but it is deemed important that all funeral arrangements should be the very best that can be provided, and the survivors often impoverish themselves for years to provide what is considered a decent burial. The corpse must be arrayed in new clothes, with a cap and satin boots (such a dress as the deceased would have hired for the day had he been going to attend a feast).

As to the coffin, the price of which may range from £5 to £500, it is essential that it should be as solid and expensive as possible. But these are often provided beforehand; for dutiful sons will stint themselves for years in order to present their parents on their sixty-first birthday with really handsome coffins—cheerful birthday presents, which thenceforth form part of the household furniture, and should the family have occasion to "fit," the ponderous boards are carried with them, no matter at what inconvenience.

In the hill districts you may chance to meet some great official on the march. The ladies of his zenana are carefully stowed away in covered chairs, and this domestic procession is completed by a small caravan of mules laden with "longevity boards," ready for all emergencies! So essential is the provision of a good coffin, that the Chinese form of insurance, instead of having reference to the comfort of old age, goes to entitle the subscriber to a coffin and grave-clothes. To secure this, he must for sixteen years be a member of a "Long Life Loan Company," his annual subscription being something less than a shilling. Benevolent persons present coffins to the temples for the use of the very poor.

When it becomes positively necessary to close the coffin, its edges are closely cemented with mortar, and, unless the funeral is to occur immediately, the coffin is varnished and deposited in a place of honor, either in the home itself, or in one of the small houses built for this purpose near the cemeteries. Thus, it may lie for years awaiting a lucky hour for burial, and night and morning dutiful hands must burn incense to the spirit of the dead; and at all festivals, paper money and clothes must also be burnt, and the priests must receive large offerings, in order that by the fervor of their prayers the soul may be delivered from the Buddhist Purgatory and enter the rest of Paradise.

At the end of one hundred days, the tablet of the dead is placed upon the ancestral altar, and the dutiful son reasons with his parent and points out that as the body which he formerly inhabited has now been dead for one hundred days, it is full time that he should take his place amongst the other ancestors. Then all present do homage to the tablet, and make a sacred bonfire of their deep mourning clothes. They now assume blue, instead of white—clothes, shoes and hair-ties being all blue.

Once in ten years a great festival is held for the consolation of the dead. The principal temples are fitted up with rows of booths for the sale of every sort of thing which the dead can be supposed to require—hats and garments, boots and shoes, spectacles and fans, horses and houses, sugar-plums, furniture and gold and silver money; but above all, opium, with pipes all ready for smoking—these, and many more, all made of paper and cardboard, are devoutly offered to the dead. Amongst these numerous shops, even the pawnbroker and the money changer are duly represented.

At the close of the festival, all the paste-board shops and their miscellaneous contents are heaped together to form a vast bonfire, the smoke of which finds its way through the gates of Purgatory; and there, I suppose, all the acceptable offerings of the pious donors assume a spiritual form, suited to the requirements of the Spirit World.

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 128.

MINISTRY.

When Daniel Stanton was about 20 years of age, a great concern came upon him to open his mouth in a public manner for the cause of religion. He felt it to be a weighty work, being a poor apprentice, and Friends in Philadelphia at that time being a great and wise people, gifted with a knowledge of spiritual things, and zealous for the cause of God. In this humble condition, he says, "I waded for a considerable time through much sorrow and trouble of spirit, lest I should go too fast, or before my Divine Guide; for they who go before they are sent cannot profit the people, or have peace in themselves; and peace to me, and to do the will of the Lord, was what I most desired." "Friends bore with my appearance with much tenderness, and the ministry of those who were largely gifted in the mysteries of the kingdom, and like scribes well instructed thereto, that could bring out of the treasury things new and old, would correspond with what I had to say in the fear of the Lord; which blessed helps, together with the evidence of peace in my own breast, gave a confirmation to my mind that I was in the way of my duty.

"After I came forth in this laborious exercise, I dreamed a dream, or saw in a vision, that I was as a little child born into the world, and my mother was very tender of me (who I have thought to be the church), but there was an enemy that sought my life, and as though he would destroy me, but she that was my mother made her escape, and carried me into the wilderness and we were preserved."

How important is it, that the church, as a tender parent, should care for and watch over, in love, those who are inexperienced in the ministry, so that they may be preserved from the snares of the Enemy of all good, who would fain destroy their service in the cause of truth and righteousness!

Daniel Stanton says that about the time of his own appearance in the ministry, in 1728, "The glorious day-spring from on high powerfully appeared amongst us, and several were engaged to speak to the praise of the Almighty, and to bear testimony to his great and good name; three before I appeared and two afterwards. I thought it might be said to be a time in some measure of the fulfilling the prophecy of Joel, 'I will pour out my spirit upon all flesh, and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy; your old men shall dream dreams, your young men shall see visions; and also upon the servants, and upon the handmaids in those days, will I pour out my spirit.'" "As I kept inward before the Lord in his fear, He was pleased to reveal his blessed mind and will in things concerning the ministry, and, as I grew in the gift communicated to me, he was pleased to give me an open door in the hearts of his people."

Daniel Stanton travelled much in the American Provinces, the West India Islands and Great Britain, in the work of the ministry. In visiting meetings near the City of Philadelphia, in which he resided, he often chose to go on foot, having bad, as he says, "many heavenly seasons in that way of travelling." He was not unmindful that the design and tendency of all true Gospel ministry is to stir up the pure mind to adhere to the holy teachings of Christ in their own souls; and therefore, did not always speak, even at meetings which had been appointed at his request. This silence, he remarks, "if rightly minded, might be a means to bring people to hearken to the alone teacher in their own hearts."

In accordance with the care practiced by Daniel Stanton in the exercise of the ministry, is the following advice to ministers, contained in the Testimony of Somerset Quarterly Meeting, concerning John Banks:—

"Wait to know God's time, that when thou speakest it may be in his time; and keep to thy opening, that what thou speakest may be from the Spirit, and with understanding. Thus wilt thou learn, both when to speak, what to speak, and when to be silent. And also thou wilt be preserved from a lifeless, unedifying ministry, which is a hurt, but never helps true believers. It is a living ministry which begets a living people; and by a living ministry, at first, we were reached and turned to the truth."

An interesting illustration of the effect of a living ministry is related in a letter written in 1884 by the late Wm. Chase of Salem, Mass. In speaking of the account then being published in "The Friend" of Micajah Collins of Lynn, he mentions calling on a Friend, then 90 years of age, who became a member of the Society of Friends in middle life, embracing its doctrines from conviction of their truth. She attributed her conviction mainly to the earnest labors of Micajah Collins, that is, so far as human instrumentality was concerned.

"She was in a Friend's family in Lynn as a nurse, and in that way first attended the meetings of Friends. In relating something of her experience to me in years past, she said, that one day in a meeting, the question seemed to arise in her mind, 'Do not Friends believe in prayer? I never heard any of them utter a verbal prayer.'

"Soon after, Micajah Collins arose, and began speaking with the words quite or nearly as follows—'Thou would know what is true and acceptable and living prayer;' and went on in much power and clearness to define our views on the subject, which so impressed her mind that she found her mental question fully answered, greatly to her relief. She told me, several other communications from him were equally remarkable and satisfying to her inquiring mind; and she requested membership in our Society, and has lived many years an ornament and blessing among us."

The account of M. Collins, which she was receiving in "The Friend," had revived her early recollections of one of her early and dearest friends, and was a great comfort and encouragement to her in her declining years. She was so much affected by her impressions, that tears of joy and gratitude ran freely down her furrowed cheeks."

Elizabeth Pitfield, whose memory is dear to many yet living, was often much favored in her ministerial communications. The melody of her voice at such seasons was sometimes very remarkable—a melody which may be regarded as the natural expression of the sweet feelings of Divine love with which her mind was clothed, and therefore a fruit of the gift of the ministry with which she had been entrusted.

This was strikingly the case at the Quarterly Meeting of Philadelphia in the Eleventh Month, 1861; she commenced speaking with the text, "Ye believe in God, believe also in me." She quoted other expressions of the dear Saviour, indeed going over a good deal of the fourteenth chapter of John. One who was present, said, "It seemed almost like the Saviour speaking to us himself!"

Her mind had been brought under exercise for some whose faith was very low. She wanted these poor, struggling ones to remember that Christ died for all—that we have an Advocate with the Father. She encouraged them to believe that their prayers would be heard, and that they would yet see of the desire of their souls.

The Musk-rat.

On the 9th of Fourth Month, whilst walking with a companion along the banks of Beaver Run, as it meandered through the beautiful Chester Valley above Downingtown, the exclamation, "What's that!" drew my attention to a small animal quickly gliding through the waters, and entering the mouth of a burrow at the bottom of the stream. It was one of the common Musk-rats or Musquash, (Fiber zibethicus), a member of the Rodent family, and nearly allied to the Beaver, which it resembles in appearance and habits. The body of the Musk-rat is stoutly built, and is about one foot in length, independently of the laterally flattened tail, which is nearly the same length.

This animal is confined to North America, where it is widely distributed in suitable localities from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and extending as far north as the barren grounds bordering the Arctic seas. Like its cousin the Beaver, it has two kinds of hair; one a short, thick, soft fur; and interspersed through this, large, stiff, glistening hairs which overlie and conceal the fur below. The fur is inferior in quality and amount to that of the Beaver; and though an article of commerce, the trappers in this section of country can only procure from 12 to 15 cents per pelt. This low price is no doubt a blessing to the Musk-rat; for if its skin was as valuable as that of the Beaver, it would long since have been almost, or quite exterminated from the thickly settled parts of our land; while now, protected by its comparatively low value, it is abundant almost everywhere along streams.

In broad marshes, it often builds, for a winter home, a house of sticks, grass, mud, &c., which rises from two to five feet above the water; and which it enters from beneath the surface of the marsh. A casual spectator might easily suppose these houses to be merely masses of rubbish swept down by the current and lodged against some bush or stump, or other obstruction. A few years ago, I noticed quite a group of these in one of the rivers in Iowa, and during the past winter, I have seen several of them in the swampy expansion of the Pensaukin creek in New Jersey.

Where the locality is not favorable for the erection of such buildings, the Musk-rat burrows into the bank, commencing its tunnel beneath the surface of the water, and gradually working upward into the bank, so as to make a chamber which it beds with leaves and grasses. There are said to be generally several outlets to these burrows—all under water—and they extend sometimes from 15 to 20 yards in length. These animals are quick workers, and their burrowing habits often render them troublesome by their piercing the banks of ponds and mill-races, so that the water breaks through and escapes. The friend, at whose hospitable home our walk ended, bore testimony to their industry, telling us that the banks of his ice-pond would seem sound in the evening, and next morning he would find the water gone, or running out through an opening these active animals had dug during the night. The food of the Musk-rat consists principally of the leaves and roots of sedge grass and other water plants. In captivity it will eat muscels which it extracts from their shells; and it is probable that where these abound they furnish an article of diet to it, in its wild state.

Audubon and Bachman in their work on the Quadrupeds of North America, give a pleasant description of the habits of this animal. They say:—

“Musk-rats are very lively, playful animals when in their proper element, the water; and many of them may be occasionally seen disporting themselves on a calm night in some mill-pond or deep sequestered pool, crossing and recrossing in every direction, leaving long ripples in the water behind them, while others stand for a few moments on little hurdles or tufts of grass, or on stones or logs, on which they can get a footing above the water, or on the banks of the pond, and then plunge one after the other into the water. At times one is seen lying perfectly still on the surface of the pond or stream, with its body widely spread out, and as flat as can be. Suddenly it gives the water a smart slap with its tail, somewhat in the manner of the Beaver, and disappears beneath the surface instantaneously, going down head foremost, and reminding one of the quickness and ease with which some species of ducks and grebes dive when shot at.”

“At the distance of 10 or 20 yards, the Musk-rat comes to the surface again, and perhaps joins its companions in their sports; at the same time others are feeding on the grassy banks, dragging off the roots of various kinds of plants, or digging underneath the edge of the bank. These animals seem to form a little community of social, playful creatures, who only require to be unmolested in order to be happy.”

For “The Friend.”

The Spirit of Good and the Spirit of Evil, in the Mixture.

According to my understanding of the Scriptures, I believe that the Spirit of God created the world and all things in it, without any mixture of evil. And after the formation of man, a portion of the same good spirit was given to him as a teacher and a guide in spiritual things. But at the same time the Spirit of Evil—the enemy of righteousness—was present also. And although God was over all, yet the Evil Spirit was permitted to try the fidelity of man; and through the weakness of the flesh it prevailed over him. But the same Spirit of Good continued with him for his help, in various ways, both before and after the deluge, and until the coming of Christ in the flesh; and that it was given to different persons in different degrees, and at different times according to their several needs. Hence the prophets received a greater portion of it than ordinary men; and Moses was more illuminated by it than his co-temporaries, as he was to become the author of the Jewish law, which was to govern a people that had become outward in their views and practices. And this outward law was to remain until Shiloh came; then unto Him was the gathering of the people to be. So now, the more we are gathered unto Him, the more we shall witness the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus to set us free from the law of sin and death, and to lead us out of the mixture of evil.

And the evangelists and the apostles received a greater portion of the Spirit of God, as they were designed to be the chief promulgators of that gospel which comes to us, not only in words but also in power; and which saves us from the power of the evil one. But now, since the coming of Christ in the flesh, the good Spirit of God is poured out more abundantly upon all flesh, so that both sons and daughters may prophecy in his name, and become as the oracles of God, to speak for Him, in the ability that He alone gives; and be made instrumental in his hands, in doing away with that evil mixture which so disturbs the harmony of our families and meetings, and of the world at large.

As we attend to the leadings of the Spirit of God, its overshadowing influence produces a new birth, sets us free from the law of sin and death, and also frees us from the mixture of evil, as it leads us to perfection. Thus we are sanctified and justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God. And though, since the sacrifice of Christ, a larger portion of the Holy Spirit is given us, to guide us into all truth, yet that sacrifice of itself does not save us. It only puts us in a capacity for salvation, on conditions that we do our part, by submitting to the washings of regeneration, until the holy condition which was lost in the fall is renewed. Then we are prepared to become partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light. And without this we can have no true knowledge of the spiritual things of God, neither can we interpret aright the deep sayings contained in the Holy Scriptures. For it takes a heavenly wisdom to enable us to understand heavenly things; and it requires a Divine light to enable us to see the deep things of God. But if we are happily restored to the purity that our first parents had before they fell, we will have the same Evil Spirit to contend with that they had, and we may expect to have, until he is overcome and cast out by one that is stronger than he is. But if I read the Scriptures aright, we may become so firmly established on Christ Jesus the Rock, that even the gates of hell can never prevail against us. For He never fell, and He will keep us from falling, so long as we abide in Him and He in us. And while the Spirit of Christ is in us, the evil mixture cannot enter. But without Christ's quickening Spirit, we remain spiritually dead. For I do believe that after our first parents partook of the forbidden fruit, they lost their spiritual life; and that Evil Spirit which brought death, entered the heart. And that since then, good and evil have been in the hearts of all the children of the fallen Adam. For after the Evil Spirit had, of man's own choice, entered his heart, it is said that he begat children in his own likeness, after he had lost the Divine likeness, and took upon himself the likeness of the Evil One. And now, seeing the whole world is under the bondage of sin, it becomes the great duty of man to accept the offers of salvation and restoration from this sad mixture. And we are told that there is no other name or power given, whereby we can be saved, but by and through Christ Jesus, the second Adam, the Quickening Spirit, who never fell; and who came into our sinful world, to seek and to save that which was lost in the fall. So if we want salvation we must accept the terms, and become co-workers with that Good Spirit until we are redeemed from all iniquity, and consequently from the mixture of evil. But it must be by overcoming it. Then we should find, that reconciliation was made for iniquity, and an end of sin; and an everlasting righteousness brought into the soul; and Christ to be anointed as the most Holy, ruling and reigning in unmix'd purity; for his kingdom will then have come, and his will be done, on earth as it is in heaven. And unless this vital experience is, to some extent, attained; or where the change from a state of nature to a state of grace, is not going forward, where is our claim to Christianity? Or where is our knowledge of heavenly things, or of Divine life? Without the good Spirit of God, we remain spiritually dead. But where it predominates, the mixture of evil disappears. D. H.

Moderation in Trade and Business.

While the seventh query was under consideration in our late Yearly Meeting, methought, that “to keep to moderation in trade or business,” would seem to be increasingly difficult from the present great competition therein, added to the apparently whetted appetite or desire to accumulate riches. Both of these are temptations to go beyond proper bounds or the safe limitations of Truth, in order to increase sales or enlarge business. Hereby the one great end and purpose of this uncertain probation is in danger of being overlooked or disregarded—the first and indispensable duty of laying up treasure in heaven: meanwhile, and which is not at all incompatible, providing things temporal, honestly in the sight of all men. The following Scriptures have close and instructive application to this subject, viz: “What shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? Or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?”

Than to be drowned in the cares of this life, or to have the good seed of the kingdom choked in the pursuit of its riches and pleasures, or to allow any canker to wither or destroy our beauty or fruitfulness, how infinitely better to be satisfied with a humble plain way of living; with a life not bent on the attainment of great things; but, as says John Woolman: “Where no unnecessary cares or expenses may encumber our minds, or lessen our ability to do good; where no desires after riches or greatness, may lead into hard dealing; where no connections with worldly-minded men, may abate our love to God, or weaken a true zeal for righteousness,” &c. Daniel Wheeler, also, in allusion to his circumscripted views on this subject, and in commendation of a plain, frugal life, thus writes of his commencement in business: “We had no artificial wants, and our real wants were very few.” “Every body knew we had but small means, and we made no other pretensions.”

Worldliness and godliness are essentially incompatible; the character which attempts to combine them is conspicuous only for brittleness; it is useless both to God and man. When the Church comes to represent such an unnatural compromise between God and mammon, it is defective; men are betrayed into the grossest misapprehensions. They suppose, as Archdeacon Hare says, that “the world is becoming Christian, when in fact it is Christianity that is becoming worldly.”—Sci.

THE CHILD IN THE MIDST.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

The tiny hands no bread have broken
For fanned lips; no work have done;
The cooing voice no word has spoken,
The little feet no steps have run.
And yet, and yet,
By hands and voice and darling feet
We count the baby dear and sweet.

No part in all the household labor
The blessed youngest-horn can share;
Perhaps our rich and childless neighbor
Would deem our little one a care.

And yet, and yet,
As often as we kneel to pray
"Thank God for baby" do we say.

For when the day grows chill and dreary,
The darling's smile is just a light
That makes the heart forget 'twas weary,
That bids the darkening world grow bright.

And still, and still,
Life's hardest tasks we bravely take,
And cheerily too for baby's sake.

And sweet it is to read the story,
Set like a star for youth and age,
And ever gathering heaven's glory
Upon our Bible's sacred page,

Where Christ our Lord,
From flush and bloom of happy play,
Called to Himself a child one day.

A little child, and bade them listen,
The grave disciples, awed and stern;
Our eyes with thankful tears should glisten
When'er unto that leaf we turn,

Where Jesus said,
"Except ye have the child-heart given Ye may not enter into heaven."

Some days it seems that heaven is shining
Clear into this small earthly home,
Each cloud so rich in silver lining,
Such mirth and pleasure gaily come.

On mother's knee
The little king securely reigns,
And proud we are to wear his chains.

Dear baby, helpless still, but stronger
Than many a monarch on his throne,
We who have known the world-ways longer
Are glad to call thee all our own.

And yet, and yet,
A treasure, but a trust, we pray,
God bless the baby night and day.

NOT AS I WILL.

Selected.

Blindfolded and alone I stand
With unknown thresholds on each hand;
The darkness deepens as I grope,
Afraid to fear, afraid to hope;
Yet this one thing I learn to know
Each day more surely as I go,
That doors are opened, ways are made,
Burdens are lifted or are laid
By some great law unseen and still Unfathomed purpose to fulfil,
"Not as I will."

Blindfolded and alone I wait,
Loss seems too bitter, gain too late;
Too heavy burdens in the load,
And too few helpers on the road;
And joy is weak and grief is strong,
And years and days so long, so long;
Yet this one thing I learn to know
Each day more surely as I go,
That I am glad the good and ill
By changeless law are ordered still
"Not as I will."

"Not as I will!"—the sound grows sweet
Each time my lips the words repeat.
"Not as I will!"—the darkness feels
More safe than light when this thought steals
Like whispered voice to calm and bless
All unrest and all loneliness.

"Not as I will," because the One
Who loved us first and best has gone
Before us on the road, and still"
For us must all His love fulfil—
"Not as we will."

"NEGLECTED ONCE, I COME NO MORE."

Selected.

BY MARY BRADLEY.

There was a man who dreamed one day
Of great things that he meant to do;
But idly in the sunshine lay
The while he dreamed; and never knew
What proud, bright shape was drawing nigh,
Or listened to his thrilling cry,—
"Arise, arise, and follow me,
And make your dream reality!"—
Until it passed away again,
And, passing, smote the dreamer's brain
With sudden sense of loss and pain.

"Who calls me?" anxiously he cried;
"Oh, speak! Oh, voice once more to me!"
But far away a voice replied,
"My name is Opportunity!"

Who welcomes me with swift embrace
Shall meet me always face to face;
But the stern truth is known of yore,
Neglected once, I come no more!"

And still the dreamer in the sun
Imagines great deeds to be done,
Yet sees, alas! the fruit of none.

—S. S. Times.

Maimness.—Some years ago there lived in a log-cabin in the State of Indiana, a rough-appearing, uncouth boy who was learning the three R's in a little wilderness school-house, and spent his evenings reading Aesop's Fables and Pilgrim's Progress by the light of pine-knots.

One day on his way home from school his playmates discovered a huge mud-turtle, which they at once captured, and, procuring some live coals, heaped them on the back of the poor creature to see it travel. The boy looked on for a moment in silence, and then mounting a stump began an earnest plea for the persecuted turtle, and a denunciation of the meanness of attacking a defenseless animal. It was the first speech this quiet youth had ever made, and I fancy his schoolmates listened in astonishment. Years afterward, when he had become the nation's hero, it was so easy for him to help and bless those in his power, that thousands of hearts-to-day quicken into a loving, grateful glow whenever the name of Abraham Lincoln is mentioned.

How I Narrowly Escaped Killing Myself or my Friend.

The tale is of something that I shall never cease to regret, and of which I am to this day ashamed; yet, because the fault is so common, and the temptation so sudden, in the hope of protecting others against it I shall unbosom myself, and bring forward the previously unpublished history of a scene which made the persons concerned practically several years older in an instant of time.

A long while ago I received a visit from a gentleman who spent the evening with me. During the evening various incidents were narrated by him and myself. At last I told of a circumstance which had recently occurred. In the story an account was given of repelling by the use of a pistol an assault from a man under the influence of delirium tremens.

In the course of the narrative I took a single-barrelled pistol from a drawer and pointed it at my friend to illustrate the scene described. This pistol I was sure was not loaded. The pistol had but one barrel, and I had shot the load out of it and placed it safely in the drawer; so I was certain that there was no danger in its use.

I pointed it at my visitor at a distance of about two feet from his face and went on with the story. He looked at the pistol and at me and said, "Don't point that at me, my friend."

"O," said I, "there is no load in it; I shot the load out of it myself a few days ago;" and to prove that it was safe I turned it toward my own breast, and though it was cocked, I pulled upon the trigger with all my might.

"O, well," said he, "if it isn't loaded go on with the story."

So I pointed it at him again and continued with the story, unconsciously pulling still on the trigger, when, horrible to tell, it was discharged, filling my friend's face with powder, the bullet grazing his face as it passed, and sinking half an inch into a mahogany writing-desk on the other side of the room!

Who loaded that pistol after I had emptied it I never knew. Why it did not go off when I pointed it at my own breast and did my best to snap the trigger I cannot tell. That it was the merest accident that I was not pointing it full in my friend's face when it did explode I very well know.

Two badly frightened men were there, and as thankful as they were frightened. Realizing the folly of my conduct I asked my friend not to mention the occurrence for ten years.

It has been nearly thirty years, and last summer as I entered the Methodist Episcopal Church at Greenland, N. H., I found that the pastor was absent, and saw that very man, C. N. Dinsmore, in the pulpit preaching the sermon. A most vivid recollection of a narrow escape from suicide in the first instance and homicide in the second diverted my attention for a few moments from the discourse. And I thanked God for my escape and for his.

Never point a pistol, even if you think you know it to be empty, at any person. I had never done it before, and you may be certain I have never done it since. But in two years afterward I counted two hundred and four instances recorded in the newspapers of persons accidentally shot and seriously or fatally wounded by just such a foolish fellow as I was.—By the Editor of the Christian Advocate.

When teachers undertake to delineate a Bible character or to describe a Bible event, they should see to it that they note the characteristics which are really peculiar to the person or event indicated, and not those only which it shares in common with other characters. A Scottish doctor of divinity, now deceased, once had a startling lesson in this line. In an address to a class of boys, he informed them that he was about to tell them a story without names, and that he wanted to see if they knew the names by the time he had finished the story. Then he told the story of David and Goliath, emphasizing the insignificance of the lad who slew the giant, and the exceeding bigness of the giant who was slain. The story finished, "Now, my boys," said the doctor, "I want all of you who know the name of the lad who slew the giant to hold up your hands." Up went every hand in the class. "Ah! very good," was the comment; "and what was the name?" "Jack, the Giant-killer," was the response in full chorus. And the fault was the minister's, not the boys'. He had not shown them a single characteristic of the story of David which distinguished it from that of their favorite nursery hero. The lesson is a good one for all teachers. Find out what is peculiar to the story you have to tell, peculiar to the person you have to describe,—and whatever else you omit, do not omit that.—Late Paper.

It is a wise saying of William Penn: "If thou wouldst conquer thy weakness, thou must never gratify it."

For "The Friend."

The Richmond Conference.

The proposition that emanated from the Indiana Yearly Meeting, last year, for the holding at Richmond, during the present year, of a conference of delegates, from various Yearly Meetings of Friends, has led the Editor of the Western Friend to publish in his paper an account of the similar Conferences held in 1849, 1851 and 1853.

As this narrative contains information that is probably new to the younger readers of "The Friend," and may interestingly revive facts that years ago were familiarly known by many of its older readers, it is hoped the following extracts from it will prove acceptable:

"After Philadelphia Yearly Meeting had adopted 'An Appeal for the Ancient Doctrines' in 1847; and finally decided to recognize the smaller body in New England in 1848; New York Yearly Meeting at once issued a request to all the Yearly Meetings, for a Conference at Baltimore. This Conference met at Baltimore in the Seventh Month, 1849. Philadelphia and Ohio declined to take any part in it; and the New England "Gurney" body was admitted. Elijah Coffin of Indiana acted as clerk. The minute adopted by the Conference says its object was "To consider the tried state of our Society," and "Labor for its restoration to unity and fellowship." It affirmed the necessity of sustaining "inviolably the rights that belong to each Yearly Meeting." But added that in case any Yearly Meeting should "manifest unsoundness," "promulgate views inconsistent with the principles professed by Friends," "or should not maintain our Christian testimonies" it "would then become the duty of other Yearly Meetings by 'entreaty or admonition to labor for its restoration.' Then this Conference ignoring all the concern of Philadelphia for our "doctrines," "views" and "testimonies" as set forth in the "Appeal" of 1847; and in violation of the "inviolable rights of Yearly Meetings" just affirmed, proceeded to condemn Philadelphia and Ohio, not directly, but by allusion to a state of facts which all knew applied only to these meetings. In doing this, the Conference said that "Refusing to receive credentials issued by meetings in another Yearly Meeting, "was subversive to the established order of Society;" or that "any attempt to confer upon individuals privileges which they had forfeited in their own meetings could not fail to produce confusion and disturb the harmony of Friends." The Conference then announced its ultimatum in language that assumed that all the trouble was on account of Philadelphia and Ohio, by saying that "where Yearly Meetings have refused to correspond with or to receive the official communications addressed to them by other Yearly Meetings harmony and unity cannot be restored without a return to our established order and usage." This was emphasized by a "desire to press these considerations upon Friends that they might be "received and heeded," with an added and significant threat that "It is not to be expected that the great body of Friends can long remain passive" if they were neglected. The first Conference then adjourned.

The Yearly Meetings represented waited about a year and a half to see what effect their Manifesto would have on Philadelphia and Ohio. Finding that no attention was paid to it the Conference again assembled in Baltimore in the Fifth Month, 1851. This Conference issued an Address to all the Yearly Meetings. This time they made no effort to conceal the fact that their purpose was to discipline Philadelphia and Ohio, neither of which took part in it. The Address asserted—as if Philadelphia and Ohio did not know enough to distinguish sound from unsound doctrine—"That there is nothing existing in our Society to justify the present position of Philadelphia and Ohio Yearly Meetings. And these Yearly Meetings were informed what was required of them in the following language:—

"The Yearly Meeting of New England should be recognized by Philadelphia and Ohio Yearly Meetings; the epistolary correspondence between them be resumed; ministers travelling in the discharge of their high duties shall be received as in former days; the rights of membership be accorded to those who have not forfeited them in their respective Monthly Meetings, and the decisions of these meetings in regard to those who have been disowned from religious fellowship respected."

To this list of things required of Philadelphia and Ohio was subjoined the following: "If the Conference could approach Philadelphia and Ohio Yearly Meetings, they would call their attention to the consequences which they must see are impending, it would entreat them to unite with all the other Yearly Meetings in pursuing the course indicated, which can alone prevent results that would be deeply deplored." The Conference washed its hands of all the threatened consequences, by saying "With the Friends of these two Yearly Meetings, it now rests to determine whether the consequences which appear otherwise inevitable shall be averted." And as if the Conference had already decided on a line of action in case Philadelphia and Ohio did not submit to this presumptuous dictation, and trespass upon the "inviolable rights of Yearly Meetings," it counsels those who feel "oppressed" by the failure of these meetings to unite in this policy to "yet a little longer abide in the patience."

This remarkable edict of dictation and warning was adopted by all the Yearly Meetings represented. Indiana ordered 6000 copies printed for circulation; North Carolina attached it to her minutes and it was generally circulated in all the Yearly Meetings opposed to Philadelphia and Ohio. In 1852 Committees from this Conference with minutes from their various Yearly Meetings visited Philadelphia and Ohio Yearly Meetings to present this "Address" and ask its adoption by them. As soon as they found it was rejected by these meetings, Indiana Yearly Meeting at once proposed a third Conference at Baltimore to meet in the Fifth Month, 1853. This third Conference met; spent two days in "review of the state of Society which has been brought before us," and made a report that "no way opened for this Committee at present to recommend any further labor with the Yearly Meetings who differ from their brethren," but closed the report as they closed the Address in 1851, by encouraging insubordination and rebellion in these Yearly Meetings. The Address said to such, "a little longer;" this Report said, "dwell in patience;" "that nothing be done without solid reflection." In view of the fact that the separation was precipitated in Ohio Yearly Meeting the next year, this last utterance of the Report indicates that the real decision of the two days Conference in 1853, was that those whom they classed as "burdened" "tried" "oppressed" and "suffering" in Philadelphia and Ohio Yearly Meetings should separate and become united to "their brethren" of the Conference. The scheme failed in Philadelphia but was carried out in Ohio. That the division of these meetings had been the real meaning of the threats and warnings of certain "consequences" that were "impending" if the course dictated by this series of Conferences was not adopted is too evident to be reasonably disputed. It is proved beyond doubt by the report of a large committee of Indiana Yearly Meeting to whom the epistles from Ohio were referred in 1854. The committee give as their reasons for recognizing the Binns' body, "That Indiana Yearly Meeting has earnestly and affectionately entreated Ohio Yearly Meeting to resume correspondence with New England Meeting, and they have been earnestly and plainly warned of the probable consequences of such disorderly proceedings by a conference of five Yearly Meetings in their "Address," which was refused by the party now claiming to be Ohio Yearly Meeting." Therefore we propose that our Yearly Meeting decline epistolary correspondence with the body last named."

The article in the Western Friend then calls attention to the fact that the "Binns' Body" which was "born in anarchy and rebellion," naturally took "the lead in rejecting, opposing or denying the doctrines, testimonies and practices of Friends;" and that its departure in these respects have gone so far as to alarm some of the Yearly Meetings which now are again resorting to a "Conference," this time to check if possible the extremes of that body.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Glass-snake.—In a communication to the Popular Science Monthly, Wm. A. Hammond says that the reptile popularly known as the Glass Snake, is a species of lizard without limbs, (Ophisaurus ventralis). It is from 10 to 14 inches in length, perfectly harmless, and when struck or captured, sheds its tail sometimes in several pieces, each of which continues to wriggle for sometime afterwards. He says "I have seen hundreds of them in Kansas near Ft. Riley, and further west, and have sent many specimens to the Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia, and to the Smithsonian Institute in Washington.

The breaking of its tail when alarmed is effected by the forcible contraction of the muscles. The detached tail or its pieces lose their vitality in a few hours, and like other lizards the animal has the power of reproducing the lost member in a few months.

Transmission of Sound.—A train of cars is plainly heard on the line of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad at The Needles for a distance of seventy-eight miles, to a place called Cottonwood Island. The discharge of the sunrise gun at Ft. Mojave can be plainly heard at Colorado Canyon, a distance of one hundred miles. Sounds can be understood in the narrows of the Grand Canyon of the Colorado for a distance of eighteen miles; or in other words, if a man at one end shouts "Bob!" the man at the other end can plainly hear the echo. The whistle of a Colorado steamer can be heard from El Dorado Canyon to Weaverville, the head of navigation, a distance of seventy-eight miles, and if somebody tumbles a rock over the precipice at Lee's Ferry, you can plainly hear the echo down the river, at Weaverville, a distance of thirty-six miles.—Popular Science News.

Deep Water.—Soundings recently made in Crater Lake, Oregon, by Captain Dutton of the United States Geological Survey, show that it is the deepest body of fresh water on the continent. The lowest depth reached was 1,996 feet, and it is believed that the greatest depth has not yet been sounded.

Meteorite.—Prof. J. Emerick, of William and Mary College, has been studying a meteorite which fell in that neighborhood a year ago, weighing about two hundred tons. Its composition was found to be chromium, nickel, aluminum, copper, magnesium, tin, and other metals and metalloids. It contained eighty-seven per cent of iron in a metallic state. Its specific gravity was 7.412.

Arsenic in Wall-papers.—Attention has recently been called by Boards of Health to the presence of arsenic in wall-papers. Formerly only those papers which were green were supposed to contain arsenic, but this is no longer the rule. Many brilliant colors, especially reds, contain arsenic. Analyses by Professor Carmichael show that thirty-one samples of average wall-paper gave, on analysis, an average of 2.42 grains of arsenic to the square-yard. Physicians have supposed that certain obscure ailments have been caused by the arsenical dusts set free from wall-paper.

Why Paper becomes Yellow with Age.—Prof. Julius Wiesner has conducted an investigation on the reason why paper becomes yellow on standing exposed to the light. He shows that the yellowing of wood-pulp paper is an oxidation process caused by light, and that moisture aids it very much. If the paper pulp is entirely free from matter other than cellulose, the yellowing will not take place.

Thickness of Hair.—The human hair varies in thickness from one two hundred and fiftieth to six six hundredths of an inch. Blonde hair is the finest and red the coarsest. A German investigator finds, that in four heads of hair of equal weight, the red one contains about 90,000 hairs, the black 103,000, the brown 109,000, and the blonde 140,000.

Remedy for Snake-bites.—In a letter from a German physician, who is a resident of Brazil, it is stated that permanganate of potash is an infallible antidote for snake bites in that country as in India, and that every farmer keeps some of it in his dwelling.

Tough Paper.—By mixing chloride of zinc with paper pulp during its manufacture, the paper is made so tough that it can be used for making boxes, combs, roofing and boots.

Poppy Cultivation.—Near Ningpo in China, we passed by fields of lovely and fragrant pink clover and by others more conspicuous in their gay beauty of blood-red poppies; for alas! since foreign opium may no longer be legally excluded, the Chinese farmer thinks he may as well secure the profit, and Government officials herein seeing the hope of driving out the foreign poison, ignore the ever-increasing and most grievous extension of this cultivation, which is working such rapidly increasing ruin throughout the Empire; so that much of the best land which hitherto has yielded rich grains, is now given over to this beautiful but baneful crop. Here, in place of the snow-white opium-poppy of India, the red predominates, although its produce is deemed very inferior to the white.

On some of the more advanced fields, the poppy-heads are already ripe—that is to say, they are full-sized, though still green. When the head becomes dry the juice no longer flows, so it is necessary to secure the opium at the exact moment of maturity.

The cultivators pass carefully along each row of poppies, and with a small, sharp knife make a slight incision all round each seed-pod, taking care not to cut deep lest the juice should flow outward and be lost in the seed-cavity. A thick, milky juice at once exudes along the cut, and must be left undisturbed for several hours during the heat of the day exposed to the sun's rays, when it assumes a resinous appearance, and is scraped off with a knife, and rolled up in soft lumps. These are sprinkled with a powder, which prevents their adhering together in one solid mass. They are rolled up in poppy-leaves, and left to dry in the sun, when the opium becomes of a rich dark-brown color.

—Public Stoves of Paris.—The British Friend contains a description of public warming places erected by the municipal government of Paris, each capable of sheltering 500 persons at a time, in which those destitute of homes can obtain warmth and shelter at night without cost. They are warmed by several stoves placed in different parts of the hall, and furnished with benches. They are open from eight o'clock in the evening to five in the morning; and between those hours every one is at liberty to enter without question.

—Statistics of the Society of Friends in England.—From some statements published in the London Friend, it appears that of the 317 meetings of our Society in England and Scotland, many are quite small. In 103 of the meetings the number of members, including attenders of meetings, is less than twenty. As this includes all who are on the rolls of membership, children, infirm persons, and those in remote places, as well as others, it is evident the average attendance in these meetings cannot be large.

An examination of the registers of births in the Society of Friends in England and Wales, shows the greatest number in the ten years from 1670 to 1679, when the average was 975 per annum. This gradually diminished, till in the decade from 1740 to 1749, when it averaged 554. From this time it gradually increased till it reached 686 in the years from 1800 to 1809. Between 1881 and 1885, it had fallen to 184; but this is thought not to furnish data for a fair comparison, for there has been a growing carelessness in filling up the "Birth Notes," since the general Registration Act came into operation.

—Movement among the Jews in Hungary.—The Fourth Month number of the London Friend describes a recent visit of one who was engaged in distributing the Hebrew New Testament to E. Lichtenstein, an aged Jewish Rabbi of Hungary, who has published three pamphlets addressed to his Jewish brethren, designed to bear testimony to Christ. In one of these he says: "Christ is the sure foundation of the truth, the most glorious heavenly treasure, the proudest ornament of creation, the most exalted Son of Man who has ever trod the earth; the personified Righteousness, the world's Saviour, the world's Messiah. * * * Just as in the great sea all streams meet, so we find all the most glorious attributes of God united in the person of Christ."

His visitor says: "We found Tapis Zsela a quaint, scattered, small Hungarian town, and put up at the Jewish inn. Shortly afterwards we arrived at the Rabbi's house, and were affectionately welcomed by himself, his wife, and his mother-in-law, aged ninety-six. So here stands before us E. Lichtenstein, who has taken upon himself the task, as he expressed it to us, of making the name of Jesus Christ popular with the Jewish nation, and of lifting up the Gospel as the only source of spiritual renovation. He is an aged man, with a very honest, open face, tender heart, and soul which is sincerity itself.

"It was by no human teaching that he was brought to the knowledge of Christ, and he could not tell, he said, how the New Testament found its way into his house; but the anti-Semitic movement in this country which instigated that famous Tizla Eslar trial, and the remarkable spectacle to him of Christian professors and pastors from various parts of the world writing in defence of the Jews, made him study it, with the result that the more he read the more the beauties and glory of the character of Christ seemed to open before him, until at last, driven against himself by the Spirit of God, he felt obliged to publish in his testimony that Jesus was the world's Messiah, and the Way, the Truth, and the Life for poor Israel.

"Living in such an out-of-the-way place, amid very modest surroundings, he is unconscious of the stir and sensation his pamphlets (which are being circulated by thousands) have created, and he speaks with the greatest humility of himself. He only knows that his testimony for the truth has set many wolves howling round him ready to devour him, and, strange enough, he seems surprised at it, as if Israel (especially her false shepherds) had ever treated a true prophet, who had the courage to denounce their sins, in any different way. But he has counted the cost, and has risked all for his convictions; and now, though severe the test, and heavy the trials through which he is passing, so that his aged head is bowed with grief, he stands firm. He has been Rabbi over this community for thirty-five years.

"A fortnight ago he was made to appear before a synod of all the great Rabbis in Buda Pesth, and the universal clamor was 'Recantation'; but, this failing, they suggested six different ways by which he might honorably withdraw from the position he had taken, but not by one of these he was caught.

"'Could he not at least say he did not mean all he said?' 'No, he meant yet much more than he said,' as we learned from him. But the extraordinary circumstances in which he is still placed as Rabbi has had the force of keeping him hitherto from speaking out all his mind."

—Peace Efforts.—At a meeting of the London Meeting for Sufferings, held in the Third Month, it was stated that 65,000 copies had been distributed of a minute adopted the previous month on the warlike aspect of public affairs. They had been circulated as a "Message from the Society of Friends to their fellow-Christians." About 26,000 of these had been sent by post to ministers of religion belonging to the Established Church, and to various bodies of Non-conformists. A large number of replies had been received, which were generally cordial and sympathetic.

THE FRIEND.

FIFTH MONTH 7, 1887.

When the Report of the Westtown School Committee was before our late Yearly Meeting, a remark was made by one Friend respecting the financial statement it contained, which seems to render proper a fuller explanation than could be conveniently given at the time.

That statement gave the income of "The Fund for Paying Salaries" for the past year, as $824.38. On examining the detailed financial exhibit, which is annually presented to the General Committee at its meeting in the Sixth Month, we find that the principal of said fund in the Sixth Month of last year, was $16,528.45.

What is called the "Teachers' Fund," is a separate trust, although apparently confounded with the former, by some Friends. Its principal at the time referred to was $65,383.75. This fund was raised for the special purpose of increasing the salaries of the teachers at the school; and neither the income received ($5,061.44), nor the payments made from it ($4,400) are included in the general statement embraced in the Report of the Committee to the Yearly Meeting. In this particular, it is like several other of the Funds, which have been donated for specific purposes, such as that for Nursery Expenses; that for Clothing, Board and Fares of pupils from a distance; that for paying incidental expenses of children, &c. As these do not affect the general finances of the school, it has not been customary to include them in the Report to the Yearly Meeting.

As there are eighteen separate Fund accounts on the Treasurer's books, a detailed statement of all would require a mass of figures which would probably prove burthensome if laid before the Yearly Meeting. But in the annual statement laid before the General Committee, as already mentioned, each of these is given in detail with its principal, and income, how this has been expended, and what changes have been made in the investments of each during the past year—all such changes being made by the advice and with the concurrence of a standing Committee on Accounts. The whole statement covers between 9 and 10 closely written pages of foolscap paper. These annual statements are all copied in a book kept at the school, and preserved for comparison and reference.

As intimated in a previous number, we now publish in full the Report of the Committee on Certificates of Removal, adopted by our late Yearly Meeting, and sent to subordinate meetings for their guidance and direction. It is taken from the printed "Extracts" from the Minutes of the Yearly Meeting.

As stated in the introductory part of the Report, our Monthly Meetings have at times been at a loss how to act in regard to certificates of removal, in the difficulties presented to them by the unsettled condition of the Society of Friends in many places. The rules now adopted are designed to relieve the Monthly Meetings, so far as well can be done, of this embarrassment. The Report is as follows:—

TO THE YEARLY MEETING.

The Committee appointed by our last Yearly Meeting to consider the difficulties connected with Certificates of Removal, have had several meetings, and have given the subject much attention.

That substantial unity in doctrine and practice among Friends in all parts of the world, on which are based the rules and usages of our Society in reference to Certificates of removal, does not now exist in the same degree as formerly. Differences in doctrine and in the manner of conducting religious meetings have arisen; and in several cases these and other causes have led to open separations.

Although Philadelphia Yearly Meeting arrived at a judgment in the case of the division in Ohio Yearly Meeting in 1854, yet, in several other cases of a similar kind, it has taken no action which could guide subordinate meetings. Furthermore, of latter time, several new Yearly Meetings have been set up, of which, owing to the suspension of Epistolary Correspondence, our Yearly Meeting has received no official information. In the meantime individuals are removing from one part of the country to another, and marriage engagements are being formed, which require the action of Monthly Meetings; and these are sometimes at a loss to know what course they should pursue.

Our Yearly Meeting has at different times been concerned to re-affirm its adherence to the original principles of Friends, and to warn its members against declension from primitive purity of doctrine and practice. In accordance with this concern, it seems proper that our Monthly Meetings should exercise a care in the sending and reception of certificates of removal, not to sanction or encourage departures from these principles and practices in other meetings. The necessity for the exercise of such care is rendered more apparent by the consideration, that it would be the duty of our Monthly Meetings to labor in Gospel love with any of their own members who should so far deviate from our principles and practices as to encourage innovations upon our mode of spiritual worship; or should deny or explain away our fundamental views of Christian doctrine; or in other ways lay waste our doctrines and testimonies.

For the relief and guidance of Monthly Meetings under the difficulties at present existing, and to guard against a want of uniformity in their practice, we propose the adoption of the following rules:

1. Monthly Meetings are at liberty to receive Certificates from, or send Certificates to Monthly Meetings belonging to any of the bodies under our name, whose right to be regarded as co-ordinate branches of the Society of Friends has not been adversely determined by the Yearly Meeting—Provided there is no obstruction on other grounds.

2. When any of our Monthly Meetings have reliable information that the sanction of a Monthly Meeting out of our limits is given to teachings and practices seriously at variance with our profession, they are instructed to consider such defection as a sufficient obstruction to sending or receiving Certificates of removal to or from such meeting—until the cause of obstruction is removed.

If, however, Certificates of removal coming from such a meeting shall recommend as members, persons whose life and conversation appear to be consistent with our religious profession, Monthly Meetings are at liberty to receive such persons, if, on solid consideration, the defection of the Meeting granting the Certificate shall appear to be the only obstruction.

3. In the case of persons coming among us, and desiring to be joined to us in membership, who have not been able to procure Certificates of removal, because the Yearly Meeting to which they belonged was not in correspondence with Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, Monthly Meetings are at liberty to receive such who may apply for admission, on the ground of conviction of our principles; such cases to be treated in the same manner as of those who are not members of the Society of Friends.

4. When a Certificate of removal is received for a person in the station of Minister from a Meeting outside of our Yearly Meeting, such person should be received as a member only, and is not to be considered a member of the Meeting of Ministers and Elders until his or her gift has been acknowledged among us in the manner laid down by our discipline.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The public debt statement for Fourth Month shows a reduction of $13,053,098. Total cash in the Treasury, $460,105,896.

The Acting Secretary of the Interior has directed the General Land Commissioner "to demand from the California and Oregon Railway Company a reconveyance of the United States of a section of land in the Marysville (Cal.) land district, patented to the company March 17, 1875, it appearing, from special reports and affidavits accompanying the same, that said section is unquestionably gold-bearing mineral land."

The Senate of New York has passed the Velder Liquor Tax bill by a vote of 18 to 13. Should the bill pass the Assembly it will doubtless be vetoed by the Governor.

Full returns from all the counties in Michigan show on their face a majority against prohibition of 5941. It is to be hoped that the true result, which is believed to be decidedly for the measure, may be established.

Two sharp earthquake shocks, with only a moment's intermission, were felt at Spokane Falls, Wyoming Territory, at 4 o'clock on the morning of Fourth Month 30th. People were awakened from their sleep.

Residents of Nyack (Rockland County, N. Y.) and vicinity, describe a celestial phenomenon they observed on the night of Fourth Mo. 30th. Around the moon was a four-degree corona, surrounded by a forty-five degree halo. The corona was of unusual brilliancy. Its inner rim was blue and its outer rim red. In the halo, which was distinct, though much less decided in color than the corona, the order of colors was reversed. The northern lights flashed faintly, and in other portions of the sky stars and planets blazed with remarkable brilliancy.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 460, which was 12 less than during the previous week, and 13 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing 226 were males and 234 females; 223 adults and 237 minors; 65 died of consumption; 64 of pneumonia; 33 of measles; 28 of marasmus; 26 of diseases of the heart; 24 of convulsions; 17 of inflammation of the brain; 14 of bronchitis; 13 of old age; 13 of typhoid fever, and 11 of croup.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½'s, 110½; 4's, 120½; 3's, 101; currency 6's, 125½ a 136.

Cotton was quiet, but firm, at 10½ cts. for middling uplands.

Flour and Meal.—Trade in flour continued quiet, but prices were steadily held. Sales of 125 Pennsylvania family, at $3.75; 125 barrels Pennsylvania roller, straight, at $4.25; 125 barrels Ohio, clear, at $4; 750 barrels do. straight, at $4.25 a $4.30; 125 barrels Illinois straight, at $4.35; 375 barrels winter patent, at $4.60 a $4.80; 125 barrels Minnesota, clear, at $4.10; 125 barrels do. straight, at $4.35, and 625 barrels do. patent, at $4.75 a $5. Rye flour sold in a small way at $2.75 a $2.85 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat advanced under slight offerings, No. 2 red closing at 93½ cts. bid and 93½ cts. asked. No. 2 mixed corn closed at 47½ cts. bid and 47½ cts. asked. Oats were quiet, No. 2 white closing at 36½ cts. bid and 37½ cts. asked.

Beef cattle were fairly active at 4 a 5½ cts. Sheared sheep were in fair request, at 3 a 4½ cts.; sheared lambs, at 4½ a 6 cts.; spring lambs, $1.50 to $6 per head.

Hogs were fairly active at 7½ a 8½ cts.

COMMENT.—According to the London Truth, the amount annually spent by the European countries to keep up their armies and navies is £181,120,000. The amount spent by America is about £8,000,000. Adding therefore the cost for war debts and armaments together, it will be seen that Europe pays £394,760,000 and America £18,000,000 per annum. If now possibly an Europe hope to hold her own against her transatlantic rival, when she handicaps herself in the struggle for commercial supremacy with the stupendous charge of £376,000,000 per annum? As if this were not enough, Europe is each year increasing her burden, whilst America is each year reducing hers.

In the House of Commons on the night of Fourth Month 28th, a motion offered on the 26th by Robert T. Reid, Liberal Member for Dumfries, that the House decline to proceed with any measure directed against tenants combining for relief until a full measure for their relief from excessive rents was presented in Parliament, was rejected by a vote of 341 to 240. Three Liberal-Unionists voted with the minority against the Government, and nineteen Liberal-Unionists were absent and not paired. A motion that the House go into committee on the Crimes bill was then adopted.

The increase of emigration from Ireland is exciting serious concern. Whole districts are said to have been depopulated by emigration.

A despatch received in London on the 28th of last month, from Perth, the capital of Western Australia, says: "A hurricane swept over the northeast coast on the 22d inst. The pearl fishing fleet, numbering forty boats, was destroyed, and five hundred and fifty persons perished."

The Schnaebels affair has been amicably settled, and he allowed to return to his home.

The North German Gazette says: "In ordering the release of M. Schnaebels, the German Government has placed a broad interpretation upon the matter, regarding the invitation addressed to M. Schnaebels by the German Police Commissary as a sort of safe conduct, although the arrest itself was effected independently of the invitation and without the knowledge of Commissary Gautsch, by two Berlin officials."

A despatch from Berlin, dated Fourth Month 28th says: "Official circles consider that Germany has good claim to demand that France shall cease from official intriguing in the German provinces. It is believed that Prince Bismarck is about to make urgent representations that, having proved his good will in the Schnaebels case, France must now stop offenses against international law by ordering her officials to refrain from fomenting treason in Alsace-Lorraine. If the response of the French Government to these representations is not satisfactory, the Schnaebels incident, it is thought, will become the starting point of the greatest events of the century."

The Vatican has notified France that General Boulanger's military law, which refuses exemption from military services to youth or men studying for the priesthood, is an infringement of the Concordat, and has demanded its withdrawal.

The Chinese Government has settled the currency question by making a contract with a Birmingham firm for a supply of silver and bronze coinage.

The report that the cholera has appeared at Mazatlan and Guaymas, in Mexico, is denied by the Governor of Sonora, who says he will trace and prosecute the author of the report.

Selections from the Diary of Abigail W. Hall.

Eighth Mo. 8th, 1854. Comforted and instructed this morning, in reading the 10th chapter of Hebrews. During which desires arose after more true, living faith. Show me the way, O Lord, wherein thou wouldst have me to go! "for I lift up my soul unto Thee."

9th. Sanctify the Lord of hosts himself; and, in your hearts, let Him be your fear and be your dread, saith the prophet. I think I know, in measure, what it is to live in this fear; and O! the dread of offending an all-seeing Eye, that sees and knows the most secret recesses of the heart. Keep and preserve me, O Heavenly Father! on every hand, and enable me to watch, and that continually.

20th. O! that the spirit which lived in Christ, lived more and more in us; how would fruits answerable thereto be brought forth! even fruits of the Spirit: faith, virtue, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly-kindness and charity.

Ninth Mo. 2nd. May I be found walking more and more worthy of the many favors daily bestowed. As this is the case, will not my spiritual eye be opened more clearly to see what is the Divine will concerning me? My prayer by night and by day is, that a more clear manifestation of this will may be given, so that I may not go halting and doubting all the days of my life.

4th. Feel comfortable in the remembrance of yesterday. Endeavored to maintain the watch though the enemy was very busy. Thus am I led about and instructed. Keep me, O Heavenly Father! as the apple of thine eye. Near the close of our morning meeting, I dropped a few words in testimony, which unexpectedly presented; after which felt quiet. I have ever felt it an awful thing, thus to open my lips in the assembly of the people. This feeling increases; and may it be my preservation. Let me never open my lips, unless thou commandest; and then go forth, nothing doubting.

14th. Remembered in meeting this morning the reply of the young man to our Saviour, when he was asking what he should do to inherit eternal life: "All these have I kept from my youth up," Jesus saith unto him, "yet lackest thou one thing." Is there not something that is retarding my good journey heavenward? Enable me, O Heavenly Father! "to sell all," and follow thee faithfully and unreservedly the few remaining days thou numberest to me here, that so at last, I may be found worthy an admittance into thy kingdom.

22nd. Yesterday was a day of unmerited favor. At our meeting had the company and labors of our friend Samuel Cope, accompanied by James Emlen. It was a visit in the needful time; and greatly did I crave to be found in a condition to receive them in the way of their coming. After deep wading, dear S. was brought into our state and condition, and ministered accordingly. He stood up with: "Whatsoever was written aforetime was written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope." From this he went on, speaking to the children in a way clearly to be understood; and quoting also, "Wherewithall shall a young man cleanse his way," &c. "Thy word have I hid in my heart, that I might not sin against thee." "Thy word is as a light unto my path," &c. These, with other precious passages, were treated and enlarged upon. Encouragement flowed to the tenderly visited ones; also a warning voice went forth against the rebellious—those who were saying in the secret of their hearts, we will not serve the Lord, for He will do us no good; we will not fear Him, He will do us no harm. I trust some of these were given to see themselves; yea, in that light which doth not deceive.

Tenth Mo. 4th. Greatly have I desired a quiet habitation, a sure resting place. So far have I been from this for days past, that I have seemed "tossed as with tempest and not comforted." The cause seems hidden; but I fear, there is enough within myself to land me where I now am, in a land of deserts and of pits, &c. Have mercy upon me, O Lord, and deliver me for thy mercies sake! and wilt thou be pleased, O Heavenly Father! to remember thy poor afflicted people and seed, wherever and whoever they are, that are crying day and night unto Thee! Thou knowest, O Lord! who these are. Keep them, we pray thee, in the hollow of thy hand till these calamities be overpast. Let thy purifying work go forward; purge away the sin, dross, and reprobate silver, that so holiness may be inscribed unto Thee, to whom alone it is due, not only now, but henceforth and forever.

Eleventh Mo. 8th. On Second-day, the 6th, returned to the school after an absence of four weeks. Have been visiting amongst my friends, not without many fears that I should do or say something I ought not. I did try to be careful, and craved help to watch, lest in any way I should deny or betray my dear Lord and Master, who many times was pleased to be near, unworthy as I was, to my comfort and rejoicing. Since I have returned to this place, a quiet settled feeling has attended; and a little fresh help has been administered to enter once more upon my very responsible duties. May it be mercifully continued to me from day to day; that I may be strengthened to meet whatever trials and exercises attend a large family of 250 children, and a few more expected. Truly we have need of Best Help to get along rightly; our "own arm," how impotent to help or save us!

14th. This day has been held our Quarterly Meeting. No strangers in attendance. There seemed on taking my seat, a hushed feeling, something like being allowed to sit under my own vine where none can make afraid. How good and how precious did the little while we sat in silence feel! Strength seemed mercifully afforded to draw near unto Him, who remains the "way, the truth, and the life," and to ask for our preservation individually and collectively. — ministered. I endeavored to follow, but could not. Very unexpectedly to myself, did this language of our Saviour come before me, and in such a way that I dare not withhold: "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven." A jealousy took hold of my mind that, through the multiplicity of words, there was a danger of forbidding such to come, and a turning them aside from Him, who remains to be our great Alpha and Omega. The danger, indeed I may say the awfulness, of marrying the good work begun in any, brought me on my feet; and with as few words as possible did I leave my exercise with my friends; and sat down feeling the reward of a peace which the world cannot give or take away.

21st. In our meeting on First-day morning, the Western Quarterly Meeting came before me, unexpectedly so; and still continues with me, at times, in such a way that I cannot put it from me; which I have endeavored to do, fearing it is something of my own begetting. May I not be suffered to go, if it be not a Divine requiring, nor allowed to stay if it is. I am such a child!—the weakest babe ever born. Have been ready many times this day, to adopt the language: Send by whom thou wilt send, but not by me.

23rd. This has been a day of exercise, from various causes. It was no small trial to me to open my mouth in meeting this morning; being the first time since we came last together. Oh how hard is it to the creature, to become a fool for Christ's sake! The fear of denying my dear Lord and Master, again and again brings me on my feet, with my little offerings; which may justly be compared to the "two mites" of the widow: but "all my living."

27th. Attended, on Sixth-day, the Western Quarterly Meeting. Best help was near; for which and other favors, may I be more and more concerned to walk answerable.

Twelfth Mo. 14th. Since last entry I have passed through some sore conflicts. All I believe in mercy to show me how frail I am, and how unable to keep myself even for a moment. On taking my seat in meeting this morning, was reduced very low. I saw myself as I really was, "poor and miserable, blind and naked;" which led me secretly to cry unto the Lord for help, who in mercy heard and regarded, and condescended to my low estate. So that I even dared to open my mouth in public; a thing which, on taking my seat in meeting, I thought I should hardly ever do again. Thus it is we are led about and instructed.

18th. Second-day morning. Yesterday was a day of favor, though a day of deep exercise. No one knows how heavy-hearted I left my bed, with our meetings, the care of the children in them, added to my own great weakness and infirmities, pressing upon me. As I dressed and prepared for our morning collection, my eye was upward for help and forgiveness. These words of David presenting, a little comforted and encouraged: By my God have I run through a troop, and by Him leaped over a wall. I was led tremblingly to believe, that the same Power was near to help me; even to run and leap over all in me that opposed and hindered the exaltation of the kingdom of the Redeemer. On taking my seat in meeting, sins long since committed, presented one after another; when unexpectedly was brought to remembrance the promise: "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth us from all sin." This afresh encouraged, to apply in living faith to be healed, washed, and made clean. My exercise continued throughout the meeting; and near the close, fearfully and tremblingly, was I led to prostrate myself in vocal prayer; and asked a little fresh help not only for myself, but for us all.

21st. Attended, yesterday, the funeral of our young friend Samuel Trimble, of Concord. He died of consumption: and being a very gradual decline, it allowed time for a preparation for the great and awful change: so that he seemed, the latter part of his time, like one waiting the coming of his Lord. It felt to me, that he "had oil in his vessel with his lamp;" and when the midnight cry was heard, "entered in," &c. These considerations led me to look seriously into my own state and that of others; and greatly did I desire that none of us might be found wanting oil, in that awful moment which fast hasteneth to every one of us.

25th. During the after part of yesterday, many of the children seemed very unsettled. How painful to me thus to sit and watch them! but I feel it to be my religious duty to do so, and not let them behave in an unbecoming manner. When some of them did badly, I cannot tell what a grief it was to me! Being the evening previous to Christmas was the cause of it. I grieved over the children, but more over their parents and friends. It feels to me some of these will have much to answer for.

Wanderings in China.—No. 5.

The superstitious dread which the Chinese entertain of the spirits of their ancestors; and the equally wide-spread superstition of Feng Shui (which will be further noticed) furnish an explanation of many of the peculiar customs of this peculiar people. No doubt the intercourse of the more cultivated classes with intellectual people of other nations will gradually weaken the force of these superstitious notions; but probably many generations will elapse before their influence will be materially lessened in the minds of the bulk of the population.

One of the most obvious effects, is the strong desire of the Chinese to have male descendants who may continue to honor them after death, and to provide for their wants in the Spirit World by burnt offerings made from time to time, which they imagine will thus be made serviceable to their departed spirits. In consequence of this, male infants are highly valued, while baby girls are little esteemed, and thousands of them are put to death by their own mothers. So far from being deemed a crime, this infanticide is not even blamed by public opinion. In some districts thirty per cent of all the girls born are put to death! Our authoress says that in Foo-Chow, where she was then staying, it is quite a common thing for a mother to mention that she has made away with three or four girls. To Chinese students of Bible history it seems preposterous to assert that Pharaoh could have commanded that the boys of the Israelites should all be drowned, and the girls saved alive!

One simple detail will illustrate the different estimate in which sons and daughters are held, even in families which have no wish to destroy the latter: In certain districts the medical charge for vaccinating a boy is 800 cash, equal to about 17 cents. The charge for vaccinating a girl is only 400 cash, as it is found that people would rather run the risk of their daughter's beauty being destroyed, than paying for her at the same rate as a son!

Among the merchants of Foo-Chow was one named Ahok, who had become wealthy by success in business, and who was noted for his liberality in doing good. One of his good deeds has been the saving of innumerable girl-babies by the announcement that he would give an allowance of rice for a certain time to every mother, who, proposing to destroy her unwelcome female infant, would abstain from so doing. It was found that when a woman has taken the trouble of rearing her babe through its early stages of existence, she grows fond of it, and rarely destroys it willfully. The number of Ahok's pensioners varied considerably in years of plenty or of famine, in some years he allowed rice to 500 mothers to induce them to spare the lives of the innocents, and in others this number was reduced to 300.

Ahok was practically a Christian, having long attended the services of the American Mission. There are also Foundling Hospitals established by the natives, for the preservation of the children, but so poorly managed that there is great loss of life. Those who survive to the age of 10 months are often purchased by childless couples, who want to rear a servant for their old age, or else by provident parents who thus cheaply provide future wives for their sons.

Among the Chinese, betrothals are often made in very early life. C. F. Gordon Cumming mentions a curious example of this. A visitor at a Christian school was particularly attracted by a bright little boy, about eight years of age, who for some months had refused to worship the village idols, and who repeated various Christian hymns with much feeling. He carried in his arms a wee baby-girl, and the visitor naturally asked if it was his sister, whereupon he looked shy and did not answer, but his brother volunteered the information, "She is his wife!" On further inquiry as to why so young a baby had been taken from its own mother, the boy's mother explained that had she purchased an older child, she would have been required to pay a higher price, whereas, having a girl of her own of the same age, she had exchanged with a neighbor, who also had a son to marry, but as this baby was larger and fatter than her own, she had thrown in a dollar and some cakes to equalize the exchange!

Connected with ancestral worship as a barrier to change in China, is the mysterious FENG SHUI. It seems impossible for anyone who has not had long experience of this extraordinary and incomprehensible race to realize the extent to which all social and domestic life is influenced by these twin forces. The literal interpretation of "Feng Shui" is Wind and Water, but what idea the term conveys to a Chinaman's mind no one seems able to define, beyond that it has to do with the good and genial influences which are ever moving gently from the south, and also with the baneful influences which come from the north, and which may possibly be disturbed by any alteration of existing physical surroundings. It seems almost impossible for a foreigner to arrive at any exact understanding of this great overruling belief of the millions of Chinamen, yet no one can be many hours in China ere the term becomes so familiar as to make its solution a matter much desired. Apparently it has a special reference to the repose of the dead, and the influence of the mighty host of disembodied spirits upon the welfare or adversity of their living human successors on this earth.

It is something intangible and indescribable, yet omnipotent—a vague, shadowy spirit of evil, which stands in the way, and effectually bars every effort in favor of progress and civilization. Why does a Chinaman object to his neighbor building a top story to his house? Because his doing so may disturb the Feng Shui—those gracious influences which now come straight over the city to the hall of his ancestral tablets, or to the graves where his dead are laid.

Why does he object to the making of a railway? Because the whole country is dotted with ancestral graves, each of which has been dug on a site selected after long consideration, and repeated payments to a soothsayer deeply versed in the mysteries of Feng Shui—a spot selected as that of all others most certain to attract those gentle southern influences, and well shielded from all baneful blasts from the chill north. So to make a railway would stir up the spirits of countless past generations, and let loose on the country a whole army of unquiet and malevolent ghosts.*

Do I wish to build a high wall on my own honestly purchased land? My neighbor may object that, by so doing, I turn aside the course of the spirits, who always come from that particular quarter to do him good. So if I persist in building my wall, the chances are that he will raise a mob and come to pull it down, and neither the Chinese nor the British authorities will move a finger to obtain redress for me. If, on the other hand, I venture to pull down an old wall on my own land, my neighbor may be equally annoyed, as I thereby open a straight course by which malevolent spirits may reach him from an unlucky quarter.

As good a definition of the undefinable as can well be obtained was given to me by Monsignor Gentile, the Roman Catholic Bishop of Ningpo, who described the Feng Shui as being the path of the Great Dragon, who rushes through the air just above the houses, spouting blessings in showers from his nostrils. He flies straight forward, unless by evil chance he should strike against some high building, in which case he turns aside at an angle, and so the houses beyond lose their share of his blessing. Hence the jealous care of Chinese house-builders lest anyone should build a house higher than his neighbor, and the singular uniformity of domestic architecture, as seen from any high ground in the cities.

*As standing examples of the reality of this opponent to material progress we have the history of the railway from Woo Shing to Shanghai, which, after it was in full working order, was bought up by the Chinese Government at a great cost, only to be torn up on this account, and all its plant safely deported to Formosa, where it was deposited and left to rust upon the beach.

Then, too, (when Li Hung Chang, the great advocate of progress had succeeded in forming the Kaiping Coal Mining Company with a view to developing the vast mineral resources of his country) after four years had been spent in boring and shaft-sinking, the reactionary party raised the Feng Shui spectre, asserting that the sickness prevailing in the Imperial Palace at Peking was due to the disturbance caused to the spirit of the Empress Dowager by all this tunnelling within sixty miles of her tomb! So by Imperial edict the work so displeasing to the dead was arrested.

The same law which compels the Dragon to move in straight lines regulates the movements of all spirits, to whom anything of the nature of a zig-zag is peculiarly puzzling. For this reason those who have assisted in the murder of a female baby are very particular to carry it to the grave by a path of this description, so that the baby-spirit may fail in its endeavors to return, should it seek to avenge itself on its unnatural parents.

This, too, is the reason why in Chinese houses the doors and windows are all placed irregularly, never facing one another, and especially why we often see a meaningless-looking bit of wall placed just outside the outer gate, and a little larger than the entrance. It serves the same purpose as the screen which is placed between the door and the coffin in the house of the dead. The spirits in their flight will strike this wall, and instead of rushing into the house by the open doorway will be turned aside. It never occurs to them to double round the wall, and so find their way in!

Thus do fear and reverence for the dead combine with the mysterious Feng Shui to form the ruling principle of all existence in China. They are the twin giants whose power all acknowledge, and against whom all resistance seems useless.

For "The Friend."

An Address to Friends.

Dear Friends,—As I have long felt an interest in the welfare of all the followers of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and for the spreading of our Redeemer's kingdom in the earth, as well as for my own everlasting welfare; so my desires for our preservation in the ever-blessed truth, and for our encouragement to persevere therein, still remain with me. Trusting this may be received in that love in which it is written, and which would gather all into the Heavenly enclosure, do I now salute you. Grace be unto you and peace from God the Father and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

I have no new doctrine to set forth, or new faith to advocate, but that faith which is so plainly set forth in the Scriptures of truth, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone. He is now the teacher of his people; therefore, if any lack wisdom among you, let them ask of God who giveth to all men liberally, and it shall be given them, according to our Saviour's own words: "I am the way, the truth, and the life, no man cometh unto the Father but by me, and no man can come unto me except the Father which hath sent me draw him." As there is but the one foundation, for "other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ;" and as we have but one life to live, therefore it seems to me it is dangerous for us to be spending the time allotted us here in trying to find an easier way to the kingdom, or one that would better suit our own inclinations; for the enemy of our soul's peace is ever ready, in many and various ways, to draw our minds away from the true Fountain and Source of all good, by laying his snares in the way he is most likely to prevail over us, and attacking us at a time when we are off our guard. And then, except it please the Lord to lift up a standard against him, and to enable us to see our danger, he may easily get the advantage over us, which, if yielded unto, only makes it harder to resist when next we are tempted; for true it is that they that despise the day of small things shall fall by little and little; and they that are faithful in a little shall be rulers over more.

And now, dear Friends, may we all be preserved in future from the many snares into which others have fallen through unwatchfulness, some of which I have long since seen the danger of, wherein my own feet had well nigh slipped. Now seeing that that which is to be known of God is manifest in man, it does seem to me, that the only safe way for us to walk in, is to endeavor to keep our minds single unto the Lord, desiring to know no more than He is pleased to manifest to us, daily watching and waiting for right direction in all things; for He is the true Light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world; and as we give heed and follow this light, and his still small voice in our hearts, saying, this is the way walk thou in it, we shall soon see that the way to the kingdom is not hard to be understood, and that it is so plain that a wayfaring-man, though a fool, shall not err therein.

As this is the path that all the followers of our Redeemer have ever trod, so I doubt not many of you have already found His ways to be ways of pleasantness and all his paths peace; and by walking therein have been made partakers of that peace which the world can neither give nor take away. Many are the precious promises to such as persevere therein, for it is the only way cast up for the ransomed and redeemed of the Lord to walk in.

Think it not strange concerning the fiery trials which may try you, as though some strange thing had happened unto you; for these light afflictions which are but for a moment, work for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. "In this world ye shall have tribulation, but be of good cheer, I have overcome the world," is the encouraging language of our dear Redeemer; and "he that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I overcame and am set down with my Father in his throne." So let us strive to leave those things which are behind, and "press forward toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." Although there may seem to be many discouragements and hindering things in the way, let us remember that the Lord can cause the mountains of opposition to skip like rams, and the little hills like lambs, and thus make a way when there seems to be no way; and if faithful unto death, we shall at last receive the crown of life; for "he that endureth to the end, the same shall be saved."

Our worthy predecessors in the truth cheerfully bore all that was permitted to come upon them, even to imprisonment, and some even counted the truth dearer to them than their natural lives, rejoicing that they were counted worthy to suffer for his name's sake; "choosing rather to suffer afflictions with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season, esteeming the reproaches of Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt, for they had respect to the recompense of reward;" and the same faith we are now called upon to uphold before the world. Now, dear Friends, shall we turn our backs in the day of trouble, or allow our minds to be taken up with other things, or follow the lo! heres or lo! theres so apparent in various places up and down in the land in these days, and thus allow these precious doctrines and testimonies to fall to the ground, or be trampled under foot? Nay; I am persuaded better things though I thus speak; for I believe the religion of the Society of Friends is primitive Christianity revived in its ancient purity. And although some who are called may not continue faithful unto the end, yet the Lord, who is able to turn the hearts of the children of men as a man turneth the water-course in his field, is even now at work with his good Spirit in the hearts of many sons and daughters, inviting them to come, taste and see that He is good; and, "except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it; except the Lord keep the city the watchman waketh but in vain." And we may remember, that "the preparation of the heart, and the answer of the tongue," is also from Him.

If any there be whose hearts have not been thus prepared by Him, or who have not submitted to the cleansing, purifying operations of his Holy Spirit, nor heeded his call while pleading with them, such will not be likely to hear or receive what I (such a poor unworthy one) can now say to them; unless it please the Lord once more to enlighten their understandings and make them willing to receive Him in the way of his coming, and to follow Him in the way of his leadings. I hope there are but few such unfaithful ones amongst us; but, if any such there be, let them now have their deeds brought to the light, that their sins may go before hand to judgment; and by that faith which overcomes the world they may be led away from the barren mountains, where there is neither dew, nor rain, nor fields of offerings, into green pastures and beside the still waters; there to partake of that living bread which came down from Heaven, and which alone can nourish up the soul unto eternal life; there to realize that one hour in God's presence is better than a thousand elsewhere. Yes, "I would rather be a door-keeper in the house of the Lord, than to dwell in the tents of wickedness."

So, dear young Friends, by following Him who has called you out of the darkness into his marvellous light, and enabled you to see the exceeding sinfulness of sin; and by experiencing the washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost; you may be prepared and strengthened to bear the burdens which must soon fall upon your shoulders, when the fathers and mothers who have long borne the burden in the heat of the day, are called to their long homes to receive the reward of their labors. Yes! and has not the call already gone forth to this people, "to arise, shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord has arisen upon thee; for darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people, but the Lord shall arise upon thee, and his glory shall be seen upon thee; and the Gentiles shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising."

But if this is ever our happy experience, shall it not be by individual faithfulness, and by examining our own hearts, and watching our own thoughts, words, and actions? If we endeavor to do this, it seems to me we will have but little time to spare in dwelling upon the faults of others; for this is indeed poor food to feed upon; and if it is indulged in, we will finally lose our own strength, and have no relish for any thing substantial. But let us rather be concerned to have our own deeds brought to the light; saying, "Search me, O Lord, and try my heart; prove me, and know my thoughts; and see if there be any wicked way in me; and lead me in the way everlasting." Cast all your care upon the Lord, for He careth for you; "Trust in the Lord and lean not to thine own understanding; in all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He will direct thy paths;" for "He is strength in weakness, riches in poverty, and a present helper in every needful time." In his own time He "will appoint unto them that mourn in Zion, and give them beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, and the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness." So may we all have fervent charity among ourselves, letting love abound in our hearts to the Lord and toward all men, for "by this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if you have love one toward another," so that others, seeing our good works, may glorify our Father in Heaven.

Yes, dear Friends, it does seem to me there never was a time when faithfulness to the pure principles of truth, as ever held by our Society, was more needed than at the present day; as there seem to be many in various places who have become tired of mere forms and shadows, and the emptiness thereof, and are hungering more and more for the true substance which will go with them beyond the grave.

The Lord is still merciful, slow to anger, and of great kindness; not willing that any should perish, but that all should return, repent and live. So if we will continue to walk by the same rule and mind the same thing, as our forefathers in the Truth did, we may yet shine forth as a people clear as the sun, fair as the moon, and terrible as an army with banners, as in the days of old, and as in former years. And we may each one become prepared, through repentance toward God and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ, to join the just of all generations in singing the song of Moses and of the Lamb, which none can learn but they who are redeemed from the earth, and are counted worthy to enter that City whose walls are salvation, and whose gates are praise, which needeth not the light of the sun nor of the moon, for the glory of God doth lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof.

Finally, brethren, farewell: be strong in the Lord and in the power of his might; be of good courage, be of one mind, live in peace; and the God of peace shall be with you. So commending you to the Lord and to the word of his grace, which is able to build you up, and give you an inheritance among all them who are sanctified, I remain your friend.

Hold Fast the Form of Sound Words.

2 Timothy i. 13.

An advice in the Discipline of Canada Yearly Meeting, is that "ministers and elders should be engaged daily in reading the Holy Scriptures, diligent in meditating upon them, and careful not to misquote or misapply them. In preaching, writing or conversing about the things of God, they should keep to the form of sound words and Scripture terms." There is a natural fondness in people to hear and tell new things. New forms of expression in religious matters may captivate and mislead—the effect being confusion rather than edification. It is to be feared that many honest-hearted members in the Society of Friends have been so constantly hearing certain forms of speech, of a modern character, that they have accepted them as the real doctrines of Friends.

The following extracts from a private letter may somewhat illustrate the matter, viz :

"By grace are ye saved through faith, which is the gift of God. I understand that grace is the gift, not faith. We lay hold upon the offers of mercy through faith, trust, belief, all one and the same.

Faith cometh by hearing, but grace is the free gift. Every man, although naturally depraved, has a measure of this grace given him, by means of which he can accept the Lord Jesus Christ, and come to Him for cleansing. * * Have we any evidence in Holy writ of the refining, purifying power taking place in any one before conversion? I mean, before the time when they give themselves to the Lord? And is it not at this time when they are born into the kingdom? Is it not then that the covenant is made and the Lord begins his purifying work? Is it not then, and afterward, that He purges them as gold and silver? Is it not when we submit ourselves to Him for cleansing that we date our new birth? Is it not after this time of yielding that the Lord sits as a refiner and purifier? * * When we are willing to close in with the offers of his mercy, He gives us the eternal life, the new heart. Old things are done away, all things become new. This is a radical change, a change from darkness to light, from the power of Satan unto God. This is a definite step taken at some time in life: a consent to leave the evil and choose the good. But the change is wrought by God. We have our part to do however. We must give ourselves to Him and He receives us. We do not grow into grace, but we grow in grace after, by the convicting power of the Holy Spirit, we have come to the Lord for cleansing."

The above is a specimen of modern teaching of the moderate kind. It is ambiguous and confusing. One leading point in it is that grace and faith are so separated as that one is the gift of God, the other not. Faith must therefore, according to it, be a faculty of the mind. Another point which it teaches is, that the convictions of the Holy Spirit are not of a cleansing or purifying character; but that there is a definite step taken, a time when a man gives himself to God, makes a covenant with Him, is born into the kingdom, and submits himself for cleansing, before the purifying commences. This teaching implies that man may exercise a will power of his own in moving in such an important direction, after conviction and before conversion. This theory does not agree with the testimony of the apostle: "And you hath He quickened, who were dead in trespasses and sins." (Eph. xi. 1.) "The wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." (Rom. vi. 23.) To be dead in sins is to be void of Divine life or any ability of ourselves to return to life. "Verily, verily, I say unto you, the hour cometh and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and they that hear shall live." (John v. 25.) The work of regeneration in the soul of man is the work of God, by quickening those who are dead in sins. The first evidence of life to sinners is the sense of their lost and undone condition; of the misery that sin entails by separating them from God. His visitations by the convictions of the Holy Spirit, bring condemnation upon the sinful mind of man: his thoughts are burdened with it. But man may frustrate the work of God within himself by resisting the will of God. He may hear the voice of the Son of God but not heed it. Many who are professors may be like the Laodiceans, and think they are rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing, without knowing their real condition; and in that state wherein they are void of feeling, may not recognize the convictions described as the knocking at the door. A house may be filled with noisy inmates, and none of them hear the knockings that are designed to awaken their attention. The seed sown among thorns is choked with the cares and riches and pleasures of this life.

Some modern teachers present the knocking at the door in a literal sense; and try to make it appear that the operation of the Holy Spirit, under the figure of knocking, is an outside work.

It is not easy to imagine how the mind of man can be reached by an operation outside of the mind. The warning to the Laodiceans is very searching: "As many as I love I rebuke and chasten: be zealous therefore and repent. Behold I stand at the door and knock, if any man hear my voice and open the door, I will come in to him and sup with him, and he with me." If we are so full of other things as to fail to recognize the knocking, or what the Spirit may say or make manifest, we hinder the Lord's work within us. Or we may be deeply moved as Felix was, but defer to, as we may think, a more convenient season. Perhaps the enemy has no more successful way of frustrating the work of God in man, than by deferring it. Our part in the work is to yield, to render a passive obedience to the work of God within us, which is by us a felt operation. He who gave sight to the blind, and caused the deaf to hear, does so work by his spirit—the Holy Spirit—upon our minds, in our thoughts, as to give us the seeing eye and the hearing ear; awakens our spiritual perceptions, and gives us a spiritual understanding in the things of God. Thus we come to receive faith, which the Apostle says, "is the evidence of things not seen." "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God"—the Word that "is quick and powerful"—not by man. The power to yield is of God: who destroys the power of the enemy in man "by the Spirit of judgment and the Spirit of burning" upon the transgressing nature in man, until an earnest travail of spirit is awakened for deliverance from the thralldom of sin. Then, how applicable is the invitation, "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest; Take my yoke upon you and learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart, and ye shall find rest unto your souls. For my yoke is easy, and my burden is light." The coming to Jesus and learning of Him, is the submitting to Him and his conditions.

Such an experience is the conversion of sinners into the character of little children: God having set up his kingdom within them, they delight to do his will. The power that has brought them thus far is necessary to keep them in the way they should go; and this will be supplied.

Natural History Notes.

At the approach of Spring, the coming of the birds, and the putting forth of the young leaves and blossoms, always awakens fresh feelings of interest in the lover of Nature. No matter for how many years he has witnessed these things, when he wanders into the fields and woods, and sees the violets, the dandelions, and other early comers lifting up their flowers, a measure of his youthful enthusiasm excites the mind.

The poet Longfellow pleasingly describes these emotions in one of his minor poems:—

When the warm sun, that brings
Seed-time and harvest, has returned again,
'Tis sweet to visit the still wood, where springs
The first flower of the plain.

I love the season well,
When forest glades are teeming with bright forms,
Or dark and many-folded clouds foretell
The coming in of storms.

From the earth's loosened mold
The sapling draws its sustenance, and thrives;
Though stricken to the heart with winter's cold,
The drooping tree revives.

The softly-warbled song
Comes through the pleasant woods, and colored wings
Are glancing in the golden sun, along
The forest openings.

And when bright sunset fills
The silver woods with light, the green slope throws
Its shadows in the hollows of the halls,
And wide the upland glows.

And when the day is gone,
In the blue lake, the sky, o'er reaching far
Is hollowed out, and the moon dips her horn,
And twinkles many a star.

Inverted in the tide
Stand the gray rocks, and trembling shadows throw,
And the fair trees look over, side by side,
And see themselves below.

On the afternoon of the 25th of Fourth Mo., I walked out with a friend from Indiana. In a tall hedge of Osage Orange we observed the Brown Thrush, flitting about. This beautiful songster is rather larger than a Robin, and may readily be distinguished by its red color above, much the same shade as the rust of iron, and by its white breast spotted with dark hazel. It was the first one we had seen the present season, although Robins, Blackbirds, Catbirds, Bluebirds, and other summer visitants had arrived some days before.

The movements of migratory birds are probably largely governed by the supply of food. Many of them are eaters of insects, and when these disappear from sight on the approach of winter, the birds which feed upon them are compelled to seek other climates where food can be obtained. The warmth of Spring which awakens into activity the insect tribes, brings back also their winged pursuers.

The Robin feeds largely upon the common earthworm; and I noticed quite early in the season that these miners of the soil were at work, throwing up the little heaps of dirt which may be seen thickly scattered over the surface of the ground in many places. So, when the birds came, their prey was ready for them.

Already the Robin takes its part in the early morning chorus, and many of them may be heard singing cheerily between four and five o'clock in the morning. They seem also to enjoy an evening song, and the trees in our village are vocal with their melody long after the sun has disappeared from view, and while the dusk of evening is deepening.

During our walk we came upon a bed of plants, with rather long, lance-shaped, green leaves, fleshy in texture, smooth, and thickly spotted with purplish blotches. There were but two leaves to each plant; from between these came up a slender leafless stem crowned with a single, rather large, nodding, yellow flower. This was the Dog's-tooth Violet, also called Adder's-tongue, (Erythronium Americanum). It was new to my Western friend, who was much interested in this plant, which is both curious and beautiful. It belongs to the Lily family; and like most of that attractive group, has sic separate petals or floral envelopes around its stamens and pistils. The root is a bulb, similar to that of the onion. In the scales of this, during the growth of the preceding season, nourishment is stored up, which enables the plant at the first approach of warm weather to send forth its leaves and flowers, from its own substance, without waiting for the rootlets to grow and absorb fresh supplies from the earth. This may account for the early development in the spring of many of our bulbous plants, such as the crocus, daffodil, hyacinth and tulip of our gardens.

As we passed along the lane which led us to the fields, we noticed that the garlic (another bulbous plant) had already made a growth of eight or ten inches. And on our return we saw numerous tufts of the long, narrow, channelled leaves of the Star of Bethlehem (Ornithogalum umbellatum) which bears a rather showy white flower in the early summer, and then soon withers, and all traces of the plant disappear from sight. The bulbs, buried in the earth, store in their cells the materials for the early growth of the plant in the following spring.

Somewhat similar provisions are made for many of the plants which bloom early in the season. The Trailing Arbutus (Epiqea repens) during the summer sends forth its stems and thick leaves, which continue green during the winter, and are thought to supply much of the food for the development of the beautiful bloom which is so highly prized, and which for a week or two past has been yielding its blossoms and its fragrance to the eager hands of its lovers.

Like the Trailing Arbutus, the Liver Wort (Hepatica triloba) keeps its last year's leaves till after the delicate little blue flowers have made their appearance in the spring. This plant is by no means common in our vicinity, for the sandy soil of southern New Jersey does not seem to suit it. But it is abundant in the rich woods of Pennsylvania, and in the Eastern States; where its flowers appear soon after the winter's snows melt away. The leaves are broad, and so indented as to be divided into three wide, rounded lobes, from which is derived its specific name, triloba, or three-lobed. I regret its absence in my walks, for it was one of the favorites of early days.

After returning to the village, the ear was unexpectedly greeted with the gurgling melody of the Purple Martin, showing that these sprightly birds had returned to the boxes which they had occupied for a number of years, and which had been placed under the eaves of a store building, for their especial use. Like many others of the Swallow family this beautiful bird seeks the society of man, and is everywhere a welcome visitor. He returns year after year to the same stations. His animated, musical chatter is cheering, and he boldly drives intruding hawks and crows from the premises.

'TIS FIVE-AND-TWENTY YEARS.

BY A. S. HOOKER.

Sitting upon our cottage stoop,
By autumn maples shaded,
I called the gentle voices up
That time had nearly faded.
The evening light comes from the west,
In streams of golden glory;
So fold your head, love, on my breast,
And hear my olden story.

'Tis five-and-twenty years, my dear,
Since, hearts and hands together,
We launched our bark, the ocean clear,
And all serene the weather.
With simple trust in Providence,
We set the sails upon her;
My fortune, hope and common sense;
Your dowry, love and honor.

For five-and-twenty years, my dear,
The hillows lightly skimming,
One day the skies grew mirk and drear,
Our eyes and spirits dimming.
How dark that night frowned overhead,
When hope foresaw no morrow;
And we, beside our firstling dead,
Drank our first cup of sorrow.

'Tis five-and-twenty years, my dear,
Yet music's in our dwelling,
The children's prattle that we hear
About our hearthstone swelling.

God bless them all, the loving band
So glad to call you mother;
With heart to heart and hand to hand,
Clinging to one another.

Through five-and-twenty years, my dear,
When'er my arm was weary,
And scarce I knew the way to steer,
Your words were ever cheery.
When, mid the tempest and the night,
With courage sorely shrinking,
Then on our way God gave us light
That kept our faith from sinking.

'Tis five-and-twenty years, my dear,
Slight change in you revealing;
But o'er my brow,—you see them here,—
The silver hairs are stealing.
Yet let them come, while still thy breast
Retains the fond emotion
That nerved my arm when first we prest
Our way out on life's ocean.

LIFE IS SO LONG.

"But a week is so long!" he said,
With a toss of his curly head.
"One, two, three, four, five, six, seven!"
Seven whole days! Why, in six you know
(You know it yourself—you told me so)
The great God up in heaven
Made all the earth and the seas and skies,
The trees and the birds and the butterflies.
How can I wait for my seeds to grow!"
"But a month is so long!" he said,
With a drop of his boyish head.
"Hear me count—one, two, three, four—
Four whole weeks, and three days more;
Thirty-one days, and each will creep
As the shadow crawls over yonder steep;
Thirty-one nights, and I shall lie
Watching the stars climb up the sky.
How can I wait till a month is o'er!"

"But a year is so long!" he said,
Uplifting his bright young head.
"All the seasons must come and go
Over the hills with footsteps slow—
Autumn and winter, summer and spring;
Oh, for a bridge of gold to fling
O'er the chasm deep and wide,
That I might cross to the other side,
Where she is waiting—my love, my bride!"

"Ten years may be long!" he said,
Slowly raising his stately head,
"But there's much to win, there is much to lose;
A man must labor, a man must choose,
And he must be strong to wait!
The years may be long, but who would wear
The crown of honor must do and dare—
No time has he to toy with fate
Who would climb to manhood's high estate."

"Ah! life is not long?" he said,
Bowing his grand white head.
One, two, three, four, five, six, seven—
Seventy years! As swift their flight,
As swallows cleaving the morning light,
Or golden gleams at even.
Life is short as a summer night—
How long, O God, is eternity?"

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 129.

"PLAINNESS OF SPEECH, BEHAVIOR AND APPEARANCE."

The testimony of the Society of Friends on these subjects is not peculiar to them, but belongs to the Church at large—being founded on the commands of our Saviour and his Apostles, and of the Holy Prophets; and also on the openings of the Spirit of Christ in the hearts of his obedient followers. Many indeed are the instances of those who have been brought under a living concern for their own salvation and been made willing to bend their necks to the yoke of Christ, who have felt the force of the command, "put away thine ornaments from thee;" and who have seen that they could no longer comply with many customs which others thought harmless.

This has been the case in all true revivals of religion. The early members of our Society were led into great simplicity in their manner of life, and watchfulness over their words and actions. Their liberty stood in the liberty which the Spirit of Christ gave them.

The early Methodists were a simple people, who were not ashamed to confess their allegiance to their Divine Master by their appearance and behavior in their daily walk.

David Ferris in his Journal, records his exercises in this line. He had been led by the teachings of the Spirit, without outward help, to renounce the erroneous views in which he had been educated, and to embrace the doctrines held by the Society of Friends: and he had left the college in which he was being educated for the ministry, and had returned to his father's house. He says:—

"After I had been some time at home, new objections arose in my mind against a compliance with the customs of those among whom I resided; such as bowing and scraping, and putting off the hat, saying, 'your servant, sir,' 'madam,' &c., and against using the ungrammatical, corrupt language of 'you' to a single person. Although, in past years, I had known various exercises, and thought I had learned many hard lessons, yet I found much in me that required mortification, and that I yet had many things to learn. To refuse the use of the plural language to a single person, although it seemed a small matter, yet I found it hard to submit to. I was convinced that the common mode of speaking in the plural number to a single person, was a violation of the rules of grammar and unscriptural. I also believed the pride of man had introduced the custom. . . . It was not long before I found it my duty to say 'thee' and 'thou' to every individual. Nevertheless, I found an inclination or temptation so to turn the conversation as to shun this mode of speech; yet this did not afford peace. Small as the matter appeared, I could not be easy without being faithful in every respect; and my duty in this particular being clearly manifested, I reasoned no longer with flesh and blood, but submitted to the requiring."

When Daniel Wheeler had submitted to these Divine visitations which were the means of redeeming him from sin and transgression, he found, as his children state in his Memoirs, that the only path in which he could walk with safety, was that of self-denial. "Much mental conflict was at this time his portion; but peace was only to be obtained by an entire surrender of the will; and in conformity with what he believed required of him, he adopted the plain dress. He once recounted to a friend in lively terms, the trial it was to him to put on a different hat to that which he had been accustomed to wear; especially as in going to the meeting at Woodhouse, he generally met a number of his former gay acquaintances, whom he crossed on the way to their place of worship, which he had himself previously been in the practice of attending. In this instance it was hard to appear openly as a fool before men; he thought if his natural life might have been accepted as a substitute he would gladly have laid it down; but this was not the thing required. He diligently examined his heart, and believed he saw clearly his Master's will in the requisition; and that it was a discipline designed to bring him into a state of childlike obedience and dependence. In great distress he cried unto the Lord for help; and a passage of Scripture was powerfully applied to his mind, "Whosoever shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Father which is in heaven. His resolution was immediately taken; he put on the hat, and with his mind staid on the Lord, set out to join his friends at meeting."

In an Epistle written by that worthy minister, John Banks, he exhorts parents to teach their children "the plain language of thee and thou to every single person; and to name the days of the week, and the months in the year, according to the testimony of the Holy Scripture; for this is according to truth." And he further says, "The practice of those who truly fear the Lord, is to be plain and decent in their apparel, not given to change, as they of the world are."

John Richardson, who was also an instrument in the Lord's hand to proclaim the way of life and salvation, and who travelled for that purpose both in England and America, relates that there was in his "wild nature," an aversion to the strict living and demeanor, plainness of habit and language of the "people called in scorn Quakers; and that he learned none of these things from them, for, he says, "When the Lord changed my heart, he also changed my thoughts, words and ways, and there became an aversion in me to vice, sin and vanity," "Now I came to be clearly convinced about hat-honor, bowing the knee, and the corrupt language, as well as finery in habit; all which for conscience-sake, and the peace thereof, I came to deny, and take up the cross to, and had great peace in so doing."

The experience of Job Scott is very instructive. When he submitted his heart to the holy work of Divine Grace, he was early convinced that "religion was an internal life in the soul," and "that men generally rely too much on external performances and appearances." Thus his understanding was opened to see "that a plain, decent, and not costly dress and way of living, in all things, was most agreeable to true Christian gravity and self-denial."

"Thus instructed," he adds, "I bowed in reverence; and as it became from time to time necessary to procure new clothing, I endeavored to conform my outward appearance in this respect to the dictates of Truth, in which I found true peace and satisfaction. Also, He instructed me to use the plain Scripture language, THOU to one, and YOU to more than one. The cross greatly offended me in regard to these things. This form of language in particular, looked so trifling and foolish to the worldly-wise part in me, and the fear of the 'world's dread laugh' so powerfully opposed it, that I gave way to carnal reasoning. 'What good can this exactness of language do. May I not as well serve God in a less singular and less contemptible way?' Such reasonings as these, and many more, presented in opposition to the holy injunction. But the Lord showed me, that if I would be wise, I must first become a fool; if I would be his disciple, I must first deny myself, take up my cross daily, in whatever He required of me, and follow Him in the way of his leadings.

"It was very hard and trying to my natural will to give up to this duty. This exercise, beset me day and night for some time, during which I had many sorrowful and bitter tears, pleaded many excuses, and greatly wished some substitute might be accepted instead of the thing called for. But He who called me into the performance of these foolish things, (to the world's wisdom), was graciously pleased to show me with indubitable clearness, that He would choose his sacrifice himself; and that neither a right hand nor a right eye, neither thousands of rams, nor ten thousands of rivers of oil, would by any means answer instead of his requirements. If He called for so weak or foolish a thing as the words thou and thee to a single person, instead of you, nothing else of my substituting would do instead of it." "Perhaps," says Job Scott, "few will believe the fulness of heavenly joy which sprang in my bosom, as a well-spring of living waters, after my giving up in faithfulness to this requisition."

That self-denial in matters of dress is a testimony that should be borne by the whole Church, and ought not to be confined to any one branch is shown by the following case, described in the Journal of Eighth Mo. 27th, 1884, by Mary G. Smith of Hoopstow, Illinois.

"An intimate friend of mine, a member of the Methodist society, who has been one from her earliest years, related to me the power of grace upon her, as regards dress. She had ample means before and after marriage to indulge in the gay and ornamental robing of the body. She said that when growing up and for years, her rich jewelry did not interfere with her religion; the abundance of ruffles, lace and ribbons had no effect on her to hinder her worship. Under it all, she could give her experience in class meetings, offer prayer in the congregations of the people and lived a seemingly spotless life before her friends. But at last, an impression was felt that she must live closer to God and seek to know more clearly his will for her; and in the quiet of her own home, she received a baptism that opened the seal of the inner sanctuary and disclosed many inconsistencies, hindering the pure worship of God. When she next went to prepare herself to go to meeting, not thinking about what she should put on, she took up her jewelry, which she had been in the habit of wearing, when a voice told her, "God does not need these." She was startled by the thought, and again she put forth her hand to place the ornaments on her person, when lo! the same clear voice said: "Thou dost not need these to worship me." Then there arose a contest in her mind as to what her friends would think of her strange appearance, when once more she heard: "art thou not mine? be obedient and thy soul shall live." She left her ornaments in the box, and went forth a monument to the effect of a dedicated heart and to the voice of God in the soul.

But the next time she went out, the contest arose between the desire of her natural will to conform to her usual attire, and the spiritual light which convinced her that ornaments were injurious to the salvation of her soul. She said:

"I never afterward wanted to put them on," and she felt compelled to remove the ruffles and trimmings from her clothes. This was no 'Quaker' religion, but a Christ principle, leading the mind away from the useless, to the vitalizing essence of all good.

—Indians on the Allegheny Reservation.—There has been a gradual increase in the number of Indians on this Reservation, since Friends first exercised a care over them. In 1798, the number residing there was estimated at a little over 500; in 1835-6, at 690; and in 1886, the Report of the Commissioner on Indian Affairs gives it at 935. This surely is a source of encouragement; especially as there is reason to believe, that if it had not been for the efforts used from time to time by Friends to guard these people from the evil designs of unscrupulous men, they would have lost their homes and but few of them have been left in existence.

THE FRIEND.

FIFTH MONTH 14, 1887.

Wichita, Kansas, have concluded to establish a "Friends' University" at that place; and have received considerable donations in money and land for the purpose. It may be doubted whether they fully appreciate the magnitude of the enterprise they have entered upon.

—One Effect of Paid Ministry among Friends.—The Fourth Month number of The Western Friend quotes some remarks made by a minister belonging to the Larger Body in Kansas, the purport of which was, that "the paying of ministers by wealthy meetings, and stationing of those supposed to be worth paying for, leaves our weak meetings so that ministers seldom visit us." The present influences, he thought, were operating to prevent the development of those gifts in the ministry which might be conferred by the Head of the Church, and especially the gifts of women.

—Effect of Ritualism.—In the Protestant Episcopal Church, the growth of ritualism has been rapid of latter times. One effect of this, says The Episcopal Recorder, has been the quiet withdrawal of many of its members, who have taken refuge in other denominations.

—English Preaching among the Mennonites.—The Mennonites in Bucks Co., Pa., are nearly all of Dutch or German descent, and heretofore the preaching in their meeting-houses has been in the Pennsylvania Dutch language, which is that commonly used in their families. For some years past, the English language only has been taught in the schools, and it has become so generally understood by their people, that the brethren at Line Lexington have decided, The Herald of Peace states, to hold English services also in connection with the German.

—The Library of the Convent at Mt. Sinai.—The discovery at the Convent of Mt. Sinai of the ancient and very valuable manuscript copy of the New Testament, known as the Sinaitic Version, has led to a further investigation of the literary treasures of that monastery. Professor Garthausen, of Leipzig, recently spent some months there, and has published the results of his researches.

"He reports," says The Independent, "the library in a deplorable condition, and says that 'the library is not in need of codices but the codices in need of a library.' A number of the manuscripts are stored away in the rooms of the Archbishop, others in the cell of the Virgin Mary, others in the so-called 'small library,' and still others in the so-called sacristy of St. John the Baptist. It seems that others are stored away elsewhere, and these the monks would not allow him to see. The experience with the Sinaiticus, which it seems they were virtually compelled to 'present' to the Russian Czar, has made them cautious in admitting strangers to their library, and it is thought by some scholars that possibly the best of the codices are now hidden by the monks. The oldest manuscripts date from the eighth, ninth and tenth centuries, and do not seem to contain anything not found in other equally old manuscripts. The great majority of the codices are of a later date, and belong chiefly to the practical side of theology and to the monastic institutions. No less than two hundred authors are represented by these manuscripts. Two hundred manuscripts are dated. Egypt, Alexandria, Jerusalem, Bethlehem, Cairo, Sinai, Cyprus, Palestine, Patmos, Chersonesos, Athos, Cephalonia, Serres, Rhegium, are mentioned as places where some of them were written, and forty names of owners are found. One hundred and forty-seven manuscripts represent the Old Testament department, and one hundred and fifty-three the New, although not a single complete copy of either is now found in the library, although the four gospels are found in fifty-six manuscripts, one of them dating as early as the ninth century.

—Canada Law-suit.—Information has been received that the Supreme Court of Canada have confirmed the decision of the Court below, reversing the judgment of Justice Proudfoot, and giving the property in dispute at Bloomfield to the plaintiffs in the original suit.

The supreme need of our day is the Christianization of Christendom.—Jos. Cook.

In the late Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, attention was called, on one occasion, to one of the effects of entering upon or carrying on religious labor, in the will and wisdom of man, which has probably claimed less attention than its importance merits. This is the tendency to beget irreverence for sacred things in the mind of him who so labors—a tendency which always accompanies such unauthorized labor, although it may at times be kept in check, and not permitted to develop.

There is a feeling of solemnity, often amounting to awe, on the mind of him who is brought under religious exercise, and made to feel that the Lord has entrusted to him a message for the people assembled. Under this feeling many have known the very body brought into a state of trembling, and have been in a condition like Isaiah of old, who, when he saw in prophetic vision, the Lord sitting on his throne, was ready to exclaim, "Woe is me, for I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell in the midst of a people of unclean lips, and mine eyes have seen the King, the Lord of Hosts." The true minister will never feel it to be a light and formal matter to speak in the name of the Lord; although his experience in Divine help often extended in time of need, may so confirm his faith, that he will enter upon the services required with a degree of holy confidence in that Power which has hitherto helped him.

But where any one attempts to preach, relying on previous study and preparation, or on his own natural fluency of speech, as these are the products of his own efforts and powers, there is nothing in them that necessarily begets a feeling of reverence. There is therefore a danger that the more habitual such an exercise becomes, the more fully it will descend in his estimation to the level of any other of his intellectual efforts. His sermons will degenerate into lectures; the human element will supplant the Divine; the feeling of the need of Divine help will die out, and with it the awe and reverence which are the proper clothing of the spirit in the presence of Him who ruleth over all. From this condition the descent into doubt and infidelity is not very difficult. It was, therefore, not without just cause for apprehension, that a Friend was concerned to state his belief, that among the issues which our children would be called upon to meet, one was the seeds of infidelity sown in their midst by that irreverence which is produced by handling sacred themes in a merely intellectual manner and without the call and qualification which comes immediately from the Head of the Church.

We have been afresh reminded of this danger by a paragraph in The Western Friend, in which the Editor says: "In my travels, without exception, I find that meetings where the greatest number of modern 'revivals' have been held are the ones where the worst disorder is found among the young people. They seem to have lost all feeling of reverence for the sacred duty of religious worship."

In the course of our own journeys we have several times received similar testimony as to the scattering and benumbing effect upon the people of so-called "revival" movements. And in the attendance of a large Quarterly Meeting where such methods had been favored, one of the things that most strongly impressed a stranger, was the light and irreverent manner of the preachers, much at variance with the weight and dignity which ought to mark assemblies gathered to wait upon God, or to transact the business of the Church.

In an account of the late Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, published in the Christian Worker of Fourth Mo. 28th, reference is made to so-called devotional meetings held in the afternoons of the week of the Yearly Meeting; at several of which portions of the Scriptures were read and commented on. As the readers of that account might suppose that these meetings were a part of the proceedings of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, or held with its sanction or approval, it is right to state that they were held in a private house, on the personal responsibility of the owner; and that it is understood that comparatively few of those who attended them were members among us.

The holding of meetings in this manner, without the sanction of any organized meeting of Friends, is a proceeding so irregular in its character, and so liable to abuse, that it has never received the approval of the Monthly Meeting to which its chief promoter belongs. And the feeling of disapprobation which has been felt, has been further strengthened by the character of the ministers who have been brought from a distance to carry on the services, and who are among the most outspoken advocates of those doctrines and practices, which have destroyed the harmony of the Society in many places; and against which Philadelphia Yearly Meeting has several times within a few years borne an open testimony, especially in the Address issued in 1883, and the Essay on the Right Qualification for Religious Labor, adopted last year. Two of the ministers who officiated on this occasion have (as we are informed) been baptized in water.

Beyond the fact that the person at whose house those meetings were held has a right of membership in our Society, we see little more propriety in introducing a notice of them into an account of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, than into that of the proceedings of a Methodist Conference, if such a body had been in session at the time.

This account further states, that on Fifth-day morning "devotional" meetings were held in the different houses. The meetings here referred to, were the usual meetings for worship, held in the usual manner. While it may be hoped that a devotional feeling prevailed in them, yet they were not devotional meetings in the technical sense in which that word has latterly been used, to denote meetings in which greater latitude is given to emotional excitement and to the use of outward means to produce it, than is consistent with our usual manner of holding meetings for worship.

Adam Clarke, the Methodist writer and preacher, having been invited by some of his brethren in profession to visit the United States, replied in a letter, in which, while declining the invitation, he expresses some views that seem appropriate to our own Society, as well as to those to whom they were more particularly addressed. In this letter, he says:—

"There is no danger so imminent, both to you and us, as departing from our original simplicity in spirit, in manners, and in our mode of worship. As the world is continually changing around us, we are liable to be affected by those changes in our manners and in our mode of worship. We think, in many cases, that we may please well-intentioned men better, and be more useful to them, by permitting some of the more innocent forms of the world to enter into the Church. Whenever we have done so we have infallibly lost ground in the depth of our religion and in its spirituality and union."

We have received from our friend Charles C. Cresson, a small volume edited by him, containing biographical narratives of Elizabeth Ashbridge and Margaret Ellis; and a letter from John Kelpius to Esther Palmer. J. Kelpius was one of the early settlers from Germany who settled near Germantown, Penna., about the year 1674. He died in the year 1708. He was a man of uncommon learning and abilities. He lived a very retired life and employed a part of his time in teaching the neighboring children.

"Mary Pryor, a Life Story of a hundred years ago"—is the title of a biography of that valuable Friend, prepared and published by her descendant Mary Pryor Hack.

It contains, among other interesting matter, the remarkable account of M. Pryor's narrow escape from drowning, by the sinking of the ship on which she was coming to America, on a religious visit. This account has been published in our columns; and is probably well known by many of our readers.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Queen Kapiolani, of the Sandwich Islands, accompanied by her suite, has been visiting Washington, D. C., and Boston. She expects to spend two weeks in New York city, previously to sailing for Europe, whither she goes to attend Queen Victoria's Jubilee.

"The largest gas well in the world" has just been discovered at Fairmount, near Muncie, Indiana. According to a test by the State Geologist of Ohio, its flow is nearly 12,000,000 feet per day.

One of the largest deposits of marble in the world, as reported, has been discovered in San Bernardino County, California. No less than eleven shades of marble have been found in it.

Governor Ross, of Texas, has written a letter saying he cannot attend the Prohibition Convention of that State, to be held in Dallas. He contrasts Texas morally and materially with Maine, where prohibition has long obtained. Texas spends more money on education, has more wealth according to population, has fewer divorces, fewer labor strikes, and fewer paupers than Maine. But it should not be forgotten that Maine has more large towns and cities than Texas, in which intemperance, vice and crime are more prevalent than in small towns and country places.

On the 4th instant, the Connecticut House of Representatives, by a vote of 141 to 51, passed a resolution for a Prohibitory Constitutional amendment. The matter now goes over to the next Legislature. Two days later the same House passed a bill fixing a uniform license of $400 for strong liquors, and $150 for beer, wine, &c.

On the afternoon of the 3rd instant, a severe shock of earthquake extended from Centerville, California, through Arizona and New Mexico to El Paso, Texas. The shock was also felt at Guaymas, Mexico. All the reports agree that the shocks were preceded by a rumbling sound. At Tucson, Arizona, buildings were cracked and otherwise damaged, and "great slices" of Santa Catalina Mountain were torn from its side and thrown into the valley, while vast clouds of dust rose above its summit, 7000 feet above the sea level. One towering peak, known as the "Old Castle," was entirely disappeared. Near Tombstone, Arizona, a lake, covering an acre of ground, was dried up. At Torres Station, near Guaymas, Mexico, the highest cliff of the Chivato Mountain was seen to fall. A number of adobe dwellings in Sabinal, about forty miles south of Albuquerque, New Mexico, were destroyed by the earthquake.

On the night of Fifth Month 1st, and on the 2nd, a storm of extraordinary severity raged at Duluth, Minnesota, doing damage to stores, dwellings, streets and sewers estimated at nearly $100,000. The cellars of over fifty houses were filled with water, and freight cars in the St. Paul and Duluth Railroad yards were overturned by the wind.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 468, which was 8 more than during the previous week, and 115 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing 251 were males and 217 females; 238 adults and 230 minors: 69 died of consumption; 60 of pneumonia; 37 of measles; 32 of diseases of the heart; 19 of convulsions; 16 of debility; 13 of inflammation of the brain; 15 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 11 of paralysis; 12 of typhoid fever, and 10 of croup.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½'s, registered, 109½; coupon, 110½; 4's, 129½; 3's, 101; currency 6's, 126 a 137.

Cotton sold in a small way to spinners, at 11 cts. for middling uplands.

Feed was quiet, but firmly held under scarcity. Sales of 1 car poor winter bran, at $19.50, and 2 cars choice do, at $21 per ton. Quotations: Bran, western winter, choice, $21; do. do., medium, to good, $19.50 a $20.50; bran, spring, $18.50 a $19.50.

Flour and Meal.—Flour met with a fair local trade demand at full prices. Sales of 125 bbls. Pennsylvania family, at $37.75; 250 barrels Ohio, clear, at $4.15; 375 barrels do. straight, at $4.37½ a $4.50; 500 barrels winter patent, at $4.65 a $4.90; 125 barrels do. do., at $5; 125 barrels Minnesota, clear, at $4.25; 125 barrels do., fancy, straight, at $4.60, and 625 barrels Minnesota patent, at $4.70 a $5. Eye flour was quiet at $2.75 a $2.85 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat was firm under a fair export demand and light offerings. No. 2 red closed at 96½ cts. bid and 96½ cts. asked. Corn was quiet but firm, No. 2 mixed closing at 47½ cts. bid and 47½ cts. asked. Oats were not in much request but ruled steady, No. 2 white closing at 37½ cts. bid and 37½ cts. asked.

Beef cattle were in fair request at 4 a 5½ cts.

Sheep were fairly active: wool sheeps, 4½ a 5½ cts.; sheared sheep, 3 a 4½ cts.; wool lambs, 5½ a 7½ cts.; spring lambs, $1.50 to $6 per head.

Hogs were inactive at a decline of ¼c, at 7½ a 8 cts.

FOREIGN.—A recent issue of the London Times contained a fac-simile of an alleged letter written by C. S. Parnell to Patrick Eagan, in which the writer and other members of the Irish National League are implicated in the murders of Cavendish and Burke. C. S. Parnell pronounces the letter a forgery, and the Secretary of the Irish National League of America states that a committee of prominent citizens of Nebraska having examined the subject, report their belief that the Times' letter is the production of Richard Pigott, a man who had previously endeavored to black-mail the League.

On the 3d instant, Charles Edward Lewis, Conservative member for North Antrim, in the House of Commons, called the House's attention to the breach of privilege committed by the London Times in an article charging John Dillon with having told a falsehood when he denied the paper's allegations that he was an accomplice of Sheridan, the Invincible.

C. E. Lewis concluded as follows: "These wholesale charges of lying against Mr. Dillon constitute a distinct breach of privilege. I move that the House take notice of them."

On the 4th instant, W. H. Smith, First Lord of the Treasury, announced in the House of Commons that the Government had resolved that the Times' statement was not a breach of privilege. An amendment of the Lewis motion to this effect being voted upon resulted in 297 yeas to 219 nays. W. E. Gladstone then moved that a committee be appointed to inquire into the charge of wilful falsehood made by the Times. This motion was rejected.

It is reported that the troops of the Ameer of Afghanistan were recently routed near Jellalabad; that Kholat-i-Ghilzai has been captured; and that Ghuzni is surrounded, and that the insurgents threaten Candahar. The Governor of Herat has sent another demand to the Ameer for reinforcements.

The French Government has decided to prosecute the publishers of the paper, La Revanche for publishing an article entitled, "Down with the Germans" and calculated to arouse a warlike feeling among the French people against Germany.

It is stated that the Pope and the Czar are negotiating through a noble Lombard monk with a view to the reunion of the Greek and Latin Churches. As the Pope is willing to let the Greek Church retain its own manner of worship, it is expected that the negotiations will be successful.

The Pope has summoned three cardinals to confer with him upon the question of reconciliation with the Italian Government, and to arrange conditions upon which the Vatican will consent to negotiate.

On the 3d instant, the Mexican Senate passed the House bill repealing the constitutional prohibition of a second consecutive term for President. The vote was unanimous. The measure now goes to the State Legislature.

A telegram from the City of Mexico says, that since the perfection of the Government system of telegraphs, a disposition has been shown by the Department of Public Works to compel railway companies which use their wires for the transmission of private and commercial messages to cease the practice, leaving the business entirely to the Government lines. The matter is rapidly nearing a crisis, the companies persisting in transmitting private and commercial messages in defiance of the warning recently officially given them. The Director of the Government telegraphs says that each company is now liable for $500,000 for breaking the law knowingly.

By the earthquake of the afternoon of the 3d instant 150 persons were killed at Batrispe, in the Mexican State of Sonora. At Oputu 27 persons were killed. At the time of the shock a volcanic eruption began in the mountains near Batrispe. Seismic activity is reported throughout Mexico, with volcanic outbreaks near the Guatemalan border, as well as in Sonora.

A fire, caused by an explosion, broke out in the Victoria Coal Company's mine at Nanaimo, British Columbia, on the 5th instant. Before it could be got under control a loss of 189 lives occurred—107 white and 82 Chinese. More than half the whites leave families.

CORRECTION.—In poem "Dark Hours," 39th number of "The Friend," first line, for winds, read rains.

MARRIED, Third Month 3rd, 1887, at Friends' Meeting-house, Germantown, Phila., JAMES M. MOON, son of the late Mahlon Moon, of Bucks Co., Pa., and EZRAETTA JONES, daughter of the late R. Barclay Jones, of the former place.

—, on the 5th instant, at Friends' Meeting-house, Fourth and Arch Sts., Philadelphia, CHARLES W. LEEDS, of Moorestown, New Jersey, to MARY M. HARTZ, daughter of Elias Hartz, of Reading, Pa.

DIED, Second Month 6th, 1887, at her residence near Trenton, N. J., MARY DECOU, widow of the late Peter DeCou, in the 83d year of her age, a member of Chesterfield Monthly and Trenton Preparative Meeting.

—, on the 18th of Second Month, 1887, at his residence in Upper Darby, Delaware Co., Pa., THOMAS RUDOLPH, in the 63rd year of his age, a member of Concord Monthly Meeting of Friends. During a protracted sickness, he was enabled to bear his sufferings, which were, at times, severe, with Christian patience and resignation. He passed through much deep religious exercise and travail of spirit; and near the close was favored with the peaceful assurance that all would be well with him. His relatives and friends believe that, through redeeming love and mercy, he has been permitted to enter into that rest prepared for the righteous of all generations.

—, at the residence of his son, in Waterloo, Blackhawk County, Iowa, on the 23d of Second Month, 1887, CALEB ENOLE, in the 79th year of his age, while on a visit to his children. An esteemed member of Plymouth Monthly and Southland Particular Meeting of Friends, Washington County, Ohio.

—, on the 25th of Fourth Month, 1887, at his home in Plainfield, Hendricks County, Indiana, ELIAZER BALES, in the 94th year of his age. A member of Plainfield Monthly Meeting of Friends, and a minister for about 60 years. He attended his meeting on First-day, preceding his death, and was engaged in lively testimony; and continued apparently in nearly his usual state of health until his close, which occurred with but a moment's warning. His consistent life, sound and edifying ministry and earnest concern for all, endeared him to a large circle in the community in which he lived. He had a living concern for the support of the principles and testimonies of our Society, and being of a tender and affectionate disposition, he was very serviceable in laboring with those who manifested evidence of departure from the high spiritual standard which characterizes the Society of Friends. His mind was preserved strong and clear unto the end; and we believe it may be truly said—as a shock of corn fully ripe he has been gathered into the Heavenly garner.

—, at his residence in Germantown, on the 28th of Second Month, 1887, JABEZ JENKINS, in the 71st year of his age. He was a member and overseer of Frankford Monthly Meeting, Penna.

Selections from the Diary of Abigail W. Hall.

First Mo. 1st, 1855. Another year has dawned on some of us; while very many, during the one just closed, have passed from time to an everlasting eternity. As I have dwelt on their great change—a change that awaits us all sooner or later—my feelings have been aroused to look seriously at my own state and condition; accompanied with fervent desires that I may be helped to live each day, that in mercy may be lengthened out, in the fear of the Lord; which we are old, preserves from the snares of death. The day closed comfortably. Best help seemed near. Our collection for bed was in much quietness. The dear children, many of them, were very attentive to what was read to them, as well as to remarks that rested with me to make. All praise be ascribed unto Him, who openeth and no man shutteth.

7th. In our afternoon meeting, though sat through in great poverty, I remembered what was said concerning salt that had lost its savor, 'thenceforth good for nothing but to be cast out and trodden under foot of men.' It seemed applicable to my condition—no savor of life left in me. "Oh wretched man that I am, who shall deliver from this body of this death." I thought his morning there was a little life stirring, but all seemed gone as regarded myself, this afternoon. The dear children were quiet and cheerful; now unfit am I to be a caretaker of them. This is my infirmity, &c.

25th.—Fifth-day. There seemed during our meeting this morning, more of a quiet feeling within myself, and the dear children behaved well. There was one here and another there, who I believed were, in singleness and sincerity of heart, waiting upon their Heavenly Father. Do not such children draw down a blessing not only upon themselves, but upon those with whom they sojourn! It felt to me so this day.

Second Mo. 2nd. Yesterday was our Monthly Meeting. The privilege of attending which I greatly enjoyed. Oh, how was my very soul poured out as water before the Lord, during our silent sitting together! that may I be encouraged and strengthened, oftener than the morning, to make my complaint unto the Lord alone, who knoweth the secret travail of my soul day after day, for remission of past sins, and an assurance of salvation, in a day that fast hasteneth on. I think I can in sincerity say, "Let not thine hand spare," &c.

8th. Favored with a little good feeling during our week-day meeting this morning; for which my heart secretly returns thanks. Thy loving-kindness, O Lord, is better than life; therefore my lips shall praise Thee. Opened my mouth once more in a short testimony. I am so fearful of right hand errors, that it is in fear and dread I thus open my lips. Keep me, O Heavenly Father! on every hand.

26th. Forty-three years old this day. As I have dwelt on the past, and looked towards the future this morning, many solemn reflections have attended. It does not seem likely that as many more years will be lengthened out, and it may be not as many months, weeks, days, or even hours; the thought is a solemn and awakening one; and fervent have been the desires raised, for a little renewed ability to work while it is called to-day. That mine eye may be afresh anointed to see the work assigned me, and that I may be found worthy to be one of those sheep, concerning which our blessed Saviour testified: "I know my sheep, and am known of mine." "And I give unto them eternal life," &c. Ah! this is what my soul ardently longs after—an assurance of eternal salvation in that life which is to come.

Yesterday, which was First-day, was a day of exercise. During our morning meeting I had the naughty behavior of some of the children to contend with, and in the afternoon, my own naughty heart. Nevertheless, feel this morning as if I could say with the apostle: "In all things I am instructed." Thou hast given me, O Heavenly Father! afresh to know, wherein alone my strength lieth; and that, through Thee alone, will I be enabled to overcome.

Third Mo. 1st. Our Monthly Meeting. During our silent sitting together, my heart was dipped into sympathy with souls present, hungering for the bread of life; and I remembered that they were not "always to be forgotten." Again, "When the poor and needy seek water and there is none, I the Lord will hear them, I the God of Israel will not forsake them," &c. These, with other precious promises, passed before me; but not with that clearness to deliver I have sometimes felt; so kept silence. Instruct me more and more, O Heavenly Father! in the mysteries of thy kingdom. Let it be my meat and drink to be found doing thy holy blessed will. Anoint my spiritual eye to see yet more clearly the things which belong to my peace.

5th. At our meetings yesterday, had our friend Samuel Cope. He was engaged in testimony on our morning meeting, speaking of what a blessed and desirable state it was to be in, where we could commit the keeping of our souls in well-doing, unto the hands of a faithful Creator! He seemed to think, there were of this number amongst us, even among the dear children; to whom a language of encouragement flowed.

8th.—Fifth-day. In meeting, the things of this world were uppermost. Oh how my spirit strove to put them down, and to get the victory over them! I abhorred myself, &c. It was not till towards the close of the meeting that help came—a little saving help from His holy sanctuary, unworthy as I was; my spirit was contrited under a sense of it; and I was brought a little to feel the weight of obligation we rest under to so good a Master, whose mercies continue to be new to us every morning.

12th. Burdened and oppressed throughout this day under a fresh sense of my multiplied sins and transgressions, long since gone by, but not, I have been led to fear, passed by with Him who is all purity; and who is pleased, through mercy to our poor souls, to show us how we stood when in a state of alienation from Him. Oh how was all within me humbled and brought down under this feeling yesterday, and covenants entered into on this wise: If thou, O Lord, will grant an evidence of pardon and reconciliation, and wilt remember no more my sins and transgressions, but blot them out of thy book of life, I will follow Thee whithersoever thou mayest be pleased to lead, without any excuse or reserve; and shouldst thou be pleased to grant the petition put up with unfeigned lips, may this entry now made, testify against me if I perform not my vows. Thus do, O Heavenly Father! for thy poor child, oppressed and distressed, thou knowest. Alexander Jeffrey says in his Diary: "I was near forty years old, ere I thought as I ought, of the sins of my youth; then and ever since, how have they been presented to me! how many times have I been laid in the dust upon the consideration of them!" &c. How do these remarks answer, as face to face in a glass, in my own experience! and being opened upon, one evening when greatly distressed, how was I comforted and confirmed, to find any poor soul had ever been situated as mine was, and deliverance and forgiveness experienced! that I have been encouraged to look unto the Lord, with whom remains forgiveness and plenteous redemption.

26th. Have just been reading over a few of the entries made in this book. My feelings have been solemnized in doing so; and sincere desires raised that I may pen nothing but true and faithful accounts. Although it is often humiliating to write my many weaknesses and infirmities, yet I believe it will have its use in stimulating to increased concern to be made an overcomer. Respecting yesterday, I can say as the poor disciples did, "We have toiled all night and taken nothing." Under a sense of my poverty, helplessness and want, tears dropped several times through the day, where no eye saw me but thine all-seeing one, O Lord.

Fourth Mo. 2nd. Through yesterday, could not be sensible that I lived at all, in a spiritual sense; yet I think I can say, the bent and desire of my soul was to the Lord for help. Tried this morning, ere I went into the collecting room, to draw near and put up my petition: and although not aware this was come at at the time, yet was made sensible, while reading to the children, that Best help was near; for which favor, my heart did secretly rejoice and return thanks. I can but believe my effort was owned, if I did not know it. Persevere then, O my soul! Thou servest not an hard Master, but a rich rewarder of all those who diligently seek Him.

This week closes the present session. I feel that we have been blessed and cared for beyond our deserts. So that the prevailing feeling of my heart is, "what shall we render?" &c.

Fifth Mo. 25th. How this prayer of our dear Lord for his disciples formerly, saluted mine inward ear again and again: "Satan is desiring to have you, that he may sift you as wheat." If we are not watchful, and hold fast our allegiance, he will divide in Jacob and scatter in Israel. Moreover, anointed and appointed sons and daughters will fall and be carried away captive. This is not the will of our Father in heaven; whose good pleasure it is to give the kingdom to every little one that believes in and obeys Him.

Sixth Mo. 7th. Yesterday we followed to the grave, Lydia Ann Nixon, a colored girl, who died in the 21st year of her age. She was born under our roof, and indentured to me in her 4th year, and lived in our family till we were broken up, fourteen years. Through mercy, everlasting mercy, "death had no sting, nor the grave any victory," her close was a remarkable one. For a further account of which [see "A New Child," Friends' Tracts, No. 103.]

(To be continued.)

For "The Friend."

Natural History Notes.

About the 26th of the Fourth Month, I noticed some bats darting through our streets, with the peculiar zig-zag motion which their pursuit of flying insects produces. These were the first that I had seen the present season.

Unlike the birds, to which they have some general resemblance, bats are true Mammalia. Instead of laying eggs, they bring forth their young alive, and suckle them like other animals of the same class. They are covered with hair instead of feathers. They have no long wing feathers to enable them to fly as the birds do, but in place of these, the bones of the forearm and fingers are enormously lengthened so as to furnish a support to the very thin membrane formed by the extension of the skin of the flanks and other parts.

The species which inhabit temperate regions all feed on insects, and their supply of food necessarily fails during cold weather. The swallows, which they somewhat resemble in habits, at this season wing their way to warmer climes, but the bat seeks a secure hiding place near home, in caverns, deserted buildings, hollow trees, and similar places. There it passes the severe season in a peculiar dormant condition, in which it requires no food, and takes no exercise. Respiration almost ceases at such times.

There are several species of bat which inhabit our section of country. Which of these I saw, I could not tell without closer examination than was in my power.

On the 27th of Fourth Month, I accompanied some friends from the West, who had never seen the ocean, to the sea-side. A friend there gave me a specimen, one of many which had been washed ashore a few days previously, in an easterly storm; and had been kept alive in a primitive tank of sea water, formed of a refuse tin box, a few inches long and wide. It was a living cylinder, white, and of firm cartilaginous texture; perhaps an inch and a half in diameter at the thickest part, and four or five inches long. Around the opening at one end numerous arms projected, forming a circular fringe which might be compared to a fringed and fluted collar such as is worn at times for ornament by the women.

If the animal was handled or disturbed, all of these were speedily drawn in, and the lips of the mouth, if so it might be called, rolled inward into the internal cavity. The reader may form a pretty correct idea of the process, if he will imagine the fingers of a leather glove to be inverted by some force drawing the tips into the hollows of the fingers; and this motion being continued until the fingers themselves disappear in the palms of the gloves.

It was one of the sea-anemones, so called because in some of the species the fringe of arms around the mouth of the animal has a resemblance to the petals of a flower; and this resemblance is the more complete because different species vary in color, as is the case with flowers.

The poet Southey, in his description of a rock pool on the ocean's borders, thus refers to these anemones:—

"Here too were living flowers,
Which like a bud compacted,
Their purple cups contracted.
And now in open blossoms spread,
Stretch'd like green anthers many a seeking head."

The specimen was sent to the Academy of Natural Sciences in Philadelphia; and a kind friend returned the information that its scientific name is Actinia rapiformis.

The name Actinia is derived from a Greek word signifying "ray," and is quite appropriate to the class of animals to which our Atlantic City specimen belongs, for there is a marked radiate tendency in their structure. Not only are they furnished with a radiating fringe of arms or tentacles around the mouth; but if one be cut across the body, there will be found on the inside a set of partitions, radiating from the central cavity to the outer skin. The reader may obtain a general idea of the structure of these animals, if he will revert to the comparison already made to the finger of a glove. If he take such a finger and invert the open end so as to reach nearly to the bottom of the cavity, then imagine a series of radiating partitions between the inverted part and the outer wall of the finger; and he will have a pretty correct notion of the structure of an Actinia. The whole internal cavity seems to have a digestive power, and any small fish or other food material, captured by the arms at the mouth is drawn into this cavity and there digested.

One of the most wonderful things in the life history of these simply organized creatures, is the power they possess of shooting out threads tipped with poison darts, which benumb and render helpless the small animals on which they prey. These threads are exceedingly fine, and are ejected by a process similar to that of turning a glove finger inside out; and when they are again withdrawn by the animal, it is by a reversal of this process, the tip of the tube turning in upon itself, and thus gradually coming back and sinking into the general substance of the Anemone.

The Actinia bears confinement in an aquarium filled with sea-water very well. One has been known to live in such a situation for more than 25 years. It fixes itself firmly to a stone or other object by its muscular base, spreads its arms or tentacles, and takes such food as may come within its reach.

Gosse, in his work, A Year at the Sea-shore, describes an accident which befel one of the small fish in his aquarium, which shows the deadly nature of the poison of the Actinia. He says:—"This individual, about two and a half inches long, active and healthy, made a backward spring, and came in contact with the tentacles of a sea-anemone, which in an instant enveloped its hinder half, clinging round and over it, and quite covering that portion. I was looking on, and after a moment's glance to see that the fish was perfectly helpless, I removed it with a stick, so that it was free in about half a minute from its accident. But the effect was manifest; it swam away indeed, but irregularly and fitfully, and presently sank down on the bottom; lay awhile, then struggled up for a few seconds, swimming on one side, as if partly paralyzed and frequently turning over, belly up, then sinking obliquely down and hiding its nose between the stones. The fins were white and ragged, and the skin of the hinder part was ruffled up in parts, and the entire hind half looked diseased. By night it was not to be seen; but the next morning I found it, dead and stiff, and with the whole of the parts that had been embraced by the Anemone turned of a pellucid white, the edges of the fins sloughed away and decomposing." Incidents and Reflections.—No. 130.

"LET YOUR LIGHT SO SHINE BEFORE MEN, &c."
David Ferris states that he "went to a Yearly Meeting of the people called Quakers, on Long Island; in order to discover whether they were a living people or not; for a living people I wished to find. I had thought for several years before that there ought to be such a people; a people who had life in them, and abounded in love to each other, as did the primitive Christians; a people who knew they had passed from death unto life, by their love to the brethren. Here I gathered strength; for I found a living, humble, heavenly-minded people; full of love and good works; such a one as I had never seen before. I rejoiced to find that I had been seeking; and soon owned them to be the Lord's people; the true Church of Christ, according to his own description of it. He says, 'by this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye love one another.' I also found they held and believed the same doctrines, the truth of which had been manifested to me immediately by the Holy Spirit—being the same that Robert Barclay had laid down and well defended in his Apology. Before I had read this work, I did not know there was a people on earth who believed and lived in the truth, as described by Barclay; but here I found a numerous Society who held the same truths, and lived an humble, self-denying life, becoming the character of Christians. I was indubitably satisfied that their worship was in spirit and in truth; and they such worshippers as the Father sought and owned. I was convinced beyond a doubt, that they preached the Gospel in the demonstration of the Spirit; and divine authority was felt to attend their ministry. They were not like the scribes, to whom I had been listening all my life, who had neither commission nor authority; except that which was received from man."

It was the evidence these people gave, that the Lord's life and power was manifested among them, which confirmed David Ferris in the desire to join himself unto them.

When Daniel Stanton was a boy, he was brought into a serious state of mind, and persuaded a relation to accompany him to a Friends' meeting at Newtown. "In this blessed opportunity," he says, "through the power of truth and the good testimony of that dear servant of Christ, John Estauigh, being attended with the authority of the word of life, my heart was greatly constricted, and my spirit baptized in the presence of God; it was a joyful day of good tidings to my poor seeking soul, and the eminent and powerful advice that did attend that worthy instrument in the Lord's hand for my salvation, has been 'like bread cast upon the waters, that has been found after many days.' He adds, "I went from that meeting much satisfied with the way of worship of Friends."

D. Stanton further remarks:—"The countenance and good example of faithful Friends had a great reach on my mind; and when I came to be more acquainted with the dealings of the Lord, and could get frequently to religious meetings; and behold the sitting of his servants, and attendance of his ministers, I could say, as did the Queen of the South, who came from far to see the wisdom of Solomon, that the one-half had not been told me, and one greater than Solomon was in the midst of his people; praised be his great name, even the name of Christ, our dear Lord! that greatly appeared in power and in power and majesty in Zion, in those days, to the tendering my heart and spirit before Him time after time."

Later in life, he observes:—"Great hath been the satisfaction that I have received in communion with those that are of Jerusalem, for 'Peace is within her walls, and prosperity within her palaces.'"

In his Journal, D. Stanton gives an illustration of the effect produced by a true exercise of spirit, when, in speaking of a religious visit which he paid to England, he says: "In some of the counties in which I had been, some dear young people, who were libertine in the shew of pride and finery of the world, became sober, solid and exemplary; and one young woman in particular was so reached, as I sat in a Friend's house, though I had nothing by way of testimony in words to her condition, yet the weight and exercise attending my mind at that time, so reached her understanding. She became a plain, solid Friend; and before I left England I heard her in the ministry at a meeting, and, as I thought, to the general satisfaction of Friends present."

It is said in the Holy Scriptures, that "the fervent effectual prayers of the righteous avail much;" and we may therefore reasonably suppose that the exercise of spirit which the godly man feels at the wickedness that abounds in the world, may not only be useful to himself, but may through the Divine blessing have a restraining influence, or an influence for good on others. Daniel Stanton says, when on the Island of Antigua, "my mind was much burthened and distressed for that place and people, who are for the most part a wicked and sinful generation. I came away much bowed in spirit for the sins of the wicked in that island." He had had no religious meeting among them, for he could find no openness for it; yet the consciences of some may have been smitten by his presence, and they may have felt towards him,—This man "is not for our turn: he is clear contrary to our doings; he was made to reprove out thoughts; his life is not like other men's, his ways are of another fashion: he abstaineth from our ways as filthiness."

An illustration of the power of an upright, Christian life in convincing others was related as follows in the Christian Advocate:—

"A plain, earnest Christian was recently rehearsing in our presence the circumstances by which he was providentially led to an experimental knowledge of Christ. Years ago he had been employed as a common laborer on a farm owned by a well-known local preacher of Central New Jersey. He was at that time a confirmed rationalist, having a few months before emigrated from Germany. He saw how his employer consecrated his means in aiding churches in that vicinity and in adjacent communities; how he earnestly sought to save souls; how he was the friend of the disconsolate and the needy; how he encouraged education and promoted the circulation of a healthful literature; how he stood foremost in temperance reforms, declining civil preferences when offered by a political party under the denomination of rum; and how he stood firm for the protection of the poor slave when a fugitive fleeing from human bondage. Under circumstances which carried an almost irresistible influence, he became powerfully impressed with the reality of religion. He bowed before the cross. He experienced the saving power of that Gospel which he had once despised. The memory of that employer can never fade away. He delights in nothing more than to speak of his tender associations during those months of toil. "He has gone," said he, "gone to dwell with Christ and with the redeemed in heaven, and I will meet him there by and by."

It is related of one of the early converts to Christianity in Madagascar, that when asked what it was which had convinced him, he replied in substance as follows:—

"No, my friend," replied the chief, "it was no book or sermon. One man, he a wicked thief; another man, he drunk all day long; big chief, he beat his wife and children. Now thief, he no steal; drunken Tom, he sober; big chief he very kind to his family. Every heathen man get something inside him, which makes him different; so I became a Christian too, to know how it feel to have something strong inside of me to keep me from being bad."

For "The Friend."

To the Lowly Hidden Ones everywhere, where this may come.

Dear Friends,—As the Yearly Meeting drew to its close, my mind was drawn forth in sympathy toward those who, in the hidden walks of life, are seeking in all sincerity and humility to press on in the heavenly road; and who desire above all things to be found faithful to their Saviour and Redeemer; and yet, notwithstanding these, their sincere and earnest desires are often confronted with doubts, difficulties, and perplexities, that cast them down, so that at times they are ready to cry out in the very bitterness of their soul, why go I thus mourning on my way with a heavy heart and a trembling step.

Beloved Friends, he that will follow the Master must know somewhat of the baptisms that He met with; and with Him must be willing to endure the hour of temptation; but we are not called, as He was, to stand alone in that hour, or to drink, as He did, of the bitter cup, that drew forth the agonizing cry, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"

In our lonesome hours, Christ our Saviour is near to sustain our drooping faith, and to keep steady our faltering steps, by his ever-present Spirit. But is there not something often lacking on our part toward Him in our faithlessness and fear? The promise remains sure, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee;" but is there not a disposition in the hour of our trial, in the solitariness of our solitude, to seek other comfort, stay and support, than that which comes from Him alone? So that, by little and by little, the hold on the beloved of our soul is relaxed, which, in the freshness of our zeal and in the newness of the life that sprang up in our soul from Him, was known by a faith that was living at the beginning.

Ah, how many begin well, but alas too many give out on the way. And why? because they lose sight of their guide; and of the blessed Master's injunction, "Watch and pray that ye enter not into temptation."

The Christian soldier is not a bond slave but a free man. His freedom stands in a power divine. He therefore must live by this and in this.

There is but one thing that shuts out from the presence of God—that one thing is sin and our sinful nature.

There is but one life that can draw near to God and unite with Him—his own holiness, received through Christ.

To obtain this, we must know a life begotten in us that is not of us. God only can impart it, and Christ alone, by the Spirit, is the channel thereof. Nevertheless, as in the outward, so in the spirit, the precious babe may be starved, unfed, and die. Hence the injunction, pray for the keeping thereof, watch for its preservation; for our whole salvation is bound up therein. The breathing child doth cry in pain, in sorrow, yea in every trouble; and in its joys crows and rejoices in its mother's face. The little one never turns from or tires of the mother's eyes upon it.

Ah, methinks, so doth the true child of God come to look up to God at all times. In sorrow or in joy, he feels the presence near of Him, who is the keeper of his soul. In lying down at night, his last thoughts, before he closes his eyes in sleep, are up to Him, and in the night watch, if sleep depart from him, his prayer and his converse of soul are with Him, who is dearer to him than life; and when, in the morning, duty calls to him to arise, his heart is uplifted to his gracious preserver in gratitude and in love, with craving that, as he goeth forth, his daily duties to fulfil, the good hand of His Almighty goodness may keep and direct. Thus, as he passes along in the daily avocations of life, he is not unmindful of Him in whose hand is his safe keeping.

Ah, such as these are not alone, even as the blessed Master said, yet I am not alone, "for the Father is with me." And these need not fear any evil; the rod and the staff, the Omnipotent One puts into their hands, will stay and comfort them; yea, and when they are called to pass through the dark valley, such will feel, Thou, Lord, art with me.

O, there is a dwelling near to God, and a walking with God, to be known on this earth; and the reason so few experience the blessedness thereof is, because they live in spirit apart from God, and do not seek a conformity of heart and mind and will in all things unto Him. It is not aspiring after something great, but it is being willing to become little enough, and lowly enough, so that God by his grace can come into our hearts, not as a wayfaring-man to tarry but for a season, but to take up his abode in the government of our own being. Such as these are not over much troubled if they do make mistakes, for they turn to Him, who is the bridegroom of their souls, and say unto Him, Thus, O Lord, it will ever be with me, until thou dost wholly absorb me into thyself. Such have nothing to glory in; all their glorying is in their Lord and in his cross, by which they are crucified unto the world and the world unto them. Their possessions are in another sphere; on earth they are strangers and pilgrims.

O, thou traveller Zionward, wherefore dost thou repine? Follow the Master, eye Him always and in all things. Seek not thy own but His glory. Seek His will, and not thy own pleasure. Then shalt thou have rejoicing of soul in God thy Saviour. His presence shall be thy portion in life, and all fear of death shall be taken away.

There is a service for God's children upon this earth. They are lights and finger-points to the heavenly road; but if they have not savor of Christ's life, they become stumbling-blocks in the way, instead of lights in the path. And the secret of holy living lies in secret prayer; for, where this is lived in, evil is shunned; so that the fear and love and service of God is their delight.

Blessed, indeed, are the pure in heart. This precious condition is unattainable by us, unless we are willing to be drawn near and dwell near unto God by faith and obedience, submitting ourselves in all things to his holy will, being willing to see as He is pleased to give sight, and obey in all things as He gives the sense thereof; so that in measure the experience becomes ours, that it is our meat and our drink to do the will of our Father in Heaven.

The joys of Heaven are often given in foretaste to cheer the weary traveller on his way Zionward; in the lonesome hour, the Beloved draws near and fills the cup of the sincere and seeking soul with the sense of his presence, even to overflowing.

Why, then, art thou cast down, and why art thou disquieted, hope thou still in God, and trust in Him, who alone is the health of the countenance, enabling with confidence to look upward, and is our God.

Every spot is sacred; and holy ground is that on which we stand in God's fear. Let not fear that hath torment make thee afraid, God is over all, and He rideth upon the wind, and on the flood. The Lord is thy keeper and thy stay; therefore, fear not, only dwell thou in the lowly spot where none can make afraid or disquiet. The Lord is the rich rewarder of all who put their trust in Him. On Him wait in reverent humility; not in the hour of meeting only, but at all times and in all seasons and places; that, through His grace, the condition of mind may be known in which prayer without ceasing doth arise to Him in his own temple,—the inner sanctuary of the soul.

Not to my fellow-members of this Yearly Meeting only, doth my spirit go out, but to the sincere and honest-hearted everywhere on this continent and across the Atlantic, desiring their encouragement to persevere in the heavenly road, pressing through good report and evil report, to obtain the crown immortal.

Your friend in the Truth,

CHARLES W. THOMSON.

Philadelphia, Fourth Mo. 27th, 1887.

David Brainerd, among the tribes on the Delaware, found a religious Indian who had never had communion with a white man. When beyond the outskirts of civilization a missionary came, this Indian told him that he had been like the other Indians until four or five years before, when his heart was very much distressed, so that he could not live among the Indians, but went away into the woods, and lived alone for some months. At length God comforted his heart, and showed him what he should do, and since that time he had known God and tried to serve Him, and loved all men so as he never did before. Two other Indians told Brainerd that when he could not persuade them to abandon their evil ways he would leave them and go crying into the woods. He said that he had often thought there must be other people somewhere who felt as he did, and he wanted to go and find them. This account is given in President Edwards' Life of Brainerd.

The church is largely leavened with the world, adopts worldly maxims, and robs the gospel in worldly charms, seeking by making it attractive to make it effective. The pulpit sometimes becomes a platform for lectures more fit for the lyceum, and sometimes a stage for dramatic acting more fit for the theatre! An appeal to æsthetic taste takes the place of the divine savor and flavor of worship. Where "the Lord alone shall be exalted," classical music is exalted, pagans and papists are hired to lead in praise; or a profane, drunken organist sometimes uses the keys to play out the congregation, and play out the impression of the gospel. We build gothic cathedrals, furnish them with crimson and gold, adorn them with the pencil and chisel of art; then we have concerts and lectures, fairs and festivals, entertainments and excursions; and we say, "surely we shall draw the people to the house of God." But they do not come.

"Such charms do not permanently draw the eyes of men to God's house, and their feet to his altars and feasts. Zion's attractions are peculiar to herself; they "are not of the world even as He is not of the world." The church, robbed in the world's charms, instead of drawing the world to herself and to Christ, takes the infection of the worldly spirit; therefore her Master bade her "keep herself unspotted from the world," "hating even the garment, that is spotted by the flesh!"

THE FOOL'S PRAYER.

The royal feast was done; the King
Sought some new sport to banish care,
And to his jester cried: "Sir Fool,
Kneel now, and make for us a prayer."

The jester doffed his cap and bells,
And stood the mocking court before:
They could not see the bitter smile
Behind the painted grin he wore.

He bowed his head, and bent his knee
Upon the monarch's silken stool;
His pleading voice arose: "O Lord,
Be merciful to me, a fool!"

"No pity, Lord, could change the heart
From red with wrong to white as wool;
The rod must heal the sin; but Lord,
Be merciful to me, a fool!"

"Tis not by guilt the onward sweep
Of truth and right, O Lord, we stay;
'Tis by our follies that so long
We hold the earth from heaven away."

"These clumsy feet, still in the mire,
Go crushing blossoms without end;
These hard, well-meaning hands we trust
Among the heart-strings of a friend."

"The ill-timed truth we might have kept
Who knows how sharp it pierced and stung?
The word we had not sense to say—
Who knows how grandly it had rung?"

"Our faults no tenderness should ask,
The chastening stripes must cleanse them all;
But for our blunders—oh! in shame
Before the eyes of Heaven we fall."

"Earth bears no balsam for mistakes;
Men crown the knave, and scourge the fool
That did his will; but thou, O Lord,
Be merciful to me, a fool!"

The room was hushed; in silence rose
The King, and sought his gardens cool,
And walked apart, and murmured low,
"Be merciful to me, a fool!"

ONE LESS AT HOME.

Selected.

One less at home!

The charmed circle broken—a dear face
Missed day by day from its accustomed place;
But, cleansed and saved and perfected by grace,
One more in heaven!

One less at home!

One voice of welcome hushed, and evermore
One farewell word unspoken; on the shore
Where parting comes not, one soul landed more—
One more in heaven!

One less at home!

A sense of loss that meets us at the gate;
Within, a place unfilled and desolate;
And far away our coming to await,
One more in heaven!

One less at home!

Chill as the earth-born mist the thought would rise,
And wrap our footsteps round and dim our eyes;
But the bright sunbeam darteth from the skies—
One more in heaven!

One more at home!

This is not home, where cramped in earthly mold,
Our sight of Christ is dim, our love is cold;
But there, where face to face we shall behold,
Is home and heaven!

One less on earth!

Its pain, its sorrow and its toil to share;
One less the pilgrim's daily cross to bear;
One more the crown of ransomed souls to wear,
At home in heaven!

One more in heaven!

Another thought to brighten cloudy days,
Another theme for thankfulness and praise,
Another link on high our souls to raise
To home and heaven!

One more at home—

That home where separation cannot be,
That home where none are missed eternally.
Lord Jesus, grant us all a place with Thee,
At home in heaven!

—S. G. Stock.

For "The Friend."

"Behold, a sower went forth to sow; and when he sowed, some seeds fell by the way-side, and the fowls came and devoured them up: Some fell upon stony places, where they had not much deepness of earth, and they withered away, and some fell among thorns; and the thorns sprung up and choked them: But other fell into good ground and brought forth some an hundred-fold, some sixty and some thirty-fold." Matthew xiii. 3.

How complete is the teaching conveyed in this Parable. Strange, indeed, that it should be rendered incomplete in its signification regarding the salvation of souls. Man may be and is employed by Infinite Wisdom, in the work of seed sowing. But when, through unwatchfulness and indifference, he sows evil seed, he becomes an instrument of mischief. Nurserymen have a great responsibility resting upon them. The small seed of faith, sown in the individual heart by Jesus Christ, is destined to become a great tree. But how much depends on right culture! The Prophet Jeremiah, when expostulating with the Jews concerning their causeless revolt, said: "Yet I had planted thee a noble vine, wholly a right seed; how then art thou turned into the degenerate plant of a strange vine unto me?"

King Solomon in his wise Proverbs said: "I went by the field of the slothful, and by the vineyard of the man void of understanding; and, lo, it was all grown over with thorns, and nettles had covered the face thereof, and the stone wall thereof was broken down." Alas, that such a condition of things should represent the Church of Christ! But so it is that cause and effect still follow each other. Such as a man sows, such shall he also reap. A wise apostle said, "If ye sow to the flesh, ye shall of the flesh reap corrupt-tion; but if to the spirit, ye shall of the spirit reap Life Everlasting."

Reader, has the gospel plow entered thy heart and done good service preparatory to the reception of Heavenly seed. Be careful, lest by the way-side fowls pick up the seed. In stony places, where is not much depth of earth, be watchful of the tender plant, lest it wither. Let the dew of Heaven rest long upon it; and oh, if there be thorns, guard them lest they choke the good seed and render it unfruitful. The good seed, when falling into ground already prepared by the great Husbandman, bringeth forth fruit to his praise. P. R. G.

The Story of a Stone.

BY D. A. GOODSSELL.

In the month of March, 1868, while looking out on a snow-squall from the parsonage window in Greenpoint, in the Eastern District of Brooklyn, N. Y., I saw a venerable woman coming up the steps, carrying a small but heavy bundle. She was almost breathless on entering, and I wondered why she should have chosen that rough day to come to me. I knew her as one who had sorrowed; as one who felt that her days could not be long. I knew her also as a devout Christian who had her fiber tested in the trials of life, and had grown stronger by the testing. When rested she took the wrapper from the bundle, and called my attention to a slab of grayish stone which it had concealed. And this is what she said:

"You are leaving this charge now soon. I have wanted to give you something to remember me by. I am not rich, and so cannot give you anything of much money value. But I have loved you as my pastor, and for another reason of which I have not spoken before. You wonderfully resemble a dead son of mine. He was for some years a missionary of the American Board at Mosul. While there he collected some slabs and bricks covered with inscriptions, and sent them to this country. He said they came from Nineveh. This slab he sent me. Not long afterward he died. I have kept it for his sake until now. But I am growing old and feeble, and may drop away at any time. I want you to accept this stone. You are young, and will know what to do with it." Then she rose, and laid it, with tears for her lost son, in my hands.

I at once saw that the stone was an archeological rarity, and told her so. I suggested that she might dispose of it to some historical institution, and so have personal benefit from it. At this suggestion she seemed offended, declaring that it was not for sale, and interpreting my hesitancy as underrating its value or as not wishing to be troubled with it. There was then nothing to do but to accept it. It has now been in my possession for almost nineteen years, and hangs in an ebony frame at this moment in the parlors of the First Church parsonage in New Haven.

I remember that I measured the stone at that time, and found it to be eighteen inches long, five wide and one thick. On its face, which seemed to have been partly polished, were three lines and a half of inscription in characters which I recognized as cuneiform. I saw at one point, so well preserved had the slab been by long burial, that the sculptor had let the chisel slip, and had gone back and restarted the dividing line which separated the middle rank of letters from that above. And this was all I knew about it for nearly ten years.

But not all I wondered. I did not know at that time that there was anybody in America who could read that inscription, and I doubted if there was in Europe. Of course, I was ignorant of the advance which was even then known to multitudes in the knowledge of the meaning of the cuneiform characters. The best which has been done is the work of the last twenty years. But if there had been a complete literature on the subject, I was then ignorant of it. So whenever my eye rested upon it the wonderings went on: Who wrote it? Who was king then? Where did it come from? What did it say? What Bible characters were living when that stone was put in place? And most of all I wondered that an Assyrian document should come to be an ornament in a Methodist preacher's study.

It was not until the year 1873 that any light came to me concerning the stone. In the meantime I found myself more and more drawn to general reading on the subject of Nineveh, in the vain hope to find some suggestion which might unlock the secrets of the alabaster slab. I remember speaking to a professor in Wesleyan about my possession, but incidentally, and with no hope that it would bring me more than his sympathy in my search. But that wayside remark was literally "bread cast upon the waters." As I have since learned, my friend, the professor, met Selah Merrill one day, who was then visiting educational institutions to ascertain whether they possessed any Assyrian inscriptions. Dr. Merrill was meditating the article on Assyrian inscriptions in America, which afterward appeared in the Bibliotheca Sacra. Thus that learned man came to know that I was in the possession of a slab covered with the wedges of the Assyrian sculptor.

Then came a letter from Dr. Merrill, which opened the way to this "Story of a Stone." A squeeze of the stone was sent him, and in a few weeks there came back a translation, and the long-buried secret was mine.

From this it appeared that the slab was a part of the corner-stone of the palace of the King Assurnazirpal who reigned at Nineveh B. C. 883-859, and who rebuilt Calah, which was a kind of Brooklyn to Nineveh, from which it was separated by a few miles. This, with the translation, was the sum of the information which Dr. Merrill gave me, except that he added a transliteration. The translation is as follows, the words which he supplied to fill the gaps being in brackets:

"Palace of pistachio [wood] [and] tarpih for the seat of my [royalty] for the glory of my dominion forever. In the midst I placed [images of] creatures of the mountains [and the] seas of fine white stone and ornamental stones I made in its gates. I placed doors of cedar, box, cypress, miskanni. I hung up silver, gold I collected. In the midst I placed." It is only necessary to allude to the intense joy I felt when the stone was made to tell its story. Silent for twenty-seven hundred years it spoke again, not in Assyria, but in a country New England parsonage. When Dr. Merrill's article above alluded to appeared I read it eagerly. I found my complacency gently titillated by seeing that at that time I was the only individual in the States who possessed a Ninevite slab. The list he gave showed that all the rest were owned by historical and educational institutions. But something else appeared from the translations given in that article, and that was that my slab was the tail-piece, as I then supposed, and I believe that the translator so stated it in his letter, to the larger slabs which may be seen in the library of Yale University. At any rate the inscription was the same as that at the end of the larger inscription. I had not at that time seen the larger slab. On examining this I saw that there was nothing missing from the larger slab, and yet mine told in part the same story. This remained a mystery until I learned that more than one hundred copies of this inscription have been found by Layard, and that this is the reason why this inscription is called the "standard" inscription.

The entire translation of a standard inscription is too long to give here, but a summary may not be without interest. The inscription says that the king went forth in the armed service of his divinity Asshur "and smote the heretics who worship not the exalted things. He subdued all the kindreds within his reach by favor of the mighty Asshur who gave him his throne. After recounting his many military successes, he states that he rebuilt the ancient city of Calah; that he peopled it with the captives he had taken in war, and by whose strength he rebuilt it. He pulled down the old citadel and built it new, one hundred and twenty spans he built in fine masonry." Then follow the words which are given in the translation of my slab.

Alas for the pride of Assurnazirpal! More than a hundred stones did he set up "for the glory of his dominion forever." But for centuries they were dumb, and only told of his glory when they were dug from the dust, transported to countries of which he knew nothing, and translated by men who worshipped Jehovah and not Asshur!

Assurnazirpal, whose name means "Asshur protects his Son," was probably contemporary with Jehu, King of Israel, and Jehoash I, King of Judah; with Elisha, Jonah, and Zachariah. The reference to the campaign against "heretics" or unbelievers in the "exalted ones," contained in the summary of the translation of the standard inscription which I have given, is undoubtedly to the worship of the high places and the groves to which we find such constant reference in the Old Testament, and which filled the prophets of Jehovah with such indignation, and which gave rise to the tremendous scene at Carmel. From other memorials we learn that this king kept a menagerie, and that he was acquainted with arts, which we suppose to be modern discoveries. Any interested reader will find a full account of Assurnazirpal in Rawlinson's Ancient Monarchies, where a plan of the building he erected at Calah is given; perhaps the very one from which the slab here described was sawed. The stone is a coarse alabaster.—Christian Advocate.

The work one may do in this world is only a secondary matter. The primary thing is the man himself. This life is a school, with its long and varied curriculum, in which men and women are being trained and disciplined for another life beyond this earthly sphere. Carrying on business successfully is therefore not half so important as building good manhood. Whether at the end of sixty or seventy years of hard toil, a man rests with a comfortable fortune or comes to the close with nothing, is really a very small matter, in comparison with what the man himself is at the end of his career. We pity a good man who fails in business when too old to start again; but if, through his cheekered course, he has kept himself pure and clean and true, and has grown into strong, noble character, he is not to be pitied. Pity rather the poor man with his millions, who has made money at the price of his character, and has built up a fortune on the ruins of his manhood.—S. S. Times.

For "The Friend."

Days in Bermuda.

Third Month 27th, 1887. On the 24th inst., J. and myself started for Bermuda. We had a vague idea that it was composed of some little islands out in the Atlantic Ocean, that it was a restful place, and that we would reap some benefits from a short residence there. So far, some of these anticipations seem about to be realized; and as we have just landed, I commence this hasty journal, that those at home may know about our doings.

The "Trinidad" is a pretty good steamer, but rolls quite easily in even a little sea. The accommodations and service are excellent. I have heretofore enjoyed ocean life, but for once have had enough of it. The indescribable agonies of sea-sickness commenced in good time, and kept up with terrible earnestness. Oh, the horrors of this ridiculous disease, but how thankful one is that it cannot last forever! By the evening of the 26th, some of our seventy passengers began to crawl out on deck, all looking as if they had been engaged in a hard battle, and had been worsted in the encounter. The winter voyages down to these islands are almost always exceedingly rough, as a vessel from New York has to cross the Gulf Stream diagonally, and the winds in certain directions give an ugly churn motion to the boat, which causes sickness in even the most experienced travellers. I would rather go to Europe four times than take this voyage once again. We have to return the same way too.

Since dinner I have been reading the local almanac, and learn from it that these islands were discovered in 1515 by Juan Bermudez, a Spaniard, and were finally settled by the English in 1612, this being about 60 years previous to the settlement of Philadelphia. They have a population of 14,000, nearly two-thirds of which is colored. There are a great many tiny islands in the group, the one this town Hamilton is on, being the largest. The aggregate area of land is a trifle over 14,000 acres, or what with us would be a good sized western farm.

Our steamer slowly came up the tortuous channel this lovely morning, and in some places almost touched the coral reefs and projecting rocks on either side, until the town of Hamilton opened to our view at the head of the bay. Down on the wharf a great crowd had gathered to welcome us, as this weekly vessel is almost the only communication between Bermuda and the rest of the world. Soon the inevitable hotel runners came on board, and we were quickly captured by one of them, and put into a row boat, and then almost as quickly found ourselves transferred bag and baggage into our present comfortable quarters. These are on the first floor, and cost $12.00 per week, and we hope to be free from the restraint necessary in the larger and excellent hotels of the town. This afternoon we walked around the place, noting the smooth roads, the pretty little park gay with flowers, and the picturesque views of the harbor. We have devoted more time to-day to eating than for several days past.

28th. This day we have driven over the island, examining the many objects of interest to our northern eyes. What is the general impression we have received? It is of a beautiful land with winding roads bordered on either side by ivy-covered stone walls, of lovely homes nestled away amongst the foliage and flowers, and of grand views of the rocky, foam-encircled coast, and the great blue sea surrounding all.

In the first place I will speak of the houses which dot the landscape everywhere. The stone here is, when first quarried, very white in color, and so soft that it is chiseled and sawed out of the hillsides in large blocks. Upon exposure to the air it hardens and makes very excellent building material. All the houses are built of it, the roofs being covered with thinner blocks, and the whole is then plastered and whitewashed, making a home to last for generations. The pure white roofs around Hamilton look on a moonlight night as if covered with snow. Most of the buildings are one-story high, with broad verandas and ample windows, and look very tropical. The public buildings and humblest homes are all built about in this fashion. The houses of the well-to-do and wealthy people are surrounded by pretty gardens, rich with flowers and strange shrubbery, and are approached by broad, well-kept drives, the whole producing a decidedly English effect, and exhibiting a luxury and comfort totally unexpected in these little, lonely isles.

Our Jehu understands his business, is very intelligent, and answers the numerous questions we propound, with the most hearty good will. Indeed, the people prove wonderfully hospitable and polite. We first drove over to Gibbs' Hill, and climbed the light-house, from which a magnificent view of the whole group is obtained. It was a glorious map beneath our feet, laid out in nature's most exquisite coloring, and bounded by a sea of purple. I have seen many beautiful views, but these highly painted waters and charming bits of land, make about the finest view my eyes have ever rested upon. The genial old light-house keeper was proud of his big revolving light, with its polished reflector and complicated clock-work; and was apparently so free from the good old English desire for a shilling, that he got two of them from us as a consequence. This afternoon a drive on the north shore included a place called the Flatts, where a man has several large tanks, that hold some of the beautiful fish peculiar to the islands. One is called the Doctor fish, because he carries a little lance around with him, and he possesses the power of turning black in color when angered. Another, called the Grouper, is about two feet long, and will frequently present a variety of colors to any one watching him a few minutes. Still another fish we saw swimming around near shore in the bay, is the Sargent Major, a small variety, beautifully striped with broad bands of black and brilliant yellow. But the Angel fish are the most interesting of all. They somewhat resemble in shape our Flounder, with the addition of fins extending on both sides of and further back than the tail. The rich tints and lovely blue on them cannot be described. Down on the fish-wharf in the early morning, I have seen large, showy fish, with strange names, many of which are excellent eating. The Anchovies like White-bait, are fried head and all, and make a toothsome dish. These waters teem with all kinds of marine life.

29th. Hamilton is a nice little town. The sidewalks don't amount to anything, so everyone walks in the middle of the streets. The stores are small and old fashioned looking, and sell the queerest mixture of things imaginable. The little park is gay with roses, geraniums, coleus, and rhododendons, some of which bloom all the year around. The foliage of the tropics are on every hand, and for once I wish myself possessed of botanical knowledge. At the one principal wharf lays the "Trinidad," ready to sail in a day or two, and clustered near are the banks, the stores, and offices which constitute the commercial centre of this cute little world within itself. The white houses spread away over the hillside, and crowning all is the big hotel which northern energy has built and maintained.

Seventy degrees in the shade is calculated to make one extremely lazy after our harsh home winter. So we are rapidly getting into Bermudian ways of doing things. I have been reading the "Royal Gazette" newspaper, just published to-day. It is about the size of the Philadelphia "Star," its type and style resembles the papers of 100 years ago, and it costs the sum of sixpence. Its news is not fresh, but the advertisements are interesting to a stranger. Reading this comical little paper takes but a short time. My good friend J. has been distributing Tracts to some of our new and pleasant acquaintances, who seem glad to lend a helping hand in this modest and useful work.

(To be concluded.)

Natural History, Science, &c.

Baldness.—A recent writer attributes the prevalence of baldness among men to the habit of wearing stiff hats, which prevent the free circulation of blood in the scalp, diminish the supply of nourishment to the hair-bulbs, and thus cause them to wither and disappear. He says the classes in the community which have been accustomed to wear soft hats are not often troubled by loss of hair; and that the comparative preservation of their hair by the women is due to the character of their head-dress.

Protection of Iron.—To protect iron from rusting, various expedients have been tried. A recent one which promises satisfactory results, is coating it with lead, which is not liable to oxidation, is not acted upon by most acids, and can be made to adhere firmly to the iron, by a newly discovered process.

Sea-lions in Central Park, N. Y.—These animals were brought by boat from Alaska to San Francisco; and from that point sent in a refrigerator car to their present home. There are eight of them—five females and three males. They are provided with a pond of water, into which they dive at pleasure, and are fed with fish. Four of them have steadily refused food, and have not broken their fast since they were captured, some three months ago. This is said to be a peculiarity of the seal family; for though tenacious of life and easily tamed, they will often refuse to eat for many months while in captivity, living apparently on their own tissue.

To Remove Grease-spots from Clothing.—The Scientific American says there is probably nothing better than equal parts of strong ammonia water, ether and alcohol. Pass a piece of blotting paper under the grease-spot, moisten a sponge first with water to render it "greedy," then with the mixture, and rub with it the spot. In a short time it is dissolved, saponified and absorbed by the sponge and blotter.

An effect of Electric Light.—A citizen of Davenport, Iowa, whose garden is situated about 100 feet from an electric light tower, has remarked that his lilies close at sunset, but open again a few minutes after the arc-lamps have been lighted. —Scientific American.

Storms Foretold by Insects.—A French paper states that upon the approach of a storm, the summit of the Puy-de-Dome is visited in succession by hosts of gnats, winged ants, and swallows. The swallows come to feed upon the insects, but what brings them is a mystery. They often arrive in such numbers as to cover the floor of the observatory, where they are crushed by the million.

The Variable Star Algol.—It is estimated that the distance of this star is such that it takes light 30 years to pass from it to the earth. We see Algol, not as it is to-day, but as it was 30 years ago. When we see its brightness dimmed, the phenomenon we are observing happened 30 years before. During that time, the image of the phenomenon has been on its rapid way toward us. But less than three days after it started, when it had come only 50,000,000,000 miles on its way, another partial obscuration took place, and the image of that started on its hitherward course. This was followed 3 days later by another 50,000,000,000 miles behind it; and that by another; and thus during the whole period of 30 years, these successive images have been winging their way toward us. There are 127 of these periods in a year, and nearly 4000 in 30 years. When therefore we see the obscuration of Algol, we know that 4000 such obscurations have taken place since the one we are observing, the images of which are following each other at intervals of 50,000,000,000 miles along the vast space which separates us from that wonderful star.—Henry M. Purkhurst.

Cuttle-fish in China.—This [Fourth Month] is just the height of cuttle-fish season here, and is as important to the fishers of Ningpo as are herring to the Scotch fishermen. Several boats are set apart for this fishery, which continues day and night, a fire being lighted on deck at night that its glare may attract the cuttle-fish. Besides the very large consumption in the daily market, an enormous quantity are dried for export.

As a general rule, it is only in wet weather that fresh cuttle-fish come into the market, for so long as the weather is fine the boats do not care to return to the city, but prefer to remain on the scene of action, and prepare the cuttle-fish for winter store. They are merely split open and cleaned, and are then spread on mats which are laid all over certain rocky isles; they are there left to dry in the sun, after which they are packed in wooden tubs.—Wanderings in China.

—Crime Beginnings and Crime Prevention.—In an article on this subject in The Independent, by W. M. F. Round, Secretary of the Prison Association of New York, much stress is laid on the importance of the early training of children to the habit of obedience to parental authority. The writer quotes the testimony of the Warden of Sing-Sing Prison, who said: "I never hear a son refuse to obey, but that I say in my heart, the son is on the way to State prison." And he adds, "If I was asked by a father to say what principle before all others shall I teach my son to save him from a criminal life, I should say teach him obedience. Dwell upon it as the fundamental principle of law and order—human and divine—unquestioning, instant obedience."

There is no law without a penalty for its violation, but in our families we every day see fathers and mothers teaching falsely as to this supreme truth. We see punishments promised and not inflicted; and a parent who does such a thing as that not only weakens the child's regard for law, but also writes himself or herself down a liar in the heart of the child.

Crimes against property are committed because men have not a proper regard for the thine and mine of society. The sense of personal property—respect for rights of ownership is not cultivated in the child—how can the man understand it? I heard a mother say—and she told the incident laughingly, with even a touch of maternal pride—"Robbie is the little tyrant. He takes possession of any of the children's playthings, appropriates them, as if they were his own." She spoke as if she thought that Robbie showed in this a character that would carry everything before him. If that mother chaises to read these words, I beg leave to tell her that her Robbie, flaxen-haired and innocent, with his contemptible, unchecked selfishness, is a young thief. Teach the boys that there is something in others' property that demands respect. The lesson can't be taught too early.

A way in which a disregard of rights of property is taught in so-called respectable families, is the utter indifference to debt. The child as it grows up, hears the unfortunate tradesman demanding his money over and over. Teach him once for all that debt incurred without the ability to pay it promptly, is swindling, is obtaining goods under false pretenses, and equally at variance with good morals and the law. But this indifference to debt, this weakening of financial integrity, is, after all, only an outgrowth of a deeper danger—I refer to a false pride—the pride of appearances, the desire to live on a scale of grandeur incompatible with one's means.

Less than a week ago I was talking with a mother whose son of seventeen years had just committed a forgery to obtain money for a fast life. The mother, who was crushed with the blow of her son's disgrace, said: "I can't see what made Johnny do it. He has always associated with boys above him, he has been proud of a fine social position, his sisters move in the best society, and we've always tried to keep Johnny in good society. We've bought him fine clothes, better than we could afford, we've pinched ourselves that he might have spending money like his associates. And now it has come to this." I had not the cruelty to say: "It has led to this;" but I could not help remembering that the boy's father was a laboring man—earning large wages for his station in life—and Johnny's ruin had been brought about by trying to keep him in a station of life above that in which the circumstances of his birth had placed him.

I have been speaking of crime beginnings and crime prevention in these families only which are called respectable. A very large proportion of our embezzlers, forgers, and many of our thieves, come from such families. There is a smaller portion from this class that commit what are known as crimes of passion. For these too there is greater blame to be put upon the parents than often is put there. Many a passionate child rules the household. The little baby on its mother's knee goes into a passion because its dinner is withheld from him, or some toy denied him. He shrieks and strikes his mother, and the mother says: "Poor little boy, he has such a passionate nature; he can't be crossed," and yields to him. She ought to spank him—spank him hard, for being in a passion, and give him nothing till his passion had cooled. The child, though he be so young that he cannot speak, if he be old enough to lift his fist and strike a blow deserves punishment, needs to have a lesson of repression taught it.

—Religious Statistics of Prussia.—The religious statistics of Prussia, taken in 1885, have been published. According to these the Protestants number 18,243,587 persons; the Catholics, 9,621,624; 83,020 belonging to other Christian denominations; 366,543 Jews. Of the "other Christians" 4,711 are Brethren, 13,022 belong to the Apostolic Church (Irvingites), 22,728 Baptists, 13,948 Mennonites, 2,321 Methodists, Quakers, or Presbyterians, 1,372 members of the Established Church of England, 23,918 called themselves Dissenters, members of Free churches, Christian Catholics, Mormons, &c.

—Temperance Drinks.—The Boston Medical and Surgical Journal gives the results of the assay of 47 proprietary tonics and bitters, as made by the Analysts of the Massachusetts State Board of Health. Nearly all of them contain alcohol in various proportions. Some of them, such as Parker's Tonic, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, and Dr. Richardson's Sherry Wine Bitters, contain more than 40 per cent. of that ingredient. Several of these preparations are recommended as remedies for intemperance; but it is evident, from the above analysis, they are more likely to perpetuate than to remove the craving for alcoholic drinks.

Too many of us are for an easier path to heaven; in which we may live unto ourselves; we like not the cross, though we would have the crown.

How common it is for us to feel that we have a duty to be at work in Christ's service! How rare it is that we realize the privilege of doing any work for Christ! We almost think that Christ needs our help, and that therefore we ought to take hold and do what we can for Him. We are liable to lose sight of the fact that Christ is in no sense dependent upon any of us for any service whatsoever, and that He simply confers an honor upon us when He permits us to do anything in the prosecution of his heavenly work here on earth.—Selected.

There is either life or death, truth or error, in every form or outward appearance of religion; and where Christ appears in the midst of an assembly, there is life; and where He doth not appear in any degree, death reigns and God is not worshipped.—Thomas Story.

THE FRIEND.

FIFTH MONTH 21, 1887.

A letter recently received by a friend in this vicinity from a valued correspondent, a minister of many years' standing, in the Larger Body, Kansas Yearly Meeting, throws so much light on the workings of the fast movement in the Society of Friends that it seems proper to insert in our columns some extracts from it. It says:—

"There is no manifestation of a disposition to return to the doctrines and practices of sound Friends, to be noticed in the meetings, nor in many persons, who constitute the meetings of Fast Friends."

"The departure from the long-established views and practices of Friends, and the introduction of so many adverse things, both in doctrine and mode of worship, have become so great, that for several months I have not attended their meeting, lest by so doing I should become responsible for the wrong and violence being practised upon the fair name of our Society; and to continue to attend and protest against the current of events, is only to engender strife and ill-feeling."

"I may have been too easy to give up, but it has seemed to me the way for me to escape falling into this modern Quaker fallacy; for had I continued to drit along with the stream, I should like others have been captivated, and carried away, for I am only a man with like passions as others have. By flattery and preferment, by important appointments, and various other means, many sound Friends have been lured from the right basis, and landed in the whirlpool of mixture and confusion."

After referring to his early religious experience, to the reception of a Divine call to follow Christ and, "become a fisher of men," and to his previous labors in the ministry, he says:

"For the last twelve years or more, since there has been so much excitement, the way for me did not seem to be opened to go out much; and now I am found as above set forth, but without any consciousness of a withdrawal of His keeping presence, or an evidence that He has in any degree taken from me the gift once bestowed, nor has the spiritual travail subsided; for in truth, I can say, it is the clothing of my thought and mind, 'Spare thy people, O God, and give not thine heritage to reproach.'"

"My mind rests upon this one thought,—the same light and power which led me out of bondage to death by sin, will also take care of me while in this retired or solitary place, and in his own time lead me out. I am waiting to hear his word, 'Move forward!' am watching the pillar of cloud as best I can by day, and the pillar of fire by night. I am expecting that He will use me again in the work of spreading the knowledge of his kingdom among men."

It is indeed a most mournful condition of things, when solid and experienced Friends feel that they cannot continue to attend the religious meetings of which they are members, lest they should become responsible for the wrong doings practised there, or should themselves slide into the current which is drifting those floating on it away from the principles of our Society, which are but another name for "primitive Christianity revived." The danger of himself losing ground, which our Kansas Friend felt, is not a merely imaginary one. The testimony of those who have had many opportunities of observation is, that in this "fast movement" there is a certain exhilaration, which might almost be called a spiritual intoxication, which is delusive and bewildering, and which has led astray many well-meaning but incautious people; and that in reference to it the advice of the Apostle is a safe one to follow—"Touch not, taste not, handle not."

Yet there are some Friends, who have continued to maintain a faithful testimony for the Truth, in the midst of unfavorable surroundings; and by their steady refusal to join in with unfriendly practices, and by their consistent upholding of the doctrines and testimonies of Friends, have been and are as way marks to others. We doubt not, that the Lord whom they have served has been their preservation, and will continue to be so, as they continue to faithfully follow Him, and oppose the workings of a false spirit.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—William B. Woods, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, died in Washington on the 14th instant, aged 64 years. He was a native of Ohio, but after a war settled in Alabama. He was appointed to the Supreme Bench in 1880.

The Secretary of the Treasury has sent a letter to Captain Healy, of the revenue cutter Bear, at San Francisco, which will soon set sail for Alaskan waters, clothing him with full powers to enforce the law which prohibits the killing of any otter, mink, marten, sable, or for seal or other fur bearing animal within the limits of Alaska Territory or in the waters thereof, except as provided for. He is also to enforce the law against the importation of intoxicating liquors and breech-loading rifles and ammunition into Alaska.

The total number of immigrants this year is expected to exceed a million. The character of the immigration has greatly changed of late years. Germany now sends us about one-third as many settlers as she did six or seven years ago, and Irish immigration is falling off. Ireland and Germany have disposed of their surplus population for the present. Russia, Austria, Hungary and Italy show an immense increase. Of the newcomers the Russians present rather the best appearance, being tall, vigorous and with an air of resolution. They are chiefly from the grain growing regions of the Black Sea.

Slight earthquake shocks continue at intervals in New Mexico, Arizona and Sonora. A fissure opened in Arizona, which extended from near Benson to fifteen miles below Tres Alamos, a distance altogether of twenty-five miles. Another fissure is reported seventy miles from Tucson, which, when it opened, threw mud and water to a great height. The belief that a volcano had broken out in Sonora was caused by the friction from rocks falling down the mountain sides, which ignited the woods.

Slight earthquake shocks were felt at Summerville and Charleston, in South Carolina, on the night of the 12th instant. Similar shocks were felt at Eureka, Rohrerville and San Buenaventura, in California.

A despatch from Marquette, Michigan, says forest fires are raging in the vicinity of Negaunee. The losses to owners of pine land will be very heavy. Fires are spreading in every direction. Duluth despatches say the navigation of Lake Superior is impeded by the smoke of the Michigan and Wisconsin fires. At Escanaba and other places the fire department has been called out to fight the flames.

Dangerous forest fires are reported in Worcester County, Massachusetts. In response to a telegraphic call for aid, a steamer and 1500 feet of hose, together with a dozen men, were sent on the 16th instant, from the city of Worcester to Still River, where "a sweeping conflagration was reported as threatening the village, and an immense number of railroad ties belonging to the Boston and Maine Railroad Company."

A bill has passed both branches of the Connecticut Legislature, providing for the permanent incarceration of incorrigible criminals.

The amended Brook's High License bill, has passed both Houses of the Pennsylvania Legislature, and been signed by the Governor. Some of its provisions are calculated to restrict the sales of intoxicants; although any license to carry on the business of inciting to vice and crime, is not reconcilable with the precepts of the Gospel. Cities of the first, second and third classes, are to pay $500; all other cities, $400; boroughs, $300, and townships, $200; for wholesale licenses.

The Attorney General of Iowa has officially advised Sheriffs and other State officers that "when engaged in enforcing the prohibitory law they have the right of way, and are to pay no attention to the interference of Federal authorities." The case which occasioned the opinion was one in Atlantic, where a Sheriff, who attempted to confiscate the product of a brewery, was ordered to stop by a revenue collector who claimed prior right to the beer on the ground that it had not paid the Government tax.

James and William Murphy, aged respectively 13 and 15 years, are in jail at Eau Claire, Wisconsin, on the charge of having thrown a railroad train from the track near that city about ten weeks ago. Several trains had barely escaped being wrecked several times in succession, when the company put armed guards at the switch, since which time no accidents have happened. The Murphy boys had been reading dime novels.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 458, which was 10 less than during the previous week, and 135 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the whole number 255 were males and 203 females; 230 adults and 228 minors: 58 died of pneumonia; 46 of consumption; 42 of diseases of the heart; 30 of measles; 29 of convulsions; 20 of debility; 18 of marasmus; 13 of inflammation of the brain; 13 of typhoid fever; 12 of apoplexy, and 12 of congestion of the lungs.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½'s, registered, 109½; coupon, 110½; 4's, 129½; 3's, 101; currency 6's, 126½ a 136½.

Cotton sold in a small way to spinners on a basis of 11 cts. for middling uplands.

Feed was quiet, but firm under light supplies. Sales of 1 car fancy winter bran, at $21.50 per ton. Quotations: Bran, western winter, fancy, $21.50; do. medium to choice, $20 a $21; bran, spring, $19 a $20.

Flour and Meal.—Flour was moderately active and prices were well maintained. Sales of 125 barrels Pennsylvania family, at $3.85; 125 barrels Ohio, clear, at $4.20; 375 barrels do. straight, at $4.35 a $4.50; 500 barrels winter patent, at $4.75 a $5; 125 barrels Minnesota, clear, at $4.25; 250 barrels do. straight, at $4.60, and 750 barrels do. patent, at $4.75 a $5.10. Rye flour sold in a small way at $2.75 a $2.85 per barrel, as to quality.

Grain.—Wheat was quiet; No. 2 red closing at 95½ cts. bid and 96½ cts. asked. No. 2 mixed corn closed nominally at 47 cts. bid and 47½ cts. asked. Oats were barely steady. No. 2 white closing at 37½ cts. bid and 37½ cts. asked.

Hay and Straw.—Average price: Prime timothy, 80 a 85 cts. per 100 pounds; mixed, 70 a 80 cts. per 100 pounds; straw, 65 a 70 cts. per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were in fair demand at a decline of ¼c. We quote 3½ a 5½ cts.

Sheep were active and ¼ a ½c. higher: wool sheep, 4½ a 5½ cts.; sheared sheep, 3½ a 5 cts.; wool lambs, 6 a 7½ cts.; sheared lambs, 5 a 6 cts.; spring lambs, $2 a $6 per head.

Hogs were dull and ¼c. lower at 7½ a 7¾ cts.

FOREIGN.—On the afternoon of the 14th instant, London was ablaze with excitement, the occasion being the visit of the Queen for the purpose of opening the People's Palace, at Mile End.

Sir George O. Trevelyan, speaking at the banquet of the Eighty Club on the night of the 16th instant, strongly condemned the Coercion bill as unjust and exasperating to the Irish people. He said that what divided the Liberals was not the question of granting Home Rule to the Irish, but of granting them Liberty. He believed there were not more than twenty Liberal Commoners who desired to exclude Irish members from Westminster, and that there was not one of those twenty who was not willing to give up the point in order to secure the return of Hartington to the Liberal ranks. He concluded by declaring that the Liberals wanted the Unionists to rejoin their old party and would pay any honorable price to get them back.

The Financial Secretary of India has advised the Government of the discovery of an immense amount of treasure, estimated at over $25,000,000, which had been secreted in the palace at Gwalior by the late Maharajah. The treasure had been sunk in pits under the vaults beneath the zenana, and the secret was entrusted to a few confidential servants. The Secretary was present when the treasure was unearthed. After removing the earth to a depth of six feet, the workmen uncovered great flagstones. Beneath these stones were several pits, filled to the brim with silver, chiefly freshly coined rupees. In each pit was a plate recording the amount of the treasure, and the names of the officials who had assisted in secreting it. The Indian Government has taken the hoard as a loan from the young Maharajah. The native papers protest against this action of the Government. They say that had the Maharajah been an adult, instead of being under a regency controlled by the Government, he would never have invested his whole wealth in Indian securities. A question will be raised in Parliament as to whether the "investment" be not another name for seizure.

According to London Public Opinion, the loss of life in India from wild beasts and snakes is still enormous. Eleven thousand, eight hundred and twenty-three persons were killed in Bengal alone during 1885-86.

The steamer Benton was run into and sunk by another vessel near Malacca, on the night of Third Month 29th. Of 200 persons on board only 50 are known to have been saved.

The elections for members of the French Municipal Council have been completed. The revolutionists will now have ten seats in the Council instead of four, as in the last Council, while the Moderates, who formerly had twenty-two seats, will have but fourteen in the new Council.

The Pope will, it is announced, communicate at once with Archbishop Corrigan of New York, regarding the case of the priest McGlynn. It is stated he will in this communication approve the Archbishop's conduct towards McGlynn, and charge the Archbishop to warn the priest once for all, that if he does not present himself before the supreme ecclesiastical authority at Rome within forty days he will be formally excommunicated.

It is reported in Bucharest that the Bulgarian Regents are meditating the proclamation of King Charles of Roumania as Prince of Bulgaria, thus virtually making of the Danubian Balkan provinces one kingdom, Roumania having, it is said, consented to the scheme. This policy is attributed to the initiative of England, and is said to have the approval of Germany.

The emancipation of the slaves in Brazil was commenced in 1873, when the number registered in the empire was 1,530,000. A registration completed on the 30th of Third Month, this year, it is said, shows not more than half this number of slaves, although in fifteen years the black population has largely increased. In the cities the decrease has been more rapid than in the country. In Rio Janeiro, in 1873, there were 50,000 slaves registered; in Sixth Month 1885, there were but 29,000, and on the 1st of Fourth Month, 1887, only 7,468. In the other cities of Brazil about the same proportion holds good. Even in the coffee districts, in which there was the greatest opposition to emancipation, and the number of slaves greatest, the returns indicate that, despite the large number of slaves imported from the northern provinces of the empire, the new registration will show a decrease of fully one-half since 1873. We have, therefore, some reliable data upon which to found the estimate that the slaves in Brazil do not now exceed 700,000, none of whom are under 16 or over 60 years of age.

Seventh Mo. 12th, 1855. To the goodness and mercy of Him, who condescended to my low state this day, do I feel bound to make this entry; having felt for many days past, afraid to make any more; being almost ready to fear that I never should again see "one of the days of the Son of man." But early this morning, was a little prayer raised in my heart, that whatever we did this day, might be to the glory of God. On asking my seat in meeting, there seemed to be a helper near; but it required close watching and waiting, that He turned not from me! Never have I felt more the necessity, as well as the preciousness, of maintaining the watch: and I do believe, if we were more concerned to do so in good earnest, we should oftener know of strength renewed; a running and not growing weary; a walking and not fainting.

15th. First-day.—Through the whole of our meeting for the solemn purpose of worship, I had to contend with the weakness of poor nature. The spirit truly was willing, but oh, how weak the flesh! This I can nevertheless say, the warfare was maintained, as I yielded not in the least, I humbly hope. May the Lord in mercy look down upon me, and pity my afflictions, and enable me to rise above it. For thou only art able; and through thee alone I look for help.

19th. Renewed desires have been raised this morning after heaven and holiness. Enable me, O Heavenly Father, to walk before Thee day by day, more carefully than I have hitherto done! Set a watch, O Lord! before my mouth and keep the door of my lips. That so I may bring glory to thy name, and peace to my oft weary and troubled soul.

21st. Not very well this morning; but the good Master seems near, which is a comfort; yea, was it not for the lifting up of the light of his countenance upon me now and then, where should I be? Truly, I have experienced Him to be a Father of the fatherless, and that He does take care for me. Greatly do I desire to be found serving Him in sincerity and truth.

Eighth Mo. 20th. Have had a short visit from my dear friend Samuel Cope. After a little pleasant conversation we dropped into silence. Though it was but for a few minutes my spiritual strength was renewed. What a favor to be noticed by the Lord's messengers!

21st. Comforted and instructed on reading the account of the poor man who came to Jesus, asking for the restoration of his child. "Jesus saith unto him, all things are possible to him that believeth." When he cried out with tears, "Lord I believe: help thou my unbelief!" If merciful regard and compassion was shown to this poor man, "will not God avenge his own elect, who cry night and day unto Him, though He bear long with them? I tell you that He will avenge them speedily." That there seems encouragement to cry nightly for help unto Him who is touched with a feeling of all our infirmities.

Ninth Mo. 23rd. This has been a day of deep and sore exercise. Notwithstanding which, felt constrained, both in our morning and afternoon meeting, to open my mouth in a short testimony. It seemed this afternoon as though I could not give up; and yet, to withhold, I feared that the blood of some poor soul would be required of me; some one who was called upon to sell all, and who was about to turn away sorrowful. Such an one had I in my little way to plead with. Upon leaving the meeting-room I was comforted in hearing, I thought, sounded in my spiritual ear: "Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord," unworthy, altogether unworthy as I am.

28th. Yesterday was our Monthly Meeting. To me it was a good meeting, especially the silent part of it. Renewed, living, and fervent desires were raised to the great Head of the Church, that He would be unto us mouth and wisdom, tongue and utterance. And if any one be called upon to speak in these our solemn assemblies, that they might "speak as the oracles of God;" as that which comes from Him, alone gathers unto Him. Sensible was I made of this in our meeting yesterday. Oh that we may become a more living and spiritually-minded people! led, fed, and nourished by Him, who remains to be the alone leader and feeder of his people.

Tenth Mo. 4th. To-morrow closes the present session. It has been comparatively a short one; being shortened or rather lightened by the good behaviour of the children, at least those I have had to care for. It has been a more comfortable term than any previous one. My heart hath often been humbled and instructed, under a sense of a restraining power: even the effective word, "Peace, be still," hath been again and again spoken. Never have I entered upon care under feelings of more discouragement; but the Lord hath been good to me; and like the poor centurion formerly, I have felt unworthy. All I could offer this morning in our meeting, was my great unworthiness; and my heart was humbled and contrited under the feeling.

7th. Had a satisfactory close at the school. After the children had gone through with their lessons, a precious stillness ensued. Dear E. Evans had something excellent for both children and teachers. I felt it laid upon me to say a few words, but through fear withheld, and lost strength by so doing. When will I learn to follow my dear Master, in childlike confidence, nothing doubting? Remembering how it was then, I endeavored this morning to do the little I believed required of me, for which I feel peaceful. I can acknowledge that we do not serve a hard master; but a rich rewarder of all those who diligently serve Him.

Eleventh Mo. 19th. Two weeks this day since we returned to Westtown. We seem now to have gotten completely underway. A great effort it is, too, on the part of some of us. Fear I shall not be able to hold out much longer. If right that I should be released, a way will, I believe, be made for it. A peaceful release is what I desire; and He who knows the sincerity of my motive in coming here, and my honesty of purpose in the prospect of leaving will, I trust, order my steps aright. I remembered in our meeting yesterday, that it was testified by the lip of Truth himself, "If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say to this mountain be thou removed, and be thou cast into the sea, and it shall be done." Greatly did I desire for myself, an increase of this true and living faith, being made sensible that where there is a want of it, there is a wavering; and, "He that wavereth is like a wave of the sea, driven by the wind and tossed." During our vacation and in my visiting among my friends, I was not left without religious exercise. But the Lord was good to me. I remember on one occasion, when feeling a commission to stand forth for my dear Lord and Master, yet feeling my great weakness and impotency, I pleaded on this wise: "So ignorant am I, I am as a beast before Thee." When involuntarily the reply came: "An horse shall be led with bit and bridle," &c. So instructive was this, that I no longer reasoned; but ventured forth with my little offering; trusting to the leading and guidance of my good Master, who is able to help, support, and strengthen all those whom He puts forth.

22nd. More busy than seems best meeting morning. There seems no avoiding it, with the care that devolves upon me. But this I can say, I move about with a prayerful heart. "Thy loving-kindness, O Lord, is better than life: therefore my lips shall praise Thee."

26th. A day of exercise. Oh! the fears that attend lest while I am preaching to others, I myself shall become a cast away. Deepen me, O Heavenly Father! that I may by a consistent life and conversation, not only glorify thee myself, but help to bring the dear children to glorify Thee, who art everlastingly worthy.

29th. To-day was our Monthly Meeting. The forepart was held in much stillness; which was broken by our friend, David Cope; through whom a language of sweet and tender encouragement flowed, to the lifting up of drooping minds present. The passage of Scripture he dwelt most upon was, "Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord." A renewed call was powerfully extended to each one of us; for which favor I felt bound on the bended knee to return thanks; craving help to follow faithfully our dear Lord and Master, the few remaining days lengthened out unto us here. I was sensible of the spirit of supplication, ere our dear friend spoke; but felt as though I could not yield; but after the foregoing testimony, it was "as fire shut up in my bones." Thou wast good, O Lord! and helped through; for which favor may increase diligence and faithfulness be mine.

Twelfth Mo. 3rd. The remembrance of the favors of yesterday, has animated to pursue with alacrity the duties of my station. How does the presence of the good Master, cheer and enliven us on our way! causing us not to "grow weary." I left my bed early, with sincere desires for best help, to perform throughout the day both my religious and social duties; but felt so poor as meeting hour drew nigh, that I went to it in fear and trembling. Through favor unlooked for and unmerited, the dear Master drew near; and I felt my spirit bound for and with the living in Israel—those who were choosing to suffer affliction with the people of God, &c., &c. Dwelling under my exercise, I found that I dare do no other than express it; and was helped and raised above the fear of man, to do so. A quiet calm succeeded, attended with a prayerful heart, to be kept little, low and humble before the Lord and his people.

13th. Our meeting this morning was to me a good one. Though not a time of abounding, there was a quiet feeling, like a canopy, spread over my mind; and sincere aspirations ascended unto the Father of all our sure mercies, that He would be pleased to "keep me in the way I should go." Near the close of the meeting a little matter seemed to arise by way of testimony. But having been heard in several of our meetings lately, and from a fear of being burdensome, I begged to be excused; and "He, whose tender mercies are over all his works," released, and that without condemnation.

17th. After a day of tossing and distress, I was comforted in our evening collection with a little bread handed in secret; for which favor my soul reverently returns thanks. The children were so quiet and attentive to the reading, and went to their respective beds so still, that my heart exclaimed, O Lord, thou art good, very good to us all!

23rd. I think I can say sincere sighs ascended to my Father in heaven to be strengthened to perform both my duties to Him, and the dear children over whom I am placed as overseer; that I might be preserved from doing anything that would add to my condemnation when night shall come. I soon found on gathering into silence at meeting, my spirit brought under exercise on behalf of the dear children; and gladly would I have brought them in spirit unto Jesus and there left them. But oh how was the call sounded "feed my lambs." I could plead as Peter did, "thou knowest all things," &c., but here was to be a trial of my love; and I found nothing short of obedience would bring peace: so allowed myself to "be guided and led whither I would not;"—a peaceful quiet followed.

Natural History Notes.

As I was walking along the street of our village on the last day of the Fourth Month, I was surprised to find around the base of a tree, and also at another spot, from which a tree had been removed, several large clusters of toad stools or Fungi. I was surprised because it was earlier in the season than I supposed such plants were accustomed to grow. They were members of the Agaric family, to which the common Mushroom belongs; and like that well-known species, a slender white stem was crowned with an inverted rounded cap (umbrella-shaped), the under side of which was filled with their plates or gills radiating from the stem to the outer edge of the cap. The cap was of a light brown or leather-color on the top, and the gills or plates were black. The individual plants had sprung up so closely together as to form compact masses, of 50 or more in a mass of three or four inches in diameter, and the expanded tops varied in size from a large pea to that of a shell-bark nut.

I cut off a few of the tops and placed them, with the gills beneath on a strip of paper. They soon deposited hundreds or thousands of the black spores or seeds, which are produced in these gills; but some which were left under cover over night, betrayed their fugacious character, by melting down into a black liquid.

On the same day a friend brought me a specimen of Helonias bulbata, one of the varied species of our plants. It was found in a swamp near Haddonfield. I had seen it three years ago growing in a swampy tract to the north of the ridge on which the village of Moorestown is situated. But that locality has been under-drained and upturned by the plow; and the many interesting wild flowers it once produced have given place to tomatoes and other plants more profitable to the farmer, although less attractive to the botanist. The Helonias belongs to the Lily family, and is nearly allied to the Blazing-Star, a plant common in the rich woods of Chester County, Pa., but which I have never met with in our sandy soils. In it, the staminate and pistillate flowers grow on separate plants, and the former forms a long and rather conspicuous spike (4 to 9 inches) of white flowers. The Helonias has numerous oblong, flat, evergreen leaves springing from the top of the root stock; and from their midst, in the early spring, it sends up a thick, hollow stalk on the upper part of which are crowded numerous small, pale pink-colored flowers, containing both stamens and pistils. The anthers are blue. The whole plant is smooth—not furnished with the hairs or other appendages which are common in many plants.

In a former number of "The Friend," mention was made of the Cray-fish, a little crab-like animal common in the Western States, which sinks its holes so deep as always to reach moist earth or water, which seems necessary to its existence. Within a day or two past, a friend from Kansas said that for about 18 months very little rain had fallen in the section of country where he resided; and many wells had gone dry. Before leaving home, he commenced sinking a new well, hoping to find water at a greater depth. When he had dug down 10 feet he found crayfish at that depth, with water in their holes! How much deeper they would go before giving out in despair, could not be told.

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 131.

DIVINE PRESERVATION.

In the beginning of the year 1749, Daniel Stanton in the course of a religious visit sailed for England. As they approached the British coasts, they encountered a storm, and the vessel having received some damage, the captain determined to alter his course, and take refuge in the harbor of Kinsale in Ireland. D. S. says: "We got in sight of the harbor; but night coming on, and being fearful of rocks and shoals, they put off to sea, and the weather being moderate the fore part of the night, the seamen were too careless, and did not keep so strict a watch as they ought; but the captain as he lay in his cabin, had so great an uneasiness on his mind, that he could not lay still any longer, and went towards the head of the vessel, and found that, instead of being out at sea, we were near striking on the land; whereupon he immediately awaked the sailors, and they tacked the vessel about, and were very watchful until morning; thus we escaped that danger.

"In the morning it was very foggy and a storm arose, and we could not discover the harbor, but were driven about for a considerable time. They threw overboard one anchor, but the storm continuing, and the weather distressing we were drove towards the land, and the seamen being almost wearied out, apprehended we could not keep off much longer. Thus we were in great distress, expecting the vessel would be wrecked; and the captain being much surprised, came to my companion and me, telling us he would do what he could to save our lives, but that we were in great danger of being lost, and he expected we would be drove on shore in the night, if we kept off in the day; and was desirous to know our minds, what he had best to do whether to run the ship aground while we had daylight, that if any of our lives were spared, we could the better see how to help ourselves. We, not knowing what to advise him for the best, only to trust in the good providence of God the captain concluded to steer towards the land. The cries and lamentations of the people were great for mercy to their souls, apprehending the vessel might be soon dashed to pieces and we might suddenly lose our lives; but I had reason to believe that the gracious and merciful Being was pleased to hear our cries; for the nearer we came to land the fog cleared away, and they espied a vessel, which as we approached nearer we discovered was lying at anchor, at the mouth of Kinsale harbor, where we wanted to be; and as we came on our way the harbor appeared plain. Thus through the great deliverance of the Almighty, we arrived there safe and dropped anchor; for which merciful preservation our hearts had great cause to be humbly bowed before Him. The captain came to me saying 'Now, if you have it in your heart to return God thanks, I will join with you on my knees; and if it had not been for your prayers we should all have been lost;' but I ascribed this great deliverance to the kind mercy of Divine Providence to us all; although I can truly say, my soul was earnest in supplication before the Lord at times on this trying passage and at one particular season, as I lay in my cabin, not knowing but that we might be swallowed up in the mighty ocean, the spirit of prayer came on me, and I was raised on my knees to make intercession with the All-powerful Being; after which I went upon the deck, and the captain, seeing me, expressed in a very loving manner, his unity and satisfaction; and I thought that the same good power and presence which attended my mind, had some reach upon his heart."

When in England during this visit, D. Stantor met with one "professing the truth," who did not manifest a trusting confidence in the care and protection of the Ruler of the universe, but pleaded for carnal defence, and asked what defence people had in the province of Pennsylvania. Daniel says:—"I told him that Providence was our defence; yet he pleaded for carnal defence in such a manner that gave me much pain of mind, and I told him that I had no unity with his principles, and bore my testimony against his unprofitable discourse."

The Leominster Tract Association has pub

shed an account of a remarkable deliverance of the crew of the "Providence," a vessel that sailed from Sunderland, and was overtaken in a storm on her voyage home from the White Sea. The crew were at the pumps when the deck was vept by a large wave. In reply to the captain's question, "Are you all there?" he was answered, "All here, but the ship is a mere wreck." The cabin being filled, all the provisions were spoiled, and the water on deck was gone, all they had left being a cask in the fore-castle and a few biscuits for a crew of seven or eight men. In his great trouble the master went below, and with all his knees in his cabin, to ask the Lord to show him what he was to do. On rising from his knees he fell into a kind of trance, in which was clearly shown him what kind of coast they could approach, and the creek into which they could find an entrance. He saw a high bold shore with a sugarloaf cliff and a long low reef beyond, and three men in a boat coming towards the ship. He went on deck and ordered the vessel to be loosened and set, which after much difficulty was done. The mate asked him what they were going to do, he replied, "We must get the ship before the wind, and make for some place where we may obtain water and provisions," they had made an observation that day, and found that they were a hundred miles from the coast of Norway. The captain, after watching a good part of the night, lay down to rest, and after a time was awoke by the mate, saying, "Here is a high bold shore ahead, sir!" On going on deck Captain H. knew it was the shore he had seen in his cabin the day before, and went aloft on the rigging-trees, telling the mate to steer according to his orders.

They sailed along the coast all that day, the wind often falling heavily; sometimes the ship was so near the rocks that the mate was alarmed. They passed two or three openings in the shore and felt inclined to put into one or other of them, but as neither of them was the place the captain had seen, they sailed on; but by and by he told the mate that he would soon see a sugarloaf rock and then a long low reef, and inside that a sloop's mast at the end of the reef, and a boat would come out with three men in it. All this soon came in view, greatly to the mate's astonishment. When they got to the end of the reef the boat came alongside the "Providence," and the captain asked the men if they could take him to an anchorage. One of them came on board and asked the captain if he had not had a pilot, and when he was told he had not, he put his hands together and exclaimed, "Then how have you got in here? you must be a good man, God has been your Pilot." They brought the ship to anchor by the fishing craft, and the men soon supplied the strangers with water, bread, and fish. The fisherman took the captain to his home, and when he told the wonderful facts to his wife, she also exclaimed, "You must be a good man, God has been your Pilot!" In the morning the pilot took Captain H. to the top of a mountain, from which he could see several creeks, and asked him, pointing to some of them, if he came in by any of those? And when, after hearing it was none of those, he showed him the right one, and was told that it was the one he had entered by, he told him it was the only one by which it was possible to gain an entrance to that coast, again exclaiming, "You must be a good man, for God has been your Pilot."

After a good deal of delay, during which time the "Providence" had been given up as lost at home, she was put into the best sea trim possible, and sailed for England, where she arrived in safety to the joy and satisfaction of all connected with her heaven-preserved and now restored crew.

Captain H. could indeed say, "This poor man cried, and the Lord heard him, and saved him out of all his troubles."

The Remains of Pharaoh.

From the published accounts of the remarkable discovery, within a few years of the mummies of some of the ancient Egyptian kings, the following description is condensed. It is taken from articles in the Christian Advocate and Sunday School Times.

In the summer of 1881, the Khedive of Egypt became acquainted with the exact locality of the hiding-place in which thirty-six mummies of kings, queens, princes, and high priests had been long entombed. The existence of this hiding-place had been for some time suspected, on account of the sale, in Cairo and elsewhere, of many Egyptian antiquities of great age, but the secret of the source from which these antiquities came had been so providently kept by the discoverer, that it was only after threatening and imprisonments and other Eastern methods that the exact locality became known. Under the direction of Emil Brugsch, subconservator of the Museum of Bulak, these mummy cases and mummies were removed to the museum, and the silence of thirty centuries was broken and a new chapter written in the history of desolate Egypt.

Some ancient Egyptian engineer had constructed in the limestone cliffs of Deir-el-Bahari a shaft 6 feet square and about 37 feet deep. At the bottom of this shaft a long passage turned off toward the west, then abruptly toward the north, ending at last in a kind of oblong chamber, 23 feet long by 13 feet in breadth. Here the greater number of mummies were found. As soon as Emil Brugsch had arrived at the bottom of the shaft, and at the very entrance of the long passage, he came in sight of a yellow-and-white coffin, then another of the seventeenth dynasty, and then more and more, while the ground was so littered with vases, funeral urns, statuettes, and other Egyptian funeral gear, that the explorer scarcely knew where to place his hands and feet. Few men in the whole history of the world have ever had such emotions as this explorer had when examining these caves. By the dim light of a candle he read the names of the greatest kings of Egyptian history. Among these mummies were those of Seti I., of his extraordinary son, Ramesis II, with that of Ramesis III, and that of Thotmes III., the obelisk maker. Here was the king who knew Joseph; here was the father of Pharaoh's daughter, and the founder of the dynasty that dwelt in Zoan.

In the summer of last year, 1886, the mummy of Seti I., and that of his extraordinary son, Ramesis II., with that of Ramesis III., and that of Thotmes III., the obelisk-maker, were divested of the resinous shrouds they were buried in, and the inscriptions were read with skilled knowledge of the characters the priests had used in the funeral rites and liturgies. So now there is visible in the Museum at Cairo a long row of mummies, whose very names fill our entire imagination with amazement.

Let us try to realize what is opened on the Bible-loving race of men the world over. How fantastic is the conception, yet it may be a literal fact, that we can yet look upon the lips which said to Jacob the words, "How old art thou?" Nay, we can look upon the hollow eyes where once flashed the meanness with which another Pharaoh said: "Every son that is born ye shall cast into the river." How real such revelations make these Pharaohs to become! What confirmations of Scripture are appearing, now close at hand! Over those silent graves a hundred generations of men have walked, unconscious how near they were to valuable discovery. Tourists have gossiped among the ruins of the temples at Luxor, with no suspicion that the still forms of a hundred sovereign rulers of lost ages were slumbering amid their spices just underneath the rock they trod upon. We did not have to talk about them as if they were Mars and Saturn and Jupiter and Vulcan; their story was not a poetic myth; they were real beings, and had been waiting some thousands of years in the dry sands of their own land for our service.

How is this? The Egyptians believed that each soul of a human being was wont to return sometimes to the body it used to inhabit. They therefore embalmed the corpse speedily after death, with the view of preserving it absolutely through the eternity of years. There have been found, sculptured upon the walls of temples, certain very significant representations of their ideas on the subject. A winged insect with a human head, is just flitting down toward the coffin-lid, underneath which is the shrouded form preserved in its spices; outside, upon the case, is painted the countenance in bold outlines, seeming just glad to give a welcome with its wide-opened eyes, as it used to give.

Remember that there might he said to be almost no rain in Egypt. The Nile River gives all the moisture the fields have with its annual inundation; but this covers only the plains, the hillsides are dry always. Hence it results that when the corpses of the dead were properly embalmed, and then deposited in one of these dry receptacles of the rocks beneath the unchanging sands, they might be considered well-nigh imperishable. It need give no surprise whatsoever to us that the bodies of veritable men and women, who lived four thousand years ago, are still on the earth, unchanged in lineament and feature. Not unlikely there are countless thousands of those who saw Joseph on his throne in Egypt now lying undisturbed in their seamyore coffins, their hands on their breasts, their eyes closed, their funeral garlands still twined. And so just now, that old dreamy, dreary land, which is first and even foremost in this inspired history, has come forth into conspicuousness because of its deadness. We have lived through the ages, till, in these last few months, there is offered before the entire world a new species of logical argument, a fresh kind of evidences of Christianity.

It is likely that some Bible students will grow confused over the recurrence of Pharaoh's name here at such widely extended periods through the Old Testament, and also the New. It needs to be borne always in mind that "Pharaoh" was not a man's name, but the name of an office. It was like the word "Czar" among the Russians, like "Caesar" among the Romans; it was the title of the king in all the dynasties.

That Pharaoh who troubled Abram so vexatiously about his beautiful wife lived and died two hundred years before that Pharaoh arose whose dreams gave Joseph such difficult problems to solve with his interpretation; and it was two hundred years more before that Pharaoh arose whose oppressions in the brickyards forced the Hebrew slaves into rebellion. Then there was another king, Ramesis II., who made the Israelites still more wretched; and another still, Menephtah, who tempted God, received the ten plagues, and whose host was overthrown in the Red Sea. We must avoid confounding these men with each other now.

Doctrines.

For "The Friend."

In attending a meeting in Philadelphia on First-day morning of the week of our late Yearly Meeting; and listening to a communication in which there was a mixture of truth and error; and in which the doctrines of salvation were so imperfectly presented, as to lay a foundation for serious mistakes in the minds of those who accepted the teachings; the writer was impressed with a feeling of the loss sustained by our Society for the want of more discrimination in some meetings in sending forth ministers to labor who are not settled on the right foundation themselves; and for the want of more efficient care on the part of the elders and other concerned Friends in the meetings which are visited by such, to prevent the audiences who are gathered on such occasions from having spread before them as the principles of Friends' views which are either wholly or partially contrary to our doctrines.

It is a very serious evil for a company of thoughtful persons, many of them not members of our Society, to be thus led to suppose that the doctrines of Friends are different from those really held by us; and to have ground to believe that we are departing from those spiritual views of religion so prominently proclaimed by our early members. It is equally distressing to reflect that some of our own members, especially the younger ones, may be imbibing unsound sentiments.

One form of erroneous teaching, to which the writer feels desirous of calling attention at this time, is that which so applies the Scripture testimonies to the necessity of faith in Christ, as to lead the hearer to suppose that he is saved whenever by the exercise of the natural power of belief which man possesses, he accepts the truths recorded in Scripture concerning Christ; thus leaving out of view the indispensable necessity of being washed, sanctified and justified by the Spirit of our God; of experiencing the new birth, the change of heart and character, without which no one can see the kingdom of heaven; of obeying the teachings of that Divine Grace "which bringeth salvation" and which teacheth to "live soberly, righteously and godly."

That faith which is saving in its nature necessarily includes true obedience, without this the Apostle James shows that what is called faith is "dead,"—has no spiritual life and virtue in it.

The Apostle Paul speaks of our being saved from wrath through Christ; and he adds: "If, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life." This implies, that although through the death and sufferings of the blessed Redeemer, we are placed in a capacity for salvation, yet that our full salvation is effected by the "life" of Christ, that is his Divine power and spirit operating on the heart. This is that spiritual blood by which the saints are purified and made meet for an entrance into the holy city; and which flows from Christ, the inexhaustible fountain.

In accordance with this is the language of Isaac Pennington, in one of his letters:—

"This is it which I have daily experience of in my heart; that it is no less than the light of the everlasting day, in which the renewed man is to walk, and no less than the life of the Son, (whom God gave a ransom for sinners,) which can quicken man so to do; and none but Christ, none but Christ, by his life revealed in the soul, and blood shed there to wash it, can save the poor sinner from sin, wrath, and misery; and my hope is not in what I have done, do, or can do; but, in what He hath done without me, and also doth in me."

To bring together in one church evangelical and unevangelical opinions would make, not a denomination, but an amalgamation, a conglomeration, that could never succeed practically, or have spiritual power.—Jos. Cook.

PATIENCE.

BY M. R. H. HAZEN.

Dear heart, and does thy sail impatient wait
Upon the silent sea,
With not a breath of wind that, soon or late,
May wait thee safely to the harbor gate,
Where thou wouldst gladly be?

Be patient, heart, and wait thy time to go;
Be sure the hour will come
When either on the tidal ebb or flow,
Or when the winds may soft or fiercely blow,
Thy God will guide thee home.

'Tis easier far to reef thy fresh'ning sail
Upon a stormy sea,
To hold within thy hand the rudder frail,
And bravely face the coming of the gale,
Than safe and idle be.

Thy God, be sure, has set some task for thee,
All idle though thou art,
Some task whose outward form thou mayst not see,
Some work of hidden meaning, though to thee
It seems an idle part.

So heart, dear heart, be patient still, and wait
Upon the silent sea,
In God's own time the wind, or soon or late,
Will wait thee safely to the harbor gate,
Where thou shalt happy be.

A HEBREW PROVERB.

BY MIRIAM K. DAVIS.

See the swarthy toilers sweating under Egypt's burning skies,—

Not a moment for repining, not a breath to spare for sighs;
Hope itself so long quiescent, they forget it has not fled;

Faith so long reviled and taunted that it surely must be dead.

Human strength can bear these burdens till they weight
it to the ground,

Human patience still endureth, till deliverance is found;

When the task ordained by Pharaoh heart and soul and sense benumbs,

"When the tale of bricks is doubled, Moses comes."

Homely toil and soddren longings—what to us such lowly things?

Shall the soul that strives for freedom o'er them droop her fluttering wings?

Ay! for never work so lowly but of life it is a part;
Never trials grow so petty but they fret the human heart.

As the winter follows summer, after labor cometh rest,
And the Voice divine has told us that the mourner shall be blest.

Surely, though he needs no herald, clash of arms, or beat of drums,

"When the tale of bricks is doubled, Moses comes."

Comfort ye, whose hearts impatient long for better things than these;

In the future waits deliverance that no mortal vision sees.

Though the daily task oppress thee, others yet have labored more;

Thou canst bear, and strength not fail thee, what has been endured before.

Something dear has still been left thee, as the drudg-ing thousands see

Stars unclouded shine in promise of the nation yet to be;

And, if all but faith should fail thee, thus the sage his wisdom sums:

"When the tale of bricks is doubled, Moses comes."

THE NIGHT MIST.

All the night long the gray, embracing mist
Has held in tender arms the tired world;
The sleepy river its soft lips have kissed,
And over hills and meadows it has curled.

Its white, cool finger it has gently placed
On weary stretches of deep, drifting sand;
The noisy city and the far-off waste
Have felt the benediction of its hand.

The drowsy world rolls on toward the day;
The fresh, sweet wind of morning softly blows;
The willing mist no longer now may stay;
With first expectancy of dawn it goes!

—Margaret Deland.

"Esteem them very highly which labor among you, and are over you in the Lord, and admonish you."

They who are dedicated to the service of the ministry, and bear in their foreheads the inscription of holiness, having to conflict with all the struggles of the private soldier, may sometimes manifest weaknesses inconsistent with the dignity of the holy office; and he who yet remains to be "the accuser of the brethren," will not fail, where he can under any disguise gain admittance, exceedingly to expose and magnify these; and would lead, by little and little, to despise the Lord's anointed, "to speak evil of dignities," and lightly to esteem the sacrifices which the Lord hath commanded to be offered in the holy place. It is not in my heart to justify, to excuse or extenuate, the failings and imperfections of the foremost rank in the Lord's army; I know it deeply behooves them above all others, to walk circumspectly, to make straight steps to their feet, to be examples to the flock; and I am verily persuaded, there are none who feel more deeply for their offences,—none more deeply bowed under the humiliating sensibility of their own unworthiness,—none more frequently covered with blushing and confusion of face than these. I do not want to excuse or explain away their failings; but I want to impress a proper regard to the dignity of the holy office; I want to revive that ancient precept, "Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of thy people."

"God forbid," said David, "that I should put forth my hand against the Lord's anointed." If weakness appear, if the enemy prevail in any little matter, Oh! "tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Askelon, lest the daughters of the Philistines rejoice, lest the daughters of the uncircumcised triumph." Oh! did but the people know, were it but possible for the uncircumcised to consider the secret travail of their spirits; the painfully distressing conflicts which these have passed through, and which yet await them; how often they have wandered in the wilderness, "with their hands upon their loins;" what they have to pass through in the weeks of preparation, while eating the roll of prophecy and lying on their sides; how often such are covered with sackcloth, and have secretly to muse on the contents of the roll, wherein is written "lamentations, and mourning, and woe;" were it possible, I say, for such who are yet whole, not having yet fallen upon that stone which the Lord hath laid in Zion for a foundation, and been broken thereby, and enabled to offer the sacrifices of a broken heart; were it possible for those who have not trodden the arduous path of regeneration, to consider these things, they would not need to be reminded to mark such whom the Lord set over them; "to esteem them very highly," to honor them with double honor for the works' sake, because they watch for your souls, as "they that must give account in the day of the Lord Jesus." Permit me to express some degree of jealousy, lest, instead of this esteem, regard, and double honor, there is a murmuring, unthankful, gainsaying spirit which is for condemnation; for whilst I was musing on these things, the exceedingly unhappy case of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, was brought into and affected my mind, and the language of their complaint was brought to my remembrance, "Ye take too much upon you, seeing all the congregation are holy every one of them, and the Lord is among them, wherefore, then, lift ye up yourselves above the congregation of the Lord." Thus, through the seduction of him who blinded their eyes and hardened their hearts, they murmured against the meekest of all men, and the friend of God. Ah! poor return this for all that good and deliverance which he, as an instrument, had wrought for them in bringing them out of Egypt, in bearing them in his bosom, and so frequently and availingly interceding for them with the Almighty. But the Lord pleaded for him against these men, and destroyed them by a remarkable destruction. I mention this instance as it simply arose without any charge of application, leaving that to the Divine witness in your bosoms, to which I recommend every one of you, in order that you may be enabled to reap the caution and benefit intended by these broken hints.—John Thorp.

In Toledo (Ohio) recently, a pass-book belonging to a poor man was picked up in the streets, containing an account of the man's current expenses for himself and family. The items, covering a period of two weeks, amounted in all to $10.69, of which $4.35 was for whiskey, beer and "drinks." Of fifty-nine entries on the book thirty-two were for liquor, of which whiskey took the lead to the amount of $2.05, then beer, $1.55, and "drinks" 75 cents. To offset this the family had at the same time $3.26 worth of flour. There were no luxuries, and 37 cents worth of herring constituted the meat bill. These figures indicate something of the inevitable wretchedness of the "homes" of such men who are under bondage to the abnormal drink appetite. It is from the many thus impoverished that the wealth of the few millionaire brewers and liquor sellers is derived.—National Temperance Advocate.

A Word in Season.—The following conversation is said to have taken place in a stage coach. A woman was talking very fast, in favor of attending the theatre. Among other things she said, there was the pleasure of thinking on the play before she went; the pleasure she enjoyed when there; and the pleasure of reflecting upon it when in her bed at night.

When she had finished speaking, a gentleman present, remarked, in a very mild way, "That there was one pleasure more, which she had forgotten to mention." She replied, "What can that be? surely I have included every thing, in the enjoyment beforehand, at the time, and afterwards." To which he answered, "Madam, the pleasure that it will give you on your death-bed."

She was struck with great surprise, had not another word to say. The consequence was, she never went again to the play; but followed those pleasures which could afford her satisfaction on her death-bed.—Selected.

The dread of appearing singular no doubt induces many to pursue a course of conduct which their better judgment condemns; causing remorse of conscience, and bitter reflection in hours of sober thoughtfulness.

For "The Friend."

Days in Bermuda.

Third Month 30th, 1887. St. George's Island, where we drove to-day, is connected with this island by a long causeway. The roads over to it wind alternately down gentle slopes to the sea, and then up into the pretty country, and then again the next moment we are led by the shore of some beautiful sound with its exquisitely tinted waters. We stopped en route at the Walsingham caves, and they are very beautiful. The light from the entrance penetrates the emerald waters, which are so transparent, that the bottom, 40 feet beneath the surface, is clearly visible. Near by is a calabash tree, that sentimental people like to look at, because somebody says it is the identical one that the poet Thomas Moore wrote about in one of his poems. What interested me much more was an orange grove near at hand, with its golden, although not sweet fruit hanging in thick clusters; while all around were little coffee trees just now bright with their red berries. Upon peeling off the skin of these berries, there is revealed in each one, two of the familiar coffee grains of commerce.

St. George's is a slow old place, with crooked streets about 10 feet. These have on both sides the regulation stone walls, pierced by narrow gates that afford a glimpse of the pretty gardens and quaint, old, white houses beyond. The shops, the public buildings, and docks, all look as if slowly going to decay. We addressed the proprietor of one of the larger shops to ask a question, and he immediately gave us an example of Bermudian courtesy by shutting up his place and inviting us to walk around the town with him. These people put to shame our ideas of politeness. Our new acquaintance was very intelligent, and led us up the hill overlooking the town, from whence also a magnificent view can be obtained of the harbor, shipping, and innumerable smaller islands. We passed by the barracks where the English troops are quartered, and just alongside is the chapel for them. This is just the English way—to plant a chapel and barracks wherever she goes. After our walk, we invested in some mementoes of our visit, at an almost inaccessible little shop kept by a voluble old woman, who energetically protested as to the genuineness of her wares. St. George's is much frequented by vessels in distress, which stop here for repairs; but just now things are very dull, and we decided that it was about as sleepy and quaint a seaport as we had ever seen.

31st. The steamship sailed to-day for New York, so the only trace of modern activity has left us. About the only sounds we hear are those of children's prattle, the foot-falls of pedestrians on the hard road-way, the cackle of chickens, and occasionally the unmelodious see-saw of some donkey in the distance. One of the first phrases I heard after landing, was, "Oh, there is no hurry;" and in truth, if one does get in a hurry, the sooner he gets out of it the better. If I want a jug of water, I have by this time learned to sit down and read patiently until it comes; or if I send a man on an errand, I do not expect him to come back in an hour, but can calculate on his reporting to-morrow. This is a restful land, where the tension of artificial life can be loosened, and where steam and electricity do not introduce a pressure even on our recreation. The climate and habits of the people are all calculated to induce repose.

Fourth Month 1st. This morning our friend Captain White sent around to breakfast some delightful fresh strawberries. After the meal we started out on an expedition to the coral-reefs. These surround the islands, and extend some 10 or 15 miles out to sea, and a trip over them in a row-boat affords an opportunity to examine the mysteries of the ocean bed, and observe the marvellous tints of the water itself. I cannot describe the colors of the latter on these beautiful shores. One moment it looks the most transparent pale indigo, fading away into an exquisite tint of emerald. Then again the many shades of blue and purple blend into what seems like liquid pearl. Whilst thus gazing on the wonderful painting of the Almighty Hand, one cannot but be awed at the thought of his works, even in this little world of ours, and exclaim as did one of old: "In wisdom hast thou formed them all."

Looking over the boat's side many beautiful sights are presented to the view. Of course coral abounds, some of it growing in long prongs like a deer's horns, some resemble coarse grass for color, and some so rounded and marked as to suggest the name of "brain coral." Here and there grow clumps of Finger Sponge, which is a fine textured sponge that is formed and looks like one's fingers. In many places the various hued grasses and sea-weeds, spread 10 or 20 feet beneath us, look almost like a well woven carpet. Down in the quiet depths of this vast aquarium there wander many kinds of fish, whose bright scales flash in the sunlight that penetrates their watery home. We recognize the big, black "Sea Pudding," the pretty Sea Anemone, and the curious Star Fish. At noon we landed by an old farm house close to the beach, and partook of a hearty meal, after which, lying down in an old boat hauled up under the shadow of some fragrant cedar and oleander trees, and fanned by the lovely Southern winds, I dreamed away an hour. I devoted this time to a practical fishing expedition, during which the "Silver-hook" accomplished wonders, and we then started for home. Our return was around by Ireland Island, where is the great dock-yard and the huge dry-dock and some grim gun-boats, all the property of the British government, and in striking contrast to the peaceful scenes we witnessed early in the day.

Bermuda is a great naval establishment. Here are repair shops, and docks to hold the largest men-of-war, and immense supplies, and enough powder and ammunition to stock many fleets. Out on one island is one of the largest depots of gunpowder in the world, and it is guarded with the most extraordinary care. All the commanding positions on the islands are strongly fortified, and mounted with cannon, which frown down on the lovely landscape and peaceful sea. The expenditure of money in building the solid masonry of these forts, and in arming them, has been prodigious. The red coated young soldiers of England wander everywhere. The visitor cannot but wonder and lament that these lovely little specks out in the great Atlantic should be so pervaded by the spirit of unholy war.

2nd. Some of the foods peculiar to Bermuda are very good, but I have yet to see the place that equals Pennsylvania in regard to good eating. The banana groves are everywhere, the fruit is small but tender and finely flavored, and is cooked in a variety of ways. The sweet potatoes are better than those of New Jersey. The papaw grows on tall trees, resembles in appearance a large orange, has the texture of squash, and although much thought of, is to me at least an insipid fruit. Onions are plenty, and are cooked into everything that the natives can possibly mix them with. Cattle do not thrive, and the best meat is imported. The Bermudians pride themselves on their fish, some of which are really fine, but they have nothing to compare to a genuine fresh Delaware River shad.

3rd. In travelling I always like to mingle with the people, and find these of Bermuda very approachable. I have listened to numerous tales of sorrow, caused either by the selfishness of men, or the insatiable waves of old ocean. Some of the poorer classes have many afflictions poured out to them, and although they manage to live very neatly, have hard work to earn a scanty livelihood; yet in spite of all this it is pleasant to observe in such as we have met with, a real reliance on Divine Providence and other evidences of genuine piety. The established church of England holds with an iron grasp many privileges calculated to oppress dissenters. There is an unhappy jealousy between the whites and blacks, caused by the latter working their way into colonial offices and obtaining extra educational advantages for their children. So it seems that in this little country are reproduced the politics, the passions, the hopes and fears that agitate many a larger and more prominent land.

4th. The New York steamer came in early this morning, but just like Bermuda, we will not get our mail till this afternoon. The newspapers tell us that last week the thermometer was below 20 degrees in the United States, but to us who have been living in a temperature ranging from 60° to 75° in the shade, such a difference almost seems impossible. The changes in climate vary very little from one season to another. There is never any frost, so the Bermudians never skate or go sleighing, and can keep out of doors and raise flowers all the year around.

A small party of us visited a school for colored children to-day. They were a bright lot, and their colored teacher plied question after question with the nervous energy of a yankee school-mistress. They were well advanced in studies for their years, and some of the maps drawn by them were finely executed in ink and colored crayons. Their personal neatness and intelligent appearance were altogether noticeable.

5th. Yesterday afternoon, seated in a village cart, propelled by a donkey just a trifle larger than a Newfoundland dog, with preposterous ears, but possessed of an amiable disposition, we started out for a ride. We were accompanied by a black dog, who, with smiling face and wagging tail, teased the numerous tethered goats he came across, but at the same time managed with great tact to avoid open conflict with many of his own race that offered warfare. Speaking of this donkey, reminds me that they are a Bermudian institution. Heavy burdens are imposed upon them; and I have seen one pull with the greatest ease a cart, two big barrels of potatoes, two large bags of cabbages, two crates of onions, and a negro about the size of the patient animal, surmounting the whole load. Writing about tethered goats, also reminds me that these people tether everything on their farms, although the live stock could not possibly wander in any direction without soon coming to the ocean. Cattle, goats, and donkeys are always tied, and we have even seen apparently mortified roosters and stately turkeys ignobly kept out of some adjacent tomato patch by a string attached to one leg. Among the country sights and odors are the many onion fields, that at this time of year present scenes of activity caused by bands of negroes pulling and packing that vegetable for the New York market.

To offset these peculiarities, we especially noticed yesterday the delightful perfume from the great white lily-fields, now in the height of their beauty; the delicious aroma of the cedar woods, or the sweet scents wafted across from some of the brilliant beds of flowers that every little while charm the eye. Truly this is a land where morning-glories blossom all through the day, and where roses and geraniums never cease to bloom. The dainty ferns and pretty vines cling gently to the hard stone walls, and over them arch the thick foliage of stately trees. We drove slowly into Hamilton as the shadows lengthened over the restful scene.

6th. Yesterday was pleasantly passed at a place called "The Flats," on the edge of Harrington Sound. Our last day in the country has been past, and certainly the flora deserves some slight attention before I conclude. The Royal Palms are the finest on the islands. The trunks of them resemble magnificent columns of grey marble for about 60 feet, and at the top wave the handsome canopies of leaves. The Sago Palm, Palmetto, and Coconut trees are plentiful, and offer grateful shade in many gardens. The Pride of India is conspicuous by reason of its size, and the clusters of seeds growing over them, which look like little yellow cherries. We have seen an immense India Rubber tree, with its huge branches spreading almost directly from the ground. The Bamboo, a thing of beauty, here and there lifts its slender stalk. Mahogany trees are scarce; but one famous one we looked at, reminded me by its massive and spreading branches, of our own beautiful oak. Although all these trees flourish on the islands, none of them are natives. Captains of vessels and men connected with the military station, have brought them from many distant lands from time to time. The Cedar is the only tree indigenous to the soil.

We pack up our trophies and expect to leave to-morrow morning. Among other things, I carry away specimens of coral, beautiful sea-moss, red coffee-berries, the shining tooth of a whale, a big tortoise shell, delicate shells, carved cedar wood, and a box of fragrant lilies. We shall miss these charming scenes and balmy breezes, but leave them with untold pleasure, in the remembrance that we are going home.

W. C. A.

The Doors were Shut.—Except when an assembly was expected, the outer door is always shut; and the porter called by the knock, asks "Who?" and waits for the answer. The porter opens to him whose voice he knows, and generally to no one else (see John 10: 3, where a more inclusive case is mentioned)—except on special orders from the master of the house. The outer door once passed, the doors within, leading to the general apartments, may usually be passed without ceremony, even if they are not standing open. But in a modern house, "the doors" that were "shut" for fear of interruption, would be first the outer door leading to the outer court, and then one (and perhaps more) door leading to the place of conference. The plural number, "doors," has an exact significance. In the verse in which this phrase occurs, the "evening," although inserted of course to mark the time, gives an additional reason for shutting the doors. The Old Testament gives some examples of pretty rough gatherings about the door of a house at evening. Until quite recently, in the cities of Palestine, it was dangerous to be out of doors after nightfall, not to mention the danger of being taken to the lock-up if found in the street without a lantern. The shutting of the doors at evening—shutting them fast till morning—was the rule throughout the cities.—S. S. Times.

A testimony lives in my heart to give to the memory of my true and worthy friend, William Edmundson. His service for God was great to the stopping of the mouths of gainsayers, and convincing many of the way of truth, directing and turning people's minds from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God; so that many became the seals of his ministry. In his travels he was very careful not to make the Gospel chargeable; and had a great zeal against the hiring teachers, who sought for their gain from this quarter, and looked after the fleece more than the flock.

Of his travels in America I have heard him say that he went through great exercises among them, both in body and spirit—there arising many vain and unruly talkers among them, who gave great trouble to the churches, and it fell to his lot often to deal with such. He was careful that the authority of truth in men's and women's meetings might be kept up, where the Lord's business was managed.

This eminent elder and overseer in the house of God, was one of, if not the first, instrument in the hand of God in this generation, to publish his everlasting truth through this benighted island [Ireland] and direct the inhabitants thereof to the shining light of Jesus Christ, the glorious Sun of righteousness. In the discharge of his service in the ministry, he persevered with constancy, faith and fidelity. Many times things would open in him to admiration, showing to rich men, and the eager getters of this world, the danger they were in of hurting themselves, by hindering their growth in the Truth.

When he was taken sick he sent for me, before my return from the Yearly Meeting at London; and the next day after I came home I went to see him, and found him very weak but very sensible.

I staid with him about four or five days, in which time I observed nothing proceed out of his mouth, save what showed his concern for Truth and the good order of it; and when I went to take leave of him, he said, "We have had many good meetings together, I believe we shall meet in heaven; and this he spoke very tenderly. In a few days he departed this life in a good old age and full of days, being aged near 85 years, and a minister 57 years; and I doubt not but he hath obtained a reward of durable riches, a crown of righteousness, and his memorial is blessed, for he was a father in Israel in his day.

Taken from a testimony concerning William Edmundson, by George Rooke.

Chinese Pawn-shops.—The shores of the river below Canton are dotted with villages, in each of which stands one conspicuous great solid square structure of granite, lined with brick, about four stories high. It looks like an old Border keep, but it really is the village pawn-shop, which acts as the safe store-house for everybody's property. Here in winter are deposited all summer garments, and when spring returns they are reclaimed; and as the winter garments which are then left in pawn are more valuable, the owner sometimes receives an advance of seed for sowing his crops. Here there is no prejudice against the pawning of goods. It is a regular institution of the country, and even wealthy people send their goods here for safe keeping. Some foreigners thus dispose of their furs in the summer season. All goods are neatly packed and ticketed, and stored in pigeon-hole compartments of innumable shelves, ranged tier above tier, to the very summit of the tall building, which is strongly protected both against fire and thieves; in fact, the latter must be mad indeed to face the danger of attacking a pawn-tower, on whose flat roof are stored not only large stones ready to be dropped on their devoted heads, but also earthenware jars full of vitriol, and syringes, wherewith to squirt this terrible liquid fire! As we approached nearer and nearer to the city, the number of these great towers multiplied, and I am told that there are in Canton upwards of a hundred first-class pawn-towers, besides a multitude of the second and third class, sufficiently proving how good must be their business; and it seems that notwithstanding the very high rate of interest on money lent, ranging from 20 to 36 per cent., the people prefer borrowing money from these brokers to applying to the banks.—Gordon's Wanderings in China.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Meteorite.—On the 27th of Eleventh Month, 1885, a piece of meteoric iron was observed to fall at Mazapil, in the State of Zacatecas, Mexico, at the time of the periodic star-shower supposed to be connected with Biela's comet. It weighed between 10 and 11 pounds, and was in the form of a flat irregular mass, covered with deep depressions. A thin black crust coats the surface, from which several nodules of graphite extrude. An analysis shows it to be composed of about 91 parts of iron and nearly 8 of nickel, in 100, with small portions of cobalt and phosphorus. It is conjectured that it may be a fragment of the lost comet of Biela, which has not been seen since 1852. The ranchman, Mijares, who saw it fall, thus describes the event:—

"It was about nine in the evening when I went to the corral to feed certain horses, when suddenly I heard a loud sizzling noise, exactly as though something red hot was being plunged into cold water, and almost instantly there followed a somewhat loud thud. At once the corral was covered with a phosphorescent light, and suspended in the air were small luminous sparks as though from a rocket. A number of people from the neighboring houses came running towards me, and they assisted me to quiet the horses which had become very much excited. We all asked each other what could be the matter, and we were afraid to walk in the corral for fear of getting burned. When, in a few moments, we had recovered from our surprise, we saw the phosphorescent light disappear, little by little, and when we had brought lights to look for the cause, we found a hole in the ground, and in it a ball of light. We retired to a distance, fearing it would explode and harm us. Looking up to the sky we saw from time to time exhalations or stars which soon went out, but without noise. We returned after a little and found in the hole a hot stone, which we could barely handle, which on the next day looked like a piece of iron. All night it rained stars but we saw none fall to the ground, as they seemed to be extinguished while still very high up."

The Sea-horse (Hippocampus heptagonus).—This curious little fish has a habit of converting its tail into a prehensile organ, coiling its tip around some submarine object, and then swaying to and fro, keeping the body erect. Other fishes move in a line parallel to the bed of the stream, but the sea-horse swims as if standing on its tail.

The male fish is furnished with a sac into which it receives the eggs from the female, and there it hatches them. The substance of this pouch appears to be absorbed by the young fishes, for it loses its thick and firm texture and becomes thin and flaccid.

Samuel Lockwood in The American Naturalist describes the habits of a Sea-horse which he prized as a pet and kept in an aquarium for several months. He supposed her food to be microscopic in its character, which she sucked in through her tubular snout. During the four months in which she lived in captivity, he could not detect any other source of nourishment. At one time her tank became badly infested with minute green algae which attached themselves to her scales and seemed to be rapidly spreading over her. On removing the little fish to a jar of water, she performed a series of movements on the clean sand at the bottom of the jar, which turned out to be successful efforts to scour off the green parasitical slime. Finally swellings appeared on each side of the face, which proved to be little gas-blisters. Relief was given by piercing these with a needle, and letting out the gas; but they returned and increased, and the buoyancy would raise it to the surface, and the little sufferer despite all help would float. One morning the poor sea-horse was found floating and dead.

Effect of Diet.—The finest pork made in the world is said to be that of the Madeira Islands, where the swine live largely on nuts.

An Adulteration of Butter.—Gelatin absorbs ten times its weight of water. By adding a portion of it to butter, the consistency of it is retained and the adulteration with water is not noticeable.

Items.

Dancing.—A writer in the Herald of Truth (Mennonite) objects to dancing as an amusement for the following reasons: It allows the dancers of different sexes to take liberties with each other, which decorum would forbid at other times. It cultivates vanity by a display of personal charms and graceful motions. As generally practised, it was against health, for "it delights in night and gaslight, crowds and excitement. It reverses all rational habits of life." It substitutes mere animal motions for intelligent social converse. It unfits the mind for serious thoughtfulness.

Religion in Mexico.—In an article on the "Trend of Mexican Thought," published in The Independent, Bishop John F. Hurst says, that Mexican independence and the Mexican Republic of to-day, are the creation of the descendants of the old Indian races and not of the Spanish conquerors. The Roman Catholic religion is associated in the minds of many of the leading men of Mexico with oppression and bondage; and the revolt from it has favored skeptical views. "They look with sympathy upon Protestantism, but the cause of this is not that they are believers in evangelical Christianity, but that Protestantism and liberty go hand in hand."

Roman Catholic Missionary Operations. The income for 1885, of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, is given as about $1,250,000. France contributes more than two-thirds of this sum. About four-fifths of the amount is spent on foreign missions; and the remainder is said to be used in counteracting the growth of Protestantism.

Non-polygamous Mormons.—There are some twenty thousand Mormons in Ohio, calling themselves Josephites, who believe in the Mormon Bible, of whom Joseph Smith, the son of the celebrated Mormon prophet, is the head, but who neither believe in nor practice the system of plural marriages. At a recent convention of these Mormons, held at Kirtland in that State, this Joseph Smith took occasion to denounce polygamy, and declare it to be an apostasy from the true Mormon faith.—The Independent.

Small Debts.—Debts scattered about in sums of two or three dollars will damage a man's reputation more than obligations for a hundred times the amount to one person. If the butcher, the baker, the grocer, the shoemaker, and the tailor are not paid, the man becomes odious in the community. Nothing will undermine respectable standing in a community like the non-payment of small bills.—Christian Advocate.

Prohibition Movement in Michigan.—At the election held a few weeks since, the proposition to introduce into the State Constitution of Michigan an amendment prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors for drinking purposes, was defeated by a majority so small as to inspire the advocates of the measure with strong hopes of success in a future movement. It seems probable, from the published statements, that a majority of the people were in favor of the amendment, but that the balance was so nearly even, that it was comparatively easy to overrule the popular will by fraudulent and illegal means.

Among the other reasons given in explanation of the result are the following: The diversion of temperance votes caused by the introduction of the question of High License; the fear that the amendment would interfere with the obtaining of wine for sacramental purposes; and a reaction from the extravagance of denunciation used towards the advocates of High License by a few of the injudicious advocates of the reform.

Be not disheartened because the eye of the world is constantly and earnestly fixed upon you, to detect your errors and to rejoice in your halting. But rather regard this state of things, trying as it may be, as one of the safeguards which a kind Father has placed around you, to keep alive in your own bosoms an antagonist spirit of watchfulness, and to prevent those very mistakes and transgressions which your enemies eagerly anticipate.—President Upham.

THE FRIEND.

FIFTH MONTH 28, 1887.

A Friend residing in a distant State, recently mentioned in a letter to the Editor, that a Norwegian, who travels about selling books, had spent a night at his house. He is a firm believer that there is no vitality whatever in the use of ceremonies—says it is a real work wrought out by the Holy Ghost in the heart that saves; but he wished to know the view taken by Friends of the word water in the language of our Saviour to Nicodemus, "Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." John iii. 5. Our correspondent requests, that if any exposition of the passage should be met with within the writings of the early members of our Society, it might be published in "The Friend" for the information of others.

In the life of Thomas Story, as published in Friends' Library, vol. x, p. 127, he mentions disputing with a priest, who referred to this text (which, however, he misquoted), to whom Thos. Story said: "There is no necessity to believe that the Lord Jesus spoke then of elementary water; but as there is a twofold operation of the Holy Spirit, the one compared to water, which is for the washing away of the pollution of sins past before conviction, and the other to fire, for destroying the root of it in us; as it is prophesied of Christ, 'He is like a refiner's fire, and fuller's soap; and He shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver, and He shall purify the sons of Levi, and purge them as gold and silver.'"

"The Spirit of Christ is thus compared both to water and fire, and their different effects and operations, to express the baptism of Christ, and work of regeneration as begun, carried on and perfected by Him."

The same view is set forth by Robert Barclay in the Tenth section of the Twelfth Proposition of his Apology, which treats on the subject of Baptism. In this, in replying to those who inferred the necessity of water baptism from the text already quoted, he says:

"If this prove anything, it will prove water-baptism to be of absolute necessity; and therefore Protestants rightly affirm, when this is urged upon them by Papists, to evince the absolute necessity of water-baptism, that water is not here understood of outward water; but mystically, of an inward cleansing and washing. Even as where Christ speaks of being baptized with fire, it is not to be understood of outward material fire, but only of purifying, by a metonymy; because to purify is a proper effect of fire, as to wash and make clean is of water; therefore the Scripture alludes to water, where it can as little be so understood, as where we are said to be saved by the washing of regeneration, Titus iii. 5. Yea, Peter saith expressly, 'That the baptism which saves, is not the putting away of the filth of the flesh.' So that since water cannot be understood of outward water, this can serve nothing to prove water-baptism."

A similar view of this passage has been taken by others than members of the Society of Friends. Adam Clark, a learned member of the Methodists, who advocate the use of water-baptism, observes on this passage: "It is not necessary, that by water and the spirit, (in this place) we should understand two different things; it is probably only an elliptical form of speech, for the Holy Spirit, under the similitude of water: as in Matt. iii. 11, the Holy Ghost and fire do not mean two things but one."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Secretary of the Treasury has issued the 149th call for the redemption of bonds. It is for $19,717,500 of the three per cents, and will mature on Seventh Month 1st.

Land Commissioner Sparks, in speaking of the purpose of the Secretary of the Interior to revoke the orders of the withdrawal of railroad indemnity lands, made by his predecessors from time to time since 1850, expressed the opinion that the revocation will result in 25,000,000 acres of land being thrown open to settlement and entry.

Judge Pardee, of the United States Circuit Court, in a case tried at Atlanta, has declared the Local Option law of Georgia to be constitutional. An appeal will be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States.

At the time of its adjournment, the Pennsylvania Legislature had passed 349 bills, 106 of which originated in the Senate and 243 in the House. The Governor signed 58 bills and vetoed 8, leaving 283 bills to be acted upon within the next thirty days.

A telegram from Bethlehem, Pa., says that the Salvation Army has for some time past been marching through the streets there every evening "yelling and singing." Collisions with the police were frequent. Finally, on the night of First-day, the 21st instant, "while parading noisily," the captain and one officer of the Salvationists were arrested. The next morning they were committed to jail "in default of fines, which the Justice imposed upon them for disorderly conduct and profanity."

The laws against the sale of liquor on the first day of the week, in New York, have been enforced for the past three weeks. As a consequence there was a general exodus from that city to the seaside, Jersey City, Hoboken, Brooklyn and Staten Island. It is estimated that 10,000 people went to Staten Island alone.

A despatch from Newburgh, New York, says forest fires are devastating the Shawangunk Mountains. Thousands of dollars' worth of timber have already been destroyed, and the damage to young timber is incalculable.

Forest fires are still burning in the Michigan peninsula, but are abating in many places. The losses through the wind storm of two weeks ago and these fires are estimated as high as $3,000,000.

According to a telegram from New Orleans, that city is now believed to have the best marine quarantine system in the world. "The effects of incoming passengers are exposed to superheated steam at 230 degrees, and vessels are subject to a germ-killing process that is accomplished in five hours without damage to delicate fabrics in the cargo."

Several cases of yellow fever are reported as having appeared at Key West, Florida.

While boring for natural gas a few miles from Lamar, Missouri, a vein of zinc has been discovered, said to be nine feet in thickness.

The great Lick Telescope, San Francisco newspapers fear, cannot be got ready for use by the 1st of Seventh Month, as had been anticipated, but will be much behind that time.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 410, which was 48 less than during the previous week, and 42 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the whole number 225 were males and 185 females; 208 adults and 202 minors; 57 died of consumption; 35 of pneumonia; 30 of measles; 28 of convulsions; 22 of diseases of the heart; 15 of obesity; 14 of marasmus; 13 of inflammation of the brain; 12 of paralysis, and 11 of diphtheria.

Markets.—U. S. 4½'s, registered, 109½; coupon, 110½; 4's, 129½; 3's, 101; currency 6's, 126 a 137.

Cotton was quiet, but firm, at 11½ cts. for middling uplands.

Feed was quiet, but steady, under small supplies. Sales of 1 car choice winter bran, at $21.25 per ton. Quotations: Bran, western wifner, fancy, $21.50 a $21.75; do., do. medium to choice, $20.50 a $21.25; and, spring, $19.50 a $20.50.

Flour and Meal.—Demand for flour was of a hand-to-mouth character, but the market ruled firm with moderate offerings. Sales of 125 barrels Pennsylvania family, at $3.90; 125 barrels Ohio, clear, at $4.25; 375 barrels do. straight, at $4.50 a $4.55; 500 barrels do. patent, at $4.75 a $5; 125 barrels do. do. fancy, at $5.25; 125 barrels, Minnesota, clear, at $4.25, and 625 barrels do., patent, at $4.85 a $5.10. Rye flour was quoted at $2.75 a $2.85 per barrel, as to quality.

Grain.—Wheat ruled a fraction lower; No. 2 red closing at 95½ cts. bid and 95½ cts. asked. Corn was dull and weak; No. 2 mixed closing at 46½ cts. bid and 47 cts. asked. Oats were quiet, but higher; No. 2 white closing at 37½ cts. bid and 37½ cts. asked.

Beef cattle were demoralized and ¼c. lower, at 3½ a 5½ cts.

Sheep were ¼c. lower; sheared sheep, 3 a 4½ cts.; sheared lambs, 4 a 6 cts.; spring lambs, $2.50 a $6 per head.

Hogs were inactive and ¼c. lower, at 7 a 7½ cts.

FOREIGN.—On the 20th instant a large meeting of Unionist members of the House of Commons was held in London. Lord Hartington presided. It was resolved to inform the Government that the feeling was almost unanimous against the old Bailey clause of the Crimes Bill. The meeting was strongly opposed to hampering the Government, and decided to give a hearty support to any reasonable scheme for shortening the debate on the Crimes bill.

Lord Rosebery speaking at Newton Abbot on the 23rd instant, said that what the English nation wanted was education in the facts of the Irish question. The nation had been grossly and constantly misled by foul libels or by worse means. Once it thoroughly understood the real issue, it would no longer hesitate.

It is announced that a new English coin, of the denomination of a double florin—two shillings—will shortly be issued.

In the French Chamber of Deputies, a debate on the report of the Budget Committee, which demands a reduction in the estimates submitted by the Government, was begun in the Chamber of Deputies on the 17th inst.

The Chamber, by a vote of 275 to 259, rejected the proposals of the Government and proceeded to discuss the order of the day.

Minister Goblet then announced that the Cabinet would resign. As soon as this announcement had been made the members of the Cabinet left the House.

Afterward a resolution was proposed by the Budget Committee affirming the necessity of adopting new plans for retrenchment. The resolution was adopted by a vote of 312 to 143.

The municipal authorities of Lyons, Rennes, Montpellier, Le Puy and other places have petitioned President Grévy to retain General Boulanger in the Cabinet. This retention would be regarded as a menace to the peace of Europe. De Freycinet has announced his inability to form a new Cabinet.

The sale of the crown jewels was concluded in Paris on Fifth Month, 23rd. The chief lot, a diamond headress was sold in sixteen pieces for 650,000 francs. The proceeds from the nine days' sales amounted to 6,864,000 francs.

General Geno, commander of the Italian forces at Massowah, has dissuaded the Government from carrying out its Abyssinian expedition, on the ground that the cost and difficulty of the undertaking would outweigh the probable gain.

It is officially announced that five men were executed on the 20th instant, for the recent attempt to assassinate the Czar of Russia. Six men and two women were sentenced to transportation to Siberia, for long periods, for complicity in the attempt.

A Berlin telegram to the Independence Belge, received on the 18th inst., says that the police at Novo Tcherkask have unearthed another plot to kill the Czar and that 30 arrests have been made.

William O'Brien, the Irish Editor and Member of Parliament, has been making speeches against the evictions of Lord Lansdowne, in various parts of the Dominion of Canada. At Toronto and at Kingston he was mobbed and his chest injured by missiles which were thrown at him. At Hamilton, while riding to his hotel, after making a speech at the Palace Rink, several shots were fired at him, one of which struck the driver and disabled his wrist.

Reports have been received in the city of Mexico from the regions of Northern Mexico recently visited by earthquakes. At Bahispe "no habitable house was left standing." Sixty persons were killed and many fatally injured. During the afternoon and night of the day following, there were 18 additional shocks. It was thought the number of bodies dug out of the ruins would reach 150. A volcanic eruption occurred in the mountains near Javos, flames bursting from the summit, and boulders being thrown up.

DIED, on the evening of the 21st of Fourth Month at his residence near Springville, Linn County, Iowa BARTON DEAN, in the 84th year of his age. He had been afflicted about a year with cancer, and at times his sufferings were extreme, but he bore them with Christian fortitude and resignation, being clothed with that spirit which sweetens the cup of affliction. His course through life was marked by consistency and by a diligent attendance of our religious meeting, always manifesting a lively interest in the affairs of Society. At times he experienced much poverty of spirit, and said it would be through unmerited mercy if he gained an entrance into the kingdom of heaven; and if he was favored to enter within the gates he would be content. A few days before his close he expressed, that all around him seemed bright, and that he was enabled to feel a consoling evidence that he should pass peacefully away, and that his passage from this world would be easy; said he was ready, willing and anxious to go, but hoped to be preserved in patience to the end. The calm, serene look of his countenance was a token of the state of his mind; and we reverently believe his desire was granted, for he went as one falling asleep, to that rest he so much longed for; and we believe the language applicable, "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord, from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors."

Selections from the Diary of Abigail W. Hall.

First Month 6th, 1856.—First-day evening. "Weary and heavy-laden" throughout this day, with many perplexing thoughts. Extend thy arm of deliverance, O dearest Father! and help me to come unto thee, so that my soul may live. Though I am brought very low, deliver, O Lord, "my soul from death, my eyes from tears, and my feet from falling."

Received last week, comfort and encouragement through the Lord's devoted servant, William Evans, who with other of our Committee were with us. Through unmerited favor I felt my state ministered unto. He with his dear brother spoke acceptably in our meeting, and William in our collection. Thus it is we are cared for, and have nothing to pay with.

8th. Greatly depressed; yet comforted some this morning, in remembering that our blessed Saviour was "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief." "The disciple is not to be above his master, nor the servant above his lord."

9th. Previous to retiring to bed last night, I had a season of retirement and quiet; such as I have not often been favored with. Oh, how my tears and prayers were poured forth for help and preservation.

10th. We had the company and labors of our dear friend, Samuel Cope: who, with his wife, came on purpose to attend our meeting. He was lively in communication; his concern for us all being, to occupy faithfully the talent or talents committed to us; so that at last we might hear the welcome language of "Well done," &c.

11th. During a season of quiet last evening, I could in sincerity appeal to Him who knoweth all things, that the whole bent and uppermost desire of my heart is that I may be kept faithful in my allegiance unto Thee; and that I may not be suffered to do any thing, that is displeasing in thy holy eye-sight, O Heavenly Father!

16th. Have been endeavoring since last entry in this book, to walk carefully; was helped yesterday morning to lift up my heart in prayer unto my Father in heaven. I note more particularly this instance from the certainty at that time given, that "the Spirit does help our infirmities." I was burdened and oppressed; and the Lord was good and drew near: for which unlooked for favor, my heart at this moment afresh returns thanks.

21st. Under the burden of my exercised soul, could have wished with dear S. Grubb, "that I had in the wilderness a lodging place, that no eye might see, nor ear hear, the imperfect state of a heart, the depths of whose distress Omnipotence only can fathom." Tears flowed, and prayers arose to the Father of all our sure mercies, that He would be pleased to condescend to my low estate, and help me through this day. Keep me, O Heavenly Father, in the way I should go; I lift up my cry unto thee.

24th. During our meeting I did strive to be rightly engaged. Though many intrusive thoughts assailed, I combated with them till near the close of the meeting; when help came, and I was enabled to lift up my cry unto the Lord, that He would be pleased to enable me "to make war in righteousness against my soul's enemies." The sincerity of this appeal was heard, my meeting ended comfortably. Enable me, O Heavenly Father! more and more to bring every thought into subjection unto Thee; that so all that impedes my good journey heavenward, may be put out of the way, and that there may be a running and not growing weary, a walking and not fainting, the few remaining days thou seest meet to continue me here. And when this chequered scene closes, may I be found worthy of a home above—"a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

28th. Since last note, I have passed through some sore conflicts; which have driven me closer home to my dear Lord and Master, than ever before. To Him is my cry put up by night and by day, that He would be pleased to look down in mercy upon me; and would open my eyes to see clearly the way wherein He would have me to go. For my encouragement, I have remembered the faith of the poor, helpless, diseased ones that came unto Jesus when in that prepared body; not one did so, but He healed them. And is not his power and willingness the very same now as then? Therefore cleave thou unto Him, oh, my soul! accompanied with this same faith which tended to the healing of these.

Second Mo. 21st. Meeting just over; I sat it through in great poverty of spirit. Just at the close, a little life sprung up, with, I now believe, a word to offer; but my nakedness stared me so in the face that I feared to venture; not remembering that the Lord is able for his own work; and that it is He "that worketh through us, both to will and to do of his good pleasure." "Will a man rob God? yet have ye robbed me," &c. A solemn query! and the reflection to me, at this time, truly so. When will I learn wisdom? "Quicken thou me according to thy word."

Third Mo. 6th. At our meeting to-day we had our dear friends, Samuel and Ann Cope. The former was engaged acceptably in the ministry; preaching that was teaching, and attended with power and life; without which all preaching is vain. I remembered early in the meeting the Scripture testimony concerning the star that went before the wise men, till it came and stood over where the young child was; also how "they rejoiced at the seeing of it, with exceeding great joy." A comforting and contriving evidence accompanied the labor of our dear friend, for which favor, how was my soul bowed within me! and even ventured to bend the knee and return thanks. Samuel's exercise did much relieve of a burden I have been travelling under, and which was known to no mortal.

19th. Have been enabled at intervals, both yesterday and to-day, to draw very near my Heavenly Father; and to feel as though his good Spirit was hovering over and around me and mine (the dear children). Let nothing separate me from the love of Christ. But rather that all the troubles and perplexities that attend my pathway, may only drive closer home unto Him, who is the preserver of my life, and the lifter up of my head, when it has seemed as if "the deep would swallow me up" and "the pit would shut her mouth upon me." Thou, O Lord, art stronger and mightier than all, and can deliver even unto the uttermost all that put their trust in thee.

25th. Feel as though I could adopt the following expressions of dear John Barclay's, which I accidentally opened to and are so befitting my own case: "My heart craves that I may abide in the patience, under the operation of proving and refinement, however severe it may seem, to wean me from this world and the wickedness thereof: not only from gross sins, but also from hidden and secret faults, and from the deepest insinuations of the enemy in my heart, in the semblance of an angel of light. I have had of late such a time of discipline, as had never before befallen me in my life; such apparent desertion of everything like good, such distress in consequence of outward circumstances of various kinds, that at many intervals, a deep conviction of the certainty of a future judgment, seemed to prevent my choosing death, rather than life. Yet through inexpressibly tender mercy, I have been preserved to this day in earnest seeking after the Lord, and with great desires after submission to his will, cost what it may."

In our collection for bed last evening, dear William Evans, who with two others are here on a little business in regard to the schools, was led to speak in a manner, as if answers to face in a glass, to my state. Oh the multiplied mercies of our Heavenly Father, still extended even toward such a poor worm as I. My heart was tendered under a fresh sense of this, even in the night season; when covenant was afresh entered into, "To commit the keeping of my soul unto the Lord, as into the hands of a faithful Creator." Dear William broke the silence which overspread our collection with: "Though the Lord give thee the bread of adversity and the water of affliction, yet shall not thy teacher be removed into a corner; but thine eyes shall see thy teacher, and thine ears shall hear a voice behind thee saying, this is the way, walk thou in it, when thou turnest to the right hand or to the left." From this, a proved and tried state was ministered unto; representing that the Lord's covenant is with the night as with the day, in seed-time and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter, &c. These very afflictions and trials we were passing through, would assist, if abode rightly under, in working out the great work for us. He pressed it upon us to keep close to, and keep a single eye unto our dear Lord and Master; then would he be given to see all the stratagems and snares of our soul's enemy. Though I may not have given the words correctly, the substance I have, and it lives in my heart as a memorial.

31st. Our afternoon meeting yesterday was a season of close proving. How tossed and distressed I felt! was comforted toward bedtime in reading some pages of the life of our dear departed friend and worthy elder, Daniel Stanton. How did I long that there were more such among us in this day! "For how has the gold become dim, and the most fine gold changed!" But praised and magnified be the ever worthy name of the Lord, there is still, notwithstanding the low state of things amongst us, a seed left, which will be counted as a generation.

Be pleased, O Heavenly Father! yet more and more to turn thy hand upon the little ones; those who are desiring, above every thing else, to be found serving Thee; that so there may still be those raised up, to whom thy blessed cause and testimonies are dear; and who are willing to go down into suffering with their suffering Lord. So do thou for them, for the sake of thy dear Son, thy blessed Saviour, for their own dear Sake, and for the sake of thy poor afflicted Church. We do know, that Thou art able to work; and no man can let it.

(To be continued.)

For "The Friend."

A Spring Ramble.

The first week or ten days in the Fifth Month were marked in our section of the country by an unusually rapid development of the vegetation which had been kept back by the cool weather that preceded it. Many of the trees, especially the maples, seemed almost at once to have become thickly covered with foliage. A short walk on the 12th of the month, down one of the village lanes, and along a bushy fence, and into the adjoining woodland, brought to view between 30 and 40 varieties of plants which had already come into bloom.

Of these the most abundant was the well-known Springbeauty, (Claytonia Virginica). This belongs to the Purslane Family, all of which have thick, succulent leaves, smooth and without teeth or lobes. The flowers of this family open in the sunshine, and are not long-lived, but are succeeded by others, so that the plant continues in bloom for a considerable time. From a tuberous root, the Claytonia sends up a single stem, bearing a pair of long narrow leaves, and above these the pretty white and rose-colored flowers, the fine leaflets of which are marked with deeper lines of the same color. The leaves in our species are from 3 to 6 inches long, but along the Allegheny Mountains, I have found another kind, the Claytonia Caroliniana, in which the leaves are much shorter, being one to two inches in length. In some parts of the open woodland which I traversed, the ground was almost covered with these flowers—thousands of them dotting its surface.

I was agreeably surprised to find several showy groups of the wild Geranium (Geranium maculatum) with its large, light purple flowers surmounting the erect, hairy stems. The leaves, too, are rather large, and split into five wedge-shaped divisions. I had not thought that it would be in bloom so early in the season—not reflecting that this species of Geranium has a root-stock that lives for several years, and therefore can send up its stems and flowers without waiting for the germination of last year's seeds and the slow process of growth from them. The word Geranium is derived from an old Greek name for Crane, and was given to this genus because the long beak of the fruit was thought to resemble the bill of that bird. Those who are familiar with the plant have often noticed these peculiarly shaped vessels, but there has not been time for them to be formed the present season.

Still more beautiful than the Geranium was the Wild Honeysuckle (Azalea nudiflora), a low bush richly ornamented with clusters of large pink-colored flowers, from which the long thread-like filaments of the stamens and pistils protruded. The leaves of the plant were still quite small, as they are preceded by the flowers. A few of these shrubs were growing along the bushy fence already alluded to; and near them some vigorous young hickory trees were just unfolding their leaves from the huge buds at the tips of the branches. The coverings which had enveloped the buds were several inches in length, and still formed a circle at the end of last year's shoots, and being slightly rose-colored, contrasted pleasantly with the green of the young leaflets which they had protected during the winter.

On an older tree of the Shell-bark Hickory (Carya alba) were hanging numerous slender catkins,—little strings studded with stamens,—which hung in clusters from the end of the twigs. The pistillate flowers which develop into the fruit, are placed near them, but are smaller and less conspicuous.

The oaks also were in bloom, and were adorned with pendent tassels, very similar in general appearance to those of the hickory. In these trees also, the flowers from which the acorns spring are little round bud-like bodies, covered with scales, and so small and inconspicuous as to be easily overlooked. They are placed at a little distance from the staminate flowers—but the latter are so numerous, and, when mature, send out such clouds of pollen, that abundant provision is made for fertilizing them, and for the production of a crop of acorns. As the fruit matures, the scales which covered the flower-bud thicken into a hard cup, in which the rounded nut or acorn fits.

The Chestnut tree is a member of the same botanical family as the oaks. When it is in bloom (which will not be till the middle of summer) the numerous catkins of the staminate flowers make it a conspicuous object in our forests, while the pistillate flowers (those from which the fruit comes) are so modest and unobtrusive that they are rarely noticed except by close observers or botanical students. The scales which cover these flowers enlarge and harden as the fruit matures, but instead of assuming a saucer-shape, like that in which the acorn of the oak rests, they form a thick, prickly bur enclosing the nuts.

The oak which I passed in my walk was a specimen of the White Oak, one of the most valuable of the whole genus. When in leaf, it may readily be distinguished by the character of the beautiful leaves, which are of a paler-green beneath than above, and deeply and rather regularly cut into long lobes with rounded ends, which are destitute of the teeth with which many kinds of oak-leaves are marked.

The prevailing colors of the flowers that I met with to-day, were white and yellow; although shades of blue were not uncommon, especially where the Hooded Violet (Viola cucullata) abounded, as it does almost everywhere, with its bright blue blossoms. Among the yellow flowers, a large butter-cup (Ranunculus) was most conspicuous in the meadows. Another species (Ranunculus abortivus) was abundant in the woods, but the flowers were small and inconspicuous, the whole plant very smooth, and the leaves, which sprang directly from the root, were round heart-shaped or kidney-form.

Another very pretty little plant, with five-fingered leaves, and bright yellow blossoms, with fine petals as in the strawberry, was trailing among the grass on the side of the path. It was the cinque-foil, or "five-finger," as the word denotes (Potentilla Canadensis). And in the low grounds, quite conspicuous was the yellow bloom of the Winter-cress (Barbarea vulgaris) a member of the Mustard family; Cruciferae, or "cross-bearing," so called, because all of them have four petals or flower leaves arranged in the form of a cross.

But I must stop my descriptions, lest my readers become more weary of following my steps, than I was in taking them. J. W.

For "The Friend."

Lord Shaftesbury.

The following account of the Inner Life of the late Lord Shaftesbury, has been mostly gathered from an English periodical whose editor had gleaned it from the three volumes of his Memoirs prepared by Edwin Hodder.

It has been thought that a brief sketch of the daily walk of this worthy man, would be interesting and instructive to the readers of "The Friend"—a man of whom it is said, that throughout a long life of intense labor in the defence of the poor, the helpless, and the oppressed, he never hesitated in the belief that he was "directly called of God" to his mission, and persistently, from youth to age, set "the great end of Christ" always before him.

In the extracts from the diaries which the work contains, every phase of thought and feeling, every movement of the times, every subject uppermost in men's minds throughout a period of sixty years, extending from 1825 to 1885, is noted by Lord Shaftesbury in chaste and beautiful language, and with the vigor of a man intensely in earnest. We propose in these papers to follow the course of the narrative, as it gives us glimpses into the soul of the man whose labors have done much to alter the condition of the working classes of England, the poor and the friendless, and to bring about the great social reforms which have marked the history of the past half century.

The simple story of the consecration of his life to God, while yet in early childhood, is full of important lessons.

Antony Ashley Cooper was born at 24 Grosvenor Square, on the 28th of Fourth Month, 1801. His mother was the daughter of George, fourth Duke of Marlborough, and his father was Cropley Ashley—who, in 1811, succeeded to the title of Sixth Earl of Shaftesbury; he was a cold, stern, hard man, engrossed in public duties; his mother was a thoughtless woman of the world, given up to fashion and gaiety, who saw but little of her children. The tone, the conversation, the amusements, the opinions, the spirit of the home, were all opposed to the early bent of the boy's mind, which from the days of infancy was in the direction of the career he ultimately made for himself.

But "God did not leave Himself without witness." There was in the household a faithful old servant, one Maria Millis, who had been maid to young Ashley's mother when she was a girl at Blenheim, in the home of her father. This old nurse took a tender interest in the gentle, serious, and neglected child committed to her care; she read to him the sweet story of old, and taught him the first prayer he ever learned, the music of which made melody in his heart even in old age. Into her ear he poured all his childish troubles, hopes, fears, and aspirations; and from her lips he received the only words of kindness, comfort, and Christian counsel he ever heard in those days. Although not seven years of age, there was a distinct yearning after God; and to his old nurse, Maria Millis, he was indebted "for the guidance and the training under which the longing of his heart ultimately developed into a settled and intellectual faith."

At the age of seven he was sent to the Manor House School, at Chiswick, about the worst place in the world to which a nervous sensitive child could be sent. He lived in constant terror from the cruelty of the elder boys, and suffered exquisite misery for years through the neglect and inhumanity of the principal of the school in failing to provide sufficiently, even the necessaries of life. Seventy-five years afterwards he visited the place, and he said, "The memory of it makes me shudder; it is repulsive to me, even now. I think there never was such a wicked school before or since. The place was bad, wicked, filthy, and the treatment was starvation and cruelty."

It was while he was at this place, that his old friend Maria Millis, "the only grown-up person in the world he really loved—the only one to whom he had dared to speak of the misery of his school-life—the only one with whom any bright and beautiful ideas were associated"—was called to her rest. Very grievously the boy mourned for her, and then, "without a soul on earth to whom he could go for comfort, he spread his sorrows before the heavenly Friend whom she had taught him to regard as full of pity and tenderness."

At the age of twelve, young Ashley was removed from the Manor House School, and happier days began to dawn upon him at Harrow, where he was placed under the care, and in the house of Dr. Butler, the head master. Silently, slowly, but surely, the divine life had meanwhile been growing in the midst of what would have seemed the most adverse circumstances, and without any of those influences which are generally considered all-important to nurture it.

After leaving Harrow he spent two years under the care of a clergyman in Derbyshire, and at eighteen he went to Oxford, where he greatly distinguished himself by his energy and perseverance. Three years later he took a first class in classics, and in 1826 he entered Parliament.

Throughout these years he never forsook his habits of prayer, and of diligent study of the Scriptures; and in a journal he notes his thoughts and hopes, his plans and aspirations.

There were numerous temptations surrounding Lord Ashley in the early years of his parliamentary life. He had all the advantages of a singularly attractive person, a well-stored mind, a high social position, a fascinating manner, and troops of friends. The great Duke of Wellington sought his company, and loved to have him at Strathfieldsaye. Lord Brougham was loud in his praises; Southey was his constant correspondent; leaders of men in all the higher walks of life were among his friends and companions, and all society threw open its doors to him. Amid them all, the young member of Parliament calmly pursued his way, travelling on toward the light. What his ideas of duty in the public life he had chosen for himself were, may be gathered from his opinion of what a Prime Minister should be. "I have decided in my own heart," he wrote in his journal, "that no one should be Prime Minister of this great country unless deeply imbued with religion; a spirit which will reflect and weigh all propositions, examine each duty, and decide upon the highest; be content to do good in secret, and hold display as a bauble compared with the true interests of God and the kingdom."

In 1828, the Duke of Wellington was called upon to form an administration, and he at once wrote to Lord Ashley offering him an appointment in the Government as Commissioner of the India Board of Control. The spirit in which he entered upon his new duties is thus shown:—"God protect me and encourage me in a career of honor and right-mindedness, and may He give me also discretion and calmness to reflect; and now that office can no longer be avoided, I pray the Heavenly Father to give me the will to discharge my duty, and the strength to perform it; to found all in his glory, and, by seeking the welfare of mankind, to render my public and my private thoughts a means of furthering the love of His religion." From that time forth, everything he undertook was entered upon in the same devout and earnest religious spirit.

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 132.

EARLY VISITATION,—NECESSITY OF FAITHFULNESS.

Those quite young in years are often made sensible of the visitations of the Grace of God, showing them those things in their conduct which are displeasing to their Heavenly Father, and awakening a sincere desire to become his obedient children.

It is related of Martha Routh, a ministering Friend of England, who visited America near the beginning of the present century, that being placed at a day-school where she had not much of the company of other Friends' children, she deviated from the simplicity of language inculcated by her parents at home. Sometime afterwards, two Friends, ministers, came to visit the families of the meeting to which she belonged: "At which," she says, "I greatly rejoiced though I did not expect to be so found out and melted down under that ministry as proved to be the case. After reminding us who were children of the example of our parents, how carefully we had been brought up, and the steady attention manifested in the discharge of their duty, that we might act consistently with the principles of Truth; they said, 'What a loss and pity it would be, if any of us should deviate therefrom when out of the sight of our parents, in not using the plain language'—which I well knew was my own case. I seemed like one broken to pieces, and could scarcely forbear weeping aloud.

"As soon as I could get to my cousin Mary Beadley—who had learned to write before me—I got her to write me a letter, which I directed to a scholar to whom I was much attached, expressing a hope that she would not be offended that I could not any longer give her the title of 'Miss'; but must call her by her proper name, as well as the other girls, though I should love them no less but rather better, because I knew it was acting contrary to the mind of my parents, and the way in which Friends spoke to one another.

"When I went to school again on Second-day morning following, it was under as much weightiness of spirit as mind or body could well bear; but going early, few were in the school, and I took my seat close to that of my governess, whom I loved much. When she came in, she spoke to me in her usual kind way, as did the other girls, and took no notice of my change of language or more serious deportment."

A writer in "The Journal" of Philadelphia, who was born a member of the Society of Friends, in the limits of Bush River Meeting in South Carolina, in giving some reminiscences of his early life, relates the following incident:—

"I remember about this time, being left in the nursery by my parents under the care of the housekeeper, on a First-day afternoon, whilst they made a social call, when my choleric temper was soon quite aroused by having my childish privileges curtailed, as I thought, by my brother and sister. I immediately retired in disgust to the kitchen to vent my angry feelings in a boyish pout, but in this state, like Elijah, when the fire and the whirlwind had passed, I heard a still small voice saying: "Now this is all wrong; go right back to thy brother and sister, overcome this angry feeling, and enjoy thyself in their company and their innocent sports and plays." Then I immediately, like Paul, conferred not with flesh and blood, but obeyed the injunction. O, the sweet peace that accompanied it. Nothing since has ever surpassed its serenity and heavenly enjoyment, easing every burthen and making all things light, not only for that afternoon, but through all my boyish labor of the following day. This peace of mind was afterwards lost by boyish unfaithfulness."

The remark, that the peace of mind which followed submission to the Divine command was afterwards lost by unfaithfulness, is alas, a too common experience of poor, frail man. There can be no advance in our heavenly journey, nor any of that sweet comfort which attends a sense of the Lord's approval, without filial obedience to what He requires of us—without seeking in all things to know the Divine will, and to be conformed thereto. Sad indeed are the results of an obstinate refusal to bow in submission to the Great Ruler of all things; and of rejecting his government, which is designed to promote our own happiness. A striking example of this is furnished by the case of a young woman in Philadelphia, many years ago, a member of a wealthy family there. She believed it required of her to appear as a minister, but was unwilling to yield to the requisition; and, having long resisted it, was brought into great distress of mind, because of her disobedience. After a time, the call to this service was withdrawn; and then, hoping to obtain relief from her mental anguish, she presumed to offer unbidden sacrifices. But these appearances in the line of the ministry brought no comfort to herself or to her friends.

Her mind probably became unsettled by her anxiety and distress; and her temper being unrestrained, grew to be so unreasonable and violent, and her demeanor so disagreeable, as to unfit her for much social intercourse with others. For a long period she remained most of the time in her own room, waited upon by an Irish nurse, who felt such a contempt for her patient, that her usual term of designation was "the old thing."

The late Jane Pierce, out of her feelings of compassion and Christian interest was accustomed to visit her frequently. On one occasion a female Friend, a minister of the Gospel, being at her house, Jane took her to visit the poor creature. After a time of silence, the Friend addressed the invalid with a Gospel message, in which she expressed her belief, that a renewed visitation of the love of God would be extended to her soul, and that a door of mercy would be opened before her. Jane Pierce could scarcely believe that this would be the case, so great had been the fall of her neighbor. But the event proved that the prophecy was a true one. One morning the nurse came for Jane, desiring her to come and see the sick woman, of whom she then spoke in terms of respect, no longer calling her by any opprobrious term. She said she thought she was going to die, for she had been praying all night! Jane went and found her greatly changed; she had become gentle as a lamb, and so continued till her close came.

This is a striking instance of the long forbearance and abundant mercy of our Father in Heaven, who willett not that any should perish, but that all should return, repent and live. But how sad it is to think of the years of misery, and of the loss of happiness and of usefulness, which her disobedience caused this poor woman!

The Journal of Stephen Grellet mentions a remarkable instance of the visitations of Divine Grace to the young—which was related to him by Prince Alexander Galitzin of St. Petersburg in 1819, as having recently occurred in Finland.

“Some children from seven to nine years of age, were so brought under the sensible influences of the Spirit of God convincing them of their sins, that on their going to and from school, they retired into the woods, and there put up their prayers to the Lord with many tears. By degrees their number increased. The parents of some of them found them thus engaged, and with rebukes and stripes dispersed them; but the parents of others who had noticed the increased sobriety and good behaviour of their children, encouraged them to meet together in their houses, and not to go out into the woods. The children did so, and some of these parents observing their religious tenderness, and hearing their solemn prayers to the Lord, the Redeemer, and the Saviour of sinners, felt themselves strong convictions of sin. They joined their children in their devotions, and a great reform took place in that part of the country. This excited the angry feelings of the priest, who was a bad man and a drunkard. He went to the magistrate to enter his complaint against both children and parents; the prosecution issued in their being all sent to prison. They had been some months in confinement, when Prince Alexander Galitzin heard that children were in prison on account of religion. He thought it so strange an occurrence, that he sent confidential persons to inquire into it; they found so much religious sensibility and tenderness in the children, that they were greatly surprised, especially at the simplicity with which they related how they had been brought under trouble because of their sinful hearts, and how they had felt that they must pray to the Lord Jesus Christ, who alone could forgive them, and enable them to live in a state of acceptance before God. Being inquired if their parents or others had not put them on doing this, they said that so far from that, they were afraid that their parents or any one else should know how it was with them, that they retired privately to the woods to pray and cry with tears unto the Lord. The parents also stated that the children had been the instruments of bringing them to a sense of their sinful lives, and to seek to the Lord that he might give them a new heart, and pour forth his Spirit upon them. Moreover, it was found that the conduct of these people and children had been such during their imprisonment as to comport with their Christian profession. The prince ordered their release, and had the priest and magistrates severely reprimanded and removed from their offices. The Emperor, having heard of all this, and of the great suffering to which these families are reduced in consequence of their long imprisonment, which took place last year before harvest, ordered that all their losses should be liberally made up to them, having ample provision for their present support. The prince told us of some other instances that had occurred lately in Russia, of children who have been brought under the influences of the Holy Spirit, and rendered instruments of good to their parents and others; they felt it their filial duty so tenderly to plead with them, on account of their drunkenness, swearing and other vicious habits, as to prevail upon them to forsake their evil ways.”

Christ's liberty is obtained through Christ's cross: they that would be his free-men, must be his bonds-men, and wear his blessed yoke. His liberty is from sin, not to sin; to do his will, not our own—no, not to speak an idle word. It is not I that live (saith the Apostle) but Christ that liveth in me, who had set him free from the power of sin, and brought immortality to light in him; whence he learned thus to triumph: “O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?”—William Penn.

LONELY!

BY D. H. R. GOODALE.

The four-years' boy above his blocks
Watches his castle as it rocks,

With wandering eyes—feels only
The too loud ticking of the clock—
Starts at an unexpected knock,
And wide-eyed, pale, his mother greets,
Whom at the open door he meets.
He throws himself into her arms,
And tells him all his vague alarms,
With “Oh! I was so lonely!”

The dreary morning breaks again,
And with it wakes a bitter pain,
That lingering sleep dulled only:
The wife, whose heart lies with the dead,
Reluctant lifts her heavy head,
Sees the new day look coldly in
While she its journey must begin;
Must pass again the hopeless round,
For many a year all joyless found.
Her life is left so lonely?

The old man leans upon his cane,
And sees his life go by again,
Now trembling, sad and lonely;
His strength is spent, his eyes are dim,
And not a soul to care for him
Is left of all his kith and kin.
There is no door will take him in,
Why did his boys all leave him go?
And his old wife before him go?
He left alone—he only.

The child, the wife, the poor old man,
Must find their comfort as they can,
New hope or memory only.
Can these console? Shall Destiny
A thing of worn-out garments be,
Affections torn and spent, the heart
At last insensate to its smart,
And all the universe to me
Mere emptiness and mockery;
I dying here so lonely!

Yes, this is all, if life must be
But what we touch and what we see,
And outward flowering only.
If depths of being underlie
And love surround the mystery;
If help Divine meets human pain
And transient loss is endless gain,
In sharpest stress if God draw near
And in the dark new suns appear,
Ah, then, who need be lonely?

MY TREASURES.

Selected.

Homely and humble, these my cottage rooms;
No fine upholstery, or gilded walls,
No woven threads from Persia's costly looms,
No fair, arched entrance into stately halls;

No marble Clytie, with its frozen veins,
All bloodless, wandering over snowy breast;
Bat, one sweet Cupid, touched with richer stains
Of rosy life on lip and cheek and crest;

With shining curls whose spirals catch the glow
Of every sunbeam—this my kingly boy,
And my one window, wisely made for show
Of greenest foliage—these insure me joy.

And yet another—look the vista through—
See yonder, with the red upon his cheek,
And sleeping laughter in his eyes of blue,
And strength that dreams no honest effort weak,

The sturdy keeper of this garnered bliss,
Who lives for those he loves, who made this wild
A garden spot, well paid by wifely kiss
Or the sweet chatter of a happy child.

He made my cottage window, framed in vines,
Where gladness laughs in every lusty leaf,
Where Fuchsias hang their bells, and Pansies shine,
Like violet eyes touched with some tender grief.

Here blooms the Rose, and there the spicy Pink,
Here lifts the Calla, grand and pure and fair,
And here sit I, to read or work or think,
Or twine bright flowers in baby's golden hair.

Call me not poor, such treasure-trove is mine!
With flowers and fruits in loving likeness blent;
My child, my husband, and my household shrine,
The wealth of boundless love and sweet content.

Of Judging.

“What kind of a tree is that?” Year after year this question was asked of her friends by a lady concerning a tree that grew in one corner of her yard. She had bought the place already “improved,” and readily named the maples and elms and birches growing on it, but this tree she could not name. It was like nothing else on the place or in the vicinity. But as it promised, when grown, to be a good shade tree she carefully cultivated it. One day last autumn she found an English walnut under the tree, and wondered how it could have got there. Then looking the tree over and wishing she knew what to call it, she espied an English walnut growing upon one of its branches. Will she ever again need to ask what kind of a tree that one is? “A tree is known by its fruit.” For ten years she had waited with suspended judgment, and then a single nut growing on the tree terminated the suspense.

Viewed from different points, truth must have a great many different aspects. We know certainly that it has, and that it is the rarest thing to find two earnest seekers after truth who think alike or see alike. And yet each one certainly sees what to him seems truth. One will see everything as related to himself primarily; another will see everything as related primarily to others. The two will not see “eye to eye.”

“A tree is known by its fruit.” God has planted all the trees of the forest and garden. The peach has no right to reproach the oak because of the smallness and pulplessness of the acorn. The apple need not say to the maple, How inedible are your winged seeds! The elm has no call to reproach the thorn with its thorns. The evergreens must not sit in judgment on their naked and shivering brethren whose verdure perishes at the approach of frost.

We inevitably form conclusions as to the people with whom we are thrown in contact, as to their intelligence, integrity and general value to as individually and to society. But in order to judge them accurately, impartially, justly, we must know what only God can know. Therefore it is wise for us to obey the injunction of Christ, "Judge not," while at the same time we use the criterion He has given, "By their fruits ye shall know them."—Selected.

Copy of a Letter from Gilbert Molleson.

The following is copied from the records of Aberdeen Monthly Meeting, and, we believe, will be of interest to many of our readers:—

To Friends of the Monthly or Quarterly Meeting of Aberdeen, 1725.

Dear Friends,—Although I have not of late corresponded by letters with you, yett I may say that in a Sense of the same true Love I greatly desire that as our God hath apparently raised up some Faithfull and also Eminent Testimony-Bearers amongst you, whose Endeavours our God hath remarkably Blessed, and they will, to their uninterrupted Joy, reap the most Comfortable fruites of their faithful labours; which accordingly, such of you may also expect as continueth to the end, answering what is Required of each of you, knowing it not enough to beginne well, but noe less necessary to goe on daily in the blessed Way, we are certainly called unto; often Looking at the Marke sett before us; having for our great Encouragement received the Sensible earnest of the blessed Inheritance to be enjoyed without Interruption Eternally in the Heavens; wherefor, my Dear friends, Lett not this day of great ease from outward Persecution betray any into Unconcernedness or Unwatchfull of minde; knowing that the Enimic of our Safety and Peace will thereby seek to lead all into a false and dangerous Liberty, which, without a continued and great Watchfulness he will prevaile; as he hath on some who begun well, to the great Sorrow of some others; but yee being made sensible of the great loss of Such; and that we are called to travell on more and more towards the Mark Sett for that Ende in our Vew; soe lett us press forward daily, more and more, and nearer and nearer to the same, being assured thereby that more true and permanent Comfort will be enjoyed then all the Friendships and uncertain Riches of this world can give; whereby with Lamentation it may be said, too many in this day of soe great Ease are betrayed; But Such as retaineth ye most comfortable Sense of the most precious Truth, will not only travell that if same may be Sensibly felt to prosper in themselves more and more, but also that others may be Convinced thereof, and Regenerated thereby. Wherefor I have, for the information of some in my Native Country, sent now by a Ship bound for Aberdeen, fifty books, called how sin is strengthened, and how it may be Overcome; wrote by James Nayler, after his true Recovery, of whom my dear brother Robert Barclay, said to me that near since the Apostles' days have wrote more clearly; which small books, hope will be found of good service to some that lay under a burden of Sin. 20 of this books I desire to be disposed off by Friends of your Monthly Meeting; and 20 of them by the Friends of Ürie; and ye other 10 to be disposed off to, and by the friends of the Meeting at Kilmuck, and as it may be hoped they will have a good service. Soe thereby yee, on whom God hath bestowed more outwardly on, than on many others, will be encouraged to sende to your Correspondents at London for more of them: with other such books of Friends for the spreading of Truth which that it may, both in the Convinced and many others, in my Native Country from Age to Ages, is greatly desired by

Your affectionat Friend,
GILBERT MOLLESON.

It hath lately been proposed, and is under consideration of the meeting for Sufferings, to reprint a large Impression of my brother, R. Barclay's Apologies, by subscription in Meetings for its further great service.

The Coronation Stone.—In a hollow place under the seat of the Coronation Chair, preserved in Westminster Abbey, in which every British sovereign is seated when crowned, is deposited a rough block of red sandstone, about 26 inches in length, 17 in breadth and 10 in height, whose cracked and battered appearance, and the rusty iron rings attached to its side, are suggestive of its many migrations. This stone has been a venerated relic for many ages. The traditions respecting its early history are probably mere fables; for they date back to the patriarch Jacob, and affirm that it is the identical stone on which he rested his head when he saw that wonderful vision of the ladder and the angels. According to them, it was carried into Egypt by the Israelites, afterwards removed by an Egyptian colony to Spaiu, thence to Ireland and afterwards to Argylshire in Scotland. In the year 597 St. Columba is said, like Jacob, to have adopted it as his stony pillow.

Thus far, its history cannot be regarded as possessing much claims upon our belief—But from whatever cause, it was looked upon as a sacred and venerated object. In 834 it was removed to Scone by Kenneth II., to commemorate his victory over the Picts. At Scone it remained till 1296, when Edward I. transported it to London, and deposited it in Westminster Abbey, where it still remains. Respecting it, Lady Cummings remarks in her book on the Hebrides:—

"A strangely-suggestive link, in truth, is this time-honored symbol of royalty, connecting ages far apart by one curious bond, namely, the utterly unaccountable reverence for a poor battered old stone, the history and origin of which are alike matter of vaguest tradition, and which, nevertheless, retains its position, deeply rooted in the very heart of our monarchic constitution, connecting the stateliest ceremony of modern England with the earliest trace of superstitious homage paid, to the rude warrior chiefs of the Scots, or our still more shadowy ancestral princes of Ireland; a stone, in short, which has been the silent witness, as well as the authority for, the coronation of each successive generation in these isles for upwards of 2400 years."

"Other Sheep I have, which are not of this Fold."

—The wealthy owners of sheep have many flocks in different parts of the country under the care of separate shepherds. Each shepherd leads the flock of which he has charge to the locality where he expects to find pasturage; and when this is exhausted, he moves on with the flock to some other place where herbage and water may be expected. In this way the flocks sometimes travel considerable distances; and it is perhaps in this sense that the talmudic definition of the "extent of pasture," as sixteen miles, is to be understood. At special seasons, or at times previously appointed, these under-shepherds, who have been wandering all over the country with their flocks, return to the place where their employer resides, and so for a time there is one flock again, instead of many. Our Lord's suggestion of his own mission is somewhat different from this. He does not wait until the under-shepherds bring in the "sheep which are not of this fold," but goes out himself, and leads them to where there may be one fold and one shepherd.—S. S. Times.

The Ups and Downs of Life.

It is a very common idea that the discipline of life consists of its painful or rough experiences. Suffering and sorrow, disappointment and opposition, are the trials. The man whose course is all smooth we regard as having no trials. But this is a mistaken and very narrow view. The whole of life is a training-school. The tests of life are not all painful by any means, and the severest tests are not always those which press the hardest. The whole of life leaves its impress upon us. Its light and shade are equally needful to mature us, and we may pervert the light as well as the shade. It requires summer as well as winter, sunshine as well as frost, to mature the harvest. Some men are wrecked in prosperity, and some in adversity.

It is very rare to find that perfect poise of character which Paul described when he said he "knew how to abound, and how to be in want." He had learned to bear the contrasts of life, its winter and its summer, with entire evenness of temper. He could bear the heat and the cold of human experience, without being made feverish by the one or being chilled by the other. A healthy body maintains the same temperature in the hottest rays of summer and the coldest blasts of winter. A healthy spirit will maintain a corresponding poise.

But very few are thus balanced. Very few can bare sudden elevation without being made dizzy and giddy. What we call good fortune is often the greatest misfortune that could happen. We read of fortunes falling to poor girls or hard-working men, and call them the favored ones; but we know that in nine cases out of ten this was the most unlucky event of their lives. But if a man can be thus suddenly lifted into a different condition, and bear it—neither be puffed up by it nor lose his balance; neither break out into extravagance nor be betrayed into vice—there is the making of a king in him. Better than royal blood flows in his veins.

And there is equal peril in coming down. The peril is different, but none the less. It is no uncommon thing for a man to fall from affluence to poverty. There is a great deal to bear in such a change, more than one would think. It is not merely less money, smaller rooms, cheaper clothes, and coarser food. This could be easily borne. But there is the entire change of one's condition and associations. Privileges are cut off; influence is lessened, friends fall away. It is hard for a man to see why his judgment is not as good now he is poor as when he was rich. Yet he finds it does not have the same weight. His word used to be listened to with such deference, and now it is heard with impatience, if at all. If a man could move in the same circle, enjoy the same regard, and exert the same influence in his poverty as he did in his wealth, the change would not be so great; but we find

The friends, who in our sunshine live,
When winter comes have flown.

It is hard to bear all this. There are thousands of beaten men who are beaten altogether, bankrupt in life as well as fortune, in spirit as well as purse. Some are broken in courage, and never take hold of life again; some are made sour and fault-finding, very Ishmaelites, with their hand against every man, and fancying every man's hand against them; some are made sensitive, suspicious, and jealous, driving away the friends who would love to remain true.

But when a man can come down and bear all the results of it, and still be true to himself, still be a man, there is nobility in such a character of finer grain that sits in castle or hall. When a man can accept all the consequences of his change, and yet bear himself like a man, the grace of God reigns in that heart. I do not mean a man who goes about with defiance in his look, as if he would say, "I am as good as any of you yet;" nor a man who is broken by his misfortunes, and moves about with a meek, submissive air, as if he would ask pardon for being alive; but a man who calmly and resolutely meets the changed conditions of his lot, and does the best he can, "with malice toward none and charity toward all." There is a grandeur in such a character which surpasses brave exploits or daring deeds. It is the ruling of the spirit, which is better than taking a city.—Richard Cordley.

From the "Intelligencer and Journal."

Letter from Patrick Henry to Robert Valentine.

It was my privilege recently to have access to a number of very interesting letters and papers, once the property of Robert Valentine, of Chester County, Pa., an esteemed member and minister of the Society of Friends, before and after the Revolutionary War, among them being a journal of his travels through the British Islands, I think in the years 1772 and 1773, his death occurring in 1786. The names of many prominent Friends of Philadelphia and vicinity of that day are mentioned in these letters with much that is interesting reading to those who love to revert to incidents and recollections of the past. The papers are now in the possession of his great-grandson. Among the collection is a letter written by Patrick Henry to Robert Valentine in 1773, in his own hand-writing, and which I have carefully copied for publication. Although the time has passed when the influence of these truths written by this distinguished man might have been exerted for good, yet it seems a just tribute to the character of Patrick Henry to publish a letter so full of earnest condemnation of slavery, as well as showing his high appreciation of the principles of the Society of Friends,—exerted then as now in the cause of justice and humanity. His predictions for the future of his country when justice might be done are almost prophetic, and yet nearly a century passed before the irrepressible conflict ended in the full establishment of freedom.

M. J. B.

Hanover, Jan'y 18th, 1773.

Dear Sir:—I take this opportunity to acknowledge the Receipt of Antho Benezet's Book against the Slave trade. I thank you for it. It is not a little surprising that Christianity, whose chief Excellence consists in Softening the Human heart, in cherishing and improving its finer feelings, should encourage a practice so totally repugnant to the first impressions of Right and Wrong; what adds to the Wonder is, that this abominable practice has been introduced in the most enlightened ages. Times that seem to have pretensions to boast of high Improvements in the arts, sciences, and refined morality, have brought into general use and guarded by many Laws, a species of Violence and Tyranny which our most Rude and Barbarous, but more honest Ancestors detested. Is it not amazing that at a time when the Rights of Humanity are defined and understood with precision in a Country above all others fond of Liberty, that in such an age and such a Country we find men professing a Religion the most Humane, mild, meek, gentle and generous, adopting a Principle as repugnant to humanity as it is inconsistent with the Bible and destructive to Liberty? Every thinking honest man regrets it in speculation; how few in practice from Conscientious motives!

The world in general has denied you people a share of its Honours, but the wise will ascribe to you a just Tribute of Virtuous Praise for the Practice of a train of Virtues among which your Disagreement to Slavery will be principally ranked. I cannot but wish well to a people whose System Imitates the example of Him who was perfect, and believe me I shall honour the Quakers for their noble Effort to abolish Slavery. It is equally calculated to promote moral and political good. Would any one believe I am Master of Slaves of my own Purchase? I am drawn along by the general inconvenience of living without them. I will not, I cannot, justify it. However culpable my conduct I will so far pay my devoir to Virtue as to own the Excellence and rectitude of her Precepts and to lament my want of conformity to them. I believe a time will come when an opportunity will be offered to abolish this lamentable Evil. Everything we can do is to improve it if it happens in Our Day, if not, let us transmit to our Descendants, together with our Slaves, a pity for their unhappy Lot, and an abhorrence for Slavery.

If we cannot reduce this wish'd for Reformation to practice, let us treat the unhappy Victims with lenity; it is the furthestest advance we can make towards Justice. It is a Debt we owe to the Purity of our religion, to show that it is at Variance with that Law which warrants Slavery. Here is an instance that Silent Meetings, (the Scoff of reverend Doctors), have done that which learned and Elaborate Preaching could not effect,—so much preferable are the genuine dictates of Conscience and Steady attention to its feelings, above the Teachings of those men who pretend to have found a better Guide: I exhort you to persevere in so Worthy a Resolution. Some of your people disagree, or at least are lukewarm in the abolition of Slavery. Many treat the Resolution of your meeting with Ridicule, and among those who throw contempt on it are Clergymen whose Surest guard against both Ridicule and Contempt is a certain act of Assembly. I know not where to stop, I could say many Things on this subject, a serious review of which, gives a gloomy perspective to future times.

Excuse this Scrawl, and believe me with Esteem,

Your hble Serv't

PATRICK HENRY, JUN'R.

Did I Miss My Road.

It was my duty, and not pleasure, which saw me rattling away across a certain wide and desolate common about ten o'clock at night, and not so long since. The road was lonely enough, in all truth, and the night was particularly dark—not with the mere absence of light, but with the solid and dense darkness of a misty atmosphere. But I had gone that way many a time before; I was well wrapped up; and the horse was sound and steady. Insensibly my nose and ears sank deeper into my woolen comforter, and while my eyes still kept a mechanical look out ahead, and my hands instinctively grasped the reins, my thoughts escaped from the trammels of the present, and went floating down the past.

The line which my thoughts took—for I remember it well—was this. Had not all my life been a great mistake? What if I had done that which, years ago, I had not done, and taken that turning, which I had then not taken—should I not have cut a far finer figure in the world, found a better market for my abilities, and altogether been a more successful man? In other words, had not my life, as it really had turned out, been, in a certain sense, a failure?

Such were the thoughts that filled my mind as I drove along—but I determined to free myself from the depression, and accordingly sat up straighter, jerked the reins a little, whistled to my horse, and tried to attend to external objects.

There was still nothing to see but the indistinct glimmer of the white road, and nothing to hear but the ringing of the horse's hoofs and the grating of the wheels. Yet it ought not to have been so. I should by this time have crossed the downs, and have found a hedge on each side of me. Undoubtedly I must have missed my way. While my thoughts had been wandering my horse and gig had been wandering too.

So far as regarding personal safety, this discovery caused no alarm. But I was vexed that the person who had sent for me should have to wait longer than was absolutely necessary, and I was further vexed to think that my own return home would be unnecessarily delayed.

On, therefore, we went, through the mist and darkness, along the road into which I now perceived more and more clearly that I had accidentally swerved. In a quarter of an hour, as I expected the white road ended in a lane, and a little way down this there was a cottage. Stopping at the gate I jumped down, and making my way across the little garden, knocked at the door to ask my road. For though I fancied I knew the lane, I still thought I should like to make quite sure before proceeding.

I was further encouraged to knock at the cottage door at so late an hour, by perceiving a light still burning within. And no sooner had I knocked than it was opened by a woman, almost as if she had been standing behind it. "We heard your wheels sir," she said, "but we did not think you would be here so soon. Run out, Johnny," she continued, speaking to a lad who stood by her, "run out and hold the gentleman's horse."

I stared at the woman in astonishment.

"The truth is, my good woman, I've missed my road. I was going to the market town and stopped to ask my way."

"Then it was the good Lord that sent you, sir," said the woman. "My husband's gone over to your house to bring you, and you must have crossed him on the road."

And then she proceeded to tell me what was the matter. One of her children, in fact, had met with a most serious accident, and the quickness or the tardiness of medical help made all the difference, humanly speaking between life and death.

When all had been done that could be done, I still had time to find my way before midnight to the house where I had been at first expected, and where the need was, after all, not nearly so great as at the cottage. Besides which, while I was in the cottage, the fog, with that mysteriousness of movement which characterizes fogs, had cleared off and revealed the moon shining in the brightness of its second quarter. And once again, as I crossed the down on my way homewards, my thoughts went drifting to the same subject as had occupied them some hours before. But how different was their tenor! and how nuch had they been affected by the incident of he night.

Here was a material instance—thus I reasoned with my changed course of thought—in which, to all human appearance, I had mistaken my way. But that, which to my mind had seemed a mistake, was now plainly perceived to be a providential thing, leading to the relief of excruciating human suffering, and it may even be, to the saving of a human life. Might it not be so with all my life as with these few hours of it? Nay, must it not be so, if all things work together for good to those who love God? Though I might have missed my way to fame and fortune, had I not found it, by the goodness of God, to at least a sufficiency for myself and those nearest and dearest to me, and to large opportunities of doing good to many suffering persons, both as to their bodies and their souls?

Meditating these things and besides driving homewards—when your horse, as we all know, goes a good deal faster than in the other direction—I did not find the way either so long or so dreary as when I went. And when my dear wife came down, as is her custom, to let me in, and asked me how I had fared, I said, “Well my dear, if I have done nothing else, I have learned a little lesson.”—British Workman.

A Life of Devotion.

Thirty years ago in the region about London docks were “innumerable courts and alleys filled with fog and dirt, and every horror of sight, sound and smell. It was a rendezvous for the lowest types of humanity.” The wealthy and influential class in this settlement were the rum sellers and keepers of gambling houses. Children were born and grew to middle age in these precincts and never heard the name of Christ, except in an oath. Thirty thousand souls were included in one parish here, but the clergyman never ventured out of the church to teach.

A young man named Charles Lowder, belonging to an old English family, happened to pass through this district just after leaving Oxford. His classmates were going into politics, or the army, or to the bar, full of ambition and hope to make a name in the world; but Lowder heard, as he said, “a cry of mingled agony, suffering, laughter and blasphemy, coming from these depths, that rang in his ears, go where he would.” He resolved to give up all other work in the world to help these people. He took a house in one of the lowest slums, and lived in it. “It is only one of themselves that they will hear, not patronizing visitors.” He preached in the streets, and for months was pelted with brickbats, shot at, and driven back with curses. He had no eloquence with which to reach them; he was a slow, stammering speaker, but he was bold, patient and in earnest. Year after year he lived among them. Even the worst ruffian learned to respect the tall thin curate, whom he saw stopping the worst street fights, facing mobs, or nursing the victims of Asiatic cholera.

C. Lowder lived in London docks for twenty-three years. Night schools were opened, industrial schools, and refuges for drunkards, discharged prisoners and fallen women. A large church building and several chapels were erected. His chief assistants in this work were the men and women whom he had rescued from degradation.

C. Lowder broke down under his work, and rapidly grew into an old and care-worn man. He died in a village in the Tyrol, whither he had gone for a month's rest. He was brought back to the docks where he had worked so long. Across the bridge where he had once been chased by a furious mob bent on his murder, his body was reverently carried, while the police were obliged to keep back the crowds of sobbing people who pressed forward to catch the last glimpse of “Father Lowder,” as they called him. “No such funeral,” says a London paper, “has ever been seen in England. The whole population of East London turned out, stopping work for that day. The special trains run to Chiselmurst were filled, and thousands followed on foot—miserable men and women whom he had lifted up from barbarism to life and hope.”—Youth's Companion.

Worldliness.—“As I grow older as a parent,” says Dr. J. W. Alexander, my views are changing fast, as to the degree of conformity to the world which we should allow in our children. I am horror-struck to count up the profligate children of pious parents, and even of ministers. The door at which those influences enter which countervail parental instruction and example, I am persuaded, is yielding to the ways of ‘good society.’ By dress, books, and amusements, an atmosphere is formed which is not that of Christianity. More than ever do I feel that our families must stand in a kind but determined opposition to the fashions of the world, breasting the waves like the Eddystone Lighthouse. And I have found nothing yet which requires more courage and independence than to rise even a little, but decidedly, above the par of the religious world around us.”

The Wax-insect of China.—A pure white wax is deposited by legions of minute insects on the branches of a stunted tree of the Sumach family. These insects come into existence in galls on a totally different plant to that on which they are to deposit their wax—on an evergreen shrub which grows in a different soil and climate from the Sumach, to which the insects, are conveyed about the beginning of the Sixth Month. By the end of the Eighth Month all the branches on which they have settled are thickly coated with the wax to the depth of perhaps a quarter of an inch. This is scraped off, melted in boiling water, and strained through a cloth; and is then ready for commerce.

The wax-insect is a species of Coccus, or scale-insect, similar to that which produces Cochineal, and belonging to the same family as some of those which infest and injure cultivated plants.

Artificial Egg-hatching near Canton.—Passing by amazing heaps of old egg-shells (for which even the Chinese seem to have as yet found no use), we reached the hatching-house, in which many thousands of eggs are being gradually warmed in great baskets filled up with heated chaff and placed on shelves of very open basket-work, which are arranged in tiers all round the walls, while on the ground are placed earthenware stoves full of burning charcoal. Here the eggs are kept for a whole day and night, the position of the baskets with reference to the stoves being continually changed by attendants who reserve their apparel for use in a cooler atmosphere!

After this preliminary heating, the eggs are removed to other baskets in another heated room, to which they are dexterously carried in cloths, each containing about fifty eggs—no one but a neat-handed Chinaman could carry such a burden without a breakage! Here the eggs remain for about a fortnight, each egg being frequently moved from place to place, to equalize their share of heating. After this they are taken to a third room, where they are spread over wide shelves, and covered with sheets of thick warm cotton. At the end of another fortnight, hundreds of little ducklings simultaneously break their shells, and by evening perhaps a couple of thousand fluffy little beauties are launched into life, and are forthwith fed with rice-water.

Duck-farmers (who know precisely when each great hatching is due) are in attendance to buy so many hundred of these pretty infants, whom they at once carry off to their respective farms.

The baby-ducks are fed on boiled rice, and after awhile are promoted to bran, maggots, and other delicacies, till the day comes when the owners of the duck-boats come to purchase the half-grown birds, and commence the process of letting them fatten themselves.

I do not know whether there is always a relay of ducklings at hatching-point, or whether we were especially fortunate in the moment of our visit, but we certainly witnessed a large increase of this odd family. It was so very amusing to watch scores of little beaks breaking their own shells, and struggling out, only to be unceremoniously deposited in a basket of new-born infants, that we were tempted to linger long in this strange nursery.—Gordon's Wanderings in China.

Temperance.—A proposition has been sent to the Presbyterian General Assembly from the Presbytery of Chicago, to simplify the business of the Assembly by abolishing the Permanent Committee on Temperance. The whole Church may properly be regarded as a Temperance Society; and a special organization of the kind the Chicago Presbyterians regard as an unnecessary appendage.

Protestantism in Spain.—There are said to be about sixty Protestant communities in Spain, with 14,000 openly professed Protestants, and hardly a large town without a regularly organized church. It is just eighteen years since the first Protestant chapel was opened in Madrid.—The Independent.

The Observance of the First Day of the Week.—In a recent case before the Supreme Court of Arkansas, it was decided that the law prohibiting the transaction of ordinary business on the First day of the week, is not a violation of the constitutional or religious rights of any. A man may believe that there is nothing in the Law of God which prohibits him from working on that day, yet he cannot violate with impunity the statute which declares it illegal to do so. The court quoted with approval the remarks of Judge Devens, of Massachusetts, in a similar case:—

“It is essentially a civil regulation, providing for a fixed period of rest in the business, the ordinary vocations, and the amusements of the community. If there is to be such a cessation from labor and amusement, some one day must be selected for that purpose; and, even if the day thus selected is chosen because a great majority of the people celebrate it as a day of peculiar sanctity, the legislative authority to provide for its observance is derived from its general authority to regulate the business of the community, and to provide for its moral and physical welfare. The act imposes upon no one any religious ceremony or attendance upon any form of worship, and any one who deems another day more suitable for rest or worship may devote that day to the religious observance which he deems suitable or appropriate. That one who conscientiously observes the seventh day of the week may also be compelled to abstain from business of the kind expressly forbidden on the first day is not occasioned by any subordination of his religion, because, as a member of the community, he must submit to the rules which are made by lawful authority to regulate and govern the business of the community.”

—The Greek Church in the Island of Scio.—The St. James Gazette states, that many parishes of the Greek Church were backward with their tithes, and they were interdicted by the Bishop. The priests stopped their work of marrying, baptizing, and officiating at burials of the dead, and these matters were taken in hand by the laity.

—Gaelic Congregation.—A Scotch Presbyterian congregation has been organized in Boston. It is intended that one of the First-day services, and one of those in the middle of the week, shall be in the Gaelic language; which will probably be very gratifying to the Gaelic-speaking people among the inhabitants of Boston.

A Mexican Sculpture.—One of the most notable links binding Mexico with something even older than Egypt, is found here in the Grand Plaza before the door of the Cathedral. This is a serpent with a bruised head. It was brought by Cortez from the "bloody temple" after its overthrow, and is placed here along with some idols and massive monoliths in a great heap for the curious traveller to look upon. This serpent is a rattlesnake: coiled; has thirteen rattles; is chiseled from a solid blue granite—not found anywhere in this part of the country—is as smooth and hard and enduring as glass, and is a wonderful work of art.—Joaquin Miller.

THE FRIEND.

SIXTH MONTH 4, 1887.

We believe the Society of Friends have ever believed that when our Saviour promised his disciples, "Whosoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do." He referred not to the outward use of the word "Jesus," but to that Divine power and influence which flows from Christ, and which alone makes prayer effective. There are many instances in the Bible, in which this word "name" is used in a similar manner, such as, "Save me, O God, by thy name," Ps. liv. 1: "The name of the Lord is a strong tower, the righteous runneth into it, and is safe," Prov. xviii. 10: "The Lord hear thee in the day of trouble; the name of the God of Jacob defend thee," Ps. xx. 1: "By what power or by what name have ye done this? By the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, whom ye crucified, whom God raised from the dead, by Him doth this man stand here before you whole. Neither is there salvation in any other, for there is no other name under heaven, given among men, whereby ye must be saved," Acts iv. 7, 10, 12.

In these and similar cases, name is evidently used to express the power or spirit of Him to whom the word refers. Therefore, to ask anything in the name of Jesus must be understood, among Friends, to ask under a measure of his Divine life and power.

We have been pained at times to hear ministers in their public appearances in the way of prayer, unhesitatingly claim this heaven-given qualification, by saying that their petitions were put up in the name of Jesus; when the listeners could perceive but little evidence of the Divine call or anointing in their services. While such an expression might be truthfully used on many occasions, and may be called for at times, yet the following passages from the writings of William Bayley, one of the early ministers in our Society, show that Friends in the beginning exercised a care on this point. He says:—

"There is a great noise by way of objection among many of the professors in this age, against the people called Quakers, which is on this wise, viz: 'We do not understand,' say they, 'that you ever pray to God in the name of Jesus, or in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, &c., though we grant you often preach and pray, and many good exhortations there are to be heard among you, but we seldom or never hear you preach or pray in the name of Jesus.' * *

"To which I shall endeavor to answer as I have received of the Lord. * *

"I do affirm that they who preach and pray in the Spirit and power and light and wisdom of God, do pray in the name of Jesus, for Jesus is but a name which was given unto that which was before that name was. * *

"Now if any pray or preach or speak in the power of God, and in the wisdom of God, they do it in the name of Jesus; or if any pray in the truth, and the life, and the way, they pray in the name of Jesus; and if any pray in the true Light and Spirit of God (which lighteth every man that cometh into the world), they pray in the name of Jesus."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A St. Louis paper publishes a report of a scheme, originating with the Wyoming Cattle Association of Cheyenne, to consolidate all the cattle interests of the Northwest, and form a company which shall control $15,000,000 worth of cattle and grazing lands. There are said to be connected with the enterprise a number of men who already control fully half of the stock in Wyoming, and have the support of nearly all the rest of that Territory.

A despatch to the Chicago Times says it is estimated that the total losses by the forest fires on the northern peninsula of Michigan will reach $7,000,000. Eight lives are known to have been lost. The fires have been extinguished by copious rains.

On the morning of the 27th ult., a great fire in New York destroyed the Belt Line Railroad stables, on Tenth avenue, between Fifty-third and Fifty-fourth streets, with 1200 houses; one wing of a silk factory, five brick tenements, a row of frame rookeries on Tenth avenue, opposite the stables, and all the shanty settlement on Fifty-third street, from Tenth avenue to within three hundred feet of Eleventh avenue. The losses of the railroad company are estimated at $440,000, and it is thought the total loss will be $750,000. More than one hundred families, mostly poor people, were made homeless.

The Philadelphia Ledger states that a syndicate of foreign and home capitalists have advanced the requisite funds for the construction of a Hudson River submarine tunnel. "As the estimated cost of the undertaking is set down at $11,000,000, and the time needed for its accomplishment about a year only, the prospect of the disbursement of that amount of money among the little army of men who will have to do the work is an important consideration with a numerous class of tradesmen who will be likely to reap the benefit of it."

Brooklyn has reached a water consumption of over 50,000,000 gallons for one day.

There has been an unusually large catch of trout on Cape Cod the present season, and they appear to be more plentiful than for several years past. The black bass are becoming more numerous than ever before, most of the Cape fresh-water ponds having been stocked with them a few years ago.

A severe earthquake shook Nogales, Arizona, at one o'clock on the afternoon of the 30th, and ten minutes afterwards a lighter shock was felt. No damage was done.

In Texas eighty-two papers declare for prohibition and twenty-one against it. In Tennessee fifty-two for it, and four against it, and some silent.

The Governor of New York has vetoed the Vedder Tax bill, which had passed both Houses of the Legislature. The veto concludes as follows: "This legislation is a fair sample of all the alleged temperance legislation of this winter. The art of how not to do it could not be more conspicuously illustrated, and the whole purpose seems to have been to hoodwink and deceive the honest temperance sentiment of the State, without, in fact, doing anything to aid the cause of temperance."

The deaths in this city last week numbered 395, which was 15 less than during the previous week, and 27 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the whole number, 201 were males and 194 females; 214 adults and 181 minors; 56 died of consumption; 30 of pneumonia; 25 of convulsions; 24 of heart diseases; 20 of inflammation of the brain; 19 of marasmus; 17 of old age; 17 of measles; 14 of debility; 13 of paralysis, and 14 of casualties.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$'s, registered, 109 $\frac{1}{2}$; coupon, 111; 4's, 129 $\frac{1}{2}$; currency 6's, 126 $\frac{1}{2}$ a 137.

Cotton was firmer at 117-16c, for middling uplands. Refined Sugars were quiet and easier. Wholesale prices were 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. for powdered, 5-13-16 cts. for granulated, 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. for crystal A, and 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. for confectioners' A.

Feed was dull and lower. Sales of 1 car choice winter bran, at $18.50 per ton. Quotations: Bran, western winter, choice, $18.50; do., do. medium to prime, $17.50 a $18.25; bran, spring, $16.50 a $17.

Flour and Meal.—Demand for flour was confined to the immediate wants of the home consumers, but prices ruled steady. Sales of 125 barrels Ohio, clear, at $4.20; 250 barrels do. straight, at $4.55 a $4.60; 375 barrels winter patent, at $4.80 a $5; 125 barrels Minnesota, straight, at $4.50, and 625 barrels do., patent, at $4.80 a $5.10. Eye flour was quoted at $2.85 per barrel for choice.

Grain.—Wheat was lower; No. 2 red closing at 96 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. bid and 96 $\frac{3}{4}$ cts. asked. No. 2 mixed corn closed at 46 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. bid and 47 cts. asked. Oats were quiet, No. 2 white closing at 37 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. bid and 38 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. asked.

CATTLE MARKET.—Beef cattle were higher, at 3 $\frac{3}{4}$ a 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts.; sheep were $\frac{1}{2}$ c. lower, at 3 a 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts.; fall lambs, 4 a 6 cts.; spring lambs, 6 $\frac{1}{2}$ a 9 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts. Hogs were fairly active at 7 a 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ cts.

FOREIGN.—On the 28th of Fifth Month a terrible explosion occurred in the Udston colliery at Blantyre, a village in Lanarkshire, eight miles from Glasgow. There were three seams in the pit. All in the upper seam were rescued,—but one died shortly afterward. A number of men in the second seam were also rescued, although much prostrated from the fire-damp. Five bodies were taken from this seam. All the men in the lower seam perished. Altogether sixty-two bodies had been recovered and twelve were still entombed.

On the 25th, the "Opera Comique" in Paris was destroyed by fire, during a performance. On the 28th it was officially announced that 75 corpses have so far been recovered from the ruins. It is expected that 100 will be found.

A new French Cabinet is announced, with Rouvier as President of the Council, Florens Minister of Foreign Affairs, and General Fernon Minister of War.

A despatch from Brussels, dated Fifth Month 25th, says: "The situation of the miners' strike at Seraing is assuming a more alarming aspect. Twenty-two hundred more miners have left work and are taking part in the strike. At Charleroi 7000 men are on strike, and the appearance of affairs is growing more serious."

Rome, Fifth Month 29th.—Four shocks of earthquake were felt to-day at Terzi, one being of great violence. Shocks were also experienced at Ancora.

The Vatican, replying to a request for an interpretation of the Pope's recent allocution, has set circulars to the Papal Nuncios abroad stating that, although the Pope's declarations are moderate, nothing will be changed, and if the Italian Government desires peace the Pope is disposed to treat on the basis of the restoration of his temporal power.

On Fifth Month 27th, a very destructive cyclone visited Calcutta. A local steamer with 750 passengers aboard, was caught by the cyclone and is missing. It is feared she is lost, with all aboard. The district of Orissa was completely devastated by the cyclone.

The first train on the Canadian Pacific Railroad for the Vancouver ocean terminus reached that point on the 24th. Hitherto trains stopped at New Westminster.

Selections from the Diary of Abigail W. Hall.

Fifth Mo. 20th, 1856. Weeks have passed away since I made any memorandum in this book. During which time our vacation of four weeks has occurred; Yearly Meeting, also, in that time, and other things of moment to me. At our last Monthly Meeting, was brought from the Select Preparative Meeting, my case for recognition—Friends of that meeting believing the time had come to recommend me an approved minister. I remembered while the subject was before the meeting and about to be decided, that it was "not the laying on of hands," that would make me a minister of the word—a workwoman that needeth not to be ashamed. Sincere prayers arose in my heart, and have arisen many times since, that the Lord would take unto Him his own great power, and do with, by, and through me, as He sees meet—a poor, weak, feeble child. Yet, may I not say, a willing one to be moulded and fashioned according to his own good pleasure. The Select Quarter confirmed the judgment of the Monthly Meeting; so now I stand fearfully and responsibly among the people in said position. Keep me, O Heavenly Father! on every hand; that so honor to Thee and thy blessed cause, which is "dignified with immortality and crowned with eternal life," may be brought forth; and that, when the final winding up of time may come to me here, I may say with that eminent apostle formerly: I have fought a good fight, I have kept the faith, henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, &c.

I attended each sitting of the Yearly Meeting. And though the state of things amongst us is low, and some of us could indeed say, we were brought low under a feeling of it, yet praised and magnified be the ever worthy name of the Lord, He helped us, and proved himself to be a God nigh at hand and not afar off. I have full faith to believe as we, not only as individuals, but as a Society, press and keep close to Him, who remains the Way, the Truth, and the Life, that we shall be led safely along, and no weapon formed against us shall prosper; and every tongue which riseth in judgment against us, shall be condemned.

It is more than one week since my duties at this place have been resumed; and I may say they have been entered upon with a prayerful heart, to be kept in the way I should go. Then will all things, even those which may seem trying and hard to be borne, "work together for good."

23rd. A beautiful spring morning! all nature looks lovely. To a mind at ease and happy within itself, how much is there to be enjoyed! How I have longed this morning for a complete change of heart—a new birth unto righteousness to be brought forth. It is written, "Behold, all things are become new." And all things are of God. This is what I desire for myself above everything else. We are told that "with God all things are possible." I can say, with tears, "Lord I believe, help thou my unbelief."

Our meeting yesterday was held in silence. I was exercised on my own account, which also extended to others: that while much serving is ours, and in part necessarily so, there may not be a neglecting that "good part," which will stand by us when all these things may have passed away. I remembered, also, that it was through obedience to the Prophet, that the little that the poor widow had was increased. And how did I desire that we, whose condition resembled hers, might in all things obey the command of our great Prophet and High Priest.

26th. While I feel constrained at times, as was the case to-day, to call upon others, I know there is a great work within myself to be accomplished, and how am I straitened till it can be proclaimed concerning me, "It is finished." This language of the dear Son of God, when about to be offered up a propitiatory sacrifice for the sins of the whole world, has, since I took up my pen, very forcibly arisen, accompanied with deep breathings of soul, that there may be an entire surrender of body, soul and spirit, into his hands, who alone can accomplish the work. Thus do, O Heavenly Father! for thy poor child who "cries night and day unto Thee."

30th. Attended, yesterday, in company with five of the teachers, our Monthly Meeting. The first meeting was held in much stillness. It seemed indeed that the dear Master was in the midst; so that I was loath to break in upon such a precious solemnity. This fear kept me back till it was proposed to close the first meeting. I was then brought upon my feet, and in as few words as possible, left my burden. Previous to doing so, and while trying to bear my exercise, thinking it would better befit me at this time to be still, how was the language sounded, "The wisdom of this world is foolishness with God."

I felt in our Meeting yesterday, a concern to revive what had arrested my attention some days previous, that of attending the Monthly Meeting at Concord. It was with great reluctance I gave up to go; but the language forcibly saluted my inward ear this morning, "He that knew his Lord's will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, was to be beaten with many stripes." Difficulties not only within my own mind, but outward obstructions also, were pressed through.

Sixth Mo. 2nd. William Evans, (who with other of our Committee Friends are with us,) was remarkably led to minister to the state of the children. Through this dear favored instrument, "the haughtiness of man was humbled, and the loftiness of men laid low, and the Lord alone was exalted." My heart did secretly and with tears acknowledge, "this is the Lord's doings, and is marvellous in mine eyes." And, "The Lord shall fight for you, and ye shall hold your peace."

An explanation of the above seems necessary. Difficultly with some of the children previous to meeting, tried me exceedingly. But I found my only refuge was in God. To Him did I flee, and make my complaint. I showed before Him my trouble. Truly can I acknowledge: "Thou art my refuge and my portion in the land of the living."

30th. I was comforted and strengthened in beholding the quiet sitting of many of the dear children, considering the great heat of the weather it did seem to me remarkable, and so little drowsiness apparent; this, too, was the case in our morning meeting. Unexpectedly to myself a little word of encouragement seemed to spring up in my heart for these: "those who had this day offered willingly to their dear Lord and Master," &c.

Seventh Mo. 7th. It is a favor to be preserved on the watch-tower, even though surrounded with weakness, so that we may feel as though nothing was attained. "Thou God seest me!" was the language of poor Hagar in her best of condition. And the Lord did see and regard, and He continues thus to condescend to the low estate of his children. Faint not then nor grow weary, O my soul!

24th. It is such a favor in our meetings to be brought into a state of waiting; to know the enemy's power to be limited; to know Him that is stronger than he, to keep the house armed as it were. Think I can say, I did experience the Lord's preserving power to be over and around my trembling habitation this day. There was also a sweet assurance given, that upon a more whole surrender of body, soul and spirit, to Christ, the vine would more abundantly yield her fruit, and the ground its increase. My feeble petition is, quicken, O Lord! that which thou hast begun, that which thou hast wrought for us.

Eighth Mo. 6th. On Second-day attended the Quarterly Meeting of ministers and elders, for the first time. The general meeting, next day, was largely attended. On first sitting down, it seemed to me that there was a hungering and thirsting for the bread and water of life. We were lengthily ministered unto by ———; but if I had any true sense of feeling, it did not satisfy. I remembered while our friend was on her feet, what Jesus said to Nicodemus, "that which is born of the flesh is flesh," &c. After she got through, I felt it to be my duty, on behalf of my dear crucified Lord and Master, to lift up my voice, quoting: "Whosoever drinketh of this water shall thirst again; but whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him, shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up unto everlasting life." In a few words, I felt constrained to call all home to Christ, that "inward teacher, who teaches as never man taught." It seemed an awful thing for such a child as I, thus to lift up my voice, but the Master was good, and helped through; praised and magnified be his ever worthy name. It is in the day of the Lord's power, that his people are made a willing people.

I thought there seemed more life to attend our last meeting than the first. The spirits of many seemed lively to the business that came before us; which it was comforting to behold. Oh! the beautiful order of that building of which Christ is the head.

16th. [Under this date, our friend alludes to and introduces a dying testimony of Thomas Loe to William Penn; and which she says, had taken "fast hold of her feelings." We may remember in this connection, that it was through the instrumentality of Thos. Loe, that Wm. Penn was arrested in his exalted worldly course, and finally brought into obedience to Christ as his leader and teacher and sanctifier.

The testimony is this:—"Bear thy cross, and stand faithful to God," &c. "There is no other way which shall prosper, than that which the holy men of old walked in." "God hath brought immortality to light, and life immortal is felt, this love overcomes my heart." "Glory be to his name forevermore."]

18th. Thou knowest, O Heavenly Father! the secret conflicts of thy poor child. Be pleased to reach forth an hand of help. Blot out my many sins and transgressions; and "create a clean heart and renew a right spirit within me." Show me, and keep me, in the way I should go, that so I may bring glory to thy ever worthy name, and rest to my weary soul when the trouble and the conflicts of this present life closes. So do, O Lord, for thy poor child, who does desire, above every thing else, to be found serving Thee in that way which is well-pleasing in thy holy eye-sight.

[How plainly does the experience of our friend, as recorded in her Journal, manifest the testimony given by the Patriarch: "Is there not an appointed time for warfare to man upon earth?" And Paul in addressing Timothy, desires for him, "That thou mightest war a good warfare;" while that Apostle of himself says: "I have fought the good fight," &c. This warfare with weapons not carnal, A. W. H. seemed to grow skilful in the use of, till the final period came when her warfare with the world, the flesh, and the devil, and even with spiritual wickedness in high places, was accomplished and the victory won. While severe at times was the conflict and sharp the struggle, yet, as is evident, she realized that she did not have to contend against such potent foes in her own strength, or go forth at her own charges; for her ever-present Helper, being touched with the feeling of our infirmities, interposed his arm that was never foiled in battle, and gave the assurance, that as her day, her strength should be. It is written: "The battle of the warrior (with carnal weapons) is with confused noise and garments rolled in blood; but this (the Christian's) shall be with burning and fuel of fire," even till all of self or the unrenewed nature, is consumed, and every old inhabitant of the heart overcome or thrust out. How sweet to contemplate that, if true to the Captain of salvation, after the conflict, comes the victor's crown of glory and of rest, when the poor battered arms may be laid aside forever; and that "The more we toil and suffer here,

The sweeter rest will be."

Our friend, no doubt, while thus engaged in life's warfare, sought to remember the years of the right hand of the Most High—the good things which God hath laid up in store for them that love Him.]

For "The Friend."

Lord Shaftesbury.

In 1830, Lord Ashley was married to Emily, daughter of the fifth Earl of Cowper, "a wife as good, as true and as deeply beloved, as God ever gave to man;" a wife, who, three years later, when the Factory Question came before Lord Ashley, and he had to decide whether he would give up ease, influence, promotion, to associate himself with the most unpopular question of the day, and to become the victim of a virulent opposition from all parties, said: "It is your duty, and consequences we must leave. Go forward, and to victory!"

Holding the views he did, aflame with a burning zeal for the glory of God, his heart overflowing with sympathy for the poor, the suffering, and the sad, with a fiery indignation for every form of oppression and cruelty, Lord Ashley placed himself at the head of almost every great religious and philanthropic movement of his time. Although yearning for rest and literary and social enjoyment; yet he was ever impelled by the spirit that was in him, to stand in the forefront of every battle; to forego every personal gratification, and to spend days and nights, from youth to age, in labors from which his whole nature shrank. Nervous and sensitive, he yet conducted one of the greatest and most vigorous agitations of the century; delicate and refined, he visited every loathsome haunt in London; retiring and diffident, his whole life was aggressive; from first to last it was a career of self-surrender and self-sacrifice.

There was needed some strong sustaining power to enable him to persevere in his career, and the secret of his strength we know. In a letter to one of his sons, he says: "You ask me how I get through so much work? why, as I hope that you will, hereafter, by hearty prayer to Almighty God before I begin; by entering into it with faith and zeal, and by making my end to be his glory and the good of mankind."

Lord Shaftesbury was the foe of all oppression in whatever form it might be exercised. It mattered not to him whether the oppressed were nations or individuals, his whole nature rose against tyranny and injustice, and he could not forbear to throw himself into the breach and assist the weak against the strong. He was the prime worker in abolishing the labor of children and females in the collieries, accomplishing it through intense opposition. So, also, with his "Ten Hours bill," laboring earnestly for many years before the House would pass it. It has been well said that the services he rendered on behalf of the Lunatics, by having their sufferings abated, would have carried his name down to posterity in the front ranks of English philanthropists. His untiring labors in connection with it ceased only with his life.

During the long period of Lord Shaftesbury's Presidency of the "Ragged School Union," he was always in the chair at the annual meetings. He assisted in founding the "Society for improving the Condition of the Laboring Classes," establishing "Model Lodging-houses" among the lowest classes.

During his perambulations of the slums of London, in 1846, by his ragged-school investigations, &c., he made himself thoroughly acquainted with the haunts and habits of young thieves of the metropolis; holding meetings among them and lecturing to them by day and by night; establishing a "Thieves' Refuge," &c.

He also brought before Parliament the question of the Opium Trade, with a view to putting an end to the traffic in this drug as a means of revenue for our Indian empire. These efforts were not successful in attaining the desired end, although they served to inaugurate a standing protest against the iniquity of the system.

He had found great difficulty, in 1840, to procure an Act forbidding the employment by chimney-sweepers of climbing boys, but it was a far more formidable task to prevent its evasion: he pleaded for the "four thousand wretched children who were at that time engaged in this disgusting and unnecessary employment."

In 1868, we find him busy in founding a "Society for giving Dinners to Destitute Children."

As the result of the inquiries instituted by the "Children's Employment Commission," remedial measures were passed to benefit children and young persons in various departments of trade; but, by a technical difficulty, children employed in brickfields were excluded from the protection of these measures, while those employed in pottery and porcelain-works were included. Of course Lord Shaftesbury could not rest until this manifest injustice was set right, and he moved an Address on the subject in the House of Lords. He stated that there were about 3,000 brickyards in the country, and that the number of children and young persons employed in them amounted to nearly 30,000, their ages varying from $\frac{3}{4}$ to 17. A large proportion of these were females, and the hours during which they were kept to their monstrous toil were from fourteen to sixteen hours a day. The prayer was granted, and children in brickfields at length came under the beneficent protection of the law. In Church and State, at home and abroad, his labors were incessant. Once committed to any subject, he always followed it up to practical issue.

It was a principle with him that he would "not offer to the Lord that which cost him nothing," nor would he engage in any work until he had made himself master of all its details. "I made it an invariable rule," he said to his biographer, "to see every thing with my own eyes, to take nothing on trust or hearsay. In factories, I examined the mills, the machinery, the homes, and saw the workers and their work in all its details. In collieries, I went down into the pits. In London, I went into lodging-houses and thieves' haunts, and every filthy place. It gave me a power I could not otherwise have had. I could speak of things from actual experience, and I used often to hear things from the poor sufferers themselves which were invaluable to me. I got to know their habits of thought and action, and their actual wants. I sat and had tea and talked with them hundreds of times." It was in this way he prosecuted his early inquiries into the state of lunatic asylums and the treatment of lunatics.

This determination of his to "see for himself" demanded enormous self-sacrifice, and at times almost heroic courage. For example, when the Public Health Act, of 1848, created a Central Board of Health, Lord Ashley was appointed chairman of the Board, an office which he reluctantly accepted, but, having done so, he bent to it all the persistency of his strong will. In 1849 his labors were almost unprecedented in connection with the visitation of cholera, which in one year resulted in the death of 14,497 persons. During the whole of the anxious time when the pestilence was at its worst, and every one who could do so was flying from the danger, he remained in the midst of it, searching into every infected place, and bringing to bear every known means for its removal. Here is an extract from the diary on the subject:—"Sept. 1849. London is emptied. Cholera worse than ever; returns of yesterday quite appalling, and yet manifest that we do not receive more than two-thirds of the truth. Have been mercifully preserved through this pestilence. Have, not, I thank God, shrunk from the hour of duty in the midst of this city of the plague, and yet it has not approached either me or my dwelling."

Some of the most beautiful passages in the whole book are the extracts from the diaries in which Lord Shaftesbury unconsciously reveals himself in the relation of a husband, when writing of the goodness and self-devotion, the love and bravery of his noble-hearted wife. He had proved the truth of what he wrote on the first anniversary of his wedding-day:

"June 11th. Yesterday was the anniversary of our wedding. Mark it with the red letters of joy, hope and gratitude. If men would all base their love upon esteem, and their esteem upon religion, marriage would prove a twenty-fold source of earthly happiness and surety for heaven."

Forty years later, and on the last anniversary they were to celebrate, he notes:

"June 10th, 1872. To-day my wedding-day! Forty-one years ago was I united to that dear, beautiful, true and affectionate darling, my blessed Minny. What a faithful, devoted, simple-hearted, and captivating wife she has been, and is, to me! And what a mother! Ah, Lord, give me grace to thank thee ever-more, and rejoice in thy goodness. Send forth thy Holy Spirit on us, and lead us yet in the way of service, of obedience, and of love."

His anxiety concerning the welfare of his children in their school life, is shown in the following extract: "Went yesterday to Rugby to examine the physical and moral aspect of the place, and see whether it would be a good school for Antony. I fear Eaton; I dread the proximity to Windsor, with all its means and allurements—dread the tone and atmosphere of the school; it makes admirable gentlemen and finished scholars—fits a man beyond all competition for the drawing-room, * * * but it does not make the man required for the coming generation. We must have nobler, deeper and sterner stuff; less of refinement and more of truth; more of the inward, not so much of the outward gentleness; a rigid sense of duty, not a delicate sense of honor; a just estimate of rank and property, not as a matter of personal enjoyment and display, but as gifts from God, bringing with them serious responsibilities, and involving a fearful account; a contempt of ridicule, not a dread of it; a desire and a courage to live for the service of God and the best interests of mankind."

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 133.

CONSCIENTIOUSNESS.

An interesting illustration of true honesty is related in one of the volumes of The British Friend. It occurred at the time when such great distress prevailed in some parts of England, particularly in Lancashire, owing to the suspension of work in the cotton factories.

An old woman in humble life who resided in that district, although not herself a "mill hand," found from the general depression of trade, that her little means were getting less and less, until the pressure grew too great to bear. In her sore poverty she resolved to pack up the few articles she had left and go to Preston, where she had a daughter who was married and with whom she might live. She went to take leave of the minister of a congregation of which she was a member; and on hearing her plan he endeavored to dissuade her from it; urging her if possible to remain where she was in hope of better times, and adding that perhaps her daughter might be even worse off than herself. "That cannot be," said the old woman, "for I am very poor and have nothing left to live on; I will go to my daughter, for that will be shelter for me at any rate." The minister finding she had so miserable a prospect if she remained in her old dwelling, kindly gave her the amount of her railway fare to Preston and half a crown besides.

When she reached Preston station, a crowd of boys surrounded her, begging to carry her box; which she refused, as all the money now left in her purse was a half-crown and three pennies. One poor lad with a piteous look besought her very earnestly to let him take it for her, adding, "I will take it to any part of the town for two pence; do let me, for it is the only way I have to get a bit of bread, and we're clemming (starving) at home." Small as was the sum, the old woman had to begin anew her struggle with the world, she had a pitying heart, and the appeal thus made was enough. The lad shouldered the box, and followed her through the lamp-lit streets to a humble part of the town, where she knocked at the door of one of the houses; and, after waiting awhile and receiving no answer, she found it was locked.

Supposing the daughter might be out on some errand, she desired the boy to put down the box; and paying him for his services, she seated herself on it by the door to await the daughter's return. After a time the latter came up, and, on finding her mother come to settle with her, burst into a lamentation: "Oh! why have you come? for we are starving. I have been out trying to get a morsel for the children, and I can't. What can we do?"

Her mother calmed her a little and begged her to open the door. "Let's go in anyhow, I have a half-crown in my pocket, and you can take that and buy something; and that will carry us over to-morrow at any rate." They entered, and the old woman drew forth her purse to take the half-crown, when, to her dismay, she found she had paid it to the boy in the dim light of the evening in mistake for a penny. This was too much to bear and both the women sank down and cried long and bitterly over the prospect before them. The mother, however, was a truly Christian person, and when the first burst of sorrow was past, her faith rose triumphant over all. "Well," said she, "never mind, we have the two pence left, and let us be thankful to God for that, and for a roof over our heads: You take it; it will buy bread for you and the children to-night, and I will go to bed, for I shan't want anything, and let us hope God will provide for to-morrow when it comes." The daughter did accordingly, and that night passed away with its griefs and sorrows.

With the early morning came a tap at the door, which the daughter opened. A boy stood there before her who introduced himself rather briefly, with, "Did'nt I bring a box for an old woman here last night?" "Yes, you did," "Where is she?" "Up stairs." "Then tell her to come down, for I want to see her." Very soon the mother made her appearance and was greeted with, "Missus, do you know you gave me a half-crown last night instead of a penny? because you did; and I have brought it back, and here it is." "Yes, my lad, and I am very much obliged to you for bringing it back again. But I want to know how you came to do so, for I thought you told me you were clemming at home?" "Yes, we are very bad off," said the boy, brightening up as he spoke; "but I go to Sunday School, and I love Jesus, and I could'nt be dishonest."

Precious indeed is that holy fear and confidence in God, which enabled this poor boy to resist the temptation to keep that which had been given to him in mistake, and led him to seek out its rightful owner. "This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith."

Another illustration of conscientiousness was furnished by the head of a family named P—who lived in the south of Ireland many years ago, and were much respected, not only for their wealth and station, but for moral worth and benevolence.

They were connected with the Society of Friends and lived consistently with their principles of peace and non-resistance in the trying days of the commotions in Ireland in 1798. One night in those troublous times their house was broken into and spoiled by a band of robbers, who seemed fully aware of what valuables they might expect to obtain—a knowledge probably derived through some of the servants. As they were about to depart with their booty, one of them said to the wife, "You have a gold watch?" She had put it in her bosom at the attack, and now quietly replied, "No, I have not." Her husband was standing by, and when he heard her denial, he turned on her such a look and such a reproach as she never met before from him. "Mary," he said, "I am ashamed of thee! Wouldst thou then barter thy sweet peace by an untruth, for the sake of thy gold watch?" The rebuked wife stood abashed before her husband, and taking the watch from her bosom handed it over to the robber.

Sometime after the husband was sent for to the county town on an unexpected errand. The party of robbers had been arrested for another robbery, and he was sent for to identify his property, which was returned to him safely. In jail suspicion first rested on the leader of the gang, from the watch having been seen with him, bearing her initials.

Although a faithful attention to the directions of conscience, and to the monitions of the Spirit of Christ, may sometimes be attended with pecuniary loss or outward suffering, yet there are many instances where a blessing has evidently attended such faithfulness. One such is related by Neal Dow in the New York Observer, as follows:—

"A friend of mine, yet young, who had been in business in a small way, thought he would go to New Orleans, live there, and try his fortune. He put all his property into a certain kind of merchandise which he knew the market in New Orleans would readily take, embarked on board a brig and sent her off, while he resolved to go by land.

"In those days there were no railways. From Philadelphia he took stage over the mountains to Pittsburg. On Saturday night there was talk among some of the passengers on the question of Sunday travel. My friend said he would not travel on that day—he would stop over at the hotel where the passengers had supper. He had never travelled before, and some old stagers represented to him the possible, if not probable consequences of his resolution.

"On the Monday the stage might have no place vacant and he must necessarily wait another day, and perhaps another and another before he could continue his journey. In that case, on arrival at Pittsburg, he might find the steamer gone, and another delay would result from it. My friend considered the matter carefully. His orders to the shipmaster were to await him at New Orleans so many days, if he should fail to arrive he was to warehouse the cargo, a costly affair in New Orleans. He had hoped to sell it from the vessel.

"My friend said: 'I will stop over. I will not travel on the Sabbath.' The stage with his pleasant companions went on without him. He remained in the poor country inn, with no books, no company, no church. On the Monday the stage was full and he could not proceed, on Tuesday the same, on the Wednesday he found a seat, and on his arrival at Pittsburg there was no steamer and would be none for two weeks. He took passage on a flat-boat for Cincinnati, where he arrived after a tedious passage, and was obliged to wait three days for a steamer to New Orleans. All looked very dark to him.

"If he had kept on without stopping over he would have found a steamer at Pittsburg all ready to start, by which he could go without change to New Orleans. On arriving at his destination he found his cargo in a warehouse, as he had feared, and besides, he missed an admirable opportunity to sell the whole of it from the vessel, to a merchant in undoubted credit, who importuned the captain to sell and thus save storage. All looked very dark to my friend. A worldly man would think Sabbath-keeping would not pay.

"In two days after his arrival the merchant failed who had endeavored to buy his cargo. The sale would have been "on time," and the entire cargo would have been lost. In the meantime my friend's merchandise greatly advanced in the market, was very quickly sold at a large profit and for cash, the transaction being the foundation of a handsome fortune, which he employed always wisely and well, not for himself and family only, but most liberally in every good work."

Because a vigorous young lad, or a healthy young girl, is receiving day by day more strength than is needful for the legitimate outlay of daily life, there seems to be no special call for economy in the use of the strength thus coming in; and in many cases the surplus strength is wasted, instead of being capitalized. The lad is sure that he is not harmed by sitting up late at night, or by an indulgence of his appetite, or by over-study, or by excessive exertion of any sort. The girl is of the same opinion for herself, whether at her home, or at the place of summer-resort. Parents, indeed, often think that their children are not imprudent, so long as they show no signs of failing health or strength from their daily, and nightly course of ordinary life; and sometimes the family physician agrees with the parents in thinking that no great harm will come of what the young folks do so easily, and seem to stand so well. But if any of the incoming strength of early life which ought to have been stored up as capital, is then expended in unnecessary or in unwise outlay, the physical fortune of the young person who is guilty of this extravagance is so far diminished, to the added peril of its possessor in meeting the emergencies which the future surely brings.—*S. "ONLY."

Selected.

"Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."—Matt. xxv. 40.

Only a word for the Master,
Lovingly, quietly said;
Only a word!
Yet the Master heard,
And some fainting hearts were fed.

Only a look of reproof,
Sorrowful, gentle, and deep;
Only a look!
Yet the strong man shook,
And he went alone to weep.

Only some act of devotion,
Willingly, joyfully done;
"Surely 'twas nought!"
(So the proud world thought)
But yet souls for Christ were won!

Only an hour with the children,
Pleasantly, cheerfully given;
Yet seed was sown
In that hour alone
That would bring forth fruit for heaven!

"Only!"—but Jesus is looking,
Constantly, tenderly, down
To earth, and sees
Those who strive to please.
And their love He loves to crown.

THE BORDER LAND.

BY PROF. C. S. HARRINGTON.

On the solemn border standing
Of the land unseen, unknown,
'Neath Death's shadow, hushed I listen
For the hymns around the throne.
Doubts and fears around me thronging
Swell the load of daily care;
Who shall satisfy my longing?
Who my burdens help to bear?

Jesus comes; his gentle finger
Lifts the load, and it is gone;
Jesus comes; where shadows linger,
Lo! the purpling of the morn!
And when trembling fear comes o'er me,
When 'mid doubts I scarce can pray,
If the Master stands before me,
Doubts and fears all melt away.

When my guilty soul sinks under
All the crushing weight of sin,
Jesus comes; O joy and wonder!
Strength and hope are back again.
He gives victory in my conflict;
He from sorrow sends release;
When the gathering storm is darkest

"HE KNOWETH THE WAY THAT I TAKE."

I know not—the way is so misty—
The joys or the griefs it may bring,
What clouds are o'erhanging the future,
What flowers by the roadside shall spring;
But there's One who will journey beside me,
Nor in weal nor in woe will forsake;
And this is my solace and comfort—
"He knoweth the way that I take."

I stand where the cross-roads are meeting,
And know not the right from the wrong;
No beckoning fingers direct me,
No welcome floats to me in song;
But my Guide will soon give me a token
By wilderness, mountain or lake—
Whatever the darkness about me,
"He knoweth the way that I take."

And I know that the way leadeth homeward
To the land of the pure and the best,
To the country of ever-fair summer,
To the city of peace and of rest;
And there shall be healing for sickness,
And fountains, life's fever to slake.
What matters beside? I go heavenward—
"He knoweth the way that I take."

Energy and Perseverance.

F. E. Loring, in The Independent, gives a lively and interesting account of the efforts used by a poor Bulgarian peasant boy to obtain an education. His home was a little hut made of mud and stones; and his father was so poor that he could hardly get food enough for his large family. Their clothes cost little, as they all wore sheep-skins, made up with the wool outside. He was a bright, ambitious boy, with a great desire for study. And when he heard of Robert College at Constantinople, he determined to go there. So he told his father one day, when they were away together tending sheep, that he had decided to go to college. The poor shepherd looked at his son in amazement, and said:

"You can't go to college; it's all I can do to feed you children; I can't give you a piastre."

"I don't want a piastre," the boy replied; "but I do want to go to college."

"Besides," the shepherd continued, "you can't go to college in sheep-skins."

But he had made up his mind, and he went—in sheep-skins and without a piastre. It was a weary march of a hundred and fifty miles to Constantinople, but the boy was willing to do anything for an education. He found kind friends all along the way, who gave him food and shelter at night. So he trudged sturdily on day after day until he reached Constantinople. As he was not one to let the grass grow under his feet, he soon found his way to the college, went into the kitchen and inquired for the President.

He asked for work; but the President kindly told him there was none, and that he must go away. "Oh, no," the boy said, "I can't do that. I didn't come here to go away." When the President insisted, his answer was the same: "I didn't come here to go away."

He had no idea of giving up. "The King of France, with forty thousand men went up a hill, and so came down again;" but it was no part of his plan to go marching home again. And three hours later the President saw him in the yard patiently waiting.

Some of the students advised him to see Professor Long. "He knows all about you Bulgarian fellows." The Professor, like the President, said there was no work for him and he had better go away. But he bravely stuck to his text: "I didn't come here to go away."

The boy's courage and perseverance pleased the Professor so much that he urged the President to give him a trial. So it was decided that he should take care of the fires. That meant carrying wood, and a great deal of it, up three or four flights of stairs, taking away the ashes, and keeping all the things neat and in order.

The President thought he would soon get tired of such hard work. But a boy who had walked a hundred and fifty miles for the sake of an education, and was not ashamed to go to college in sheep-skins and without a piastre, would not be easily discouraged.

After a few days, as he showed no signs of "weakening," the President went to him and said: "My poor boy, you cannot stay here this winter. This room is not comfortable, and I have no other to give you."

"Oh, I'm perfectly satisfied," he replied. "It's the best room I ever had in my life. I didn't come here to go away."

Evidently there was no getting rid of him, and he was allowed to stay.

After he gained his point he settled down to business, and asked some of the students to help him with his lessons in the evenings. They formed a syndicate of six. That was good old

Dr. Hamlin's way, so none of the boys found it a burden to help him one evening in a week. It was a success on both sides; the boys were patient and kind, and the newcomer was as painstaking and persevering in his lessons as in other things, so that he made great progress.

After some weeks he asked to be examined to enter the preparatory class.

"Do you expect," asked the President, "to compete with those boys who have many weeks the start of you? And," he continued, "you can't go into class in sheep-skins, all the boys would cry 'baa.'"

"Yes, sir, I know," he said; "but the boys have promised to help me out. One will give me a coat, another a trousers, and so on."

Nothing could keep back a boy like that, who overcame all the obstacles in his way.

After the examination, the President said to Professor Long:

"Can that boy get into that class?"

"Yes," was the reply. "But that class can't get into that boy."

It was not all plain sailing yet. Although he had passed the examination he had no money, and the rules of the college required each student to pay two hundred dollars a year. That was a question in mathematics that puzzled the good President.

"I wish," said Professor Long, "that the college would hire this boy to help me in the laboratory and give him a hundred dollars a year. He has proved himself very deft and neat in helping me there, and it would give me much more time for other things."

So he became the Professor's assistant, and was perfectly delighted with his good fortune. But where was the other hundred coming from?

President Washburn sent an account of his poverty and great desire for an education to Dr. Hamlin, the ex-President of Robert College, who was in America. The Doctor told the story to a friend one day, and she was so much interested that she said:

"I would like to give the other hundred."

And that's the way he gained the wish of his heart.

He proved the truth of the old saying, that "where there is a will there is a way." But his way was so hedged in that no boy without a strong will and great perseverance would have found it.

Of course such a boy would succeed. To-day he is head master of one of the schools in his own country.

Canaan, Ancient and Modern.

BY CANON H. B. TRISTRAM.

The first glimpse which history gives of the land of Canaan is to be found in the story of the wandering of Abraham and the pastoral patriarchs. What the land must then have appeared to the travellers from the East we may infer from examining the fragments, scarcely touched by the profane hands of the builder or the colonist, which remain in the eastern parts of the country in Gilead and Bashan. From Damascus to Egypt there are but two towns of any importance,—Es-Salt (Ramoth-gilead) and Kirak, the ancient Kir, or Kir Moab. These and a few villages comprise the whole settled population. No terraces scarp the hill-sides. Only here and there are the open plains disturbed by the plow. Scattered timber, more park-like than forest, clothes the mountain in irregular clumps from base to summit. The date-palm still waves in the Jordan valley, on the east side. The balm-of-Gilead, the arbutus, sweet bay, and oleaster, cover the lower ranges. Above them, as we ascend, we find the olive; higher up the evergreen oak or ilex, then the Turkey oak; while clumps of pine, about identical with the Scotch fir, crown the summit of Gilead. In the open glades the nomad Arab pitches his black tent, while his flocks and herds, camels, sheep, and goats, with a few horned cattle, depasture the neighborhood, and disturb the gazelles and deer which at other times browse unmolested. The only cultivated land consists of unfenced patches round the towns and villages.

Such must have been the character and such the inhabitants of western Canaan when Abraham first pitched in the plain of Shechem. Fair indeed, and lovely, must that land of promise have looked to the eyes of the pilgrims just come from the bare and monotonous plains of Mesopotamia, as they threaded its labyrinths of well-wooded hills and narrow valleys with their purling brooks, and camped among the exuberant verdure of the moist plains. We find but few traces of towns or cities at that early epoch,—only Shechem and Hebron in Canaan proper. A dense population cultivated the seething tropical valley of the Jordan, and the shores of the Dead Sea. Phenicians and Philistines fringed the coast-line with their settlements. But these did not touch the Canaanite who was then in the land. The Canaanites were scarcely yet an organized nation, like their neighbors. They seem to have been rather a collection of village communities, who recognized the supremacy of the Hittite invaders. The country was not lawless. It was the highway of the great commercial route or caravan road between the empires of Chaldea and Egypt, and the few allusions in Scripture point to industrious and peaceful communities. Such certainly were Shechem and Hebron.

Recent research has cast a flood of light on the movements of the Hittites who then ruled at Hebron; and we know from Egyptian records that, not long before the time of Abraham, they had pushed from northern Syria, halted for some little time at Hebron, and then moved on to Egypt, where they established for some generations the dynasty of the Hyksos or shepherd kings. Hence the significance of that passing remark in Numbers 13: 22: "Now Hebron was built seven years before Zoan in Egypt." Zoan was the capital of the Hyksos dynasty, and the Hittites had paused seven years at Hebron before making their further advance. Through this country Midianite traders could conduct their caravans of precious merchandise without danger. The pastoral chieftain from beyond the Euphrates could lead his flocks where he would, so long as he refrained from interfering with the wells, the earliest kind of real property in history; for cultivation had not yet extended beyond the environs of the few settlements. That, in these, land was of considerable value, is shown by the purchase of the burying-ground of Machpelah from Ephron,—the first legal conveyance recorded in history.

Very different was the state of Canaan four hundred and fifty years later, when conquered by Joshua. The population must have increased enormously. The whole country was thickly studded with walled towns. Places which, like Bethel, had been but a name in the days of Abraham were now considerable cities. Scripture gives but one incidental hint of the changes which had occurred meanwhile. Hebron and Kirjath-Sepher, which had been Hittite in the time of the patriarchs, were now Amorite, and the name of the latter changed to Debir; while in Joshua's time, the Hittites were found in the mountains. The Egyptian annals explain this. A century before the Exodus, the Shepherd, or Hyksos, dynasty having been overthrown, Thothmes III., and after him Rameses II., prosecuted great campaigns against the Hittites, invading Canaan and Syria, driving their hereditary foci out of Hebron, and overrunning the country as far as the Euphrates, but making no permanent conquests.

The period before Thothmes was the epoch of Canaanite development; for we find in the Egyptian records, a list of over a hundred places submitting, given in the same topographical order in which the names occur in the book of Joshua. With the exception of a few strongholds, and some remote and inaccessible districts, the Israelites occupied the walled towns and the villages built by the Canaanites, and completed the subdividing or terracing of the hill-side, which their predecessors had begun. It was this terracing, which, in its ultimate results, has reduced the country to the state in which we now see it. From the density of the population every foot of ground was valuable. The hill-sides were girdled with terraces, like flights of steps, from the base to the crest of each rounded knoll, on the top of which was perched the little town. The primeval forest everywhere disappeared, and its place was taken by the precious olive tree, the evergreen foliage of which attracted the spring showers. Along the edges of the terraces ran little cemented channels, which conducted the rainfall to the cisterns with which the whole country is honey-combed. On each step of the terraces, corn in spring, and a second crop of vegetables in summer, were raised; while fig-trees occupied every corner, and the vine was trailed over every stone-heap. The land was utilized as it is in Malta to-day.

But, in after ages, war and neglect have done their work. We have no reason to believe that the material prosperity of the country ever suffered more than temporary checks from the wars and captivities till the final destruction of Jerusalem by Titus. Even after this, though the Jew was driven out, a considerable population remained, till the ruthless devastation and massacres by Chosroes, the Persian invader, A. D. 594, swept the land with the besom of destruction. The olive-trees, at least those which had been spared by Titus, were cut down. With them disappeared the fertility of the land. There was no man left to repair the terraces or keep open the water-channels. Over the treeless hills the clouds in spring passed without shedding their showers, while the winter rains, descending in impetuous torrents, soon washed down the terrace embankments, and carried the earth into the valleys, leaving the rocky sides barren and bare, while the hollows were choked to a depth of many feet with rich alluvial soil. Thus by the reckless wickedness of man has God's curse been accomplished.

Yet as after some great flood, we find in nooks and corners some walls and strays of what existed before, stranded in the eddies of the backwater; and as the waves of successive invasions of India have stranded on the hills and in the secluded valleys the remains of the Dravidians and other earlier races, so it has been in Canaan. The Israelite indeed has utterly disappeared; for the few Jews to be found in colonies in Jerusalem and some of the towns are all immigrants who have returned since the time of the Crusades from Spain or Germany or Poland. But while the nomad population of the plains is of Arab descent from the followers of the Khalif Omar, and the fellahen, or agricultural population of the villages is of Syrian origin, the descendants of the Christian settlers after Constantine, we find traces of the old Canaanite or Hittite, in the retired mountain villages east of the central ridge, to be recognized by their somewhat Ethiopian physiognomy, and by some old heathen local customs, such as sacrificing under a sacred tree or "grove" on the hill-top at the new moon; while in the southeast of Judea at Beit-Jibreen (or Gath) we have traces of the old Philistines in the large flat-featured race, quite distinct from any others in the land. It is interesting to note that these relics of the aboriginal races are found just in the districts which we learn, from Judges 1., were never thoroughly subdued by Israel.—S. S. Times.

For "The Friend."

Memories of the Prairies.

Prairie wolves were quite numerous in the new settlements, and their depredations frequent on the poorly protected poultry and flocks, and even upon the young and weak, of the herds of cattle; but a vigorous war has been waged against them, stimulated by a bounty of from two and a half to five dollars per scalp, and though yet far from being exterminated, their number is insignificant. They are eminently a prairie animal, and are seldom, if ever, found in the deep woods. I have heard old hunters say that they could not be driven into the "timber," and that they would permit themselves to be rode down and taken rather than take shelter in the near woods, but I know this is not entirely true, for they delight to hide in the small prairie groves and to skulk along the bushy borders of the woodland. There was another larger and more fierce variety of wolves inhabited the timber. The cry of the prairie wolf consists of three sharp barks, the last one prolonged into a long lonesome howl, and in early times it could be heard in some direction on almost any still night. They also had a curious habit of gathering into small companies, and amusing themselves by joining in a most ludicrous sort of concert. They would all at once break forth and bark, and howl, and whine, and yelp, and chew it all up together into a medley of mixed sounds impossible to describe, giving one a greatly exaggerated notion of the number of wolves in the pack. I well remember one time when I was travelling alone until very late into the night, as I passed between two small groves that were separated by a bit of low lying prairie, along which my road led, there was such a chorus broke forth from the shadowy side of the grove above me, and such a torrent of mingled sounds as then startled the still air, I scarcely think ten lusty boys just let loose from school could equal. I was not a stranger to this kind of serenade, and knew quite well how deceiving it was; but this time I felt quite sure there were about half-a-dozen in the pack. When I approached to within twelve or fifteen yards of them they left their place in the shadow of the grove, trotting across the road before me, and resumed their discord in a meadow on the other side, and to my astonishment there were just two of them.

In the summer of 1854, a neighbor who lived in a part of the same house we occupied, on his return home one evening brought with him a young prairie wolf. He was a smart pretty little fellow, and soon became quite an interesting pet. We fed him on bits of bread and milk with perhaps some stray pieces of cooked meat, and he grew nicely and was as playful as any pup; but had a spice of wild nature always about him, that made him a favorite with us all. One day after we had kept him a month or more, I found a crippled gosling down by the brook in the pasture, and as an act of kindness to the poor sufferer I killed it, ("The mercies of the wicked are cruel") and then I thought it would make a dainty morsel for wolfy, so I took it and dropped it into his box. After smelling it over for a moment he tore it in pieces and ate it greedily. The change it wrought on him was wonderful. He was at once more wild and fierce than we had ever seen him. He would growl and snap at us, and cowering away into the darkest corner of his kennel, would glare at us with eyes that seemed almost blazing with hate, and it was only after two or three days of more civilized diet that he regained his good temper. Several times we tried the experiment of giving him raw flesh, or blood, and always with the same result. He would always try to run away if left long at liberty, and never showed much signs of affection or obedience to any one.

Late in the fall when he was pretty well grown he made good his escape, and through that whole winter he was the pest of the neighborhood; he had learned enough of civilized ways to be able to evade every effort to capture or to kill him, as well as to find his way to the good things of the barnyards and chicken roosts. He was remarkably shrewd, but one luckless night the next spring, while on a visit to a neighboring hen-roost, he stepped into the jaws of a trap set for him, and when morning came, the good woman of the house found him there, and she was so overjoyed at his misfortune, that without waiting to call help she seized a hoe that stood near, and with it put an end to his career.

Beavers were sometimes, though rarely, found along some of the streams of central Iowa as late as 1868. I believe it was in the summer of that year that I had occasion to visit the little town of Fairfax, a few miles southwest of Cedar Rapids. I was travelling on foot, and approached it across the beautiful rolling prairie south of the Cedar River. From the summit of a high ridge overlooking the valley of Prairie Creek before me, and that of the river on my right hand, with thickly wooded and low hills beyond it, I saw the little village of my destination, just across a curve in the valley, while the road leading to it wound tediously around among fields and meadows, and by pretty farms, but I was already weary with long walking, and decided to leave the beaten track, and save a few tired steps by crossing the fields and woods and stretches of open prairie in a more direct line. I was soon plunging through the hazel thicket that fringed a grove of small timber that shaded some rough land over which I made my way as best I could, then entered the nearly level valley where the trees were larger and less lumbered with underbrush. In a little while I found myself upon the banks of the stream but unable to cross it. While following its sinuous course in search of a crossing, I came most unexpectedly upon the recent work of a small colony of beavers. There were perhaps a dozen or more trees and bushes cut down, some were fallen into the water while others lay upon the bank. There were several of them ten to twelve inches through, and one ash tree fully fifteen inches in diameter was cut almost down, but had been abandoned. It leaped so that it would have fallen from the creek and been of no use to them, and I wondered if some shrewd old animal had discovered this fact and stopped the waste of labor. The largest trees, and the greatest number were ash, though other varieties had also been cut.

I was surprised at the large size and regular form of many of the chips they had taken out.

They had made deep cuts with their chisel-like teeth, above and below, often two and three inches apart, then taken hold in the middle and torn out quite a good sized piece. I saw nothing of the animals themselves and only knew of the workmen by their chips, and their work; and I suppose that they had been intruded upon and killed or driven away a few days before my accidental visit to their clearing. I found a place where I could cross the creek, and rather reluctantly left this interesting scene and was soon on the track of the C. & N. W. R. R. which I followed to the village a mile farther up the stream.

For "The Friend."

From some correspondence which took place in 1863 between Friends in Holland and Stephen Crisp, also with the Morning Meeting in London, it appears that some proceedings were on foot with the Government of Holland for legalizing the marriages of Friends on their agreeing to give notice to the civil magistrate (before the marriage as well as afterwards) of the solemnization.

Some of the Friends in Holland scrupled as to the previous notice; and the advice of the Morning Meeting was requested. The answer was to this effect:—that "it was not inconsistent with Truth's testimony to certify the magistrate both before and after the marriage—all things having first passed with clearness through the meetings of Friends." "We have been willing from the beginning," writes George Whitehead on this occasion, "that our marriages should be made known to the magistrates." The Morning Meeting further remarks, "For though we cannot allow the right of marrying to the civil magistrate, yet his right to take cognizance of offenders, covenant breakers, &c., has always been our testimony. Therefore, Friends being free to impart the simple knowledge of their intentions will rather bespeak their innocence and clearness from all violations of contracts, clandestine proceedings, &c., than the refusal of such notice, and surely we would have our innocence appear both before marriage and after."

It was thought this extract might be interesting in view of somewhat recent legislation in Pennsylvania on the subject of marriage and the action of our Meeting for Sufferings in relation thereto—of the propriety of which some Friends appear to have had some doubt.

Extraordinary Reason in a Mastiff.—J. M. Buckley in The Christian Advocate relates the following anecdote, the truth of which he took pains to have confirmed by the person who owned the dog:—

Harold Dollner, a native of Denmark, and for many years Consul-General of Denmark in this city, and a portion of the time acting Minister for that kingdom, and well-known to business men as the head of the firm of Dollner, Potter, & Co., of New York, for many years resided in Brooklyn in a kind of rus in urbe—a mansion of the old style, situated on Washington Avenue, in the midst of what, for a city, are large grounds. He always took a great interest in his flowers, trees, and vegetables, and in the heart of the city raised the very finest pumpkins. He also kept two or three dogs; one a house dog, another of the spaniel variety, and the third a powerful mastiff. The mastiff was always chained near the stable, and not far from the rear entrance to the premises.

In a certain autumn the pumpkins which were produced in his garden were of such extraordinary size and beauty that they excited the rapidity of a person who stole two of the largest of them and took them to the Horticultural Exhibition, where he entered them as his own, and actually took the premium for them. This so raised Dollner's indignation that he instructed his gardener to take off the largest of those which remained and deposit them in the cellar lest they also should be stolen. At the same time he told him to set the mastiff loose, so that if any body else came in at night to steal the pumpkins the dog would attack him. Pursuant to this order the gardener worked all the afternoon taking off the finest of the pumpkins, which he carried up one by one, piling them near the cellar door until he had finished, when he conveyed them into the cellar. About sunset he unchained the mastiff.

This dog had watched the performance of the gardener, and during the night he gnawed off the largest of the remaining pumpkins and carried them one by one to the cellar door, where he piled them up and stood guard over them until the next morning, when as the cook arose and opened the kitchen door, with an expression of great delight the animal wagged his tail, looked up for approbation and went away. The next night he gnawed off everything from the size of a hazel-nut upward and carried them to the cellar door as before. A few days afterward, when the person suspected of having stolen the pumpkins, who had always been friendly with him, entered, the mastiff sprang upon him with the utmost rage.

Power of the Imagination.—There can be little doubt that much of the distress resulting from abstinence from an accustomed stimulant, whatever it be, is due to imagination; and in some cases, victims of the habit have cured themselves by the exertion of a strong determination to take no more. In a large number of cases, however, the indulgence has produced a complete paralysis of will-power; and then some method of judicious medical treatment is necessary, although even then success does not always follow. An account of an ingenious mode of effecting the cure of a long-indulged opium habit is given in the Medical World by Dr. R. H. Dalton. The patient was first allowed for a week to take her usual quantity of morphine in the form of a mixture containing also five drops of iux vomica and one-quarter grain quinine in each dose, and colored with tincture of lavender. Then, for twenty weeks, the amount of morphine was lessened every seven days by one-twentieth, and, at the same time, the tincture increased by one drop and the quinine by one-quarter grain at each change, until the morphine was left entirely out. In the meantime, however, the quinine was not augmented after the ninth week, but ten drops of elixir of vitriol added to each dose taken afterward. The diminution of morphia was minute and gradual; and, the taste being the same, the patient was unable to detect any change whatever during the four months' treatment. As soon as Dr. Dalton became satisfied that the habit was entirely in the mind, he announced that she had not taken a particle of morphine for two weeks. As soon as she understood this, the spell was broken, and she wanted no more morphine. Her health had become very much improved, and her gratitude seemed unbounded. Dr. Dalton thinks that, if recourse to stimulants be prevented during the cure of this opium habit, any physician may succeed with this plan.—British and Colonial Druggist.

Delicacy of Sense of Smell.—The extreme delicacy of the sense of smell in man has been shown by a series of interesting experiments by Fischer and Penzoldt. In an empty room of some two hundred and thirty cubic meters capacity and tightly closed, a small quantity of the particular substance to be detected was thoroughly mixed with the air, and the observer then admitted. Among the different substances which were tested in this manner it was found that the very smallest amount recognizable was .01 of a milligram of mercaptan. This quantity diffused through the room sufficed to make its distinctive character appreciable in the small volume of air coming in contact with the nerves of the nose, from which it was estimated that the 1-460,000,000 part of a milligram of this substance was recognizable—an infinitesimal quantity, passing conception, but which science declares to be a fact.

Cheap Sodium.—It is said that by the use of carbide of iron and an improved form of furnace, the metal sodium can be produced at a very low cost. If the process prove successful, it will enable the chemist to produce aluminium cheaply from the clay which everywhere abounds. Aluminium has properties which render it very valuable in the arts.

—New Saints.—Two hundred and sixty-one new English saints will be added to the calendar on the occasion of the Pope's Jubilee. They will consist of the English martyrs from the fifteenth to the seventeenth century. Well, if Protestants were to establish an order of saints, and include all those that the Roman Catholic Church slew because they would not submit to it, there would be, at a moderate calculation, more than one saint for every second of time in the year.—Christian Advocate.

—The Missionary and the Fog.—An illustration of popular ignorance and superstition in China, is furnished by a correspondent of one of the papers, who, writing from Nanking, on 16th of Second Month, says: "One of the missionaries had occasion to send for an official on the night of the 14th inst. to disperse a crowd which had gathered at his gate clamoring to have him come out and clear away the fog, which was very dense, and which they claimed he had brought on." The Shenpoo mentions that on the night of the 13th the city of Nanking was enveloped in a dense fog, and the street lamps, which were 100 feet above the ground, were invisible. On the following night the fog was accompanied by the smell of sulphur, which caused the inhabitants to fear that there was a conflagration. It, however, disappeared in about two hours.

—Ritualistic Troubles.—On a recent occasion, rather an extraordinary scene was witnessed at St. John the Baptist's Church, Liverpool. The vicar, as he entered, was seen to carry a lighted taper in his hand. He immediately lit the candles on the altar. The church-wardens, who were sitting in front of the chancel rails, stepped forward and put out the lights. The vicar lit the candles a second time, and as soon as they were lit the church-wardens advanced and blew out the lights. The vicar did not light them a third time. The service then proceeded without 'altar lights.'

The Independent says:—"The ritualistic controversy has reached Australia, and is greatly disturbing the Anglican communion. A teredos in the cathedral at Sydney is an object of concerted attack, and the introduction of candles in churches is bitterly opposed. 'What,' said one of the bishops to a ritualistic clergyman, 'will it profit if we gain a candle and lose a soul?'"

—The Prohibition Cause.—The Baltimore Sun in commenting upon the increased interest manifested by the people of the United States in the Temperance question, calls attention to the gradual increase of the strength of the Prohibition Party, as manifested by the votes cast at the different elections; and adds: "It must be borne in mind that the present Prohibition Party has never as yet polled more than a small percentage of what may be fairly called the Prohibition vote. As tested by the result of the votes on the Constitutional Amendments in various States, and by the votes cast in Local Option contests, there must be from 30 to 40 per cent. of the people of the country who are willing to have the liquor traffic declared illegal."

—Secularian Influence.—State Superintendent of Instruction Draper, of New York, decides, in a case of appeal involving the question whether teachers employed in a public school supported by public moneys, who wear a distinct sectarian garb and address one another by the term "Sister" are not in effect exerting sectarian influence which ought to be prohibited, that they are. He says:

"The conclusion is irresistible that these things may constitute a much stronger secularian or denominational influence over the minds of the children than the repetition of the Lord's Prayer, or the reading of the Scriptures at the opening of the schools, and yet these things have been prohibited, whenever objections have been offered, by the rulings of this department, from the earliest days, because of the purpose enshrined in the hearts of the people, and embedded in the fundamental law of the State, that the public school system shall be kept altogether free from matters not essential to its primary purpose, and dangerous to its harmony and efficiency.—The Independent."

THE FRIEND.

SIXTH MONTH 11, 1857.

There is, perhaps, no one feature in the modern departure from the principles of Friends, which for convenience sake, may be termed the "fast movement," which seems to us so subversive of the whole system of Quakerism; and to be fraught with so many destructive consequences to our profession, and indeed to the spread of the Truth in the earth, as the employment of paid pastors and ministers by our meetings. Whatever plausible excuses and arguments may be adduced in its support, having paid preachers is a revival of the system of "birding ministry," which was so earnestly opposed and condemned by Friends in their beginning.

The testimony we have received as to the practical working of locating and paying ministers, corresponds with what might reasonably be anticipated as the result. The settled "pastor" feels that the people who pay him, expect him to preach to them; and he accordingly in large measure assumes the control of the meeting, prepares himself with a subject and line of thought before coming, so that he may not be compelled to disappoint these expectations; and introduces or encourages singing and reading the Scriptures as means of interesting the people and employing the time when he is not speaking. There is little opening left for the development of true spiritual gifts in the members of a meeting so presided over; for there is but little opportunity for that reverent waiting upon the Lord in silent adoration, which is an essential element in divine worship, and in the exercise of which the mind is enabled to hear the still small voice of Christ, and receives strength to obey his commands.

If a Friend, ten years ago, had predicted that by this time so many of the more fluent speakers would be paid and stationed among the more wealthy congregations of Friends, as is now the case; that the practice would find numerous influential advocates amongst professed members of the Society; and that the action of pastoral committees of several of the Yearly Meetings would substantially justify this course; he would have been regarded as a false prophet, or at least as one unnecessarily alarmed. But the practice has become so widely spread, that the lack of means to pay with seems to be the principal obstacle to its further progress in those sections of the country where the fast movement has had full sway. A year or more ago, an advocate of this movement asserted (if we remember correctly) that there were then not less than 20 such preachers located in this manner; and the number is probably now considerably increased.

In connection with this subject, a minister in one of the Larger Bodies in the West, spoke of one of the effects which the system their meetings are now pursuing, had upon the smaller meetings. The paying and location of so many of the speakers, he said, had materially lessened the frequency with which the meetings generally were visited by travelling ministers. The small meetings especially were neglected; and he believed that among such would be found an open door for those who might be drawn by the love of the Gospel, and qualified and commissioned by the Head of the Church to gather the lost sheep of the house of Israel.

The author of the lately published Essay on "The Theatre," has taken the initial steps to have it published in France. Jules Parodon, of Nismes, and Samuel Combe, of Montmeyran, feel much interested in the matter, the former having undertaken to get the Essay translated into French. This translation is now ready. J. Parodon suggests an edition of 5000 copies, to be sent to ministers, editors, libraries, and to other suitable places and persons throughout the country. Several hundred dollars will be needed for the purpose. The author has tendered moneys (including the profits of past sales,) in his hands, for the object stated, but has probably but an eighth part of the sum required. Friends who may wish to further this matter, may send their contributions to Josiah W. Leeds, 528 Walnut Street, Philadelphia. While the theatre is patronized in France by people who make a profession of religion, even more than it is here, yet it may be that so awful an event as the recent burning of the great theatre in Paris, with the accompanying sacrifice of so many lives, may produce a soberness and a disposition to heed the facts concerning the real tendency of stage entertainments, such as was probably the result in this country subsequent to the memorable destruction of the Richmond (Va.) theatre.

Several communications addressed to the Editor of "The Friend" have been received during the past three weeks, which his absence from home has prevented him from attending to. He has now returned, and makes this explanation, that his correspondents may not feel that they have been improperly neglected.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The public debt statement shows a reduction during the Fifth Month of $8,888,997. Total cash in the Treasury, $466,269,526.

William A. Wheeler, ex-Vice President of the United States, died on the 4th instant, at his home in Malone, New York. He was in the 68th year of his age.

Ulysses Mercur, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, died on the morning of the 6th inst., at the residence of his son, at Wallingford. He was born in 1818.

According to the Pittsburg Chronicle-Telegraph, the fire waste record for 1887, in the United States and the Dominion of Canada, promises to be the heaviest ever known, already exceeding that for the corresponding period in 1886, by about twenty per cent. and steadily growing. A peculiar feature of the situation is that the great bulk of the property now being reduced to ashes, is what underwriters class as the choicest risks, while the kind usually counted extra hazardous and insured only at the highest rates, if written at all, is escaping destruction.

An earthquake shock which "seemed like an underground explosion of great severity," was felt at Jamestown, New York, at ten o'clock in the morning of Fifth Month 31st. Many people ran out of their houses in alarm. Another shock of earthquake was felt at Benson, Arizona, at 11.55 on the 6th instant.

San Francisco papers complain of the extent to which the use of profane and vulgar language is permitted on the streets of that city, and charge that the police, instead of being champions of decency and good manners, often offend in the same way.

All the hotel keepers in Council Bluffs, Iowa, have been summoned to show why injunctions should not be granted against them, and all the owners of property where saloons are still running are being arrested and placed under bonds of $700 each to appear in the District Court for contempt.

Prohibition is expected to carry all the counties in Dakota, outside the Black Hills, next fall.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 352, which was 43 less than during the previous week, and 8 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing, 188 were males and 164 females; and the same number of adults and minors: 22 died of consumption; 36 of diseases of the heart; 22 of convulsions; 19 of pneumonia; 18 of debility, and 12 of marasmus.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4 1/2's, 109 1/2; 4's, registered, 128 1/2; coupon, 129 1/2; currency 6's, 123 a 134.

Cotton was quiet but firm, at 11 1/2 cts. for middling uplands.

Feed was weak, with liberal supplies and a light demand. Sales of 1 car medium winter bran at $15.50; 1 car good do. do., $16; 1 car prime do. do., at $16.75, and 1 car choice Southern do., at $17 per ton. Quotations: Bran, western winter, choice, $17; do., do. medium to prime, $15.50 a $16.75; bran, spring, $15 a $16.

Flour and Meal.—Flour was steady, under moderate offerings, but demand was confined to the immediate wants of the home trade. Sales of 125 barrels Pennsylvania roller, straight, at $4.35; 375 barrels Ohio, straight, at $4.50 a $4.55; 500 barrels winter patent, at $4.75 a $5; 200 sacks Minnesota, clear, at $3.80 per 196 lbs.; 125 barrels Minnesota, straight, at $4.65, and 500 barrels do., patent, at $4.85 a $5. Rye flour was dull and weak at $2.65 a $2.85 per barrel as to quality; 100 barrels fair sold at $2.65.

Grain.—Wheat has advanced slightly; No. 2 red closing at 96 1/2 cts. bid and 96 1/2 cts. asked. Corn was nominal; No. 2 mixed closing at 46 1/2 cts. bid and 47 cts. asked. Oats were dull but steady, No. 2 white closing at 36 1/2 cts. bid and 37 1/2 cts. asked.

Beef cattle were 1/2 c. higher, at 3 1/2 a 3 1/2 cts.

Sheep were 1/2 c. higher, at 2 a 4 1/2 cts. Fall lambs, were active, at 4 a 5 1/2 cts. Spring lambs, were active, at 6 a 9 1/2 cts.

Hogs were 1/2 c. lower; Western, at 7 a 7 1/2 cts. State, at 6 1/2 cts.

FOREIGN.—The inaugural conference of the Radical Union was opened on the 1st instant, at Birmingham, by Joseph Chamberlain. A resolution was passed in favor of the largest possible extension of local government to Ireland, subject to the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament and the protection of the Protestant minority.

W. E. Gladstone has been making a tour in Wales. At Swansea, on the 4th instant, one hundred thousand Welshmen, wearing rosettes and bearing banners and accompanied by numerous bands of music, marched in a procession, after which they were addressed for an hour by the orator. He advocated the question of Welsh disestablishment being decided by the Welsh people themselves.

The Sultan of Turkey has ceded the Island of Cyprus to England.

A final estimate of the victims of the burning of the Opera Comique, places the number at 130, including the remains of forty persons which were found in the ruins, but which were so badly burned as to be unrecognizable.

A despatch from Berlin, dated Sixth Mo. 5th, says: During a circus performance at Neschen last evening a storm arose and a portion of the roof of the circus structure was blown off. The pendant lamps hanging from the roof were broken, and the blazing petroleum poured down upon the heads of the people below. There were 2000 spectators, and a fearful panic arose. In the midst of the tumult one lightly-built wall of the structure fell in, and the whole building immediately collapsed. A large number of persons were burned, and many trampled to death, and 300 others were more or less injured.

Violent hailstorms have done immense damage in the Temesvar and Buzias districts in Hungary. The distress increases hourly. Numerous lives have been lost. Entire herds of cattle have been drowned at Mako. The flood has reached Canad County, and fully 50,000 acres of wheat land will soon be inundated. Csongard is submerged. It is calculated that 50,000 families have been ruined by the floods.

The Crown-Prince of Germany has undergone an operation for the removal of a small tumor from the entrance to the windpipe. Professor Virchow pronounces it to be non-malignant in its character.

News has reached Merv, from Herat, that the Ghilzais have defeated a thousand of the Ameer's regular troops, and captured five guns and considerable baggage. Daharneh, the commander of the Ameer's forces, was captured and beheaded. The inhabitants of the province of Herat and the adjoining districts are greatly excited over the success of the revolted tribe, and it is stated are ready to join the Ghilzais. News has been received from Herat that the Ameer of Afghanistan is in a critical position. He has withdrawn the garrisons of Herat and Balkh for the purpose of reinforcing the troops defeated in the recent encounter with the Ghilzais.

The report that a volcano broke out in the Sierra Madre, near Piedras Verdas, Chihuahua, during the first of the recent earthquake shocks, is confirmed by exploring parties. A mass of molten lava is pouring down the mountain side, and extends ten miles from the crater. The heat prevents a nearer approach than three miles.

The Dominion Senate has decided, by a vote of 30 to 13, that a divorce obtained in the United States is of no effect in Canada.

The annual public meeting of the Society for Home Culture will be held at Friends' Select School, No. 140 North Sixteenth St., Philad'a, at 3 p. m., Seventh-day, Sixth Mo. 11th, 1887.

The Secretary will report the work done by the students during the past year. There may also be expected papers on observations made in the field, and a discussion as to the most feasible methods of aiding and extending a practical interest in the Natural Sciences.

MARY P. ELKINTON, Secretary, 325 Pine Street, Philad'a.

Selections from the Diary of Abigail W. Hall.

Ninth Mo. 13th, 1856. A precious quiet reigns. During which prayer hath seemed to be the almost constant covering of my spirit; interceding that the Lord would be pleased to show me the way wherein He would have me to go. Then I will follow Thee faithfully, come life or come death; any thing that will assist in working out the great work for me.

15th. The favors of yesterday, I dare not let go unnoticed. A little prayer similar to this, arose in my heart on first awaking in the morning:

"In midst of dangers, fears, and death,
Thy goodness I'll adore;
And thank thee for thy mercies past,
And humbly hope for more."

18th. When the poor tribulated disciples walked by the way and were sad, it is written, "Jesus joined himself to them;" and I felt this morning as though He was very near to some of us, even to querying, "what manner of communications are these," &c.

20th. When the Lord's holy influence is felt to prevail, how precious is the quiet. My heart was tender under a feeling of this, this morning.

27th. How long such a quiet comfortable feeling is to overspread the dear children, I know not; but there is something very teaching in it, showing so clearly the superintending care and help of a kind Providence. This, too, has caused me to feel much of late like poor Peter, when he said: "Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord." Still I can query, as Peter did, "Thou knowest all things, thou knowest that I love thee." If I am found fit in any way to administer to thy "lamb," all praise shall be given unto Thee, thou fountain of love and life. I remember what a dear friend once said to me, "It is the altar that sanctifies the gift."

29th. Remembered, affectingly so, this language of that eminent apostle Paul: "Neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I may finish my course with joy," &c. He could also say, "None of these things move me," &c. What a mercy and favor to know our foundation established upon that Rock that cannot be shaken. My prayer very often is, that this may be my condition, so that neither the rain, nor the wind, nor all that tries the poor structure, may be enabled to overthrow. And I am convinced it will be so, as there is a fleeing unto my alone sure Helper.

10th Mo. 1st. I have thought this morning that my condition resembled that of the poor woman, who "cried after Jesus for the life of her little daughter." She continued to cry, saying to Him, when told "it was not meet to take the children's bread and cast it to dogs," "truth, Lord, yet the dogs eat of the crumbs that fall from their master's table." By night and by day is my spiritual life pleaded for. And though unworthy as I feel of the very least of the Lord's mercies, still I cry on. May He in mercy, regard.

[After alluding to the death of a relative, our Diarist thus comments and sets forth her views and feelings:] Thou wilteth, O Heavenly Father! not the death of any who die in their sins; but art pleased to grant a measure of thy good Spirit to assist us in working out our soul's salvation with fear and trembling before Thee. So do, O Lord! for thy poor hand-maiden, who feels unable to take a single step aright without thy holy assistance, either to ask forgiveness for sins past, or to be delivered in future from temptation.

Twelfth Mo. 5th. Many and multiplied are the favors and blessings daily conferred upon us! Have had our Committee acceptably with us. May the gospel labor which has been bestowed, not be in vain. In our meeting on First-day, dear Elizabeth Evans was remarkably led; and on Fifth-day, S. Bettle, Senior, quite as much so. Though they were differently exercised, yet their concern centered in one and the same thing, viz: to wean us from the world, and to draw us unto Christ, who remains to be "the Way, the Truth and the Life;" and who hath said, "No man cometh unto the Father but by me."

From a letter written by A. W. H., dated West-town, Twelfth Month 1st, 1856, we extract the subjoined more extended relation of the gospel labors on said occasion of our well remembered and beloved friend, Elizabeth Evans, viz: "Through that favored instrument, E. E., bread was blessed and banded forth to us. The dear children seemed to be the objects of her tender solicitude; and in a most feeling and solemn manner was she led to address them; arising with these words of the prophet Ezekiel: 'Thus saith the Lord, Behold all souls are mine; as the soul of the father, so the soul of the son is mine: the soul that sinneth it shall die.' From this followed just such a communication as I think I never before heard. Though addressed to the children, it was instructive to us all. The inducements held forth, to endeavor to lead good lives were such, that I hope they may never be forgotten; neither the warning to those who may turn a deaf ear as, 'The soul that sinneth it shall die.' While the good children were remembered and encouraged to hold on, and not to be drawn or turned aside from the right way by those that were naughty; a warning and caution went forth to a class, who not only did wrong themselves, but led others thereinto; and such as these could not entice, they scoffed at, &c. She spoke of the sufferings and tribulations that even children had to endure, and encouraged all such to look up to their Father in heaven, who would ever stand by them; and when separated from their earthly parents, would take care of, and watch over them. The exercise of their religiously careful parents, especially concerned mothers, whose tears and prayers were often poured forth for them, was set forth in such a moving way, as must have come home to every feeling mind. Methinks I never remember more brokenness among the girls. All were shown that each had within them a precious, immortal part to be saved or lost. The happy state after death of the good, and the miserable condition of the bad, was set forth, as given by our blessed Lord himself: 'Come ye blessed,' &c., and 'Depart ye cursed,' &c. That good country was also alluded to as described in the Holy Scriptures, 'whose walls are salvation,' 'gates praise,' and 'pavements of pure gold.'

This is only a small part of what she said. But to have such labor bestowed upon us just at the opening, when it is necessary that some things she said, should be said, that I did feel it a great favor. I think no one present can be guilty of wrong doing, without this labor rising up in judgment against them. Then, dear E., like a ship heavily laden, was drawn to plead on behalf of us, who were placed over this flock and family; that our vessels might be daily replenished with heavenly oil; that there might not be a living on yesterday's manna, &c. &c. It did seem to me that our friend labored, and that not without a cause. I felt my own need, and the need of others; and it was cause for thankfulness to be thus remembered. Nevertheless, as I have said within my heart this morning, what will all avail if each one does not labor for themselves! We cannot save one another. The salvation of the immortal part must be wrought out between God and our own souls. Feeling and knowing this, oh! that I may be inspired to 'work while it is called to-day.'

[The allusion made in the foregoing, to the several classes of parents, teachers, and children, is fitting and teaching. And can there be a doubt, that if the former two, were fully alive to the momentous influence they exert, one way or the other, over the tender and susceptible hearts and minds of dear children—involving a proportional responsibility—and were duly disposed to improve that talent as they ought to the honor of the Great Giver, that more of our youth would manifest the precious fruits of this religious care and training? and we should see an increasing number of said class growing up in good liking before the Lord, and prepared by Him to occupy with the gifts He purchased for them, unto filling positions in the church, so that the waste places among us would not so mourn.

Were all parents and teachers deeply interested themselves in our holy religion, and in the promotion of the inward and spiritual kingdom of the Lord Jesus, they could not but feel bound, in the ability which He gives, to impart thereof to those placed under their care, unto their edification and instruction in the way of regeneration and holiness. We remember, in this connection, the instance of a lawyer who was greatly interested in his profession; and whose only daughter, from being much with him, had learned so many of the varied points of law, as to be quite familiar and intelligently apt with them. Now if we apply this to religious professors, interested as they should be in the welfare of their offspring and those placed under them, how could they help teaching diligently to such at proper seasons, of that which they themselves had tasted and handled, had received the most benefit from, and which is so forcibly enjoined in Holy Scripture: remembering that "of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh" and inciteth.]

10th. Have at this time a dear child very ill (inflammation of the lungs); known alone to Him who knoweth all things, how it is to terminate. She queried this morning of her mother, "Dear mother, why is thee troubled?" "don't be troubled for me." There is abundant more need, I verily believe, for some of us to be troubled for ourselves. I am often made to feel that many of these dear lambs that we are placed over, are nearer the kingdom than some of us who are older.

18th. More than a week has elapsed since last note in this book. I have passed through a great deal within that time—trials of a very close nature, of which I feel not at liberty to speak. I have given myself and my all up into the hands of our Heavenly Father. He sees and knows the extremity I am in; and surely He will, if I cleave unto Him, take care of me. The prayer of my heart by night and by day has been, do with me as seemeth Thee good.

20th. The dear children have been very good throughout the day: giving as little trouble as children can. It is often humbling to my feelings to see them so quiet and still. Nothing short of the good Spirit could thus curb and direct. All praise be given unto Him, who remains to be the helper of his people.

31st. Another year about to close upon us! While many have been spared to measure it out, others have during its course, been summoned hence to that bourn from whence none return. The thought is a very solemn one, and ought to have full place with every one of us, seeing we know not the day nor the hour, wherein the Son of man cometh, "whether at midnight, at cock-crowing, or in the morning." We know not that the year about to dawn, will be lengthened out to us. But if forgiveness for the past be only experienced, and we enabled to live each day, in mercy given, aright, it will matter not. I think I can say renewed desires have been raised this morning, to be found walking in the way I should go; and surely a sight of that way will not be withheld, if sincerity and uprightness are mine.

What we Saw of New England in Ten Days.

As the season for travel approaches, it may be acceptable to some, who are contemplating a trip for vacation, to have the experience of recent tourists to help them decide on a direction or locality. With this view we offer the following:

Choosing the long days of Summer, we left home the 13th of Seventh Month—a party of four—to take the 11 A. M. train from Broad St. Station, for New York. Reaching there at 1.30, we lunched, and then proceeded to deposit our satchels on the Providence, a steamer bound for Newport and Fall River. We then walked a few squares to the foot of Brooklyn Bridge, and took the cable cars that run constantly from end to end, by steam, returning every ten or fifteen minutes. This remarkable structure is a mile in length, and crosses the East River, connecting New York and Brooklyn. It is a suspension bridge resting on large piers, and extending far inland at both extremities; and from its centre commands a fine water view of the bay.

After riding over and back, we took the elevated railway for Central Park, and drove to Cleopatra's Needle. This celebrated obelisk, brought from Egypt by a steamer, was erected here at much expense and trouble; our informant stating that the vessel it was brought on had the bulk-head knocked out in order to land it,—the street it was carried over was completely torn up, and that it had to be raised by a derrick after standing over night, it settled so quickly below the surface. It was placed on a knoll in the park, so that visitors can drive around it and examine the ancient hieroglyphics on every side. These the severe cold of our winters threatened to efface, till the commissioners protected the surface from the frost by a transparent cement.

After a drive through the beautiful grounds, we returned to our steamboat for a ride by evening through Long Island Sound. Our attention was first directed to the frame erected for the Statue of Liberty, on Bedloe Island, which was shortly to enlighten that world-famed harbor.

The Ode to the Bartholdi Statue, written by John Greenleaf Whittier, from Oak Knoll, Tenth Mo. 22d, 1886, to commemorate this event, may not come inappropriately here, in preference to anything of our own.

"The land that from the rule of kings,
In freeing us, itself made free,
Our Old-world sister, to us brings
Her sculptured Dream of Liberty.

Unlike the shapes on Egypt's sands
Uplifted by the toll-woman slave,
On Freedom's soil by freeman's hands
We rear the symbol free hands gave.

O France, the beautiful, to thee
Once more a debt of love we owe;
In peace beneath thy Fleur-de-lis
We hail a later Rochambeau.

Rise, stately symbol; holding forth
Thy light and hope to all who sit
In chains and darkness; belt the earth
With watch-fires from thy torch uplit.

Reveal the primal mandate still,
Which Chaos heard and ceased to be,
Trace on mid-air the Eternal Trill
In signs of fire: "Let man be free."

Shine far, shine free, a guiding light
To Reason's ways, and Virtue's aim,
A lightning flash the wretch to smite
Who shields his license with thy name."

The fortifications on Governor's Island claimed our notice and awakened gloomy reflections; and next the public institutions—Men's and Women's Hospitals, House of Correction, and the Prisons on Blackwell's Island—the New Yorkers preferring to isolate these classes of their population by water as well as by walls. We passed over Hell Gate, where such terrific explosions have cleared the channel, but there was nothing to mark the great convulsions. We then dropped in for the night to land in early morning at Newport.

Six o'clock found us in the quaint old city, and after refreshment at our pretty hotel, the Aquidneck, we took a carriage for the ten mile circuit of the cliffs. These are overlooked by handsome residences of the wealthy. Such citizens as William Vanderbilt, Fairman Rogers and Catharine Wolfe, "the wealthiest unmarried lady in the United States." At the time of her death, which occurred last winter, her income was estimated at from $1000 to $1500 per day. The Wolfe expedition to Babylon, some years ago, was carried on at her expense; she also contributed to an expedition to Asia Minor under Dr. Sterill, beside patronizing many charitable institutions and religious efforts, and employing the poor around her. As one means of doing this, she had adjoining her summer home, a lot devoted to poultry and vegetables; every potato, it was said, cost her $2.00, and a rich neighbor, who grazes a few acres, and makes butter, eats it at a cost of $25.00 per lb., owing to the price and consequent taxation of the land.

After driving for miles among costly homes, calling upon our relatives on Broadway and Narragansett Bay, and visiting the old tower and Jewish burial ground, we drove to the station near 5 P. M., and were shortly in Doane Street, Boston.

The next morning we devoted to Harvard University; not, like ours in West Philadelphia, comprising three or four buildings, but including thirty-four—a fair village of large and handsome edifices—beside four out of the limits of Cambridge. The oldest one, Massachusetts Hall, was built in 1720, though the College was founded by vote of the colony, in 1636, and named after John Harvard, a young clergyman, who died and bequeathed to it his library of 300 volumes, and 700 pounds sterling.

Incidents and Reflections.—No. 134.

One of the old numbers of the Moral Almanac contains the following interesting account of the experience of a man, who under great trials, was enabled to maintain his faithfulness to his convictions, and was finally brought out of all his distresses. The person who gives the relation says:—

"About the year 1815 I became associated in the Committee of the London Female Penitentiary with an excellent man, who very shortly afterwards became a visitor at my house, and who related to me his very interesting history, which was as follows.

"He told me that in early life he had been placed in the general post-office, whence he had risen to the situation of first clerk in the receiver-general's or accountant-general's office—I think the first; with a salary of £500 per annum; that he was at that time very gay, frequenting with his wife, the theatre, and places of public amusement, and spending year by year, very nearly the income he received. But he was not happy, for he had an impression on his mind that things were not right between him and God. In the gaiety of his heart he read novels, but he had never been in the habit of reading the Bible or attending the place of worship. In consequence of the disquiet of his mind he began to read the Bible, but being unacquainted with its contents, he knew not where to look for those parts which might be most profitable to him. He went to a neighboring place of worship, and some of the prayers seemed interesting, but there was nothing in the sermon which came home to him. He went to other places, but with no better result. One morning, in passing through White Hart-court, Grace-church-street, he saw the Friends going into their meeting-house, and he determined to go in too. In the course of the service an aged Christian man spoke with much feeling of the difficulties which some men felt in coming to God, stating that it had been his own case. He then referred to those parts of Scripture which he had found to be of an encouraging nature. The gentleman told me that he was quite thunderstruck at finding the good man expressing the very feelings and referring to the very difficulties of which he had been the subject for some months previous. The address of this aged Friend had excited an interest he had never felt before, and he went home and searched those parts of the Scriptures to which he had referred.

"He then determined to tell his wife where he had been, not having done so on the previous occasion. He met as he expected, with sneers and contempt, and, 'Oh,' said the good man, 'could I expect anything else? If she had taken that course a few months previous, when my mind was given to vanity, I have no doubt I should have said pretty much what she did.' He persevered in attending, notwithstanding her remonstrances, and very soon afterwards purchased the works of the Quaker writers. He little thought at the time, as he said, to what this would expose him; but in his reading he found what he considered very strong arguments against the taking of an oath, which he was required by the course of the office to take once a quarter to the accuracy of his accounts. After a very serious examination of the subject, he came to the decision that he ought not to take it; and the clerk who stood next to him in the office, having no such scruple, he requested leave of his principal to change places with that clerk; by doing this he would lose £100 a year; but that he was willing to sacrifice for conscience sake. On mentioning this to his wife, he told me that he brought the most bitter reproaches upon himself for neglecting the interests of his family, in giving up that of which they ought to have the benefit; and he was charged with cruelty towards her and his children. But this was not his greatest trial, for his principal positively refused to allow of the exchange, wishing, as it afterwards appeared, for an opportunity of placing another person in his office. The quarter-day approaching he again applied, stating that the second clerk had gone over the account with the vouchers, and was prepared to swear to its accuracy; but this was again refused, and, on the day on which they were to be presented, he was called before the principal, asked whether he was prepared to swear to the accounts, and declining to do so, he was at once superseded, and another person put into his place; who swore to them the same day, after an hour's examination.

"The storm and the tempest which he had to encounter when he went home and told his wife that he was dismissed, was, as he said, tremendous. The children were presented to him, one by one, and he was told that he would be their murderer; and each day only brought fresh reproaches. He immediately made inquiries for means of obtaining a subsistence, but could hear of none. After a time, the little money he had saved was nearly expended, and poverty seemed to stare him in the face: still as he told me he was enabled to trust in God.

"One day, as he came out of the Friends' meeting-house, two of the elder brethren took him aside, desiring to speak to him, and they asked him whether it was true that he had given up his office sooner than violate his conscience? He told them it was. They desired him to meet them the next day, and then inquired particularly into his circumstances. He told them frankly everything, and they called at his house and satisfied themselves, by inquiring of the persons to whom he referred them, that his statement was correct; and having done so, they told him they were willing to give him a trial, but that it must be in a subordinate situation; and learning that he had been intended for a chemist, and had begun to learn the business when his father had obtained for him the situation in the post-office, they made an arrangement for his serving in a chemist's shop, and afterwards assisting in the warehouse of a wholesale chemist, each for six or eight months, they allowing his family during the time two guineas-a-week, 'for which,' as he said, 'I was thankful.' At the end of that time, his employers certifying that he was qualified to go into business, they set him up in a shop, lending him £300 to begin with, and giving him a running credit with a wholesale druggist for £300 more. God prospered him in his business, and when I first made his acquaintance, he was a man of good property; and his wife who had long before become a Friend, was quite satisfied with the course he had taken."

The Earnest Christian of Sixth Month, 1886, gives some instructive reminiscences of James Kennedy, of San José, California, with whom the editor of that paper had made his home some years before. He was a native of Scotland, who had removed to this country in early life. In 1852, in company with many others, he went with teams across the plains to California. He was chosen leader of the caravan, and every Seventh-day went into camp, and did not allow a wagon to be moved till Second-day morning. After a few weeks some of the company became impatient, and drove ahead on the First-day, without waiting for the rest. Others followed their example, so that he was left alone with his own family and teams. But he persevered in his course, and got through in safety, with his cattle in good order, having lost none, and without being once molested by the Indians. After about ten days, the first of those who had left him arrived, and others came straggling in for two weeks more. They had lost a number of cattle and those that lived were poor.

After he reached California, J. Kennedy engaged in the "packing business." In those days there were no railroads and no wagon roads to the mining camps in the mountains. Their roads were narrow trails, often up the steep sides of mountains, and through and across deep ravines; and only men, or small, sure-footed mules could pass over these mountain trails in safety. Supplies were carried to the miners by trains of mules having on them pack-saddles, on which were loaded, meat, flour, vegetables, canned goods, clothes, and everything wanted in a mining camp. From a dozen to twenty mules constituted a train. When J. Kennedy loaded up his first train at Sacramento, the merchant of whom he bought, a brother Scotchman, said, "You must load one mule with whiskey."

"Not a mule of mine will ever pack any whiskey," was the prompt and decided answer. "You will fail then in business; for it is of no use for you to attempt to trade with miners unless you keep whiskey."

"Then fail it is; for they will never get any whiskey by means of me."

The mule that the merchant intended should carry whiskey was loaded with onions. This proved a most profitable venture, for the scurvy had broken out in camp, and onions were in great demand. At the close of the season it was found that he had done better than any of the traders who carried whiskey.

The feeling on the subject of slavery ran high in those days. Everywhere men met on the American continent the subject was agitated. Kennedy often had to defend in the mining camps the cause of human freedom. On one occasion, the landlord, though he had formerly been a college professor at the north, defended slavery with marked ability. Kennedy answered his arguments so well that the listeners insisted upon a public discussion. Arrangements were speedily made, and the question of slavery was debated with warmth and skill until two o'clock in the morning. The vote of the audience was very largely in favor of freedom; and they were all unconsciously being prepared to take the right side in the great struggle which was to determine the fate of slavery in this republic.

When the war broke out, J. Kennedy was toll-keeper on a turnpike owned mostly by Southerners. He sometimes had in his hands from two to three thousand dollars. Yet during all this time he never kept a revolver, or arms of any kind; and no attempt was ever made to rob him, though the mill and the store near by were robbed.

News that the conflict had actually begun reached them when one of the directors, a hot-headed Southerner, was with him.

"I would like," said this director, "to cut the heart out of the first black republican I meet."

"You had better," said Kennedy, "begin on me. You will not find a better one."

The Southerner, ashamed of himself, changed the subject at once.

Some of his friends urged Kennedy to be more careful of what he said, as he might lose his position, the directors being generally Southerners. He replied that if he did, it would make no difference; he should stand by the right, come what would.

But he was confident they would not discharge him, for they wanted an honest man in his position, and they knew it was difficult to get one. He kept his place till the war closed, and he voluntarily resigned.

He died in the 82d year of his age, in the hope of a blessed immortality.

For "The Friend."

On Secret Societies, (Supplementary.)

The desire of the writer not to unduly lengthen his essay upon Secret Societies (continued through several recent numbers of "The Friend,") decided him, at the time, not to make any reference to the "Lodge of sorrow" worship which of late years has been growing in favor with the Freemasons. Since the article was written, however, there was held in the largest public hall in this city, an imposing service or celebration of the kind referred to, so that I deem it proper to adduce this feature of lodgery also, as additionally showing the antagonism of the secret institution to the spiritual religion of the Lord Jesus Christ. The following statement, from the American, of Washington, together with its description of a like celebration of the "Lodge of sorrow" recently opened at Norwich, Connecticut, will answer very well for what might have been said of its Philadelphia counterpart.

"What Christian cannot perceive that it is, in fact, the substitution of sensual for spiritual worship? Ancient idolators were familiar with the very forms that are used in these funeral services. Is the burning of candles by Freemasons any less objectionable or foolish than by the Chinese? Shall Protestants disapprove the latter and endorse the former? What means the 'golden censor,' if not the offering of worship, yet it is not the worship of God, for He has not authorized men to approach Him with such ceremonies. At Norwich, Conn., a 'Lodge of sorrow' was opened. The people attended and doubtless considered it very solemn. But solemnity is no mark of purity. The service was under the auspices of King Solomon Grand Lodge of Perfection, Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite of Free Masons. The catafalque was erected in an open space in the center of the hall, around which the seats were arranged. On the top of the cenotaph rested a handsome silver-mounted casket, covered with a black velvet pall, and the sides bore the name of the deceased, inscribed on white, triangular fields that stood out in bold relief against the black background. From the ceiling, directly over the casket, radiated festoons of black and white to the corners of the hall, and the gallery front was draped in emblems of mourning. At the head, foot, and one side of the casket stood three tall white candles; and on the fourth side lay a sheathed sword. Near the head of the catafalque stood a white pillar bearing a golden censer. After a large bell had tolled the hour, a trumpet call, arranged from 'Lohengrin,' was executed. Four sentinels entered and, after affixing a blazing torch at each corner of the bier, commenced pacing before the sombre pile. They were followed soon by the officers and members of the lodge, attired in black robes and berettas, and broad sashes containing the nine symbolic colors. The officers also wore brilliant jewels. The solemn procession made a circuit of the bier, to the music of Beethoven's Funeral March, and took their seats. The lodge was then declared open, and after more music there were addresses. Then the candles were put out one by one, and the roll of the deceased members was read. Then the Master of ceremonies, lighting a flambeau, flashed it before the catafalque three times, each time calling to the deceased: 'We mourn for thee.' 'We call upon thee to answer.' 'Do you year our call?' After more music and addresses the tolling bell announced 'Low XII.' midnight, typifying the depth of sorrow. After this, the gas lights, which had been subdued, were turned up and then began the ceremonies illustrating 'faith,' 'hope,' and the 'resurrection.' In this we have the ancient forms of mourning for the dead, the heathen ceremony of propitiating the evil spirits by fire and finally the triumphant resurrection, without any reference to Him who is 'the resurrection and life.' Yet this idolatry holds in favor with the masses through the supposed approbation by Christian churches.

Having understood that there were some who read the Essay hereinabove alluded to, who questioned whether the institution of the secret, oath-bound lodge, could really be so objectionable as was mentioned, I believe it right to cite two or three further corroborative testimonies which have come incidentally to my notice since the article was written.

In pursuance of a request, I was present at the hearing, before a magistrate, of two men charged with the offence of offering and circulating papers of a highly immoral character. One of the defendants in extenuating his unlawful act, deposed that he belonged to quite a number of secret societies—the Grand Army among the rest—and that (to use his words) "as is the usual custom, we were in the way of having a social after the lodge business was done, having a free and easy time, with songs," &c. The specimen submitted was of such a character that the defendant was held in heavy bail to answer at court.

A citizen who is known to many Friends, a man of excellent character, stated to me that he had belonged to the extensive order known as the "Knights of Pythias," but that he had severed his connection therewith, and that he does not see how one could be a religious man and remain in membership with such an organization. It was (and is) the custom once a year for the Grand Lodge to appoint committees, who visit the Subordinate Lodges for the purpose of installing the officers who have been elected for the ensuing term, but who cannot assume their positions until they have bound themselves by oath to obey all mandates emanating from the Supreme and Grand Lodge (no matter how it may differ from their own ideas of right or wrong.) While awaiting admission to the lodge room they would indulge in conversation and reading of a decidedly vulgar character; and again, after the business of the lodge was concluded, though the rules might forbid the drinking of liquors in the room, it was usual, nevertheless, to adjourn to a saloon, where some would stay and carouse until long after midnight.

A Friend, travelling on a train west of Pittsburgh, a few months ago, fell into conversation with a brakeman, who, after descanting on the excellencies of the Masonic rules and ritual, ended with the remark: "If I live up to that, I won't need any other religion."

Finally, it was only yesterday that a worthy minister of Congregational affiliations said to me that he had lately met with one, a minister in our religious Society, who, admitting that he belonged to several secret orders, was offended at my informant because he declared his disunity with the lodges. It is greatly to be regretted that any of our members should be caught in such entangling alliances, where others may be stumbled by their example.

Babylon and Zion.

"Babylon is built in the likeness of Zion, but by another spirit." And the children of Babylon are governed by the god of this world; while the children of Zion are governed by the God of heaven. So there is a true and a false to everything pertaining to religion; a true worship and a false; a true ministry and a false; true prayer and false; true singing and false. And there is an outward ear to hear outward things; and an inward ear to hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches. And there is an outward eye, and outward understanding, to enable us to read and understand the outward law, which is given for the government of the natural man; and there is an inward eye and an inward or spiritual understanding given, that the man of God may read and understand the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus.

This inward law and light, as it is believed in and obeyed, leads us more and more away from under the government of the king of Babylon, who now so wonderfully rules and reigns in the hearts of the children of disobedience; although they are professing to walk in the ways of Zion, and to be governed by the King of heaven. Oh! "the deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish," &c. But there is a light offered to all the darkened sons of Adam, by which as it is received, believed in and obeyed, they will be enabled to see the difference between the power of the King of Zion, and of the king of Babylon; and to detect the workings of Satan, producing discord and confusion in our families and in our churches. But where the god of this world has been suffered to blind the eyes of them that believe not, they cannot discern the difference. So they "call evil good, and good evil; put darkness for light, and light for darkness; put bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter, and are wise in their own eyes, and prudent in their own sight." But it may turn out to be the case that "that which is highly esteemed among men, is abomination in the sight of God."

It was said of Israel of old, (Matt. xiii. 14, 15) "By hearing ye shall hear, and not understand; and seeing ye shall see, and shall not perceive: for this people's heart is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes have they closed; lest at any time they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and should understand with their hearts, and should be converted, and I should heal them," &c. They voluntarily closed their eyes against the light, and so may we. If we turn away from the light, and choose darkness, we shall be left to our choice; but leanness and darkness will cover the soul. If we prefer darkness, as Israel did, we may expect the light to be withdrawn, leaving the darkness to be very great.

In this condition there is danger of a fatal mistake in religion. We may take the emotional teachings and the leadings of "mystery Babylon the great," for a "remarkable outpouring of the Holy Spirit" from the King of Zion, the city of the saints' solemnities—which brings forth the peaceable fruits of righteousness to them that are exercised thereby. But by those who love darkness rather than light, those heavenly things will never be seen; as their eyes they have closed. And to such it might be said, "Ephraim is joined to idols; let him alone,"—a sorrowful condition indeed! We can pity, but not restore.

From whence does the ministry which belongs to the wisdom and will-worship of man, get its support and life? Does it get it from the school of Christ, and from the Teacher who teaches as never man taught? Or does it not far more likely spring from the colleges of men, and the wisdom of this world that knows not God? but which is foolishness with God. But it suits the worldly wise, and gets the applause of men, which is idolatry; while it leads away from Zion, and strengthens the stakes of Babylon. Because it is not from the heart, but from the head; not from the Spirit that giveth life; but from the letter that killeth. Those who are taken in the snares of popularity, are carried captive to Babylon the great; the mother of all the false births, or of all who, while they are arrayed in Babylonish garments, are professing to be the true-born children of God; and to sing the songs of Zion. But they cannot sing the Lord's song in a strange land, where their harps are hung upon the willows in the midst of the streams of confusion.

How do the ways of our Zion mourn because so few living ones come to her solemn feasts. It is because the attachments of Babylon, and the allurements thereof, are so strong on the children of nature, that so many are drawn into the broad way of the world, and so few find the narrow way to life everlasting. The attractions of Zion are peculiar to herself, and are not adorned with the merchandise of Babylon, which consists in "gold and in silver, and pearls, and fine linen, and purple, and silk, and scarlet, and even in the souls of men." For many sell their souls in exchange for the merchandise of Babylon. But the children of Zion are not adorned in the robes of Babylon. Because they are not of the world, even as Christ, their leader, is not of the world, and He bade his children to "keep unspotted from the world;" hating even the garments that are spotted by the flesh. So the Church of Zion, even though she may be in the minority, is commanded to "come out of Babylon, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues: for her sins have reached unto heaven, and God hath remembered her iniquity."

The teaching of the King of Zion, the only true God, will lead us by his light away from all mere human mediation, and interference, to a direct relationship and communion with our Creator. It will call us away from all merely intellectual or human teachers, to Christ within, the great Teacher of teachers; from outward rites to inward experience; from the baptism of water, to the washing of regeneration, and the renewing of the Holy Ghost; from the bread and wine of the sacramental board, to the spiritual communion of the table in the heart, where we can partake mystically of the flesh and blood of the Son of Man, which becomes as meat indeed, and as drink indeed, and which nourisheth up the spiritual man unto eternal life. Thus we become strong in the Lord and in the power of his might, until we are enabled to break entirely away from the bondage of the letter and come to the freedom of the Spirit: from the shadow to the substance, and from Babylon to Zion, where we can behold Jerusalem a quiet habitation, and worship God in the beauty of holiness. This is Apostolical Christianity, and Quakerism in its primitive purity; answering the witness of God in the hearts of those around us. This is coming directly to Christ in the heart, without any priestly mediation or scholastic aid.

For "The Friend."

A Christian woman of the city of New Orleans, who, for the past thirteen years, has devoted her time to visiting among prisoners, the seamen, and in dens of vice and infamy, thus speaks in a private letter concerning the matter of attire: "My heart is so deeply grieved over this great sin of fashionable dress. There was a time when I loved dress, my whole heart and mind being given to it; but when God changed my heart, and gave me to see the beauty and blessedness of a pure and holy life, I had no longer any desire for fine or fashionable dress. I do not know any greater evil in the Church than this."

TO DANIEL WHEELER

On hearing him say, In answer to a friend who queried respecting his home,—“I have no Home.”

Pilgrim and stranger as thou art on embassy of Love, The messenger of Gospel Truth, an heir of rest above, Well mayest thou say there is no spot from which thou shalt not roam, That none thy spirit knoweth not, nor asks on earth a home.

Afar from scenes most fondly prized; from friends in life most dear; Duty has marked thy footsteps out, a way than none more clear; But peace, sweet peace, hath followed thee, thy spirit's favored dome, For every man thy brother seems, and every land thy home.

And whether moored on England's coast, or yet on Russia's plain, Or on the mountain billow tost, while ploughing on the main, Jesus has been thy guiding star, and thou couldst safely roam.

While riding on the swelling surge, the Freeling was thy home.

God's Holy Spirit beaming there (thy passport o'er the deep), When danger's darkest hour was near, lulled the rough winds to sleep. In perils, oft thy soul was staid where evil could not come; Christ was thy anchor in the storm, thy port, thy spirit's home.

He bade thee go to distant lands, to seas and isles afar; Nor didst thou doubt his torch of love would be thy guiding star.

Benighted sons there gathered round, rejoiced to see thee come; And, in God's hand an instrument, e'en there thou wast at home.

From snow-crowned heights, where love grew strong, faith led thy steps away To tropic suns and genial climes, where earth's rich garden lay.

From north to south, from east to west, gray-headed thou hast come, And, while we hail thy spirit here, oh! be our hearts thy home.

Yes, let thy precepts be impressed upon the softened clay, Not merely as the morning dew that passeth soon away, But as the shower that resteth long; that thus in years to come Remembrance of the faithful past may cheer thy evening home.

As Christians, we can greet thy soul on truth's exalted ground; As children, come with listening ears to catch love's welcome sound; For thou hast trod youth's slippery morn; noon past, and twilight come, Experience speaks, come follow me as I am travelling home.

Loved ones thou hast; for life to thee has been one favored chain Whose golden links, tho' severed now, will reunite again Where faith shall end in glorious sight, where partings never come, And prayer be turned to endless praise in thy eternal home.

SUSAN H. LOYD.

APPENDA TO SUSAN LOYD'S LINES TO DANIEL WHEELER.

In frost-bound Russia, she who shared thy bosom's joy and care, Laid down in peace her weary head, her Master's joy to share: From sea-girt isles, against whose base old ocean's surges come, Thy William bowed to God's decree, and sought a heavenly home.

In giddy France the lovely one, who with affection true Had followed thee to southern climes, and all thy combats knew, Waited thy coming from the west, across the Atlantic's foam, Saw thy dear face again in love, then hastened to his home.

Perhaps in mercy, He who gave, may every green bough take, And thou, a tree late flourishing, a branchless trunk mayst make; Then oh! how joyous will it be—no longer doomed to roam— To hear the mandate from above that calls thy spirit home.

'Tis done! the chariot-wheels have passed along the parted air; The victory won, the soldier leaves the field of toil and care.

The house eternal of our God, the everlasting dome Is now the resting-place of him, who had on earth no home.

Consistency.

Consistency has, by some, been called a jewel; and I am inclined to think it is indeed something to be prized. I appreciate all that has been advanced in "The Friend" relative to a faithful support of our principles and testimonies; and the course which our Yearly Meeting has taken in denouncing heresy and declaiming against error, meets my hearty approval. But would it not be well for us to look awhile at home, and not dwell [exclusively] on the unquaker practices of some who are members of other Yearly Meetings. Charity, it is said, begins at home, although it does not end there.

It must appear evident, I think, even to the most indifferent observer, that some of the rules of our most excellent discipline are being disregarded by many; especially that most restrictive and very important rule in relation to placing monuments over the remains of the dead. A short time ago my attention was directed to a number of these stones which the marble mason had brought in his wagon to be placed in our grave-yard. He happened to be on hand when our meeting had closed, and had one stone placed in position, which was rather more conspicuous than anything which I had before seen in the burial place. One of the committee who has charge of the yard looked with apparent indifference on the scene. I beckoned to another Friend, a member of the same committee, and told him it was at variance with our own rules, made by authority of the Preparative Meeting some time before, to allow of such departure; and although I had little reason to expect any interference on his part, he not appearing as a Friend; yet, to his credit be it spoken, he had the stone lowered. If members of our Yearly Meeting are determined to disregard our discipline and go contrary to our established rules, with what show of propriety can we sit in judgment upon the actions of other Yearly Meetings, or censure those who seem to vie with each other in trampling under foot those testimonies given us as a people to bear. I have no wish to say much on this subject, it pains me even to think of it; and yet we cannot close our eyes to a painful truth.

For "The Friend."

Lord Shaftesbury.

Parting with any of his children, for even a brief time, was always a keen sorrow to Lord Shaftesbury. There is the true ring of tender fatherliness, as well as of exquisite pathos, in the following passage, written on the day when he parted with his first-born son for school:—

"The last day that Antony will pass with his family before he enters on his new state [for such it is] of life. During many years I have passed every morning with him, hearing and reading the Scriptures. I cannot bear to part with him; were I not deeply, entirely convinced that the plan is for his real welfare, I should be miserable. I commit him to God, and to the word of his grace! Eleven o'clock at night.—It seems to me almost incredible that I am about to surrender my Reuben to the care of a stranger. I have watched every moment, weighed every expression, considered every thought and seized every opportunity to drop a word in season. All will now be left to an 'hiring.' Will he care for the sheep? Oh, God, be thou to him a guide, an instructor, a friend! Probably the course of his affections may be stopped, or made to run in another channel; they will not, at any rate, flow on in their clear and early simplicity. Yet he must be gradually introduced to the world, and we gradually severed from him. This is the order of Providence [and since it is his order, wise and good], that the children shall imbibe new loves, and form new connections, while the parents are left by the receding tide, stranded like sea-weed on the shore, their time being come for decay and transmutation. This seems to be painful, and probably is so, but here is not our permanent treasure or our final resting-place. If we have trained up a faithful servant of the Lord, to go forth and fight his battles, vigorous and young, while we are flickering at home, I therein rejoice, yea, and will rejoice."

It was his custom to gather his children together and impart to them religious instruction. The following is a pleasant picture of Christian family life:—"Dover. Read the Bible with the boys; a useful and agreeable morning; day beautiful; walked to the top of Shakespeare's Cliff: enjoyed the scene, the refreshing air, the hope of renewed strength and fuller service." "As I taught the little children to-day it seemed wonderful in how small a compass is contained the whole sum and substance of Christian religion. Volumes without end, years of study, years of controversy, immense thought, immense eloquence all expended and mostly wasted to dilute or torture that which may be comprehended by the understanding and relished by the soul of a simple child. Will all the learning in the world, all the meditation of the profoundest spirits, add to the plain facts of the fall of man and his salvation by Christ? Little but perplexity and the embarrassment of that which is intrinsically simple!"

Lord Shaftesbury was loved and revered by his children with an intense affection and reverence, and scarcely less so by his servants. "In 1833," says his biographer, "when speaking on behalf of the Aged Pilgrim's Friend Society, he referred to the fact that his housekeeper had been fifty-two years in his service; that, as nurse, she had brought up all his children, not one of them would ever think of retiring to rest in his house without bidding 'good night' to that 'female patriarch.' He did not, of course, say what was nevertheless the fact, that every morning it was his habit to shake hands with that aged housekeeper, and enquire after her health and of things that were of interest in her little world. He had exemplified the saying of old Philip Quarles, 'If thou wouldst have a good servant, let the servant find a good master.'"

In 1847, his second son, Francis, a boy of sixteen, and a singularly striking character, was taken ill at Harrow, where he was at school, and the sickness was "unto death." He knew his danger, but he knew also his hope. "Never have I known till now," wrote Lord Shaftesbury in his diary, "what I am possible to lose! 'Read to me,' he said about the forgiveness of sins.' We then read and talked much of the free and full mercy of God in Christ Jesus. Above all, I urged him, as a calmer to every apprehension, to bear ever in mind that God is love; that human love is capable of great things; what then must be the height and depth and intensity of Divine love! 'Know nothing,' we said, 'think of nothing but Christ Jesus, and Him crucified.'"

"After he had learned his extreme danger from the medical attendants, he said to me, 'Is it so?' I replied that it was. He then called me, saying 'Come near to me, dear papa.' I went and knelt down by his bedside; he threw his blessed arms around my neck and kissed me for a very long time, and then said, 'I want to thank you, dearest papa, for having brought me up as you have done—for having brought me up religiously. I now feel all the comfort of it; it is to you I owe my salvation.' 'No, dearest boy,' I replied, 'it is the grace of God! 'Yes, it is true,' he said, 'but you were made the instrument of it.' Is there not consolation, almost divine, in those precious sentences?' * * * "Yesterday it pleased Almighty God to take our blessed Francis. It was the work of a moment, and we were like amazed persons, so great had been the promise, not many seconds before, of returning strength and vivacity. Yet we must not murmur or repine, for all is wisdom and mercy and love that cometh from God. The child, we doubt not, is with Christ, which is far better."

"It opens up a beautiful page in a man's life, when it can be seen that there was between himself and his children such absolute confidence and affection that they could speak unreservedly together on the subject of personal religion. It sheds a lustre over every public effort for the good of others, when it is known that this was but an extended phase of the work that had been going on in his own home."

Nor was this a solitary illustration. Like testimony to the influence of home teaching was borne by his son Maurice, who died in Switzerland, and his daughter Mary, who died at Torquay, both in early life.

The darkest and most terrible year in the life of Lord Shaftesbury was the year 1872. His daughter Constance had been for some years in declining health, which necessitated her wintering in the Riviera. The devotion of her parents to her is a home picture of singular beauty, but it has a reverse side of singular sadness. Overstrung by excessive watchfulness and nursing, the health of Lady Shaftesbury gave way. The best of medical advice was obtained, and recovery seemed certain, inasmuch that on a day in October she was able to take the air in a carriage drive. But in the evening of that day there was a relapse, and, on the following day, while his heart was breaking, the stricken husband turned to his diary with that strange instinct which had all through his life, made it to him as a safety-valve for pouring out the pent up fires of his soul, and he wrote:—

"Oct. 15th, 1872.—Minnie, my own Minnie, is gone. God took her soul to himself at about twelve o'clock this morning. She has entered into her rest, and has left us to feel the loss of the purest, gentlest, kindest, sweetest and most confiding spirit that ever lived. Oh, my God, what a blow! But we bow before thee in resignation and sorrow. Almost her last words were, 'None but Christ, none but Christ.' * * * What do I not owe to her, and to thee, O God, for the gift of her?"

In a letter to a friend, Lady Gainsborough, he says: "During the space of forty years that God, in his special and undeserved mercy allowed me to live in union with that inestimable woman, there was an increase and no abatement of love on either side. And now that He has taken her, I must believe that it is a continuance, and not a withdrawal of his mercy; and I bow before Him with reverence and gratitude for his past goodness."

The loss of the mother was a terrible shock to Lady Constance, the suffering daughter, and the only hope of her sustaining it was to go at once to the warmer shores of the Mediterranean. Mentone was reached a month after the death of Lady Shaftesbury. Inexpressibly sad were the days that followed. Then came a day when the invalid daughter "became suddenly quite herself, as in the days of strength and joy. She sat up in bed, her face was radiant with inward pleasure, she spoke to every one around. 'Dearest papa,' said she, 'do not give way. I want to bless you now for all that you have taught me.' * * * 'Christ is very near me,' she said. * * * Soon after, she exclaimed, 'I know that I am going to die, for I feel so happy?' With these words she fell into a soft sleep. In a short time she was gone; and no one could mark the moment of her departure. * * * She said, 'Christ is very near!' I think she must have perceived something we did not."

As loss after loss of those he so tenderly loved wrung his heart, he sorrowed as a Christian; but within three months of the time when the grave closed over his beloved ones, he was again in the midst of his old work, toiling with a vigor that had never been surpassed; and to the poor, the suffering, and the sad, he went forth from his own grief with a heart overflowing with sympathy and powers awakened into fresh activity, consecrated anew by sorrow.

It was the prayer of his old age that he might "die in harness," and the prayer was answered. To the very last he labored on, his faculties keenly alive, his heart tender as ever, his sympathies just as fresh and his plans as numerous as at any other period of his life.

Then came a day, while he was at Folkestone seeking health, when he took a chill and ceased forever from active work. Then, undisturbed by fear of death, unshaken in faith, and in full assurance of hope, he calmly waited the end. During the interval which elapsed, he used to ask his daughters and his valet—which ever happened to be present—to read to him portions of the Bible he named to them. Every morning he begged that the twenty-third Psalm, that short cry of hope, beginning, 'The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want,' might be read to him. Fully conscious to the last moment, he passed, without pain or sigh or struggle, into the ineffable light.

The words of Scripture are most appropriate to him, "When the ear heard him it blessed him, and when the eye saw him it gave witness to him, because he delivered the poor that cried, and the fatherless and him that had none to help him. The blessing of him that was ready to perish came upon him, and he caused the widow's heart to sing for joy. He was eyes to the blind and feet was he to the lame. He was a father to the poor."—Job xxix.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Pearl Oysters.—In the gulf of California there are extensive pearl-fisheries. The pearls are found inside of a species of oyster that grows at the bottom of the Gulf. The district is about three hundred miles in length, extending out from the shore some ten miles. Most of the fishing is done by native Mexicans or half-breed Indians, who dive for them from boats. The divers take heavy stones in their hands to help them reach the bottom. They also carry baskets which they fill with oysters. A good diver can go down fifty feet and remain under water from two minutes to two minutes and a quarter. Diving is not an unhealthy business, and there is no danger from sharks.

A more extensive business is carried on by means of divers clad in marine armor. These go in schooners fitted out with all the necessities for a voyage of four or five months. The armor-clad divers sometimes go down more than a hundred feet deep, but the pressure is so great that it produces rheumatism, and the armor-divers rarely live to be more than thirty-five or forty years of age.

As soon as the oysters are in the boat they are opened, examined for pearls, the beads or soft portions cut off, and the rest thrown into tubs. When the day's work is over, the pieces in the tub are carefully examined again, and then spread to dry in the sun. The dried oysters are shipped to China where they command a high price.

The common opinion is that a pearl is caused by a grain of sand or some other similar substance finding its way into the shell, and irritating the oyster, which thereupon encloses it in a smooth covering. This is not true of the pearl proper, but such substances are always glued to the inner side of the shell, and are covered with "nacre," the well known "mother-of-pearl." Some of these substances thus imbedded are very curious. The writer has seen a parasite, a worm nearly two inches long, thus confined in a most gorgeous crust of mother-of-pearl strong enough to hold him tight, and yet showing his shape perfectly. The real pearl is probably the effect of a disease. It is always found imbedded in the muscular portion of the oyster, It begins as a sac filled with a clear liquid like water. At a later stage the water thickens, becoming first cloudy, then like jelly, and finally hardening into the perfect pearl. Specimens have been found in all stages, but it is not yet decided whether the sac increases in size during the hardening process.—Christian Union.

A Tortoise Going into Winter Quarters.—C. C. Abbott, in his Wasteland Wanderings, describes the motions of a land-tortoise when preparing to go into winter quarters. He says: "It was one that I had had in my yard for several years. Twice I saw it preparing for hibernation, and the process in each case was precisely the same. The animal chose a spot at some distance from any tree, as though desirous of escaping contact with roots as it descended into the earth. Without protruding its head, the tortoise first dug a shallow pit but a mere trace larger in circumference than its shell. The fore feet only were used to displace the earth, but with its hind feet, at times, it would effectually scatter this loose earth in every direction. When the depth of the pit was such that the animal could no longer dig without standing on its head, it rested upon all-fours in the shallow pit, and commenced immediately the task of lowering itself still deeper into the earth. By exercising great care I was enabled to see the beginning of the work, and the same method was doubtless continued until the end. By a vigorous scratching with all four feet, the earth beneath the creature's plastron was first brought to the sides of the little pit, and then slowly was pushed upward until it formed a rim of sand about the margin of the carapace. There was a slight sidewise dipping motion of the creature's body all the while, but I judged that by the feet alone it not only loosened the earth beneath but worked it upward. However this may be, the quantity of this displaced earth was gradually increased until the tortoise disappeared. Just a day later I dug down to the animal and found that it had gone to a depth of fifteen inches, and the earth displaced and scattered was not one-twentieth of what it had actually removed from beneath and worked above it in the manner I have described."

He thinks that many of the smaller animals which burrow in the earth, make their holes in a somewhat similar manner by displacing the particles of earth, without throwing out much of it.

Bamboo Shoots as Food.—Lady Cumming in her travels in China, mentions on one occasion meeting large parties of men returning from the hills with baskets of bamboo shoots, generally about eighteen inches long by four thick. They are used as vegetables. Some had large bundles of much younger shoots, resembling overgrown asparagus. Some of the latter she had for supper, and found them fresh and tender.

Lichens.—Some years ago it was announced by some European naturalists, that the Lichens, which we find everywhere encrusting rocks and the bark of trees, are in fact compound organisms, formed by the spores of an Alga and a Fungus germinating together and the tissue of each running into the other. Bouvier, a French naturalist has recently gone over the ground, and by experiment produced the same results.

Too Much Importance Attached to Climate.—

The paramount considerations for the promotion of health are an abundance of pure air and sunshine and out-door exercise. Without these no climate is promotive of health or propitious for the cure of disease; and with them, it is safe to say, the human powers of accommodation are such that it is difficult to distinguish the peculiarities of any climate by their joint results on the health and longevity of its subjects.—Bell's Climatology.

—The Churches of the United States.—The Independent of Fifth Mo. 19th, gives a statistical exhibit of the number of members belonging to the principal religious denominations in the United States, drawn from official sources where practicable. The eleven branches of the great Baptist family which it mentions, are grouped together under one head; and so also of the fourteen divisions of the Methodists, and of the different sections of the Presbyterians, Mennonites, &c.

The three most powerful of these denominations, arranged in the order of the number of their communicants, are the Methodist, Roman Catholic, and Baptist. In the table, the Roman Catholic membership is placed the highest; but this includes all the members of their families; while in the other two, only those are included who have joined the churches, and are communicants.

—The Color Line.—The same Journal (The Independent) states that the Episcopal Diocesan Convention of South Carolina had a hot discussion on the subject of admitting colored parishes and ministers to a representation in the Convention. The decision reached appeared to be in favor of the admission of colored delegates, and the lay representatives of fourteen parishes announced in consequence their withdrawal, together with five of the clergy. The seceders established an independent convention. An overture was sent to them, expressing the regret of the Convention at the course they had pursued, and inviting them to return. This they declined to do, except upon conditions which were not accepted to.

In commenting upon this action, a writer from Baltimore says that the opposition to colored clergymen in the South Carolina Diocese has been growing more decided for several years; and he intimates that it was believed the Standing Committee of that body had refused testimonials to candidates for the ministry, solely because they were colored.

—Gambling at Horse-Races.—The Legislature of New York enacted a law on the 12th of Fifth Month, legalizing pool-selling at horse-races. The Governor was earnestly entreated by a deputation of those who were concerned for the preservation of public morals, to veto the bill; but he permitted it to become a law.

The iniquity of the practice is shown by one of the provisions introduced into the act, which makes it a felony, punishable with imprisonment, to do at any other time and place, that which it authorizes to be done at the time and place where the races occur.

—New York Yearly Meeting.—At this meeting, which convened on the 27th of Fifth Month, at Glen Falls, six men and three women delegates were appointed to the Conference proposed to be held at Richmond, Indiana, next fall.

The Minutes of the Representative Meeting showed that it had under its care the subject of a catechism. It was continued in its charge.

It was decided, after the present year, to sever the connection of N. Y. Yearly Meeting with "The Associated Committee on Indian Affairs."

The Yearly Meeting next year is again to meet at Glen Falls.

THE FRIEND.

SIXTH MONTH 18, 1887.

In the remarkable narrative preserved by John Richardson of Peter Gardner, it is stated that when he was at Scarborough, on his way to Scotland, whither he was drawn in the service of his Divine Master, he left Jolu's house early in the morning, and without outward information, went to the house of a Friend, and was invited to see his wife who was sick. "He went up stairs, and sitting down retired by her side, in an awful and solemn manner, said, 'Thou hast long had a concern on thy mind to visit the churches in America, but thy husband has hindered thee;' and told her, The will and resignation of her mind was accepted for the deed, and she was excused from the journey which was before her; and should die in peace with God and man. Then addressing her husband, he said, 'Thy wife had a concern to visit the churches in another country beyond the sea, but thou wouldst not give her leave; so she shall be taken from thee;' and added, 'Thy wife will be happy; but the Lord will blast both thee and thine; for behold the Lord's hand is against thee, and thou shalt be reduced to want thy bread.'"

"In about two weeks after, the man's wife died, as Peter had foretold. At that time, the same man had three ships at sea; his son was master of one, his second son was on board another; and, in their voyages, they were all wrecked or foundered, and their cargoes chiefly lost. So that, from considerable affluence, he was soon after reduced so low as to be maintained by Friends."

The lesson so strikingly conveyed by this narrative of our dependence on the Divine blessing, is one that we need ever to keep in remembrance. A man may be conscious of the possession of good natural abilities and these may have been improved by careful training. He may have much of this world's goods; and may hold such a position in civil or religious society as to open before him a wide field for the exercise of his talents. But if he becomes elated with these advantages, and is unwilling to submit himself to the government of Christ, preferring to retain the control of his life in his own hands, and thus rejecting the counsels of the Almighty, the blessing of the Lord will surely be withdrawn from him—unless he becomes humble and repentant. And when that blessing is withdrawn, he will surely come to loss. Some men, as in the instance above mentioned, have their outward prospects blasted. Others, through want of that sustaining grace which alone can enable any to endure temptation, yield to their own passions and inclinations, and sink deep into disgrace. Others, while maintaining an outward respectability, lose all tenderness of spirit, become thoroughly worldly-minded, and must be classed with the multitude who enter in the "wide gate," and journey in the "broad way" that leadeth to spiritual destruction.

He who has known the workings of Divine grace for his salvation, knows that there is no true peace, and no living hope for the future, save in an unreserved submission to the Lord, and such an union with Him in spirit that his own will becomes subjected to the Divine will. And if, at any time, through unwatchfulness or the weakness of the flesh, he breaks his covenant with the Lord, he cannot rest satisfied until he has some evidence of being restored into favor, through repentance and forgiveness. How earnestly is such an one led to adopt the prayer of David, after he had sinned,—“Take not thy Holy Spirit from me!”

His own experience will lead such an one to have compassion on others who may go astray. For he will feel, as I. Pennington expresses—“It is of the infinite mercy and compassion of the Lord, that his pure love visiteth any of us; and it is by the preservation thereof alone, that we stand. If he leave us at any time, but one moment, what are we? And who is there that provoketh him not to depart? Let him throw the first stone at him that falls.”

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The State Department has received a despatch announcing the arrival of the American ship Celina, at Havana, with a full cargo from the River Platte. This is said to be the first American vessel that has arrived at Havana direct from the Platte in sixty years, the differential duties that ruled in favor of Spanish vessels having excluded American vessels from this trade, before the ratification of the commercial agreement made by Secretary Bayard with the Spanish Government in Tenth Month last.

The Assay Office is about melting up the last 100,000 of 3,200,000 trade dollars received from the Sub-Treasury. The silver is run into bars of about 1200 ounces each, and these are stored in the Assay Office, requiring in this form about one-third the storage space required by the dollars. The Superintendent has taken the precaution to assay the coins and finds them running remarkably close to the standard, in no case varying more than one-thousandth of one per cent.

A large number of delegates from Indian tribes, wild and civilized, are in council at Eufaula, in the Indian Territory. On the opening of the council, S. H. Burge, President; C. A. Burns, of the Chickasaws, and George Sanders, of the Cherokees, advised all “to adopt the ways of civilization,” and the wild tribes to establish schools and “churches.” Mahkosisa, of the Sacs and Foxes; White Wolf, of the Comanches, and Towconaco Jim, of the Wichitas, spoke of the recent Land Law, and said it did not suit their tribes.

The hottest day San Francisco experienced since the Signal Service was established there, was on Fifth Mo. 28th, when the temperature rose to 96.9°. The hottest day before that was in 1872, when 95.3° was reached.

A meteoric stone fell near St. Joseph, Ind., a despatch from Evansville states, on the morning of the 12th instant, with a sharp sound and a shock that many thought was caused by an earthquake. The meteor imbedded itself in the earth to a depth of fifteen feet, scattering many fragments about the mouth of the cavity it had made.

In the Massachusetts House of Representatives, on the 8th instant, the proposed prohibitory amendment to the State Constitution failed for want of a two-thirds vote. Of the 142 members recorded in favor of the measure, 126 were Republicans, 13 were Democrats, 1 Independent Republican, 1 Independent Democrat and 1 Independent. Of the 77 recorded against it 17 were Republicans, 58 Democrats and 2 Independent Democrats.

A man in Iowa has introduced to notice a new fuel, which is expected to take the place of coal in the prairie countries. This fuel is made by grinding cornstalks and coarse prairie grass together, moistening them, and then pressing the pulp into blocks about twelve inches long and four inches thick and dried. It is claimed that one block will give an hour's steady heat, and that the fuel can be produced for $3 per ton.

His trial for bribery is said to be costing Jacob Sharp (N. Y.) over $75,000, and it is added, that the amount will be increased to nearly half a million should he have to carry the case to the Court of Appeals.

Speculation in coffee, which had carried the price up 100 per cent, since the first of the year, has collapsed. The price has fallen six cents a pound, and several New York coffee brokers have failed.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 389, which was 37 more than during the previous week, and 77 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the whole number 192 were males and 197 females; 190 adults and 199 minors; 46 died of consumption; 28 of pneumonia; 22 of diseases of the heart; 20 of inflammation of the brain; 18 of marasmus; 15 of convulsions; 13 of typhoid fever; 12 of old age, and 11 of measles.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½'s, 110; 4's, coupon, 128½; reg., 129½; currency 6's, 123 a 134.

Cotton was quiet but steady, at 11½ cts. for middling nplands.

Feed was dull and unchanged. Sales of 1 car prime winter bran at $15.75 per ton. Quotations: Bran, winter, choice and fancy, $16 a $16 25; do. do., medium to prime, $14.50 a $15.75; bran, spring, $14 a $15.

Refined sugars were active and firm. Refiners' wholesale prices were 6½ and 6 3/16c. for powdered; 5½ a 5 15-16c. for granulated; 5½c. for crystal A, and 5½c. for confectioners' A.

Flour and Meal.—Flour was steadily held, but demand was light. Sales of 125 barrels western winter, extra, at $3.25; 125 barrels Ohio clear, at $4.20; 375 barrels do., straight, at $4.50 a $4.55; 500 barrels winter patent, at $4.75 a $5; 125 barrels Minnesota, clear, at $4.25; and 500 barrels do., patent, at $4.75 a $5. Rye flour ruled dull, at $2.60 a $2.75 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat was unsettled; No. 2 red closing at 94 cts. bid and 94½ cts. asked. Corn was dull; No. 2 mixed was quoted at 46 cts. bid and 47 cts. asked. Oats were without much change; No. 2 white closing at 37½ cts. bid and 37½ cts. asked.

Beef cattle were fairly active at 3½ a 5½ cts. Sheep were scarce and ¼c. higher, at 2½ a 5 cts. Lambs were fairly active at 6 a 9½ cts.

Hogs were active and ¼c. higher, at 7¼ a 7½ cts. Milch calves were active at 5 a 7 cts.

Fat cows were firmer at 2½ a 4 cts. Milch cows were in fair request at $25 a $55.

FOREIGN.—The Philadelphia Public Ledger says: One of the most significant, if not among the most startling, incidents attending the “tithes system” and Church and State alliance in Great Britain, is the calling out of armed soldiers, men of war, to enforce exactions of tithes in money in Wales, for the purpose of supporting the “Gospel of Peace” in an English college.

William E. Gladstone's recent tour does not seem to have forwarded the cause of Liberal reunion. The English Liberal Association has passed resolutions regretting that, while Gladstone makes minor concessions with reference to his Irish bill of 1886, he adheres to the plan of an Irish Parliament, and expressing the conviction that his speeches in Wales will discourage the hope of reunion, which the Liberal-unionists desire.

An exceptionally stormy winter and numerous heavy snow-falls account to a large extent for the present disastrous floods in Hungary. It is stated that no amount of dyke inspection can prevent the occurrence of floods in the Theiss Valley until the Government undertakes the regulation of the Danube at the iron gates, as provided for in the Treaty of Berlin.

A despatch from St. Petersburg, dated Sixth Mo. 8th, and received in Berlin, says: “The Czar is incensed at the tone adopted by the Russian press in regard to his foreign policy. The Czar aims at maintaining peace, and his policy emphasizes the tradition of amity between Russia and Germany.”

Another despatch of the same date to the Neue Freie Presse, says that Askabad has been occupied by 26,000 Russian troops.

Severe shocks of earthquake have occurred at Vernone, in Turkestan. The town was almost entirely destroyed. One hundred and twenty persons were killed and 125 injured. Among the latter is General Friede the Governor of the Province of Semi Retchinsk. Shocks still continue to be felt at intervals. The inhabitants of the town are panic-stricken, and have fled for safety to the open country.

The Lower Danube, which has heretofore been without that fish, has been stocked with 500,000 eels.

DIED, on the 10th of Fifth Month, 1887, at his residence in Philadelphia, CHARLES J. ALLEN, a member and Elder of Philadelphia Monthly Meeting, in the 65th year of his age. Concerning this dear Friend it may be truly said, “the memory of the just is blessed.” Yielding in early youth to the heart-changing power of Divine Grace, he was enabled to bring forth in large measure the precious fruits of the Spirit. His business intercourse was marked by unwavering integrity and faithfulness to the various important trusts confided to him. In the affairs of the Church in which he was much engaged, his soundness of judgment, coupled as it was with humbleness of mind, was highly valued. Being especially interested in the management of Westtown Boarding School, his intellectual gifts were exceedingly valuable in connection with its varied interests, and to these he devoted much of his later years with u.-sparing assiduity. The health of our dear friend, which had never been robust, showed a marked failure within the past few months, and although for a time, hopes were entertained of his ultimate recovery, this period was followed by one of much prostration, and at times suffering. The humility and patience with which all was borne, together with the child-like sweetness and quietude of his spirit, were often touching, and it was evident that a Saviour's love which had long been so precious, sustained and comforted him on his bed of languishing to the very end. On one occasion he exclaimed, “Great and marvellous are thy works!” then paused and said, “I almost fear to say the next;” but added, “just and true are all thy ways, thou King of saints—thou King of saints.” This passage was frequently upon his lips, but it was observed that he omitted the sacred name, excepting on one occasion, when it was repeated with deep reverence. A few nights before his departure, prayer being offered at the bed-side, that our Heavenly Father would condescend to be with us, sustain and comfort him, and enable us all resignedly to say, “not my will but thine be done,” he remarked, “I have had great comfort in that short but comprehensive prayer, and it seems with me to say in all sincerity, amen and amen.” On another occasion he said, “the hour of death is a solemn, rather than a trying hour.” At one time he remarked, “The Lord has been very good to me in many ways;” and again, “He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High, shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty.” After lying quietly for some time, with eyes closed, he opened them saying, “I have seen His face”—and the remark being repeated to him, rather as a query, he replied: “Yes,—yes.” During a period of restlessness, he said several times—“Let me go, for the day breaketh.” Thus he left his sorrowing friends, as they reverently believe, to receive the blessed welcome, “Well done, good and faithful servant, . . . enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.”

—, in West Branch, Iowa, Fifth Mo. 11th, 1887, CLARA B., daughter of Robert and Lydia M. Knowles, in the 33d year of her age, a member of Springdale Monthly Meeting of Friends. She was a good example in plainness and sobriety; was resigned to go. Said, “What a blessing to be released, though I am a poor worm of the dust.” Her friends have a comforting belief that she has entered a mansion of rest.

—, in this city, on the 23rd of Fifth Month last, ELIZABETH HUSTON, daughter of the late R. M. Huston, M. D., a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia for the Western District. She was of a gentle and retiring disposition; and before her last sickness, was favored with a remarkable evidence of Divine regard. She patiently bore the weakness and weariness of the body, all the appointed time, until her change came—a change which we reverently believe was a glorious one for her.

Selections from the Diary of Abigail W. Hall.

First Mo. 13th, 1857. I have endeavored, may I not say all the time, to keep near in spirit unto my Heavenly Father; but oh, what an unwearied enemy we have to contend with! how he draws the mind off! and even in my most serious moments intrudes thoughts causing me to wander; thoughts that are not evil in themselves, but which should not come into "my Father's house,"—the "house of prayer." For as in the temple formerly, so in the temple of the heart, all must be overthrown. That I have felt this morning, the great need to make my request known unto God, that He would be pleased to help me and strengthen me to draw nearer and nearer in spirit unto Him. How were my tears poured out in secret both last night and this morning! I remembered it was said: "By faith, Abraham, when he was called, went out, not knowing whither he went." This seems a little my condition. I believe the Lord is calling, and pointing me to a way wherein I should go. But faith hath been so weak, and the enemy so busy, that I had nearly made shipwreck. Nevertheless the Lord, through great mercy, hath proved me by day, and so instructed in the night season, that a willingness hath been wrought, to be led and guided whithersoever He would. Since the surrender hath been made, He, my dear Lord and Master, hath been pleased to make known unto me some of his secrets; for which favor my soul desireth to follow after Thee, lead whither thou wilt.

16th. Cared for through the night; and a very cold night it was. I slept comfortable and warm; while many up and down, more worthy no doubt, really suffered. We read, that Mary "loved much," because "her sins which were many were forgiven her." What need have poor sinful I, to be found rendering unto my dear Lord that which is his due, for the many and multiplied favors daily showered down! Was favored last night and this morning to draw near in prayer, with tears, unto my Heavenly Father; asking of Him the help and guidance of his good Spirit to enable me to make straight steps to my feet; and that I may be helped to press through the crowd of difficulties that surround, keeping close unto my good Master, who sees and knows his children. There was a remarkably quiet feeling prevailing in our young family throughout yesterday; so that surely the Lord's mercy is towards us.

17th. Quietness still seems spread as a canopy over us; remarkably so during our collections last night and this morning. I read a little from the concluding remarks in Youthful Piety, which tended further to solemnize; which covering was to me very precious. I feel we have abundant cause to thank God and take courage. Surely, "His mercies are new every morning; great is thy faithfulness."

25th. Did not He, my dear Lord and Master, stand by me in seasons of extremity, where would I be? turning aside, I fear, like a deceitful bow. But oh, how precious and consoling is the evidence at times given, that the Lord is my Father and Friend; and that He never will forsake me, unless I forsake Him.

Second Mo. 2nd. Having felt for some time past as if my labors at Westtown were drawing to a close, have endeavored to wait till I could feel that the time had fully come, before I brought it before the Committee. I have endeavored to move with carefulness, and hope I have not done wrong in forwarding this morning my "resignation!" I feel peaceful in the retrospect, which is all I can ask.

3rd. Feel that I can, with Jacob, covenant: "If thou wilt be with me in the way that I go," "then shall the Lord be my God, and I will serve Him." Lead and keep, O Heavenly Father! thy servant, that trusteth in thee: "Lead me in a plain path because of mine enemies." Be thou a strong habitation, whereunto I may continually resort.

6th. In our Quarterly Meeting on Third-day, the quietness which overspread us was not of our own begetting. Elizabeth Evans arose with saying, how loath she was to break in upon it, but her labors tended only further to gather; being as precious ointment poured forth; yea, "came down as the small rain and distilled as the dew." The younger part of the meeting were the objects of her tender solicitude, and were most feelingly and tenderly ministered unto. While I have no doubt many precious dear children will improve from and were strengthened by her labors, I fear there are those, who will turn away forgetful of them. How my heart follows after some of these that they may return, repent, and live. Surely the Lord's mercy is great towards us, but we may outlive it. The door may be closed, and then vain will it be to cry "Lord, Lord, open unto us." My feelings in the consideration of this, were solemnly affected, not only for myself but for others present. Time is fast passing away, reminding of the Scripture: "O, that men were wise, that they understood this, that they would consider their latter end."

18th. More than half of the night of the 15th, and all the time I could get the day following, I passed by the sick and dying bed of a dear little boy, who finished his short sojourn here below, the afternoon of the day following. He had been sick of measles for about nine days, when the asthma set in (a complaint he was subject to from infancy.) It proved too much for him; since Sixth-day his sufferings have been great. I never witnessed so much physical suffering, and he so alive to it—being all the time so entirely sensible. He remarked to us, as we sat by, trying to do all we could for him: "This has been an awful night!" and again in the morning, "If my Heavenly Father had not helped me I never could have gotten through last night." He put up his little petitions most fervently to be released, and to be taken where pain and sorrow were not known. "Dear Heavenly Father, be pleased to help me," and "forgive my sins," with more; all showing the innocence, the sweetness of that state of which it is said, "of such is the kingdom of Heaven."

Third Mo. 1st. I often feel afraid lest, whilst I am preaching to others, I myself shall become a castaway. Our First-day morning meeting was an exercising one to me; and while trying to get relief by unburdening my exercise, I thought there never was a poorer, weaker instrument made use of; and if I could only be helped not to bring dishonor to the best of causes, it was all I asked. It seemed to me, that "I am a worm and no man;" and that "in me, that is in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing." My prayer to thee, O Heavenly Father! is, that I may be helped more and more to be made an overcomer, through thy grace, so as not to be found among the "fearful and unbelieving," whose part, we are told, is to be in "that lake which burneth with fire and brimstone." Awful indeed is such a condition to think of; and how much more so to be found in it.

12th. I don't know when I have taken my seat in meeting feeling more poor, unable to bring my mind to any degree of settlement. There seemed, however, a remembrance on whom help was laid—He who was able to succor even unto the uttermost; so I struggled on. Toward the close of the meeting, help came; and I was enabled to settle down into a state of inward stillness. Oh how precious it did seem and feel! Under the solemnity, a little testimony sprang up in my heart, and I felt it extend toward all present; but I was afraid till a secret assurance was given: "I will help thee, I will uphold thee," &c., when I ventured to arise with, "Lord how I love thy law! it is my meditation day and night;" enlarging a little to the peace and relief of my own mind. Upon taking my seat, felt the spirit of supplication. But begging to be excused, I robbed myself and the meeting; of which I was made sensible. The fear of man ever bringeth a snare. The enemy cares not in what way his ends are answered, whether in exalting, or casting down; and nothing will preserve but keeping close to the dear Master, begging his help and preservation.

22nd. Toiled through our meeting this morning, having so many intrusive thoughts to combat with. But think that through and under all, my eye was single unto our alone great Helper. Toward the close of the meeting I experienced that even unto the uttermost, He is able to succor all that come unto Him in living faith. The preciousness of the truth of this being afresh felt,

I was bound in spirit for the help of others to express it. For which act of dedication, a portion of that peace which the world cannot give nor take away, was felt as an unspeakable favor.

Fourth Mo. 4th. This afternoon has been a season of favor. The winds and waves have been rebuked; and there has been a precious calm. This has brought me very near to the dear Master; even to that place where prayer is wont to be made.

9th. This may be the last note I may ever make at Westwton! My labors here being about to close. To-morrow we break up, and I leave, not expecting to return. I can hardly realize, that a service of five years and a-half, usefully so to myself, are about filled up. If much has not been achieved to others, I know it has been a useful school to me; and hope I have been preserved from doing any harm. Feel as though I could adopt the language of the Prophet: "Yet surely my judgment is with the Lord, and my work or reward with my God."

In our meeting this morning, dear William Evans' "feet were shod with the preparation of the gospel;" oh, how powerfully he did preach! An awakening call went forth to the disobedient and rebellious, accompanied with tender entreaties to close in with the offers of mercy. Hannah Rhoads followed in supplication for such a state, as well as others. It seemed to me the Lord would be clear, and his servants would be clear; and if there was not a closing in with the offers of redeeming grace and mercy, their blood would be required at their own hands. It was a very solemn meeting.

Fifth Mo. 1st. [In reference to our Yearly Meeting then just past, A. W. H. writes of suffering, in her small measure, with the suffering seed. And then relative to the future of the Society, thus concisely sets forth her views:—A little hope did spring up in my heart that notwithstanding what we have passed through, are now passing, and may have yet to pass through, that the arms of the hands of this people, would yet be made strong by the hands of the mighty God of Jacob. As individual faithfulness is abode in, surely "the Lord will do great things for us." The call to enter into the vineyard of our own hearts and labor never felt to me more imperative.

Now I am away from Westwton, I want not to neglect my little diary; but what is more than all, I want not to neglect any of my religious duties. There will be so many social ones to call my attention off, that I have a great jealousy over myself; and yet I do think, that through and over all, the prevailing and may I not say continual desire of my heart, is to fulfil the first and great commandment; and I cannot think, as this continues to be the case, I shall be allowed to falter and fall. Thou who knowest just how it is with me! Oh preserve me for thy mercies sake. Keep me on every hand, even when "the blast of the terrible one is as a storm against the wall." Thou alone knowest the plunges of thy poor child. If these be necessary baptisms, keep me, O Lord! till these calamities be overpast.

Bring thy deeds to [the Light within which comes from Christ] and love it and walk in it, and thou wilt assuredly have the light of life; and thy fellowship shall be with God, and with his Son and saints, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son shall cleanse thee from all sin. And whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are of good report, if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things.—William Penn.

For "The Friend."

What we Saw of New England in Ten Days.

At the present time there are in all departments of Harvard University about 178 instructors, 29 other officers, and 1595 students. It has conferred degrees on 15,000 persons. Memorial Hall commemorates the graduates and students who served in the army and navy during the late rebellion. It is the most beautiful building on the grounds, and reminds us painfully of the loss our generation sustains by the cruel carnage waged in defense of the Union.

The Museums are open to visitors, and the Library which contains 230,000 volumes. In glass cases may be seen some rare and curious books: Eliot's Indian Bible; John Bunyan's, with his autograph; and elegantly illuminated parchments, dating from the eighth to the fifteenth centuries: besides manuscripts in the hand-writing of Burns and Longfellow, with other literary gems. The home of the latter, near by, was visited by some of our party. Harvard seems the idol of the Bostonians; but, sad to say, its atmosphere is Unitarian.

In the afternoon we walked through the celebrated Boston Common. Our first thoughts were absorbed with the martyrs, who suffered there, and the spot where Mary Dyer, Marmaduke Stevenson and William Leddra were executed; and the question naturally presented, being fellow professors, would our zeal for the truth bear such a test as theirs?

The Public Garden adjoining has a monument erected to the discovery of ether, which Boston claims; also a lovely artificial lake, surrounded by flower-beds of pansies, lobelias and geraniums. This opens out on to Commonwealth Avenue, which is lined with beautiful homes, and its centre decorated with trees and monuments of their great men. Among these was a statue of Alexander Hamilton, with this inscription: "Orator, writer, soldier, jurist and financier; although his particular province was the Treasury, his genius pervaded the whole administration of Washington." Another of that zealous abolitionist, William Lloyd Garrison, with his words engraven below, "My country is the world; my countrymen all mankind." On another tablet, "I am in earnest, I will not equivocate, I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch, and I will be heard."

After visiting Faneuil Hall, Jamaica Plains, &c., we left next morning for Intervale, where we were in sight of Mount Washington, and had Kearsarge and Moat Mountain in close proximity. On reaching our hotel we took a carriage and drove to some of the lovely lakes and waterfalls in the vicinity, and next day ascended Kearsarge.

In the afternoon took the observation cars for the Notch; a magnificent Mountain Pass, of which Bayard Taylor wrote: "As a simple picture, seen from above, it cannot be surpassed in Switzerland." We put up at the Crawford House, the very ideal of a mountain location; the lawn in front includes Saco Lake, the head-waters of that beautiful river.

From here we ascended Mount Willard by carriage, and from the top again viewed the Notch, down whole ranges of mountains; some in shadow, and others glorious with the descending sun. Here some of our party had the opportunity of witnessing a thunder-storm in all its terror and grandeur, the peals reverberating from peak to peak like charges of artillery, and an umbrella the only thing they could safely use during the performance of this solemn orchestra.

The next day being the 21st birth-day anniversary of one of our young men, he naturally wished to spend part of it at the Tip-Top House. So we were off, early, to the foot of Mount Washington, to take the remarkable trip up Jacob's Ladder, a distance of three miles from the summit, with a maximum grade of 1980 feet to the mile. The ascent is made in an hour and a-half. The locomotives are of enormous power, and push the cars from below, going up, and retard them coming down. No accident has ever taken place on these trains.

Sylvester Marsh, of Littleton, invented this wonderful piece of mechanism in 1858. It was successfully finished in 1869. Time-table commencing Seventh Mo. 1st.

In 1632, Darby Field, a valiant Irishman, guided by two Indians, first gained the summit. The first horse climbed up in 1840; and Professor Huntingdon, with three companions, were the first white men to winter there in 1870-71. Its temperature and botany are those of Middle Greenland.

The view line of Mount Washington has a circumference of a 1000 miles, including peaks of the Green Mountains, Adirondacks, and mountains of Maine, Lake Umbagog, the ocean off Portland and Old Orchard Beach. The best time to ascend is with a wind from the northwest, after a heavy rain-storm.

The Summit House is visited by over 10,000 annually, many of these set off for it in bright sunshine, and arrive in a fog: as was our experience.

The eighth day we went down Franconia Notch, and took up our quarters at the Profile House. This is a fascinating place, with its charming Reception Room and other appointments. The first illuminated with blazing logs, and decorated with moose-head and deer-horns. Here the striking features are the Old Man of the Mountain and the Flume; apart from the high mountains on either hand, Cannon and Lafayette. We drove to the Flume, a distance of six miles, through lovely woodlands, till we reached this rocky crevasse between perpendicular cliffs, with a torrent roaring through it. Spread around were acres of boulders, which had been washed down by a deluge or water-spout, reviving Young's description of the Last Day: "Rocks eternal pour, and final ruin fiercely drives her plow-share o'er creation."

We ascended Mount Cannon, and took towards evening a woodland path through the valley to Echo Lake. Here we sat long, watching the variations of light and shade over the surface of the water, as daylight departed; and as we turned to leave were surprized by the echoes from a bugle, reverberating from mountain to mountain. The whole scene bringing vividly to mind the lines of Tennyson, written no doubt under similar surroundings, commencing—

"The long lights shake across the lakes," &c.

On the ninth day we left this enchanting spot, and pursued our course down the Connecticut Valley to Springfield, an enterprising inland city of 35,000 inhabitants. Visited Army Hill, of Longfellow notoriety, to enjoy a fine sunset; and returned our southern route on the 10th, past Hartford, New Haven, and Jersey City, and on to Broad St.; while daylight lingering made it pleasant to bring up at that most attractive spot to us, our Pennsylvania home.

A Visit among the Mennonites.—No. 1.

A recent visit among this interesting people has furnished an opportunity of hearing their own statements of their history and principles; of mingling with them in their religious meetings and their domestic circles; and of observing the plain and simple manners which have been preserved among them from generation to generation. Such a visit seemed almost like being permitted to mingle with the people of two centuries ago, so slowly have the influences of the 19th century penetrated the barriers which have been made by their peculiar views, their renunciation of political life, and the isolation caused by their firm adherence to the universal language of their families,—the Pennsylvania Dutch.

There are many points of resemblance between them and the Society of Friends, sufficient to awaken a mutual interest, and to produce a feeling of attraction. And this feeling was strengthened by the evidences which our visit furnished us, that there was preserved among them a tenderness of spirit and a willingness to follow the leadings of the Spirit of Christ, in the self-denial and bearing the daily cross, into which it ever leads those who are willing to become his disciples and to follow the footsteps of the flock of his companions.

The Mennonites derive their name from Menno Simons, who was one of the most conspicuous among their early preachers. He was born in Friesland, one of the northern provinces of Holland, in 1492, (the year in which Columbus discovered America) and was a priest in the Roman Catholic Church. Becoming dissatisfied with some of the doctrines held by that body, he renounced popery about the year 1531, and became the preacher to a small body of persons who held views similar to his own. From that time to his death in 1561, he labored both by tongue and pen, and with much success to promote the doctrines he had embraced; enduring persecution, and compelled to fly from one place to another to save his life, threatened by the intolerant spirit of the times.

Perhaps the most distinguishing doctrine of the Mennonites is that, which is common with the Waldenses and other early sects in the Christian Church, they held in respect to water-baptism. They regard this baptism as the outward sign of admission into church membership; and reject the theory on which we suppose infant baptism is founded, namely, that its administration confers some spiritual benefit on the one who receives it. This theory, so directly opposed to the spiritual and scriptural views held by our own Society, which regard religion as exclusively a work in the heart of man, carried on there by the Spirit of Christ, was one of the fruits of that dependence on outward rites and ceremonies which early crept into the Christian Church, and sadly marred its testimony to the truth as it is in Jesus; which continues to be held by the Roman Catholics; and which was not fully eliminated by the English Reformers, but is implied in the teachings and practice of the Book of Common Prayer adopted by the Church of England; and which was one of the causes that led to the withdrawal from that denomination of the Reformed Episcopalians, a few years since.

The rejection of the doctrine that an infant can be regenerated or born again in a spiritual sense, by being dipped into or sprinkled with water, was a long step in the path of reform; and an evidence of a measure of true spiritual enlightenment having reached the minds of Menno Simon and his fellow-believers. We doubt not it has been in the ordering of the Head of the Church, that the breaking forth of the renewed Gospel day, after the spiritual darkness, which had so largely overspread his professing Church, should be a gradual process—first the faint dawnings of the light, gradually becoming more and more distinct.

We as fully believe that it was in the further unfoldings of Light from above, that George Fox and our early Friends were enabled to see, not only that the one, saving baptism of Christ is a spiritual process (which our Mennonite brethren also acknowledge), but that the place and service of water-baptism in the church has ceased to all those who come to experience the baptism of Christ, and that its continued use has a tendency to direct the attention of men to outward forms, which can never make the comers thereunto perfect, and to turn it from the working of that Divine life and power, on which our spiritual growth depends.

The Mennonites hold that water-baptism ought only to be administered to those who have been taught repentance and amendment of life, who believe that for Christ's sake their sins are blotted out, and who are willing to follow his commands by living a life of self-denial. This rite is performed by them when a person is received into membership,—whether one from the outside world or one of their own young people—for they do not admit of birthright membership. We were told that their young people generally joined the Society about the time of marriage and of becoming settled in life. As they do not recognize the validity of infant baptism, persons who may have been so sprinkled when children, are required again to submit to the rite—hence they are often classed with the Ana-baptists or re-baptizers, as the word means; although under that appellation several sects are confounded.

In Germany the discontent of the peasants under the oppressions of their feudal lords, led to political disturbances, in which Thomas Munzer, a Lutheran minister who zealously propagated Ana-baptist views, became involved. He attempted to establish by force an ideal Christian commonwealth, with absolute equality and a community of goods. The defeat of the insurgents and the execution of Munzer in 1525, proved only a temporary check to the movement. A second and more determined attempt to establish a theocracy was made at Munster in Westphalia (1532-5). The town was besieged in 1534 by Count Waldeck, its expelled bishop. The supreme authority within its walls was in the hands of Johann Boekhold, a tailor of Leyden, better known as John of Leyden. Giving himself out as the successor of David, he claimed royal honors and absolute power in the new "Zion." He justified the most arbitrary and extravagant measures by the authority of visions from Heaven. With this pretended sanction he legalized polygamy, and himself took four wives, one of whom he beheaded with his own hand in the marketplace in a fit of frenzy. As a natural consequence of such license, Munster was for twelve months a scene of unbridled profligacy. After an obstinate resistance it was taken by the besiegers, and John and some of his more prominent followers were put to death.

It would be gross historical injustice to confound these people with other baptists, or with the non-resistant Mennonites, who differed from them in many points.

In the similarity of views on the subject of baptism, the Mennonites approach the Baptists, although in some respects they are quite different. Both had their origin in the season of religious awakening in central Europe, in which Luther took so prominent a part; and both could point out an almost unbroken succession of testimony-bearers (although counted as "heretics" by the ruling powers) to similar views from the earliest ages of the Church.

The writer of the article on Mennonites in the Encyclopedia Britannica regards Zurich in Switzerland as the original home of this people; for as early as 1525 a community was founded there, having for its most distinctive mark baptism upon confession of faith. But the most characteristic features of this community were in matters of practice and discipline—and this continues to be the case to this day. They enjoined a withdrawal from the world, prohibited marriage with those not in membership, refused to take oath or to use the sword, and declined civil affairs. They were "content to live as strangers upon earth, devoting all their energy to preserve the purity of their own communities."

(To be continued.)

For "The Friend."

The following interesting incident was related by a dear "mother in Israel" (long since passed from earth) as her own experience, and placed on record by a near relative, with a feeling of its value as a watchword full of instruction, not only to her, but others, who may be circumstanced and tried as she was.

The Monthly Meeting, (of which this valued Friend was a member,) at one time appointed a committee to visit the delinquent members, and also those who were troubled with sleeping or drowsiness in meeting, and of each class there was a considerable number.

The committee (of whom our friend was one) were united in believing it the right time to enter on the duties of their appointment, after a meeting for worship on a certain Fifth-day. Never having been troubled with drowsiness, she was surprised soon after taking her seat at the head of a large meeting, (on the day mentioned) to be beset with a strong temptation to fall asleep, and her conflict to keep from yielding was painful in the extreme. So alive was she to her condition, and the necessity of struggling, as for her best life, not only on her own account, but for the sake of others, and for the cause she loved, lest it suffer through her weakness, that every effort was used by her to resist the temptation, and so little did it seem to avail that she almost despaired; when with great power the words of the dear Saviour were brought to her remembrance, "Without me ye can do nothing;" relief came, the tendency to sleep almost instantly vanished, and she could humbly and gratefully acknowledge the One who had given this never to be forgotten lesson of instruction; had also in mercy extended to her the hand of deliverance in a time of sore need.

The effect of this experience was to imbue her with a spirit of charity which she had not before felt for those who are tried with drowsy feelings; and to prepare her for entering upon the service to which she had been appointed, with greater sympathy for the weaknesses of others. The experience told of human frailty; and how, in our own strength alone, we cannot overcome temptation; and the effect of the wisdom thus gained was the uplifting of the finite to the Infinite, in the full assurance, "there is balm in Gilead and a healing Physician there."

Thus the Merciful One, who is touched with a feeling of all our infirmities, qualifies for service through needful baptisms of the like "cup of suffering," clothing the spirit in the garb of true charity, inspiring with tenderness and compassion; and at the same time, making clear and plain our individual duty to Him. And this duty is, not only to assemble ourselves for the solemn purpose of Divine worship; called from the worldly cares apart, as were his disciples formerly, "to watch one" brief suffering "hour" with Him; but, when thus gathered, "to watch and pray that we enter not into temptation," either of wandering thoughts, or being found asleep when He cometh to the door of our hearts—to meet with us and bless us. "Blessed are those servants whom the Lord when He cometh shall find watching."

We mourn over the deficiencies in our midst, yet rejoice that in Christ Jesus is power to redeem therefrom. We feel a godly jealousy over the Society, that is ours by inheritance and adoption, knowing whatever weakens cannot strengthen. Very earnest and sincere are our desires that we may all be stimulated to greater watchfulness, and be encouraged to obedience and faithfulness—submitting ourselves wholly unto the preparing hand of our Father in Heaven, who alone can qualify for his service in the vineyard which his own "right hand hath planted."

May the places made vacant, (by death,) in the removal of valued and useful members, be filled by the children of our own Society; those "gathered from the north and south, east and west" entering into their labors: all living branches, engrafted into the true Vine, yielding fruit in due season. May the weak be made strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might, so that the sceptre depart not from Israel.

The Blessing of Denial.—St. Augustine had an impulsive nature, which in his youth betrayed him into all manner of excesses. His mother, a devoted Christian woman, ceased not to pray daily in his behalf. He longed to visit Italy, but Monica earnestly besought God to interpose by some providence, and by preventing his departure save her son from the exposure which would inevitably come from a residence in corrupt Rome. The intercessions of the noble mother seemed to be disregarded. Augustine, so long the cause of anxiety on account of his wayward life, was permitted by an overruling providence to visit Milan. The sequel, however, was an answer to his mother's prayer. In Milan he found Christ. In his "Confessions" Augustine says, "Thou didst deny her what she prayed for then, that thou mightest grant her what she prayed for always."

Through all our Christian life, God would teach us that the method of answering our petitions is absolutely his own; that his method is conceived in the highest wisdom, and that the fitful interruptions of our personal choice might work out our greatest evil. Thus very often the denial of our will proves an immeasurable blessing in the end. In this respect prayer becomes a real test of our submission to him. O, happy shall it be, if, when we are thrown back upon the divine will, and upon that alone, we still wait upon Him in child-like trust. The delayed answer may try us; but God has a benign purpose in this delay, which infinite love dictates, and which is deeper than human reason. The way he chooses to answer may oppose in every particular our private judgment; but this is only that supreme good may be realized by us in the most effectual manner. How assuring is this scriptural view of prayer, "Nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt," given in the closing period of Christ's life.

THOU GOD SEEST ME.

Selected.

"When my spirit was overwhelmed within me, then thou knewest my path."—Psalms cxlii. 3.

My God! whose gracious pity I may claim,
Calling thee "Father,"—sweet endearing name!
The sufferings of this weak and weary frame,
All, all are known to Thee.

From human eye 'tis better to conceal
Much that I suffer, much I hourly feel,
But, oh, this thought does tranquillize and heal,
All, all is known to Thee.

Each secret conflict with indwelling sin,
Each sick'ning fear, "I ne'er the prize shall win,"
Each pang from irritation, turmoil, din,
All, all, are known to Thee.

When in the morning unrefreshed I wake,
Or in the night but little rest can take;
This brief appeal submissively I make,
All, all is known to Thee.

Nay all by Thee is ordered, chosen, planned,
Each drop that fills my daily cup, thy hand
Prescribes for ills none else can understand;
All, all is known to Thee.

The fittest means to cure what I deplore,
In me thy longed-for likeness to restore,
Self to dethrone, never to govern more,
All, all are known to Thee.

And this continued feebleness—this state,
Which seems to unnerve and incapacitate,
Will work the cure my hopes and prayers await;
That cure I leave to Thee.

Nor will the bitter draught distasteful prove,
While I recall the Son of thy dear love;
The cup Thou wouldst not for our sakes remove,
That cup He drank for me.

He drank it to the dregs—no drop remained
Of wrath—for those whose cup of woe he drained;
Man ne'er can know what that sad cup contained;
All, all is known to Thee.

And welcome, precious, can His Spirit make
My little drop of suffering for His sake;
Father! the cup I drink, the way I take,
All, all are known to Thee.

THE IVY.

Selected.

The ivy in a dungeon grew,
Unfed by rain, uncheered by dew;
The pallid leaflets only drank
Cave-moistures foul and odors dank.

But through the dungeon grating high
There fell a sunbeam from the sky:
It slept upon the grateful floor
In silent gladness evermore.

The ivy felt a tremor shoot
Through all its fibres to the root:
It felt the light, it saw the ray,
It strove to blossom into day.

It grew, it crept, it pushed, it clomb,—
Long had the darkness been its home;
But well it knew, though veiled in night,
The goodness and the joy of light.

It reached the beam, it thrilled, it curled,
It blessed the warmth that cheers the world;
It rose toward the dungeon bars,
It looked upon the sun and stars.

It felt the life of bursting spring,
It heard the happy sky-lark sing;
It caught the breath of morns and eves,
And wooed the swallow to its leaves.

By rains and dews and sunshine fed,
Over the outer wall it spread;
And, in the daybeam waving free,
It grew into a steadfast tree.

Wouldst know the moral of the rhyme?
Behold the heavenly light, and climb!
To every dungeon comes a ray
Of God's interminable day.

For "The Friend."

What Shall I Do to Be Saved?

When, through the convicting power of the Holy Spirit, by its operation in the heart, man is brought to a sense of his alienation from God and heaven; and enabled to see his lost and undone condition without a Saviour, the query arises; what is my part in the great work of my soul's salvation?

I am convinced that the first needful step is a belief in the divine authority of those convictions which the Spirit of God makes on the mind and heart, and a submission of the will to his government. It is through the operations of this Spirit alone, that a full saving belief and acceptance of the atoning sacrifice of Christ on Calvary, comes to those who have been favored with a knowledge of what He has done for us without us; and a belief also of all that He is willing to do for us.

When the jailor asked the above question of Paul and Silas in the prison, he was told to "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved."

"He that cometh to God must believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him." But no amount of intellectual belief or assent to the wonderful truths of the gospel can alone avail. We must from the heart, lay hold on and accept all in such fullness as to be willing to submit to the baptizing power of the Holy Spirit. We must yield to the influence of the voice of God in the heart, and close in with the offers of mercy extended to us in Christ; and, by his blessed help receive his gift of eternal life. "Therefore, we must not only believe, but acting upon that belief, we must come to Him." Our Lord's word to the Jews of old was, "Ye will not come unto me, that ye might have life." Thus we can accept or reject to our peace or loss forever.

Again, the promise is given, "Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out." And "The spirit and the bride (the church) say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come. And let him that is athirst come, And whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely."

"Ho! every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters. Come ye, buy and eat, Yea; come, buy wine and milk, without money and without price, and let your soul delight itself in fatness."

Having yielded ourselves as passive in his hands, we shall realize that we walk with Him "in newness of life." "Old things are passed away, and behold all things are become new," "and all things are of God," "who hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ," &c. In our walk and converse we shall show forth the praise of Him who hath called us with an "holy calling," and who "hath redeemed us by his own most precious blood." As we give heed to the leading of the spirit of God in the heart; He who hath brought us into this holy life which is "hid with Christ in God," will more and more lead us into "all truth." We shall become as "Trees of righteousness," "The planting of the Lord, that He might be glorified."

Then can the lips express the fullness of the heart; for, "With the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation." Thus shall we know of a growth in grace and in the "Saving knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." We shall become "rooted and grounded" in the love of God, and realize indeed that "The blood of Jesus Christ his cleanseth from all sin."

For "The Friend."

A Meeting for Worship of Sixty Years Ago.

[Our aged friend George Reid, has sent the following account of a meeting at which Samuel Bettle ministered many years ago. There is probably no other person living who can remember the occasion. It is interesting to notice the sound, practical character of the discourse. B. was led to deliver.]

First-day, Eleventh Month 16th, 1823, at a meeting in the old Merion house, Samuel Bettle opened his communication with a query which had rested upon his mind during his silent sitting amongst us, whether, in any case, worship could be acceptably performed unto God unless the mind was previously prepared by the aid of the Divine Spirit. He concluded that it could not; that a previous preparation of heart was absolutely necessary in order to offer an acceptable offering unto the one Eternal and Invisible God; and that our blessed Redeemer had pointed out the way in which the qualification might be obtained, "Where two or three are gathered together in my name there am I in the midst." Our minds, he said, were variously occupied when convened together, but it did not require great depth in religion to comprehend that when met together, a short mental prayer, an inspiration, or a sigh unto God was accepted as worship, and though many besetting temptations hindered us from approaching in the manner we wished, yet the object of worship regarded the heart, the sincerity of the desire. He stanced the proud Pharisee, who dared to offer us good deeds to the holy and invisible One as an act of worship; and thanked, yea arrogantly thanked God that he was not as that poor publican, who, standing at a distance, sensible of his own weakness and unworthiness, scarcely dared to lift up his eyes, and instead of using the pompous language of pharisaical righteousness, could only smite on his breast and say, "God be merciful to me a sinner." I could, said he, follow him to his house and see in his conduct that the answer of peace had been bestowed upon him, and received with meekness and humility.

He mentioned the simple language in which the truths of the gospel were first promulgated. Those times were dark times, yet they were times in which men were searching after truth, disposed to try and to question all things, so much so that in the strong language of Paul, the Athenians passed their time in nothing else but hearing or telling some new thing; and it was this curiosity which prompted them to hear what Paul had to say. Their researches, too, were extensive, for they had an altar inscribed "to the unknown God." They were forced to believe that there was some almighty power which made and sustained the universe, but this power was to them unknown; and they were told that they were too superstitious; yet the language to them was simple, such as, believe in the light, walk in the light, whatever maketh manifest is light, bring your deeds to the light, believe in the Lord Jesus. It was not necessary that they should be learned in theological reading and controversies; no hard doctrinal points were proposed to them, but simple obedience to that light, grace, &c., made manifest in the heart of man. And the language of our Lord to his immediate followers, those who in his name had worked miracles, had healed the sick, raised the dead, and cast out devils, was beautifully simple; showing them their weakness as poor fallen helpless creatures: "What I say unto you I say unto all, Watch." And yet we find for our warning and instruction, that one of these, his followers, denied his knowledge of Him, even in the presence of his Lord and Master. "While I am engaged in preaching the gospel unto others, and endeavoring as much as in me lies, to turn your attention to the alone Rock of safety and strength, I feel my own weakness. I feel, dear Friends, that I stand on a sea of glass, mingled with fire. I feel many times poor and helpless, occupied with unprofitable thoughts, and in vain endeavoring to disengage my mind from them, forced to acknowledge that I am a poor creature—Lord have pity on me. Ah, Friends, in such a state as this, there is no room for little bickerings and disputes, no room for the loftiness of man's proud heart, but rather a prayer for daily bread, and may it be reverently adopted, "Our Father, &c." Our Lord has made it a standing condition, that if we forgive not men their trespasses, neither will our heavenly Father forgive us our trespasses. We should have no room for any thing but divine universal love without distinction."

How did he press the consideration of these subjects upon the minds of all present, more especially the young and rising generation, affectionately and tenderly recommending them, since good and evil were set before them, to choose the good, and thus be preparing for the last and accountable day. He wished all to adopt the practice of drawing near to God every morning, and thus reviewing the actions of the day which was past, thanking Him for his protecting care during the hours of rest, and craving his help to meet the various temptations and occurrences of the coming day. This silent introversion might not always be of the most agreeable kind, but perhaps as profitable and instructive. It might occur to the mind, and naturally would, what was I doing yesterday? It might be, I was at meeting, and my mind was unsuitably occupied for the occasion. Perhaps I was visiting, and drawn into lightness, and knowing this we should acknowledge, "Lord, help me for the time to come; forgive me, for I am a poor creature. I have no might of my own." This being a daily occupation, and a continual care arising that the account might be kept clear, day after day would pass as wave rolls on wave, till we were borne to the everlasting shores of eternity. It behooves us to be wise and consider our latter end; to remember the example of our dear Lord, who was tempted in the wilderness, passed whole nights in prayer unto God the Father. The seashore, the mountains, and the garden were witnesses to his devotion, recorded for our example. In this manner should we be prepared to join the one hundred and forty-four thousand of the redeemed of Israel, who stand on the sea of glass mingled with fire, ascribing all the praise, the honor, and the glory unto the Lamb for ever and ever.

After this sermon, he knelt down in prayer. My heart was tendered, my eye overflowed, and my spirit was in unison with his in the work of prayer, thanksgiving and praise. "O, thou celestial spirit, who of old didst rest between the cherubim, redeem and sanctify our hearts more and more; take away these hearts of stone and give us hearts of flesh; teach us as little children to call thee Father, and render obedience to thy law; bring home those who are now wandering from thy fold of rest and peace, and let their steps be again with the flocks of thy companions; strengthen the aged, and those who in a long course of life have acknowledged thee for their Lord; leave them not in their gray hairs, but be with them and be their rock for ever; draw the young and rising generation to see thy glory revealed in Christ; show them the veil of the temple rent from top to bottom, and disclose to their view the richness, the mercy and the magnitude of redemption through Him. Finally, gracious and adored Jehovah, give us unitedly to rejoice in the assembly of the blessed before thy throne, where we may sing Hallelujah, to Thee and the Lamb forevermore. Amen."

A Remarkable "Find."

We have received a letter from Charlotte F. Brown, of Sidon, Syria, giving an account of a remarkable discovery near there of sarcophagi. We quote from her letter, adding some passages from a letter since received from W. K. Eddy.

A poor man, a Protestant, stumbled on a sort of cave; and now the place has been opened, soldiers are on guard, and only those having permission can go down into it. The law is, that the finder of antiquities has a third of the proceeds, the owner of the land a third, and the Government the remaining third. The man came to W. K. Eddy for advice, saying that he had been offered £500 for his share. W. K. Eddy advised him by all means to take what he could get, and not trust to getting a third from a tricky government.

Ira Harris, M. D., of Tripoli and W. K. Eddy went to the place to-day, as they had permission to see what there was to be seen. There is a large opening cut in the solid rock about a mile northeast of the city, in an open field above the line of gardens, thirty feet square, and perhaps thirty-five deep, that has been cleared out. They were let down into the hole by a rope. In each of the four walls was found a door leading to a chamber. In the south room, about fifteen feet square, were two sarcophagi, one of black marble, beautifully polished, and severely plain, with no carving. The other was of pure white marble, eleven feet long, five wide, and twelve high, dazzlingly bright in the light of the candles they carried. The top was a grand arch of shining marble, the front of which was divided by a line into two panels, and so the back. At the four sides were four projections with noble lions' heads. On each panel was a symbolical figure—body of animal, head of eagle, with uplifted wings, facing each other. Below, on the front of the tomb, beneath a very elaborate cornice, were two Centaurs facing each other and trampling on a warrior who strove to defend himself by a shield. On the sides, which were alike, were first two human figures with four spirited horses ahead of them; some of the horses have their heads turned back; and beneath the horses' feet, a lion on the one side, and a boar or hyena on the other; then two more figures with four more horses.

At the back, in the upper part, were also figures—bodies of birds, heads of men, with beautifully extended wings. Below, two Centaurs carrying a captured stag between them. The cloaks falling from the shoulders of these Centaurs had lions' heads in the corners. One Centaur carries the branch of a tree like a gigantic arrow upon his shoulders. Below these figures all around was a band of figures quite small and exquisitely cut, representing hunting scenes, &c. This was partly covered with stones, so that we could not see it. The workmanship of this was good, but not remarkable. A hole had been broken in the front through which the contents had been rifled, but in general it was in a fine state of preservation. Three skeletons and five dogs' heads. From the long noses of the latter, it is easy to infer they were hunting dogs.

Dr. Harris said that human skeletons were plentiful around. They could see into the other sarcophagus too, and they said that it was filled to the brim with water that trickled down, drop by drop, from the roof above. The air became so bad that the candles starved to death and went out, and Dr. Harris turned faint from the foul air. So they ascended and sat under a tree while another place that had been covered for safety was re-opened. In this second room, toward the east, was a most beautiful tomb or mausoleum of white marble, in the form of a Greek temple, perhaps seven feet high, from base to apex. The cover was the roof, which was carved to represent flat tiles, and even the lead between the rows of tiles was shown. A funeral procession was carved on the sides, showing a horse led by attendants in short Greek tunics, mourners, bier, with urn, &c. There was a frieze running all around filled with little figures. Ionic columns seemed to support the roof. But the most beautiful part of all was a row of figures standing all around the sarcophagus, with backs touching it, each one seven spans high, according to Dr. Harris, and beautifully and delicately carved.

The western door led into a small room from which we passed by a southwest door where there were four sarcophagi, three of white marble with gable roofs and more or less ornamented with vines, &c. The fourth sarcophagus was the largest, being about twelve feet long, five feet wide and four feet high to the eaves, with two feet more to the ridge.—The Independent.

Elizabeth Hooton's Sentence at Cambridge.

Many of our readers who are familiar with the touching history of Elizabeth Hooton, will be interested in the following, printed just as it appears on the public records in the Court House, Cambridge, Mass. A friend who was recently examining the records there copied and forwarded it in a private letter, from which we print:

EXTRACT.

Elizabeth Howton appearing before the Court & being convicted of being a vagabond and wandering Quaker having ben taken in the maind in Cambertowne after their bold & impetuous way making an outery in their streets. This Court do sentence Her to be whipt ten stripes in the prison house before shee thence depart and from thence to be conveyed out of this jurisdiction from Constable to Constable throw Water-Towne & Dedham and to be whipt on her naked body 10 stripes in each of the said Townes as the law it yt case directeth.

On her exam she denied her name to be Howton said she was called to preach charged ye Court yt ye Lord would root out o'r practices yt o'r minister had proved.

The correspondent who made this copy adds some further particulars. He says: "About the same time, 1660, one Benamie Bowers gave the Cambridge authorities a great deal of trouble; he would not attend church, and one Henry Dunster also gave trouble because he would not have his children baptized. He and B. Bowers were continually before the courts for some offense or other. Bowers was at one time a Baptist, but afterwards turned Quaker with his family. I found one place where he had mortgaged his farm, to pay the fines, I suppose. Thomas Danforth, who was the county treasurer and magistrate, whenever short of business was in the habit of persecuting B. Bowers, and then he would enter it at full length upon the records.

"There is this much to be said in the favor of the old Puritans, that they did not treat the Quakers any worse than they did their own members whom they accused of heresy, and in most cases they gave the victim the choice of paying a fine or taking a whipping. I found one case in which they gave a man a second whipping because he invited his friends to come and see him whipped the first time."—Friends' Intelligencer.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Seals and Music.—Lady Cumming, in her description of "The Hebrides," says that the seals are attracted by music. "Often, when sailing on one of the lochs, we have tested this curious fact, and watched the black shining heads appearing from time to time, as these music-loving creatures swam in the wake of our galley, attracted by the sounds of songs, or of old Scotch tunes played on an accordion.

Beach Grass and Sea Sands.—On the west shore of the Hebrides, in some places are beaches of white sand which are liable to drift over the cultivated lands. A wiry bent grass grows there whose long clinging roots make such a mat as binds the sand and keeps it in its place. After a while a thin crust of soil forms over these roots, and eventually finer grasses find a livelihood. The tussock grass is one which is said to take kindly to the double task of feeding the flocks and binding the sands. There is danger, however, lest, in years of scarcity, the flocks may nibble these grasses too closely, and so break this protecting surface, forming a little rent, which the winds are certain to discover, and very quickly enlarge; and one stormy night may produce such wild drifts as will leave promising fields sown with more sand than the poor farmer need ever hope to get rid of.

This is said to have been the cause of that overwhelming sand-drift which converted the fertile fields of Culbryn, in Morayshire, into that vast chain of sand-hills which now extends along the coast. Seven disastrous years of famine had reduced the people to such extremity of poverty, that they were driven to collect fuel where and how they could. Thus the broom and bent grass which had hitherto bound the shore were all torn up, and the wind catching the sand, blew it in thick clouds upwards of 25 miles along the coast, burying thousands of acres beneath this deep, ever shifting sand desert.

Happily for the islanders, the sand thus carried is not all destructive. The whitest sands are formed entirely of shells, ground to the finest powder by the pitiless action of the waves. These of course are lime, and act as a very useful manure, enriching all manner of crops. You can generally tell the little islands where the shell sand is most abundant by the richness of the grass, and fragrance of the sweet white clover which scents the air.

On some islands protected from the fury of the Atlantic, the shells lie unbroken in countless myriads. On one such we landed, near the coast of Ross-Shire, where to the depth of many feet, the little shells lie heaped up. There are no pebbles, no sand, nothing but shells closely packed together in inexhaustible store. Above them is a light crust of earth, on which the greenest of verdant pasture shows how well the shell-lime acts.—In The Hebrides.

Sleeplessness.—Dr. Reed of Atlantic City, says in the Journal of the American Medical Association, that sleeplessness when due (as is mostly the case) to brain exhaustion is best cured by tonic and restorative treatment rather than by narcotics. A light and easily digestible lunch at bed-time; a bath, a sponging of the body followed by thorough rubbing with a towel; the tonic effect of sea-air, combined with rest from business, and the enjoyment of cheerful society, all have had beneficial effects. He thinks the administering of narcotic medicine in such cases is usually a mistake.

Quicksands.—The difference, so far as these meadows are concerned, between a "boiling" spring and a "quicksand," is one of dimension only; one being an intermitting, upward movement of a narrow column of water, bearing an insignificant amount of sand; the other a far greater bulk of water, so charged with sand that its movement is very deliberate: a spring is seldom more than a yard in diameter; a quicksand may extend over an area of several square rods. The fact that the temperature of the water in either case is always the same, 52° Fahr., shows that springs and quicksands do not materially differ except in size.

The danger attendant upon personal exploration of these quicksand areas, and a natural repugnance due to an adventure to be related hereafter, has deterred me from any extensive survey, and only one of them, two miles or more back from the creek, but in this valley, has been carefully examined. For years my neighbors have insisted that this particular quicksand is a veritable bottomless pit. To satisfy them I took a ten-pound lead, well greased, and brought up stiff clay from a depth of eighteen feet, and I think I learned the difficulty about sounding the quicksand's depth, so far as my neighbors are concerned. Not one of them but admitted he had never used any other means of measurement than a fence-rail.

My own experience with quicksands is too full of horror to be related, at least I shudder when I recall a sunny summer afternoon of long ago. I stood upon a patch of quaking grass, pleased with its elastic yielding and too intent upon watching a pair of nesting finches to realize that I was slowly sinking. At last I noticed that my eyes were gradually approaching the horizon of the low-built nest, and looking about and beneath me, saw the treacherous waters were creeping above the matted weeds upon which I stood. The latter were trembling more and more violently, and the fearful truth was plain, I was over a quicksand.

I had a double task to perform, and that right quickly—avoid fright and reach terra firma; but how? But one chance of escape appeared to offer, to distribute my weight, and at once I stooped and struck out, as though swimming. The theory was good, but not the application in this instance, for what I gained by the greater upholding power of additional vegetation under me was lost by violence, and I broke through the raft of weeds upon which I depended.

I have positive knowledge of nothing beyond this moment, I can only judge from the appearance of the tangled grass and weeds that my convulsive efforts to reach the meadow were finally successful. Once fairly beyond danger, my strength failed me and I fauted.—Waste Land Wanderings.

—Increase in Church Membership.—The number of members of the different religious denominations in the United States is estimated to be more than 1,600,000 greater than it was four years ago.

—Northern and Southern Presbyterian Assemblies.—At these meetings, held in the latter part of the Fifth Month, the subject of a re-union between the two branches of the Presbyterian family was again considered. The Northern Presbyterians appear to be the more nearly of one mind in the effort to effect in organic union, than their Southern brethren; some of whom object to the intermingling of white and colored churches in social relations. Committees of conference were appointed by both bodies.

A committee was also appointed by the Northern Assembly to confer with a commission of the Protestant Episcopal Church, to consider in what way the answer to our Redeemer's prayer, "that they all may be one," could be realized and manifested.

The same body adopted the following resolution, bearing on the subject of temperance:

"That in connection with all saints, finding their way obstructed and the work of the kingdom hindered by the liquor traffic, issuing from the same ports whence go the ambassadors for Christ, and under the same flag, this Assembly voices its most emphatic protest against the greed that is carrying this wasting scourge among barbarous people, and instructs the Foreign Board to co-operate in every practicable way with similar boards in this and other lands, that this evil may be stayed."

—Transubstantiation.—The recent Episcopal Diocesan Convention in Omaha, furnished an illustration of the fact that this dogma, which seems so strange to those who have been educated in a belief of the spiritual nature of the gospel, has obtained considerable foothold in that denomination. The preacher of a sermon before the Convention said, that attempts had been made to foist upon the Church the doctrine that Christ himself is present upon the altar in the form of bread and wine. The worship of them he regarded as idolatry. One of the other ministers left the meeting, saying that the speaker had insulted members of the congregation by branding as idolatrous, points of belief held by them as the most sacred features of religious life.

—Lutheran Church.—Of 276 church buildings of the Lutherans in America, erected in 1886, 152 were for German congregations, 62 English, 37 Swedish 22 Norwegian, and two Danish.

—United Presbyterian Church.—At the General Assembly of this body in Philadelphia, a resolution was adopted, that "the overwhelming majority of the church have declared their desire and readiness for union with the Associate Reformed Church of the South, whenever that Church is ready to adopt it." A representative of the Southern body, who was present, stated that four-fifths of their people were in favor of the union, but that some of their number were opposed to that article of the United Presbyterian Testimony which condemns slavery, and declares it contrary to the law of God. The agitation now existing in the Church over the use of instrumental music in worship, furnished another reason for delay.

—Divorce.—At the General Council of the Reformed Episcopal Church, lately held in Philadelphia, resolutions were adopted declaring that that body recognized no Scriptural ground for divorce, but that laid down by our Saviour; and that their ministers should not perform the marriage ceremony where either of the parties had been divorced on other grounds; but permitting the re-marriage of a husband and wife who had formerly been separated.

—First-day Schools.—At an "International Sunday-school Convention," held at Chicago, it was stated by the Secretary, that there are in the United States nearly 100,000 such schools, with more than 1,000,000 teachers, and more than 8,000,000 scholars.

—Dublin Yearly Meeting.—This body convened on the 27th of Fourth Month. The Annual Statistical returns gave the number of members on the rolls as 2,774, which is 61 less than the previous year. This decrease was principally owing to the excess of deaths over births, and of the number who had removed from the Yearly Meeting over those who had been received by certificate.

A proposal from the Quarterly Meeting of Munster that men and women should in future transact the business of the Quarterly Meeting in joint session, was not agreed to.

James N. Richardson, George Grubb and Thomas W. Fisher, were appointed delegates to the Conference of Yearly Meetings proposed to be held at Richmond, Indiana, next fall.

London Yearly Meeting was opened Fifth Month 18th. The report of the Conference on American correspondence, held by authority of the Yearly Meeting of 1886, occupied much time, and the discussion on it was participated in by many of the members. The first proposal it contained was, that the correspondence as heretofore conducted by the Yearly Meeting should be continued, substantially on the same basis, with some change in matters of arrangement, the principal of which was the appointment of an increased number of correspondents, who should constitute an American Committee of the Meeting for Sufferings, and who were expected to keep themselves informed as to the condition of the Society in America. This proposal was finally adopted.

The second proposal was to issue a minute or address to Friends, which should be sent not only to the Yearly Meetings with which London corresponds, but to those bodies which it does not recognize. In the consideration of this proposition, one of the speakers suggested, that those to whom the minute be sent, should include "those whom we are accustomed to call Hicksites." After considerable expression of opinion on this second proposal, the Clerk decided that the meeting was not sufficiently united to adopt it, and it was accordingly set aside.

The third part of the report recommended to the meeting to consider the question of re-opening correspondence with Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. The conclusion was arrived at that the time had not come for this step.

During the consideration of the Epistles received from America, some outspoken remarks were made on the position occupied by some of the bodies from which they came. The Epistle from Ohio [Binns] reaffirmed its faith in the truth of Holy Scripture as to the baptism of the Holy Ghost being the only saving baptism, &c. In reference to this, a Friend said he could not but feel how easily words could misrepresent the spiritual condition, when he knew that shortly after the writing of this epistle, several recognized ministers in that Yearly Meeting publicly underwent the rite of water-baptism. Some of their ministers also accepted payment for their services, and the title of "reverend."

Objection was also made to continuing a correspondence with Iowa Yearly Meeting [the Larger Body] because it had practically established a paid ministry, under the title of a pastor, and had dealt in a most arbitrary manner with some of its subordinate meetings. One Friend said, "If we are to keep in communion with a society like that, I do not see why we should not open our doors to any other religious denomination in the world."

Finally committees were appointed to prepare replies to all the Epistles received.

In response to the proposal of Indiana Yearly Meeting, Joseph Bevan Braithwaite, Jos. Storrs Fry, Marriage Wallis, George Gillett, Sarah B. Clark, and Maria Richardson were appointed delegates to a Conference of Yearly Meetings to be held at Richmond, Ind.

When the reports from Scotland were under consideration, attention was called to the people known as "Ayrshire Quakers." A number of men who had been engaged in connection with the Ayrshire Evangelistic Society had found that they were walking very much in their own strength, and they were enabled to see that the work in which they were engaged was not so profitable as it would be, if they were able to cease from self and to depend more immediately on Divine guidance and help. They went to various places to seek for religious sympathy and help, but they were enabled to come back to what we believe to be the right way, and to sit down and wait upon the Lord. They were now engaged in holding meetings among their neighbors after the manner of Friends; and their influence was very great in the neighborhoods where they lived.

The Tabular Statement showed a total membership of 15,453, an increase of 73 on last year's membership. The births had been 182 during the year, and the deaths 258.

A minute was adopted, to be presented to the House of Commons, protesting against the State regulation of vice in India, and elsewhere throughout the Crown colonies.

When the report of the Home Mission Committee was read, serious uneasiness was expressed, lest its action in employing pastors and stationing them in particular meetings, should endanger the testimony of the Society as to Gospel ministry, and introduce a system of settled preachers, like that which prevails in other denominations. Several of those who spoke participated in this uneasiness, and the desire was expressed that the Committee should not be reappointed. Several hours were spent over this subject, and the Clerk in concluding it stated, that there had been a good deal of adverse criticism, but he thought the meeting was prepared to reappoint the Committee, and this was done.

A suggestion has been made by the Episcopalian of New York, to build a magnificent Cathedral in that city. This subject was spoken of by some of the preachers recently in terms of approval. One of them, who called it a "noble enterprise," said:—

"We ought to build the largest, the grandest, and the most beautiful edifice on the globe. It should be an honor to the civilization and progress of the Western Continent. Look at the government buildings of our State and National Capitols. They are imposing and admirable structures, but how much greater and grander should be the temples of the Lord! The proudest Cathedral of the proudest city of the proudest nation on the globe should surpass St. Paul's, St. Peter's, the Houses of Parliament or the Capitol at Washington in vastness and grandeur of conception."

We can readily understand how "the proudest city of the proudest nation on the globe" may desire to gratify that pride by the erection of a magnificent edifice which would attract the admiration of mankind, and bring to those who were concerned in its erection the praises of the unthinking and the worldly-minded. But we fail to see how the gratification of such pride will advance the kingdom of Him who was "meek and lowly of heart," whose example and teachings tended to humble and not to puff up the mind of man, whose kingdom is not outward and worldly, but inward and spiritual, and whose apostle exhorts his followers not to be conformed to the spirit of this world.

The disposition which, with increasing wealth, has been manifested of latter years in this country to build costly and ornamental places for worship, has long seemed to us a sad mistake. If a wealthy congregation can appropriate $100,000, or several times that amount, for building purposes, instead of expending the whole sum on one edifice for themselves, would it not be doing far more to advance the cause of religion, if they would content themselves with a house of moderate cost, and use the remainder in the erection of meeting-houses in other localities where the people were less able to bear the expense? Or in some other of the many ways in which they could imitate Him, whom they profess to serve, and who went about Judea, doing good to man?

Under the Jewish dispensation, there was an outward temple at Jerusalem in which worship was offered to the Almighty; but our Saviour instructed the woman at the well of Samaria, that the hour had come in which worship was to be in spirit, and was not to be confined to any place. But now, under the government of Christ, his faithful followers are the temples, in which He abides; as Paul said to the Corinthians, "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God?" "The temple of God is holy, which temple ye are." To call, in these Gospel days, the buildings of brick, stone or wood, in which the worshippers meet, the "temples of God," has a tendency to invest them with a sacredness which belongs not to any outward things.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—It has been demonstrated by the count of cash now going on in the United States Treasury at Washington, that the vault capacity is entirely inadequate for the safe handling of the silver. "The silver vault was filled to its utmost capacity some time ago, and there still remained about 8,000,000 standard dollars which, for want of a better place, were piled in bags in the passageway leading to the vault." The count will last five weeks more, and the silver cannot be returned to the vault until it is finished. It is hoped that the new silver vault, with a storage capacity for 100,000,000 standard dollars, will be ready for use in Ninth Mo. next.

It was supposed that the death of the late Captain Eads would end the Tehuantepec ship railway project, of which he was the originator. It seems not. The stockholders in the enterprise, twenty-five or thirty of whom (representing $15,000,000 of stock) reside at Pittsburg, have determined to continue the work, and have selected one of their number, Col. James B. Andrews, to take charge of it. He is a brother-in-law of the deceased engineer, and said to be entirely competent to carry on the enterprise. The stockholders have abandoned the idea of asking for a Government loan, and will prosecute the work on its merits.

The Agricultural Department has issued a report which shows that 10,000,000 acres of forest are used yearly in this country for fuel and lumber. Fires, it is calculated, destroy about 10,000,000 acres more. The forest area of this country is less than 450,000,000 acres. At this rate we will in less than a quarter of a century have no forests. Whatever relief may come in the future from the change in the fuel question, the demands for timber will increase as the country increases in population. The whole thing seems to point to arboriculture on a large scale and systematically, and in no long time either.

The Chicago Times has printed reports of crop conditions collected from over 1000 points in the Northwest. The general prospects for wheat are favorable; there is a largely increased acreage, especially in Dakota, and the aggregate yield in the Northwest promises to be the largest ever known. The outlook for corn is very good. "There will be short crops of timothy and flaxseed, and the barley crop also threatens to be a partial failure."

The travelling freight agent of the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fe Railroad, just returned to Dallas, Texas, from the wool districts of the West, says the sheep are in fine condition on account of an unusually favorable winter, and that the average yield was from 7 to 9 pounds. Speaking of wool centres, he says: San Angelo will handle 1,250,000 pounds of wool; Lampasas, 1,500,000; Brownwood and Ballinger, about 1,000,000 each. The first train run west on the Allegheny Mountains with crude petroleum as the only fuel, was a mail train west on the Pennsylvania Railroad, which arrived in Pittsburg on the 17th inst. "It came through from Altoona on time, and it came without a stick of timber or a scuttle of coal to make steam for its motor. There was entire uniformity of heat in the fire-box, without any stoking to make it. The pipes from the 200 gallons of crude oil in a tank in the tender did the business. The experiment was a complete success. Splendid time was made, and there was no annoyance from smoke or cinders." The process is the invention of a Russian.

The Supreme Court of Illinois, on the 18th instant, decided a case in which a depositor in the Banker Hill Bank, who had lost his money by its failure, brought suit against the directors individually, claiming that, "if deposits were received when the directors, by exercising due diligence, might have known that the bank was insolvent, they were legally liable for the deposits." The Circuit Court of Macoupin County gave judgment for the depositor, and the Appellate Court sustained the judgment. The case was then carried to the Supreme Court, which affirmed the judgments of the lower Courts. The Supreme Court declares: "First. That the directors of a bank are trustees for the depositors, as well as for the stockholders. Second, That they are bound to the observance of ordinary care and diligence, and are hence liable for injuries resulting from its non-observance."

Following the failure of the coffee speculation, on the 14th instant there was a panic in the wheat market in Chicago, which declined 17 cents per bushel. Several firms in that city suspended.

The steamer Champlain, of the Northern Michigan line, bound for Cheboygan from Chicago, burned at midnight on the 16th instant, between Norwood and Charlevoix, at the mouth of the Grand Traverse Bay. Fifty-seven persons were on board, of whom only twenty-seven are known to have been saved.

The Senate of Michigan has passed a Local Option bill from the House, after making some slight amendments. It is expected that the amendments will be concurred in by the House.

A telegram from Reading says that owing to recent legislation threatening the liquor interest, a call has been issued to the brewers of this State to meet at Harrisburg on Ninth Month 8th, for the purpose of forming the Brewers' Association of Pennsylvania. The organization is to be entirely separate from the State Liquor League of Pennsylvania, which has headquarters in Reading. The object in forming the association is to resist prohibition legislation in this State.

A severe shock of earthquake was felt at Summerville, South Carolina, on the 19th inst., at 37 minutes past 10 o'clock, A. M. It was accompanied, by "the most prolonged roaring since Tenth Mo. 22nd, of last year. Nothing was felt in Charleston. The shock at Summerville caused a "sensible vibration of houses and furniture."

The deaths in this city last week numbered 341, which was 48 less than during the previous week, and 26 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing 178 were males and 163 females; 186 adults and 155 minors; 40 died of consumption; 23 of diseases of the heart; 21 of pneumonia; 18 of convulsions; 15 of old age; 15 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 13 of debility, and 12 of inanition.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½'s, 110; 4's, reg., 128½; coupon, 129½; currency 6's, 123 a 131.

Cotton was quiet and ½c. lower, at 11½ cts. for middling uplands.

Feed was abundant, dull and weak. Sales of 1 car good winter bran at $15 per ton. Quotations: Bran, winter, choice and fancy, $15.50; do. do., medium to prime, $14.50 a $15.25; bran, spring, $13.50 a $14.25.

Flour and Meal.—Flour was very quiet and generally weak to sell. Sales of 125 barrels Pennsylvania, roller straight, at $4.30; 250 barrels Ohio, straight, at $4.50; 375 barrels winter patent, at $4.75 a $4.90; 125 barrels Minnesota clear, at $4.20, and 500 barrels do., patent, at $4.75 a $4.90. Rye flour was weak; 100 barrels choice sold at $2.70 per barrel.

Grain.—The wheat market was strong, No. 2 red closing at 88 cts. bid and 88½ cts. asked. Corn was without important change; No. 2 mixed closing at 45 cts. bid and 46 cts. asked. Oats were quiet but steady; No. 2 white closing at 37 cts. bid and 37½ cts. asked.

Beef cattle were inactive and from ¼ to ½c. lower, at 3¼ a 5¼ cts. Sheep were ½ to ¾c. higher, at 3 a 4½ cts.; lambs, at 5 a 7½ cts.

Milch calves were active at 5 a 7 cts. Milch cows were fairly active at $25 a $55. Fat cows were lower, at 2½ a 3¼ cts.

FOREIGN.—Elaborate preparations have been made in various places in Great Britain and several of the Colonies, to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the accession of Queen Victoria to the throne. Westminster Abbey has been thoroughly searched for explosives that might have been hidden there, but none were found.

Minister of the Colonies, Balaguer, read the Cuban Budget in the Spanish Cortes on the 14th instant. The receipts amount to $23,000,000, and the expenses to $22,862,000. After referring to the reorganization of the colonial tariff, which he described on Fifth Mo. 30th, he announced that provision would also be made to empower the Government to increase ten to twenty per cent. the duties on goods from all countries whose tariffs injured Cuban interests. He also announced that an arrangement would be made to settle the claims of American citizens.

While a party of 250 pilgrims were crossing the Danube River, near Paks, the boat on which they were making the passage was caught in a hurricane and capsized. Only a few of the party were saved. Over 100 bodies have been recovered.

The floods in Hungary are subsiding. The towns of Mako and Vasarhely are now out of danger. If the present dry weather continues the water in the flooded districts will be gone in six weeks. There is great distress among the inhabitants of the inundated regions, and there is danger of fevers arising from the decaying vegetable matter left by the floods. Fifteen hundred farmers are totally ruined, and the entire damage is estimated at $5,000,000.

Ristics, the new Premier of Servia, is a man of strong pro-Russian sympathies. His elevation is considered a check to Austria and a gain for Russia in the Balkans.

There has been a great conflagration in the town of Botoschany, Roumania. Eight hundred houses were destroyed and seven persons were killed.

Hail stones, strangely shaped, pointed and weighing over a pound each, recently fell in the districts of Aitos and Carnabat, between Adrianople and Shunla, on the south slope of the Balkan mountains, Eastern Roumelia. The hail stones destroyed the harvests, killed many laborers and cattle in the fields, and pierced the roofs of houses like bullets.

U. S. Consul Seiler, at Cape Town, has sent to the State Department a report on leprosy in South Africa. The first case of leprosy in Cape Colony was introduced by Malay slaves more than one hundred years ago, but not until 1845 was any attempt made by the Government to stamp out the disease. In that year a leper asylum was established at Robben Island, seven miles from Cape Town, and up to 1884, 744 lepers had been admitted to the institution, and comprised but a very small proportion of the leper population, as the segregation of lepers was not made compulsory. The rapid increase of the disease, particularly among the European population, as described in the reports of district surgeons, has aroused the Colonial Government to action, and a second and larger asylum is in process of construction, the present accommodation being wholly inadequate to provide for all the afflicted applying for admission.

DIED, at his residence in Rancocas, N. J., Fourth Month, 5th, 1887, CALEB DARNELL, in the 70th year of his age, a member of Burlington Monthly Meeting, New Jersey.

At her residence in Philadelphia, on the 11th of Fourth Month, 1887, SOPHIA JONES, daughter of the late William and Phoebe Jones, an elder and overseer of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia for the Western District. This dear Friend was naturally endowed with a bright mind, and a cheerful, hopeful, self-reliant spirit. These being sanctified by Divine grace and united with a quiet, courteous demeanor, she was peculiarly fitted for usefulness in the meeting of which she was a member, and was greatly esteemed by a large circle of older and younger Friends. An important part of her life work was among the poor of her native city, and the rare blending of sympathy and judgment which she brought to her labors among the destitute and the improvident, made her a most helpful visitor in their homes, and a wise almoner of the bounty she disbursed. Her trust was alone in the mercy of God in Christ Jesus our Saviour, and a realization of that mercy was felt in the remarkable peace and calm with which she met the summons to lay down her work here, called, as we reverently believe, to enter into the joy of her Lord.

At his residence in Moorestown, N. J., on the 9th of Sixth Month, J. WILLIAMS WORTHINGTON, a member of Chester Monthly Meeting of Friends, aged 40 years.

Selections from the Diary of Abigail W. Hall.

Fifth Mo. 7th, 1857. I have, O Heavenly Father! endeavored in simple faith to follow Thee; being willing that thou should lead and guide me. But if I have in any way stepped aside, and erred from thy commandments, be pleased to make it manifest, lead me in the way thou wouldst have me to go, and speak peace to my troubled soul. Thou alone, dearest Father! knowest how it is with me, even the wrestlings of spirit, till the day breaketh! I cannot let thee go. If I perish it must be at thy footstool.

Sixth Mo. 28th. Have been reduced of late to a state of entire helplessness and dependence; the blessed effect of which hath been, to drive me closer than ever before to our alone great Helper; and to the asking of Him in all sincerity of soul, to do by and through me, a poor worm of the dust, as seemeth to Him good. Thy will, and not mine be done, has been the secret, and may I not say continual prayer of my spirit. I have had this day, a little faith given me to believe, that if I hold fast my allegiance unto Him, that He will uphold me through and over all. Last Fifth-day afternoon, with our dear friend James Emlen to bear us company, — and I, visited a young man in West Chester jail for murder. He received us civilly, but appeared to me in a very thoughtless and unconcerned state of mind. — labored honestly with him, strength being given for it. I could but believe that some things which were said would, in his more serious moments, (for surely he must have some such) come up before him. My prayer for him at the time, and continues to be, was and is, that the word might not be preached in vain; but that while his time is lengthened out, his soul's salvation may be worked out.

25th. For the past two and a-half weeks have been absent from home. How I long for a settled home, if I dare ask it, and were worthy—a home in that house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. But if it is the will of my Heavenly Father, a little longer to continue me here in mutability, may He be pleased to give strength to endure cheerfully to the end. What are all these afflictions, if my cup of suffering be only filled up! and I be found worthy at last, to join that innumerable company, who have come out of great tribulation, &c. For the past week I have been led as by the "still waters." A favor unspeakable! Oh, for that state of mind, which an eminent apostle was found in when he could say: "None of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, that I may finish my course with joy," &c.

Eighth Mo. 9th. I am now at ——. Have been absent a week at the sea-side with sister S., who has not been well for a long time. We thought perhaps sea-air and bathing might benefit her! I gave up to go entirely on her account; it being no personal gratification. The "deaths off" I have been plunged into of latter times, seem to have spoiled, may I not say, every "pleasant picture." But through and under all, my eye is unto our ever adorable Head; endeavoring through crowds of discouragements singly to follow Him; and was it not for his all-sustaining Arm bearing up, where would I be? I was hastened home some days earlier than I expected, on account of the death of our dear friend Pennoek Passmore. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord; they do rest from their labors," &c. May we who are left a little longer to endure the conflicts of time, more earnestly seek after this rest; that we may have within ourselves, as we pass along from day to day, a well grounded hope that a happy immortality awaits us, through the mercy of Him who died for us and rose again.

Ninth Mo. 6th. It may be well here to remark, that I am looking towards entering into a marriage covenant now before very long. It is a subject that has caused me deep thoughtfulness; yea more than any mortal knows of. Have been ready to think that no one ever passed through such sore conflicts! But I can honestly and in all sincerity say, that the engagement was entered into in the fear of the Lord, whom I desire to serve above every outward consideration.

Tenth Mo. 25th. "Lord thou hast been our dwelling place in all generations; from everlasting to everlasting thou art God."

Ohio, Eleventh Mo. 14th. Many are the vicissitudes of this changing scene of existence. If only prepared for the one great change at last, it matters not. I have believed it to be in the line of Divine appointment that I am here; and whether my tarriance be longer or shorter, may the day's work keep pace with the day, and the salvation of the poor soul be worked out with fear and trembling. I have experienced great self-reduction since coming here, so that there has seemed hardly left the "little oil" or the "handful of meal;" not enough even to serve my dear Lord and Master. Increase, O Lord, my faith.

22d.—First-day afternoon. During our meeting this morning there was a patient struggle for life kept up; though my little bark seemed tossed as on a troubled sea. I remembered how it was with Paul and Silas; who even in the prison-house and in the night season, too, prayed and sang praises unto God; and how their chains were loosened, &c. Enable me, O Heavenly Father! yet more and more to lift up my prayers unto thee, and in mercy regard. Open the prison door and set my captive spirit free. Make my way (thy way) clear before us; that so, poor and unworthy as we are, we may glorify Thee here on the earth, and be made meet for an inheritance among all those that are sanctified and justified in heaven.

Twelfth Mo. 26th. My diary has been neglected, for which I feel condemned. During the interval of silence, have experienced the vicissitudes of day and night; there having been some seasons of refreshment, in which I have been strengthened to speak well of the name of the Lord; but more often has abaseness of spirit been mine. There has at times been felt the "woe" if I preach not the gospel, when I have stood forth in great weakness. But He who remains to be "a present helper," hath been near: praised and magnified be his ever worthy name.

Several late letters from home, have borne the intelligence of death among my kinsfolks and friends. — in her last to me says, "It seems a very eventful time; may we live so as to be prepared for what may come next," to which my heart did respond. Enable me, O Heavenly Father, to walk more worthily before thee, the few days that may be lengthened out to me here.

First Mo. 8th, 1858. I feel this morning, that I can adopt the language of dear John Cooran, where he says: "I still see much for the fire, and more for the fuller's soap;" the prospect of which brought me very low: being even ready to give up all, under a deep sense of unworthiness; in which the Lord was exalted, whose right it is, and the creature abased: here I felt the truth of that saying of the apostle, "Unto us belongeth shame and confusion of face."

10th. I have been afresh confirmed in my belief this day, that strength is laid on One who is mighty, and able to deliver unto the very uttermost. Think I never was more reduced into a state of entire helplessness, than during the most of our meeting this morning. Towards the close a helping Hand was reached forth. How good the Lord is! "To those who have no might, He increaseth strength."

Second Mo. 3rd. Instructed this morning in reading the 4th chapter of Matthew. The dear Master himself was led up into the wilderness, and fasted forty days and forty nights, being tempted of the devil; and can we who are endeavoring to follow Him, expect any other than to drink of the cup that He drank of, or than to be baptized with the baptism He was baptized with! "The disciple is not above his master, or the servant above his lord." "It is enough for the disciple to be as his master, and the servant as his lord."

Third Mo. 2nd. It is now nearly four months since we came to Ohio. For a while it seemed as though we were to take up our abode here, which was, in prospect, a close trial; still there was a yielding, and I looked towards no other than settling here. Latterly there has seemed a liberty given to turn our faces homeward. I say our, for my dear husband has a home feeling in Pennsylvania. It has seemed to me Divine mercy has condescended to the "low estates" of some of us. I do believe prayers have been put up, that have been heard by Him who is the hearer of prayer; and that He has turned our faces thitherward. Wherever our lots may be cast, I feel "that bonds and afflictions abide me;" but can I not say, "I'm only permitted to lay down my head at last in peace," "none of these things move me." Next Sixth-day is the time now fixed for our return. If only permitted to arrive there safely, there will be fresh calls for gratitude.

Fifth Mo. 9th.—Whiteland, Chester Co., Pa. I feel that I have been remiss, in not recording favors and blessings which, unworthy as I feel myself to be of the very least of the Lord's mercies, have been from day to day extended. We were safely brought through our journey to this our new home; and surely we have been cared for since thus far. Earthly cares have pressed heavily, though now lightened. I have tried not to let them "choke" the good seed; but it seemed sometimes, as if they would swallow me up. My faith has of late been renewedly confirmed in Him, who remains mighty to save and able to deliver, even unto the uttermost, all those who come unto Him. In our meetings both to-day and last Fourth-day, how did light arise out of darkness, and obscurity become as the noon-day! that I feel this evening afresh bound to return thanks unto Him, whose mercies are new every morning. Keep my heart alive to this, O dearest Father!

Ninth Mo. 5th. Remissness still apparent in my little journal. Still, I humbly trust, there has been, during the past four months, an earnestness to press forward in my heavenward journey, though my steps have too often "declined;" thus making work for repentance. Sincere and fervent desires have afresh been raised of late for increased watchfulness unto prayer, that I may experience daily preservation; and thus, glorifying our Father which is in heaven, know the great work of my soul's salvation to be worked out, while the day lasteth; for truly the night fast hasteneth unto us all. How solemnly have my feelings been stirred by the removal, one after another, of dear friends, from works to rewards.

We had a very good meeting to-day; our dear friend David Cope was engaged in the ministry, very excellently so.

East Whiteland, 3rd of Twelfth Month. My diary has been much before me for days past; and feeling afresh incited to go on with it, I again venture forth to record the manifold mercies and deliverances still extended to my poor soul; which, though off a partaker of the wormwood and the gall, is still prepared to celebrate and praise his ever worthy name, who "leads in the way of righteousness, and in the midst of the paths of judgment."

23rd. Am moving on from day to day, striving to keep constantly before my eyes the solemn truth, that "It is appointed unto all men once to die, and after death the judgment."

If any of our dear young Friends, upon reading the memoranda of one who seemed often to have her encampment by the waters of Marah, are tempted to think them too discouraging and forbidding examples for them to follow, may they not lose sight of the wells and groves of Elim, where our Diarist was permitted to rejoice in her pilgrimage; nor the Ebenezers she was strengthened to set up, saying, "Hitherto the Lord hath helped." Thus she records, and we thought frequently, of feelings of thanksgiving and gratitude for the condescending goodness and mercy of her Father in heaven; of the filial emotion that she was His child; of being permitted to hold communion with Him whom her soul loved; with also the precious Christian experience of pouring out her prayers and tears in the sweet solace of heavenly peace and joy, which surpasses every earthly enjoyment. These being set over against the exercises of spirit alluded to, should animate and encourage to abide under the Chastening Hand, all the days of trial and of baptism in the proving of our faith and faithfulness, unto the eternal recompense of the reward reserved in heaven for those who by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory and honor and immortality.

May none of this class be induced to think that tribulations and the discipline of the cross can be avoided in a school and warfare wherein are involved the putting off of the old man with his corrupt deeds, and the putting on of the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness. While all who enter heaven must first be turned from darkness to light, or, in other words, experience the new birth unto righteousness, He who is the way has promised to prepare it before his humble and obedient followers, and ever to make his yoke easy and burden light. May none be offended in Jesus, the meek and lowly Captain of salvation; nor seek an easier path to the kingdom than by the cross—the only one to the crown.

For "The Friend."

A Visit to Lancaster County.

On the morning of the 16th of Fifth Month, I left Philadelphia, accompanying a friend on a visit to Lancaster County. The railroad, for the first twenty miles or more, passes over the granite and gneiss, which covers most of the south-eastern corner of Pennsylvania. As it approaches Malvern, the highest point on its track east of the Susquehanna, it crosses in an oblique direction the wide belt of mica slate which borders on the south the long and comparatively narrow bed of limestone rock, which extends from Norristown, on the Schuylkill, for many miles in a south-western direction, and is known as the Great Valley. Into this valley the road descends, and follows it until, near Christiana, it turns almost at right angles, and working its way to the north-west, crosses Coppermine ridge at a remarkable depression, known as the Gap, and enters the broad and fertile limestone valley of Pequea.

It was a pleasant morning, and the ride was rendered more agreeable by the peculiarities of the scenery, the vegetation and the rocks, dependent on the difference in the geological formations through which we passed. To one whose interest has been awakened in such studies, these furnish a constant source of instruction as well as of entertainment, as he journeys over the land. The character of the soil is dependent on that of the rocks, from whose decay it has been formed; and this character in its turn affects the forms of vegetation which grow upon it. For, although some plants are very widely diffused, and may be found in almost every part of the country where a similarity of climate prevails; yet there are many others which are more exclusive in their tastes, and do not grow except in localities which are peculiarly adapted to them. Thus we find in the sandy soils of lower New Jersey, many species, such as the Pyxidantha the Hudsonia or False Heath, the White Cedar, &c., of which, years of diligent exploring never showed me a specimen in the fields or swamps of Delaware and Chester Counties, underlain with the primary rocks. Again, in the rich soils resulting from the decomposition of these rocks, plants flourish for which I have searched in vain in the drift formations of New Jersey. In the belt of mica slate on the south of the great valley, that handsome, orange-colored Orchid, Habenaria ciliaris (Yellow Fringed Orchis), which Gray calls our handsomest species, is frequently found in the damp meadows; but I have never seen it in the richer lands of the adjoining districts. Many similar instances might be mentioned.

One illustration of this choice of locality by plants, I met with in the course of our railroad ride, and I had often before noticed the same, and that was the abundance, on the railroad embankments, of the Horsetail or Scouring rush (Equisetum), a flowerless plant, whose stem is loaded with siliceous flint, which gives it a harsh feeling, and adapts it for scouring the surface of vessels of wood or metal. From each joint in the erect stem, a circle of branches radiate. Of this genus there are several species. In some of them the stems which produce the fruit appear early in the season, are without branches, and soon disappear; while the sterile stems are supplied with numerous branchlets, and continue to flourish through the season. This, I believe, was the species which was so plentiful along the railroad.

I met with but few wild plants of interest in Lancaster County, except such as have already been described in former articles in "The Friend." The land is so valuable, and so carefully cultivated, that in the rich limestone valleys, which occupy much of the county, the woods have been generally removed, and little waste land is left, in which the plants natural to the country can find a home. The Celandine (Chelidonium majus), a native of Europe, has found a congenial home here, and was abundant on many of the roadside banks. Its bright yellow flowers, scattered in profusion, were really very pretty; and I never before admired it so much. The juice of this plant is saffron-colored, and possesses acrid properties. In domestic medicine, it is sometimes applied as a remedy for warts and tetters—with what success I cannot say. Dr. Darlington speaks of it as "a very innocent application."

On some of the leaves of the common May Apple (Podophyllum peltatum), I observed an orange-colored rust, or growth of fungus, very similar in general appearance to that which often infests the leaves of the wild briars. An examination of this with a pocket-lens showed the surface to be marked with minute pits, like those made with the point of a pin; and under the microscope, these cavities as well as the general surface of the affected part were lined and covered with clusters of very small grains, yellow and white, which I supposed to be the seeds or spores of this species of fungus. Many of the small transparent hairs on the margin of the leaf were ornamented with these spores, either singly scattered, or collected in groups.

The May Apple has a creeping root-stock from which the stems spring. These grow a foot or more in height, and divide into two branches, each of which is terminated by a large deeply-lobed leaf. At the fork of the stem a large white flower appears, which is followed by the fruit, a smooth yellowish, pulpy berry, which is often eaten by boys, and has a flavor somewhat like that of the banana and papaw. The leaves and root of the plant are rather poisonous. The cathartic properties of the latter make it a substitute for jalap.

As already mentioned, much of Lancaster County is underlain with limestone, and the soil is highly productive. Although land in the east has generally fallen in value, owing to the reduction in prices of produce, caused by western competition, yet we found in many parts of the county good farms would still sell for $200 per acre. Dairying, which in the counties nearer to Philadelphia appears to be the principal business, here holds but a secondary place. A large proportion of the land is ploughed every year, and grain, and, I regret to add, tobacco, are depended upon as the sources of profit. Fattening cattle is almost universal. The stock cattle are bought in the fall of the year from western drovers, and fed in the capacious barns which are seen on all sides. Even if there should be little apparent profit in this branch of the business, it seems essential to convert the straw of the wheat crop into manure, and furnish a supply of fertilizing material for the cultivated crops. Most of the cattle had been sent to market, but in one barn we saw a noble herd of 33 animals.

The northern part of the county reaches into the red shale or sandstone formation which extends from Connecticut into Maryland; and furnishes the brown building-stone, which is largely used in New York and other cities. Besides this, there are isolated ridges of slaty and other rock, such as the Welsh Mountain in the eastern and Chestnut Ridge in the western part; where the soil is less fertile, and which are largely used for the growth of timber.

During our visit, we crossed the eastern end of the Welsh Mountain, where it slopes down towards the limestone valley. On its upper and rougher parts resides a colony of poor people, whites and blacks, inhabiting very rough and cheap cabins, often erected on land to which they have no title, who find subsistence by working for the farmers in the richer lands adjoining. To this source of supply, some of them are charged with adding that petty pilfering, which is a common temptation to people who are surrounded with an abundance, in which they have little share. Some of the more daring spirits among them progressed so far in this criminal course as to break open stores and carry off part of the contents. Among these, "Abe" Buzzard, (whose home was pointed out at a distance) obtained a local notoriety, and is now in prison. We found that people in that neighborhood believed that he was made a convenient scape-goat, and that, of the robberies charged to his account, some were committed by other parties. He was a man of great activity, and probably of much sagacity, for he long eluded the efforts made to capture him, which were stimulated by the offer of a reward of $1000. But, becoming wearied of living in constant fear and watchfulness, he finally surrendered himself to the jailor at Lancaster. To save the county the expense of the $1000 reward, it was arranged that he should appear at the door of the prison about midnight, and that everything should be prepared for his immediate admission, lest any one should lay hands on him and claim the reward. This plan was successfully carried out. J. W.

(To be concluded.)

For "The Friend."

"Take nothing from nothing, nothing remains."

In arithmetical calculations, wherein it is found needful to cypher out a question or problem, how relieving to find that when the end of figuring is reached, nothing from nothing results in neither loss nor gain. It is even better than to find, by division, subtraction and multiplication, there yet remain odd figures that create a puzzle to know what to do with them.

The difficulties of life are great. The energies of the human mind are sometimes taxed to a painful extremity, while it is for the high and the low, the learned and the unlearned to take advantage of opportunities for instruction in one of the best lessons poets ever taught, "Man, know thyself—enough for man to know." And as man cannot rightly know himself, except as the Lord shows to him his real condition, how needful to seek unto the Lord while He may be found; to call upon Him while He is near. The lesson of salvation is understood to mean this: "To know thee, the only true God and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent, is Life Eternal." "Away, then, with that felicity whose price is to abandon the faithful" in support of a testimony for the ever-blessed Truth as it is in substance, and not in shadow or symbol. P. R. G.

Providence, Sixth Mo. 18th, 1887.

For "The Friend"

"What is man that thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that thou visitest him? For thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honor."—Is. viii. 4, 6.

"As for man, his days are as grass; as a flower of the field, so he flourisheth. For the wind passeth over it, and it is gone; and the place thereof shall know it no more."—Ps. ciii. 15, 16.

How vividly the Psalmist here describes the frailty of man! and yet how many there are who elude to life with such tenacity that nothing but death staring them in the face will make them realize the truth of this declaration. They allow one thing after another to come between them and their Creator, till, oft-times, they forget what manner of man they are; but He who "knoweth our frame, remembereth that we are dust," and repeatedly gives us warning in many ways, sometimes by taking from our midst some loved one, perhaps in the bloom of youth or the vigor of manhood. The brittle thread of life is often severed when least expected, even without a moment's warning, thus clearly showing us what poor, helpless creatures we are.

When we take these things into consideration, we are ready to query, with David, "What is man?" truly nothing, but a poor dependent creature, unable to draw even so much as one breath without that Almighty power which ever holds him up,—the Creator of all things, who is "mindful of him" (man), who knoweth that his "breath is in his nostrils," and that he is dependent on Him for everything. Why then should man, who "cannot make one hair black or white," or "add one cubit to his stature," allow the thought to once enter his mind that he is anything, or can do anything? It is so clearly shown that of ourselves we can do no good thing, nor in truth anything without the aid of a Higher Power to give the ability.

Oh the frailty of human nature! Our Heavenly Father's love and care for us are so great that our Saviour declared to his disciples, "Even the very hairs of your heads are all numbered." And yet for all this care and love, man is often ungrateful, although the Lord hath given him power to discern good from evil, and the ability to love and serve Him.

"O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God!" And yet He does condescend to men of low estate, and through his cleansing, purifying power make them fit subjects for his kingdom, even such that He is "not ashamed to call them brethren." Thus we become "children of God; and if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ." Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men." Then would the world be full of thanksgivings and praises (though silent), instead of the curses and complaints that fill the air when things do not go smoothly as desired by many of the unregenerate. Yet there are many whose every action shows that their hearts are overflowing in gratitude for the many blessings bestowed upon them, but alas! what a small per cent.

The Psalmist in an ecstasy exclaimed, "Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life, and I shall dwell in the house of the Lord forever." This he said, not from the mere fact that the Lord is merciful; but from a sense of acceptance with Him, a well-grounded hope that He was his God, and would uphold him by His free will. So we of this present time may become so rooted and grounded in Christ Jesus, that nothing will move us. "For I am persuaded," said the apostle, "that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

A Visit among the Mennonites.—No. 2.

Familiar as we are with the fanaticism and intolerance which so long ruled over the minds of men, quenching the Spirit of Christ which ever teaches peace on earth and good-will to men," and assuming to control not only the outward acts but the inner sentiments for which we are responsible to God alone; it still seems very strange that the peaceable, unoffending Mennonites should have so long been exposed to the fury of persecution, and especially that they should have been so cruelly treated by fellow-reformers,—by those who, like themselves, had rejected the papal dominion over their consciences. The Encyclopedia Britannica says: "To us at the present day, it appears not merely strange but shocking, that the Protestant Council of Zurich, which had scarcely won its own liberty, and was still in dread of the persecution of the Romanists, should pass a decree, ordering, as the reformer, Zwingli himself reports, that any person who administered anabaptism should be drowned; and still more shocking, that, at the time when Zwingli wrote, this cruel decree should have been carried into effect against one of their leaders, Felix Mantz, who had himself been associated with Zwingli, not only as a student, but also at the commencement of the work of Reformation. The hymn book is still in use among the Amish Mennonites, in Lancaster County, Pa., which commemorates his death in 1526.

E. K. Martin, of Lancaster, in a pamphlet about these people, says, "Three thousand of them suffered martyrdom in Suabia, Bavaria, Austria and the Tyrol; six thousand under the rule of Philip the Second of Spain. There were nearly as many martyrs among the Mennonites in the city of Antwerp alone as there were Protestants burned to death in England during the whole reign of Bloody Mary." The extreme severity of the Swiss Protestants against them drew a protest from the burgomasters of Rotterdam, who sent an ambassador to Switzerland to intercede for them.

"But while the iron hand of persecution was tightening its grip at one end of the Rhine Valley, it was relaxing its hold at the other." Towards the close of the 16th century the Mennonites obtained a fixed and unmolested settlement in the United Provinces under the shade of a legal toleration procured for them by William, Prince of Orange, the founder of Belgic liberty. He acted from principle in allowing liberty of conscience and worship to Christians of different denominations; and was also engaged by gratitude to favor the Mennonites, who had assisted him in the year 1572 with a considerable sum of money. He was frequently urged to persecute the Mennonites, and violently assailed for his refusal to do so. His trusted friend, Saint Aldegonde, complained because he would not do it; and Peter Dathenus denounced him as an atheist for the same reason. Both civil magistrates and clergy made a long and obstinate opposition to his proclaimed toleration towards this people—an opposition not entirely conquered by him at the time of his death, but which on every occasion he resolutely discountenanced through his whole life.

The Mennonites in Holland grew rich and numerous, and occupied high social and commercial positions. Mosheim says of them at a little later period, "They are at this day, in their tables, their equipages, and their country-seats, the most luxurious of the Dutch nation. This is more especially true of the Mennonites of Amsterdam, who are numerous and exceedingly opulent." This is an interesting illustration of a cycle of events, which is not uncommon. The self-denial and economy in manner of living which their principles taught, naturally led to the accumulation of property. The wealth thus acquired as naturally leads to luxury and display!

The principal source of information respecting the sufferings of the Mennonites is "The Bloody Theatre or Martyrs' Mirror of the Defenceless Christians," written by the Dutch historian T. J. Von Bracht and published at Dortrecht in 1660. This has since been translated and published in German and in English. A new translation into the latter language has just been issued by the Mennonite Publishing Company at Elkhart, Indiana. This voluminous work essays to give a history of those martyrs in each century of the Christian era "who suffered on account of baptism." It contains a summary account of the various persecutions to which the Christian Church was exposed, and of the firmness and constancy exhibited by numbers who sealed their testimony to the truth with their lives, "of whom the world was not worthy." Of most of these, in the earlier centuries, it may be doubted whether their peculiar views of baptism were the ground of their sufferings. Many appear to have been the victims of the rage and cruelty of those who were avowed enemies of Christianity in any form. But among the "Martyrs" may justly be classed hundreds who were put to death by the Papal Church as heretics; but who really held the doctrines of Christ and his Apostles with less mixture of error than had crept into the Church of Rome—such as the Waldenses and their predecessors, whom the Mennonites regard as in a certain sense their forerunners. For both reject infant baptism, live blameless lives; assist each other as brethren, so that there are no beggars in their communities; and hold that it is unlawful to swear.

In his description of the sufferings of the Waldenses in the 14th century, Von Bracht quaintly compares his narrative to a journey, where "fire and flames are on the right; on the left there are deep waters; between there is nothing but bloody theatres, scaffolds, wheels, stakes, and innumerable instruments of torture and death, by which men are destroyed in a lingering manner, as with a thousand deaths."

Nearly 700 pages of the book are occupied with the account of the sufferings of the Mennonites proper, during the century and a half ending with the year 1660, when the work was published. As already mentioned, the Zuinglian Reformers at Zurich issued a severe edict against them in the year 1525, and in 1526, Felix Mantz was drowned at that place for his testimony to what he believed to be the principles of the Gospel of Christ. He left behind him a statement in which he says, "My soul rejoices in God, who has given and imparted to me much knowledge, that I may escape an eternal, unending death."

It would be a tedious task to enumerate the many hundreds of innocent sufferers, many of whom were burnt to death, others killed with the sword or drowned; or to detail their faithful resistance of all attempts to persuade them to embrace the errors of popery; or to describe the numerous cases in which they believed the Almighty poured out his judgments on their persecutors. Their sufferings were principally from the adherents of the Pope, but one of their writers complains of the cruelty of Zuinglius and his followers, who imprisoned at one time, in a dark tower, twenty persons, consisting of men, women and young girls, and passed on them the following sentence; that they shall never more see the light of the sun, nor of the moon, and shall finish their lives on bread and water. For this purpose they shall all remain in the dark tower, the living having to endure the noisome stench of the dead, till there are no more of them remaining."

The reader may remember the accounts given of Martin Luther, whose fervid imagination so wrought upon him, that at times, he thought the Prince of Evil was present in a bodily form in his room; and it is said on one occasion he hurled his ink stand at the apparition! Von Bracht gives a curious illustration of the same mental phenomenon, in the case of one George Libich who was imprisoned for his belief at Filleburg, near Inspruck, A. D. 1544. He says:—"That place as is well known, being in subjection to evil spirits, this brother had in consequence, to suffer much opposition and persecution from the evil fiend. For he frequently tempted him visibly, and made numerous attacks on him, particularly the first year. One time he appeared to him in the form of a young lady, and wished to embrace him. When the brother knelt down and prayed, he endeavored to prevent him. He appeared also as a young man and a warrior, and attempted many things of this nature. But brother George having severely reproved him, he finally left him in peace."

Baltimore Yearly Meeting's Records on Slavery among Friends.

1760. A weighty consideration accompanying Friends' minds respecting some uneasiness with some Friends, respecting the words "buying of negroes," contained in our Discipline, and agreed to last year, which was advised against importing negroes, this meeting, under solid and mature consideration, with divers remarks thereon, Friends at present are not fully ripe in their judgment to carry the minute further than against being concerned in the importing of negroes.

1761. On reading the alteration of our Discipline made at our Yearly Meeting held at West River last Spring relative to negroes, a weighty exercise revived in this meeting and a solemn conference was held thereon and wholesome exhortations to attend to the mind of Truth; after which this meeting concludes that Friends should not in any wise encourage their importation, by buying or selling them or other slaves, and those that have them by inheritance, or otherwise, be careful to train them up in the principles of the Christian religion, and if there should any difficulty arise relating to our testimony in this affair, that those Friends apply to the Monthly and Quarterly meetings for Friends' advice, as truth may be pleased to direct; and we hope and believe, that as they wait on the Lord for counsel, He will open a way for them in the Wisdom of Truth to act without invalidating this our Christian testimony.

1764. A friend of Gunpowder Monthly Meeting reports to this meeting that they have had several meetings appointed for negroes in particular, and that they were attended by a number of solid Friends, and that they were to good satisfaction, and if Friends should still see further cause, this meeting advises that they make further appointments for service, and make report thereof to our next Yearly Meeting.

1765. The case of Robert George being before this meeting, and Friends being informed that he intends to purchase another slave, think it best to use further entreaties with him, in order to convince him, if possible, of the inconsistency of such conduct with the testimony of truth: Therefore this meeting appoints Joseph Bartlett, Henry Troth and Joseph Berry to visit him, and treat with him in love for the same, and report thereof to our next meeting.

After a time of solid sitting together, and weighty testimonies were borne, tending to encourage and stir up Friends to a religious discharge of our Christian duty in regard to maintaining truth's testimonies against enslaving or keeping in bondage our fellow creatures, the meeting adjourned.

As the discouraging of that heretofore prevailing practice of dealing in, or detaining in bondage our fellow creatures, remains to be the incumbent duty of this meeting, it is the mind thereof that an epistle of caution and tender advice in this respect be now prepared and handed down to our several quarterly, monthly and preparative meetings, which was accordingly done.

1768. This meeting being solidly concerned to discourage the iniquitous practice of dealing in slaves among us, it is the unanimous mind thereof, that those who buy or sell them for term of life or otherwise, contrary to the former direction of this meeting, and on being dealt with in love by the Monthly Meeting where they reside, if no prospect appears of their making satisfaction for the same by granting them their liberty, or proceeding therein according to the direction of their respective monthly meetings:—that in such cases the said meetings are advised and directed to proceed to disown such persons, as disorderly walkers, until they so far come to a sight and sense of their misconduct as to condemn the same to the satisfaction of the said Monthly Meeting.

1771. The iniquitous practice of importing negro slaves, which has long prevailed in this Province, having at this time become the subject of our solid consideration, and Friends apprehending it our incumbent duty to manifest the inconsistency thereof, by bearing our testimony against said practice, it is therefore the sense and judgment of this meeting that a petition be prepared, to be presented to the legislative body of this Province, setting forth the iniquitous consequences attendant on said practice, and requesting an act may be made to remedy this evil as far as in them lies.

The following Friends are appointed to prepare an essay of a petition for said purpose and to produce the same to our next meeting, (to wit): Evan Thomas, Joseph Cowman, Gerard Hopkins, John Thomas, William Edmundson, James Berry, Isaac Dixon and Benjamin Berry.

1776. The advice of a former yearly meeting respecting extending labors of love to such of our religious society as continue to keep their fellow creatures in slavery, having been heretofore proceeded with by one of our quarters and continued under care, the other quarter reports that they have made some progress in that weighty affair, which they hope has had some good effect on some of the visited, though in general there appears a great obstruction in the minds of those who are possessed of these poor blacks, rather inclining to retain them in their present situation of bond slaves.

It is the advice of this Meeting that our several monthly meetings do each provide a suitable book to record the manumissions of slaves, and that in future the number entered therein with the names of those who grant them be sent up to the yearly meetings.

1778. Accounts of the manumission of one hundred and fifty-three slaves, brought up from our several quarters were now read, examined and received.—Friends' Intelligencer and Journal.

For "The Friend."

Many of the readers of "The Friend" doubtless remember Rachel Priestman, from England, who paid a religious visit to this country more than forty years ago. In the prosecution of her Gospel labors, she thought it right to hold a public meeting in the southern part of the city of Philadelphia; and for this purpose the use of the large meeting-house of the Methodists known among them as the "Wharton Street Church" was secured, and the meeting held accordingly.

The following letter describing the meeting was written by one of their "local preachers," a member of that congregation, to a fellow-member, who was at that time absent from the city; and is interesting as not only showing how the novelty of a Friends' meeting affects one not accustomed to it, but as also proving that the truths of religion, when uttered by Divine inspiration, do not fail to find a response in the heart of every true Christian:

Philadelphia, 2nd of March, 1844.

"On Fourth-day in the evening, the Friends held their meeting in the "Wharton St. Methodist Episcopal Church." The house was entirely filled; I suppose there were 1500 persons present. At the time appointed, about twelve or fifteen Friends made their appearance, and I conducted them to the pulpit, and there upon the platform, where you have been accustomed to see uncovered heads, were seen some five or six men and three or four women with their heads covered. This on the part of Methodists would have been out of order, but as a matter of course no one found fault in the present instance. As I was the means, in some sort, at least, of the meeting being held in our church, you may readily judge that I felt some anxiety for the success of the meeting; and knowing how the people would feel disappointed if nothing should be said by the Friends, I prayed most devoutly that the Lord would send his Spirit and move friend Priestman to speak to the people; which she did after a silence of about fifteen minutes. She laid off her plain bonnet—the next Friend took charge of it—when she arose, evidently somewhat embarrassed, which however soon wore off, and I add with pleasure, that we were all exceedingly pleased: and though I listened to every word that fell from her lips, yet I heard nothing anti-methodistical, and for this plain reason, she preached as pure Gospel as ever Paul preached. She first addressed professors, when if you had been present you might have found something suited to your case; she then turned to the wicked and impenitent, and I trust, cleared herself of their blood; and though it was a Friends' meeting, yet we could not refrain from responding, amen, occasionally, yet fearful at the time we were out of order; I believe, however, it was all in place and well received. She spoke fifty-three minutes, when she sat down some ten minutes, then arose again and said, she thought it most safe to add a few words to the "under shepherds of the little lambs," and then addressed parents present in a close and pointed manner. This was thought to be the best of her address, but it was all good and delivered in a Christian spirit: the Lord prosper her wherever she may go. Silence prevailed a few minutes again, when William Evans arose and spoke most excellently a short time, when silence again prevailed, and then friend Priestman knelt down and offered up a most appropriate prayer, when the meeting ended. I understand it was satisfactory to the Friends, and I believe it was to all concerned: it certainly was a good time."

There is no way by which the strength of the church can be restored, but by members coming back to the first principle of individually waiting upon the Lord, and seeking to receive from Him the spirit of prayer, that He would return to us, and show us our real condition; what He would have us to come out of, and the high and holy way he would have us to walk in. His mercies are the same from generation to generation; and when we are rightly humbled and brought back, He will condescend again to our low estate, and lift us up, and put songs of praise into our mouths; and the children will be enabled to join in thanksgiving and praise to his great and ever adorable name.

THE TWO LIGHTS.

Selected.

"When I'm a man" is the poetry of youth.
"When I was young" is the poetry of old age.

"When I'm a man," the stripling cries,
And strives the coming years to scan,
"Ah, then I shall be strong and wise,—
When I'm a man."

"When I was young?" the old man sighs,
"Bravely the lark and linnet sung
Their carol under sunny skies,—
When I was young."

"When I'm a man, I shall be free
To guard the right, the truth uphold."
"When I was young, I bent no knee
To power or gold."

"Then shall I satisfy my soul
With yonder prize, when I'm a man."
"Too late I found how vain the goal
To which I ran."

"When I'm a man, these idle toys Aside forever shall be flung."
"There was no poison in my joys
When I was young."

The boy's bright dream is all before,
The man's romance lies far behind.
Had we the present and no more,
Fate were unkind.

But, brother, toiling in the night,
Still count thyself not all unblest,
If in the east there gleams a light,
Or in the west.

AT DAWN.

Selected.

At dawn the jubilant morning broke,
And its glory flooded the mountain side,
I said, "Tis eleven years to-day,
Eleven years since my darling died."

And then I turned to my household ways
To my daily tasks, without, within,
As happily busy all the day
As if my darling had never been!

As if she had never lived, or died!
Yet when they buried her out of my sight,
I thought the sun had gone down at noon,
And the day would never again be bright.

Ah, well! As the swift years come and go,
It will not be long ere I shall lie
Somewhere under a bit of turf,
With my pale hands folded quietly.

And then some one who has loved me well—
Perhaps the one who has loved me best—
Will say of me, as I said of her,
"She has been just so many years at rest."

Then turn to the living loves again,
To the busy life without, within,
And the days will go on from dawn to dusk,
Even as if I had never been.

Dear hearts! dear hearts! It must still be so!
The roses will bloom, and the stars will shine,
And the soft green grass creep still and slow,
Some time over a grave of mine;

And over the grave in your hearts as well,
Ye cannot hinder it if ye would;
And I—ah! I shall be wiser then—
I would not hinder it if I could!

ALWAYS GROWING.

Selected.

BY T. C. HARBAUGH.

What do you do in the ground, little seed,
Under the rain and snow,
Hidden away from the bright blue sky,
And lost to the madcap sparrow's eye?
"Why, do you not know?
I grow!"

What do you do in the nest, little bird,
When the bough swings to and fro?
How do you pass the time away
From dawn to dusk of the summer day?
"What! do you not know,
I grow!"

What do you do in the pond, little fish,
With scales that glisten so?
In and out of the water grass,
Never at rest, I see you pass.
"Why, do you not know?
I grow!"

What do you do in the cradle, my boy,
With chubby cheeks all aglow?
What do you do when your toys are put Away, and your wise little eyes are shut?
"Ho! do you not know?
I grow!"

Always growing! by night or day
No idle moments we see;
Whether at work or cheerful play,
Let us all be able to say:
"In the goodness of God,
We grow!"

Superstitions Connected with Red.

In building a house a careful Chinaman (having first engaged Taoist priests to sprinkle the ground with holy water, in order to drive thence all bad spirits) takes care to provide a first-class piece of timber for a ridge-beam. Not only is this painted red, but it is decorated with festoons of red cloth, or at least with strips of red paper, blessed by the priest, and smeared with the blood from the comb of a young cock sacrificed for this purpose. From this ridge-pole is sometimes suspended a basket containing various symbols of good fortune, amongst others a hank of red thread.

This use of red as an amulet is strangely widespread; it figures in the use of red cloth and red thread by the wizards of Mongolia, and also of certain aboriginal tribes of Hindoostan. It has its place in medicine lore too. Both in Scotland and in the West Indies red flannel worn round the throat is supposed to prevent whooping-cough, and in England we still sometimes hear of a red rag worn round the throat to cure tooth-ache, or that a scarlet silk thread with nine knots, so worn, will stop nose-bleeding.

So, also in Chinese stories, a peculiar virtue is attributed to red pills; and when a sick man is supposed to be afflicted by evil spirits, a geomancer writes a charm with a new vermilion pencil on yellow paper, cut in the form of cash. He burns one of these charms, swallows the ash in cold water, and places another over his door. Then the exorcist (who is generally a Taoist priest, robed in red) ministers before a temporary altar, having in his hand a wooden sword made from a lightning-stricken tree, round this is wrapped a strip of red cloth.

It is not only the Taoist priest who secures the good influences of red; the torches which illuminate the great open court at the Confucian midnight festival are wrapped in scarlet cloth and fastened on tall red poles. Red candles are burnt on Buddhist altars, and red dumplings are there offered. Red eggs are offered by women at certain shrines and, (at least in southern China) the ashes of Buddhist monks who have been cremated are sewn up in bags of red cloth.

When a Chinese boy is a month old he is clothed in a bright red dress, receives his infantile name, and his head having been shaved for the first time, he is presented with a cap on which there are eight small metal figures representing the eight angels. He is also presented with a red chair and a red bedstead. As he grows older his careful mother will see that his pockets are lined with red, and on any days when evil spirits might come about, a red silk braid is entwined in the boy's long plait.

At the solemn betrothal of a Chinese damsel, the bridegroom-elect sends her a pair of bracelets tied together with red twine, and at the wedding two wine-cups connected by a red silk thread are drained by the bride and bridegroom.*

For "The Friend."

A few Lines in Love from a Friend of the Truth.

May the wisdom of God have its perfect work within our hearts! Let us take heed to the word that is nigh in the heart, and fear God and obey his commands in all things; that the blessing of the Lord may abide upon us, that the fruits thereof may spring forth on every side, that all may see what manner of spirit we are of. Oh, the blight that vain thoughts and desires bring over the minds, when they take our whole attention. Let us turn from these as much as within us lies.

Every tree is known by the fruit that it brings forth; even so, our secret thoughts will be known and expressed in words and actions; not only so, but in the great day of reckoning, they will be published, as it were, on the very house-tops. Oh that our desires may be constantly raised unto Him who was touched with the feeling of our infirmities, and is waiting to be merciful to all those that seek earnestly unto Him. Such as these will be enabled to walk in that hidden path that is cast up for the ransomed and redeemed to walk in, when the trials of time here will have no power over them. Nay! the dark cloud cannot always cover the Sun of righteousness; the bright rays thereof will break forth in due time through the dark mist, and shine in on the faithful servants of the Lord. Thus they will be guided and led. Oh that we may ever discern this heavenly light shining in our hearts, going before and around about us. Then let us fear not what poor fallen man can say or do to these frail bodies.

If we are the servants of Christ our Saviour, we must be willing to partake with Him the sorrows of time, that we may be worthy to be glorified with Him before our heavenly Father. Oh I would that all might partake of this heavenly glory, for great is the travail of spirit that I feel for those that are striving to fulfil every command of our Lord and Master; yea, my desire and prayer is for these as for myself; for when our hearts are full to overflowing with the Father's love, how it reaches forth to all, and in especial manner to the tender babes in Christ who are observing and looking unto those that are older for counsel and advice. How necessary then it is for us, who are older, to be as polished stones, pure and white, that we may be as lights by the way-side, ever watching over the tender babes in Christ, leading them carefully by our example and tender love to the true fold of Christ.

Oh how precious it is to be worthy to deliver the pure word which comes from the Holy Spirit of Him who is ever ready to administer to the humble desires of his faithful servants. How cheering and enlivening to hear his admonition and feel his kind chastening hand, when we have gone counter to his wishes. By this do we know that we are not forsaken. If we are humble and truly penitent, how quickly he will draw us back to his tender embrace!

It is not the outward form or zeal of man that will make us acceptable in the sight of God, but it is the inner anointing of the Holy Spirit of the Lord, and living in subjection thereto, that will be accepted of the great Father of mercy. Let us seek earnestly unto Him, that we may be pure vessels, ready at any time to fulfil his every command, that the blessing of the Lord may ever rest upon us.

Astronomical Medal.—The gold medal of the Royal Astronomical Society of Great Britain, has this year been awarded to an American—Hill of Washington, in recognition of his mathematical researches upon the motion of the moon.

Defective Flues.—The statistics of losses by fire in this country, show that a large proportion of the buildings burned, take fire from some defect in the construction of the flues which convey the hot air and gases from stoves and fires; often times there is only the width of one brick (about four inches) between the inside of the flue and the adjoining woodwork. And, as the sulphurous gases which come from our coal, tend to disintegrate the mortar, small openings may gradually be formed between the ends of adjoining bricks, which expose the wood still more fully to the action of the fire. Indeed, careless or unscrupulous builders have often rested their timbers on the brick-work of flues, so that there is little or nothing to protect the ends of the beams. These gradually char and are eaten away by the fire, until a small opening is made into the interior wood-work of the house, through which a current of air is established. A flame kindles as the result, and the destruction of the building often follows.

In the Report of the Indian Committee of the late Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, it was mentioned that in the erection of the new school buildings for the Indian children at Tunessash, the walls of the flues had been made nine inches thick, which was a proper precaution.

Rhubarb.—The Pie-plant Rhubarb so largely cultivated for the table, although belonging to the same genus (Rheum) as the medicinal root, is a different species. The Rhubarb root of commerce is obtained from the central parts of Asia, Tartary and China. It differs from that grown in Europe, in containing more of the crystals of oxalate of lime, whose presence is shown by the gritty sensations experienced on chewing a piece of the root. After being gathered the roots are dried by exposure to the sun and air: a process which requires considerable time.

Shad Fry.—A recent bulletin of the U. S. Fish Commission states that the total distribution of shad fry for the season of 1886 amounted to 90,000,000. As the entire number of shad taken for the market is less than 6,000,000, it will be seen that, for every shad taken from the waters this season, there have been artificially hatched and returned to the waters 15 young shad. Assuming that the entire cost of production and distribution has been $20,000, the young fish have been produced and distributed over the entire United States at a rate of about $215 a million, or about 46 fry for one cent. Another interesting fact to note is that, for the entire time up to and including 1882, there were produced 200,000,000 young shad; while, for 1883 alone, the total was over 90,000,000. This seems to indicate that we are approaching a position where the work may be regarded as profitable from a commercial standpoint.

Tea Plantations in China.—The tea-plantations are scattered over the hills, forming little dotted patches of regularly planted bushes. Here the girls and women are busy selecting the young, green leaves, which they pick and collect in large basket-work trays of split bamboo. The leaves are then spread on mats and are left in the sun till they are partially dried. After this, they are placed in very large, flat circular trays, and bare-footed coolies, proceed to use their feet as rollers, and twirl the leaves round and round, till each has acquired an individual curl. This doesn't sound very nice, does it?

Then the whole process is repeated a second time. The leaves have another turn in the sun, another foot curling, and a more elaborate hand rubbing. Then once more they are exposed to the sun, till they are so dried that no trace of green remains. They are then packed in bags, and are sent off to the tea-merchants to be fired under their own supervision, in the great tea-hongs, where the hitherto unadulterated leaf receives that coating of indigo and gypsum to which I have already alluded. Some of the tea-farmers have charcoal stoves in their own houses, where firing is done on a small scale, but this is exceptional.—Lady C. F. G. Cummings.

A Bird Defending its Young.—A neighbor was mowing a rank growth of weeds, and while thus engaged, noticed a few peaces before him a clump of elders about which a pair of little yellow warblers were constantly flying as though in trouble. Suddenly one of them flew directly in his face, snapping its bill and chirping excitedly.

Not stopping his work, the mower was again and again saluted in the same manner, and he saw that the bird's actions meant unmistakably a protest against his further progress. He quit mowing and the bird flew back to the bushes. He cut another swath, and brought the bird back almost at the same moment. The mower's curiosity was now thoroughly aroused. He walked ahead to the bushes and found a nest containing young birds. Weeks after I went to the place, and found the cluster of elders as he left them. The nest now was, of course, empty.

My neighbor's story of the little warblers recalled the fate of a brood of king-rails in my mucky meadow. The tangled white-joint grass was being cut, and steadily over the marshy stretch the mower forced his way. Not a bird there but must have heard the meaning "swish" of the deadly blade, if it did not divine what the sound meant. The blackbirds hovered overhead and protested at the invasion of their weedy haunts, although their young had been long upon the wing. The liquid notes of the swamp-sparrow trickled from the hedge-row, mourning, I thought, that the protecting grass should be no more, and all unmoved upon its nest sat a king-rail, which, deprived of its earlier brood, was patiently rearing another. There it sat, and another sweep of the scythe would pass closely over it, if not, indeed through the poor bird's body. The mower drew nearer with arms drawn back, when quick as a flash of light, the bird fled from the swift stroke of the shining blade, and with a wild cry forsook her nest. An armful of grass was piled about it, and the mower passed on. Towards evening the poor bird returned, but only to find her young dead from neglect or exposure.

Again and again, in the gloaming, I heard the wild cries of the bereaved king-rail, as it seemed to utter curses on those who would not leave unmolested even that little tract of waste land.—Waste Land Wanderings.

—Westtown Boarding School.—At the meeting of the General Committee, held Sixth Mo. 22d, it was stated that the whole amount of subscriptions for the new buildings up to the date of the report, including the interest on a part of the funds, temporarily invested, was $285,666.89. About $20,000 more will probably be needed for the completion of the Girls' wing, the grading, and other incidental expenses.

With the exception of some cases of mumps, which were chiefly among the boys, the health of the family during the present session had been generally good.

The Committee which had visited the schools, in their report to the General Committee, spoke favorably of the order of the school and of the good feeling that prevailed between the pupils and their teachers: they had been impressed with the seasoning effect upon the spirits of the family of the seasons of solemn silence observed before and after meals, at the times of reading the Scriptures, and on other occasions; and they believed that the presence of the Head of the Church had been manifested in the meetings held for Divine worship in the school.

—White's Iowa Manual Labor School.—The Christian Worker of Sixth Mo. 16th, mentions the burning of this building. The fire started in the roof, and was too far advanced when discovered to be extinguished. No one was seriously hurt. The family of 53 children and care-takers are sheltered in the other buildings, and the work goes on with as little interruption as possible.

—Reform the Newspapers.—The London Saturday Review says: "To fill the newspaper of a clean-minded man, much more of a clean-minded woman, with elaborate details of disgusting stories is to give just and serious cause of complaint. To pander to the nasty vices of those who enjoy reading such stuff is more reprehensible conduct still. It is unnecessary to demonstrate the fact that indecent publications give offense to well-behaved people under whose notice they are brought. It is the universal experience of civilization—and the criminal courts have for some time renewed and confirmed that experience in the most striking manner for those that have eyes to see—that such publications are deleterious in a high degree to persons who are not well behaved. On both these grounds publications of the kind in question ought to be rigorously prevented by the law wherever that can be successfully accomplished, and effectively discouraged by the moral sentiment of the public outside of the proper scope of legal interference. The present condition of things, including the immediate cause already referred to, could not have occurred in a thoroughly healthy state of society. The doctrine and practice that everybody is to be free to do and say exactly what he pleases, at least as long as he abstains from personal violence, has in modern times ceased to be tolerance and become shameful flabbiness."

—Infidelity and Morality.—J. W. Toland, of Canton, Ohio, has been comparing the statistics furnished by the County officials, of seven counties in that State in which the largest number of spiritist organizations, infidel clubs and free-love teachers are found; and of seven counties in which there is but little trace of these influences. The first seven selected were Ashtabula, Stark, Summit, Erie, Portage, Lake, and Geauga. The combined population of these was 232,000; and the number of divorces for the year ending Sixth Mo. 30th, 1885, was 262. The second seven counties were Muskingum, Belmont, Coshocton, Guernsey, Holmes, Noble and Monroe. Their population amounted to 228,000, and the divorces for the same period to 90. In the counties where infidel tendencies are most influential there was one divorce to every eight marriages; and in those where they least prevail, one divorce to twenty-three marriages.

—Conviction for Blasphemy.—Under a law of New Jersey, inflicting a penalty of fine or imprisonment for blasphemy, a man who had been a Christian minister, but had become an infidel, was recently convicted and fined for circulating an infidel pamphlet, published by him at Morristown in that State. There was no denial of the fact. The Independent, in commenting on the case, says that while men in this country have a right to express their opinions on the subject of religion, provided it is done in a decent manner, no one has a right to outrage the general sensibilities of the community by gross and vulgar contumely against the Christian religion.

—The Tongue-Guard Society.—The members of this society, which has recently been organized in Hartford, Conn., pledge themselves to pay one penny into its treasury every time they speak disparagingly of another person. The money thus accumulated is to be used for some charitable purpose. An increased care over "the words of the month" as well as "the meditations of the heart," from which they proceed, would be of use to many who are not members of any such an organization.

—Growth of Roman Catholic Doctrines in the Episcopal Church.—The Southern Churchman comments on a pamphlet recently issued by F. S. Jewell, a clergyman in the Episcopal society, advocating the doctrine of Purgatory, or an intermediate state between this life and one of fixedness, in which further opportunity is given for repentance and preparation. It calls upon the bishops of its denomination to protect the members from such teaching, and predicts that if something is not done to bring to trial those who advocate doctrines inconsistent with the church principles, it will lead to a division among them. It adds: "It is simply impossible that these false teachers can be permitted to remain in a Church whose Reformers died at the stake protesting against these very falsehoods." Among the errors against which it protests, the Churchman enumerates, the sacrifice of the Mass, transubstantiation, purgatory, and the invocation of saints.

We cannot have a happiness in time independent of eternity.

THE FRIEND.

SEVENTH MONTH 2, 1887.

The Diary of our late friend, Abigail W. Hall, which has appeared for many weeks in successive numbers of "The Friend," is now approaching its completion,—for it is expected that the selections from it, which are being published, will be completed in the present volume.

The impressions which it has made upon the minds of its readers have no doubt been very different with different persons. Many of those who, in former days, were under her care while engaged in keeping school; and had then learned to esteem and love her for her kindness and sympathy, and the unaffected sincerity and devotedness of her character; have traced with affectionate interest her inner history as developed in her diary, and have noted how in all her trials she constantly turned to her Heavenly Parent for guidance and help, and found in Him a place of refuge, and source of strength.

The earnestness of her concern for the best welfare of the children over whom she was placed, especially when teacher and governess at Westtown School, and the manner in which her heart was often turned to the Source of all good, in prayer for their preservation from evil, are (and we hope have proved) instructive lessons to those who have similar duties devolving upon them; and they furnish a valuable illustration of that true religious influence, which Westtown School has exercised in times past, and which the Committee in charge of it desire, may ever continue to be one of its prominent features.

We have little doubt that many have been stimulated to increased watchfulness against temptation, and zeal for their own growth in grace, by these records of the ardency of her spirit, which so plainly showed that she counted all else as nothing, if she might win Christ, and become united to Him as a branch to the vine, in a perpetual covenant, and thus be prepared to be owned of Him in the presence of the Father and of the holy angels.

We have received many evidences that these extracts from her diary have been interesting, encouraging, and refreshing to their readers; but there have been fears felt by some, lest they give of the deep baptisms of spirit, and the many humbling dispensations through which she passed, may prove discouraging to some of those who are young in religious experience, and whose faces have been turned Zionward. We hope they may not have such an effect on any; for her memoranda contain numerous acknowledgements of the goodness and mercy of Him whom she loved and served, and who was to her "the chiefest of ten thousand and altogether lovely." The strong language she uses in speaking of her own weaknesses is only a proof of the intensity of her desire to be in all things conformed to the Divine will, which rendered her sensitively alive to any omission or neglect on her part.

The experience of all mankind confirms the truth of our Saviour's declaration, "In the world ye shall have tribulation." In this respect, "One event happeneth to the righteous and the wicked." But what a blessed saying is that—"Be of good cheer, I have overcome the world!" "In me, ye shall have peace." The dedicated followers of the Lamb, have the unspeakable privilege, in all their afflictions, of knowing that they have a Friend who sticketh closer than a brother, and who will support them through all those trials which He permits to come upon them, either for their own refinement and development, or for the promotion of his plans and purposes. If they have faith to accept in its fulness the Scripture statements, "Nothing shall harm you, if ye be followers of that which is good," and "All things work together for good to them that fear God," the trials of time will be robbed of the severest part of their sting; and, even when bowed under a sense of merited chastisement for shortcoming, they will find a secret satisfaction in this "ministration of condemnation," arising from the hope that it will prove instrumental in working their fuller deliverance from the thralldom of sin.

There is no advantage to be gained by attempting to conceal from ourselves or from others, that life is a serious thing, and that a preparation for eternity involves an awful responsibility. But while this knowledge tends to chasten the spirit, and to repress lightness and frivolity, it need not prevent that innocent cheerfulness and enjoyment of social intercourse, and the many outward blessings which our Father in Heaven has provided for us. A. W. Hall was a woman of a cheerful spirit, and enjoyed the society of her friends, especially of those whose desires were set upon Heavenly things. We believe she could testify, as many others have done, that those who have come into submission to the power of Divine grace, are favored with higher, nobler, and more soul-satisfying happiness, even in this life, than can be experienced by those who are out of the Divine harmony. One who had experience of both the "broad" and the "narrow" way, thus writes:—

"There are no joys like those of the righteous; no peace at all comparable to that which Jesus gives unto them that honor and obey Him,—a peace which passeth the understanding of the natural man, and which the world can neither give nor take away. And then, the glorious end!—Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The postal treaty between the United States and Mexico having been signed by the President will go into effect on the 1st instant. Under its provisions the rate for all mailable matter are the same as all domestic rates in the United States, and the prohibited articles are the same as prohibited in our domestic mails. Ounce letters go for two cents. Newspapers from the office go for one cent per pound, and third class matter one cent for two ounces.

The total value of the exports from the United States during the twelve months which ended Fifth Mo. 31st last, was $724,559,702, against $672,100,546 during the previous twelve months. The total value of our imports of merchandise during the twelve months which ended Fifth Mo. 31st last, was $685,341,819, against $650,536,790 during the twelve months which ended on Fifth Mo. 31st, 1886.

Collector Cutler, at Niagara Falls and Suspension Bridge, New York, has notified the employers of about 200 Canadian laborers who came over to the American side to work every day, that if they continue to employ such foreign labor after Seventh Mo. 1st, the U. S. District Attorney will be advised to proceed against them under the law. It is said this action "has created no little displeasure in official circles" at Ottawa, Canada, where it is regarded as "an unfriendly act on the part of the United States."

The Lick telescope, it is now calculated, will be in position ready for use by the middle of Ninth Month next.

During the last five weeks, forty horses have been stolen in Albuquerque, New Mexico, and the surrounding country. Last week two boys, 14 and 15 years old, were captured while in the act of riding off with a couple of stolen animals, and made revelations indicating the existence of a large band of organized robbers originating among the youths of the city, the oldest member being 22 years. "They had a regular compact, which was sworn upon a glittering blade as each member flashed a keen-edged dagger in the light of a camp fire." Their rendezvous in the mountains, seventy-five miles distant, has been discovered, and it is thought the whole gang will be captured, with all the horses.

The Moro County marble quarry, sixty miles from Carson, Nevada, is reported to have been completely destroyed by the recent earthquake, the marble having been "broken into cubes not over a foot square." The ledge was over five miles long and 400 feet wide, containing a fine grade of marble, ranging in shade from pure white to black. The quarry was valued at one million dollars.

The town of Marshfield, Wisconsin, was almost entirely destroyed by fire on the afternoon of the 27th ult. The loss is estimated at $1,000,000, and 2000 people are homeless. The fire was started in a lumber yard by a spark from a locomotive.

There is a plague of locusts in Ottentari County, Minnesota, and it is reported that they have destroyed five thousand acres of grain and garden crops around the town of Perlman.

The Karg natural gas well at Findlay, Ohio, is reported to produce, by actual measurement, 12,080,000 cubic feet of gas per day, which is the equivalent in heat units of 400 tons of coal.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 449, which was 108 more than during the previous week, and 100 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the whole number 147 were males and 292 females: 216 adults and 233 minors; 54 died of consumption; 34 of cholera infantum; 30 of convulsions; 20 of pneumonia; 21 of marasmus; 20 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 16 of debility; 13 of old age; 12 of typhoid fever, and 11 of paralysis.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½, 109½; 4's, reg., 128½; coupon, 129½; currency 6's, 123 a 134.

Cotton was quiet but steady at 11¼ cts. for middling uplands.

Refined sugars were less active, but steady. Wholesale prices were 6¼ a 6½ cts. for powdered; 5 15-16 a 6 cts. for granulated; 5½ cts. for crystal A, and 5 9-16 cts. for confectioners' A.

Feed was rather firmer and in fair demand. Sales of 1 car good winter bran at $15; 2 cars choice do. at $15.50, and 1 car fancy do. at $15.75 per ton. Quotations: Bran, winter, choice, $15.50 a $15.75; do. do., medium to prime, $14.75 a $15.25; bran, spring, $13.75 a $14.50.

Flour and Meal.—The flour market was weak, with a hand-to-mouth demand from the local trade. Sales of 375 barrels Ohio, clear, at $4.40; 375 barrels winter patent, at $4.70 a $4.85; 125 barrels do. do. favorite brand, at $5; 125 barrels Minnesota 'clear', at $4.10, and 500 barrels do., patent, at $4.75 a $4.85. Rye flour was dull at $2.60 a $2.75 per barrel, as to quality.

Grain.—No. 2 red wheat closed at 85 cts. bid and 86 cts. asked; No. 2 mixed corn closed at 44 cts. bid and 44 cts. asked; No. 2 mixed oats closed at 36½ cts. bid and 37½ cts. asked.

FOREIGN.—On the 21st of Sixth Month, Queen Victoria opened her Jubilee Celebration, by a ride from Buckingham Palace to Westminster Abbey. The ovation of the people was unprecedented. It is believed a million of people were in the streets. "The scene at Westminster Abbey was most brilliant. Every seat was filled and every person present was a distinguished person. When the identities were enumerated, it was said as if every locality the world over had sent one or more of its representative personages to do honor to England's Queen on Britain's greatest holiday."

On the 26th, the Home Secretary received the following letter from the Queen:

"I am anxious to express to my people my warm thanks for the kind, more than kind, reception I met with going to and returning from Westminster Abbey since all my children and grandchildren. The enthusiastic reception I met with then, as well as on all these occasion of days in London, as well as at Windsor, on the occasion of the Jubilee, touched me most deeply. It has shown that the labor and anxiety of fifty long years, twenty-two of which were spent in untroubled happiness, shared and cheered by my beloved husband, and, while an equal number were full of sorrows and trials, borne without his sheltering arm and wise help, have been appreciated by my people. This feeling, and a sense of duty toward my dear country and my subjects, who are so inseparably bound up with my life, will encourage me in my task, often a very difficult and arduous one, during the remainder of my life. The wonderful order preserved on this occasion, and the good behavior of the enormous multitude assembled, merits my highest admiration.

"That God may protect and abundantly bless my country is my fervent prayer."

On the 27th, Sir James Ferguson, Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, announced in the House of Commons that Turkey had urgently asked England to consent to a postponement until Seventh Mo. 4th, of the former's ratification of the Anglo-Turkish Egyptian Convention, and that England had consented.

The London Telegraph says: "A conflagration which took place lately in a remote village of China has destroyed one of the most remarkable literary and artistic museums in the world. The edifice in question was the ancestral home of the family of Confucius built centuries ago, near Loo, in the province of Shan-Tong. In this building, generation after generation, the male heirs of the great Chinese teacher have dwelt in an unbroken line for 2500 years, bearing the title of dukes."

The tea trade of China, according to native papers, is suffering more or less from the competition offered by both India and Ceylon.

It is in contemplation by the Japanese Government to contract with French builders for seventeen torpedo boats, at a cost of 3,500,000 francs.

Advices from Japan show that a rumor is current to the effect that the Senate will be reorganized shortly, and all the Senators made peers. Thereafter the Senate will consist of members of the nobility. Hitherto any measure passed by the Senate could be rejected by the Cabinet, but in the future, such action will require the sanction of the Emperor.

At Valparaiso, Chili, up to Fifth Month 21st, there had been 899 cases of cholera, and 628 deaths. In Quillota there had been 1959 cases, and 1002 deaths.

NOTICE.

Old cast-off linens and muslins, will be thankfully received at the Pennsylvania Hospital, Eighth and Spruce Streets. Will be sent for if notified.

J. G. WILLIAMS, Supr.

DIED, at her home near Chesterfield, Morgan Co., Ohio, on the 27th of Fourth Month, 1887, EDITH CREW, widow of the late Henry Crew, in the 73d year of her age, a beloved elder and member of Chesterfield Monthly and Particular Meeting. She had been in declining health for some time, and felt her hold on life was loosening. Though in her last few hours she was unable to converse, her children and friends have the consoling hope, that their loss is her eternal gain. Truly a pious, benevolent and loving mother is gone. Her removal is sensibly felt by many friends, to whom she had endeared herself, by a cheerful disposition and earnest Christian sympathy. "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors, and their works do follow them."

—, at Germantown, on the 7th of Sixth Month, in the 32d year of his age, WILLIAM BIDDLE, a member of Germantown Particular, and Frankford Monthly Meeting of Friends. This dear Friend having in early manhood felt constrained to support the doctrines and testimonies of our Society, was concerned throughout a long and active life, freely and fully to maintain them; and was frequently heard to express the pain caused his sensitive feelings, by the many departures that came under his notice. Blessed with a cheerful disposition, and with a heart overflowing with benevolence, it was his delight to assist by a kind word, or timely advice, those who might be in need of it; and much of his time was devoted to labors in connection with institutions for the alleviation of the sufferings of his fellow-beings. In the words of the Patriarch, it may be truly said: "The blessing of him that was ready to perish came upon me, and I caused the widow's heart to sing for joy." Fearless and prompt in the performance of apprehended duty, he shrank not from any laid upon him; and his purity of motive, and honesty of purpose were so transparent, his zealous labor was seldom without success. Although his health had been failing for several months, his last illness was very short; but his friends have the consoling belief that he was not unprepared for the final summons; but that through redeeming love and mercy, he has been gathered as a shock of corn ripe for the heavenly garner.

ARTICLES DESIGNED FOR INSERTION TO BE ADDRESSED TO

JOSEPH WALTON,
MOORESTOWN, BURLINGTON CO., N. J.

Entered as second-class matter at Philadelphia P. O.

Selections from the Diary of Abigail W. Hall.

First Mo. 24th, 1859. [At this date, A. W. H. notes the death and burial of her uncle, Jacob Albertson, a member of Plymouth Particular, and Gwynedd Monthly Meetings. Concerning him she thus writes:] His condition was that of the poor Publican; hardly daring to lift up so much as his eyes unto Heaven, yet his fervent petition was, "God be merciful to me a sinner;" and I am confirmed in the belief, he was sanctified, and justified before Him.

Second Mo. 11th. Was comforted last night, after retiring to bed, in having unexpectedly brought to my remembrance these words of the dear Master: "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven." And He laid his hands upon them and blessed them. I was brought to feel the preciousness of this state, and to desire after it; knowing that "unless we be converted and become as little children, we cannot enter into the kingdom of God."

Third Mo. 13th. One month since last memorandum. And what shall I say! "He bringeth low, and lifteth up;" both of which states I have experienced; and have been humbled under them. Though reduced this day to hunger and thirst, cold and nakedness; can say, mine eye has been directed unto the Captain of salvation; and when He sees meet to say, "it is enough," He will, I believe, change the dispensation. Wait, then in patience, O my soul!

16th. Our week-day meeting,—a small company. I was impressed afresh with the necessity of our being "fervent in spirit serving the Lord;" and not to feel discouraged, or let in indifference, because we are few; but remember the dear Master is in the midst even of the two or three who are gathered in his name.

Departed this life, Fourth Mo. 8th, 1859, my dear cousin, Mary A. Benington, in the 36th year of her age, after a long continued indisposition of three years: which she bore with Christian resignation.

Eighth Mo. 15th. We had, I thought, a good meeting yesterday. David Cope was engaged in testimony, from: "Blessed are the poor in spirit," &c. "Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness," &c. I may add, it is a blessed thing to be found in these states; being truly the Lord's poor, and truly hungering and thirsting for the bread and water of life. Were this more individually our state and condition as a people, would we not be more a people to His praise? Being fed and nourished by the Lord, sustained and kept alive by Him, what fruit-bearing branches would appear!

The Lord knoweth who his children are, that have neither storehouse nor barn; and these He will feed and keep alive. And oh, saith my soul, may the number be increased! that so Zion may put on her beautiful garments and shine. I have been favored with many good meetings of late; which comforts and animates to press forward in my heavenly journey.

Third Mo. 3rd, 1860. I am still spared a monument of the Lord's loving-kindness and mercy. Are fruits answerable thereto brought forth! Am I endeavoring daily to be found living in the Lord's fear? While I feel the force of these two very important queries, I am often brought into close, secret self-examination, attended with many fears, and great jealousy over myself, lest "while I am preaching to others, I myself become a castaway."

Returned a week since, from paying a visit in gospel love to most of the meetings of Abington Quarter. It seemed a great undertaking for such a child as I; but the only way to peace was, to go forth, "nothing doubting." And truly the Lord gave ability for his own work, praised and magnified be his ever worthy name.

19th. On the 17th followed to the grave, our friend and neighbor, Sarah Malin; who was of an innocent and circumspect life, a "meek and quiet spirit." At the grave side my feelings were afresh awakened to the awfulness of death, and the blessedness of knowing it to lose its "sting" and the "grave its victory," when this solemn period comes. The breathing of my soul was, carry on, O Heavenly Father! this great work in me while the day lasteth. After the interment, a meeting was held in which our friends D. and S. Cope were lovingly called forth to minister to the large company assembled. Dear Samuel pleaded with those who had strayed "far from the Father's house," and those who had stood idle till the eleventh hour. He would not have any to be discouraged, &c., believing, as he did, a fresh call was extended. So persuasive was his language, that I could but believe some poor soul had been met.

The same day was interred our dear friend Phoebe Benington. A life corresponding with the above was hers, and the same hope accompanies, that she is added to the "general assembly and church of the first born."

26th. Returned from the city this morning, whither I went on the 24th, in great poverty of spirit. There had seemed for weeks past, at times, a pointing to attend the Northern District Meeting: which I did morning and afternoon. As I approached my seat and took it, the breathings of my heart were, "Cast me not off from thy presence; and take not thy Holy Spirit from me." And, "Surely I have behaved and quieted myself, as a child that is weaned of its mother," &c. As I drew near to the Lord and to his children, (for I was made sensible there were of this number assembled,) the Lord was pleased to draw near to us, even to poor me; and a little bread was given to distribute to the hungry multitude. Oh, how He helped through! praised and magnified be his ever worthy name, who openeth and none can shut, and shutteth and none can open.

In the afternoon meeting, which was silent, I was shown my helplessness: so in both states I was to be instructed.

Fourth Mo. 7th. Departed this life our valued friend and mother, Margaret Malin. She had been sick for about three weeks; but not considered ill till within three days of her death. She was a dear Friend, that will be greatly missed; not only by her aged husband and near relatives, but by her many friends. I feel I have lost a mother indeed. How I miss her from my side at our little meeting. Often did she speak the "word in season," when I have felt weary and heavy laden. Her funeral was largely attended by many relatives and friends. Among these were William Evans, H. Rhoads, Samuel and Morris Cope, &c. After the interment a meeting was held, and several living testimonies borne. Wm. Evans eminently favored. Thus one after another is called away! who may be next we know not; nor does it matter, if only prepared with the "wedding garment on."

26th. A very small, but good meeting to-day. I felt forcibly the injunction, "follow thou me." And it is the only and alone way for any of us to be saved.

Fifth Mo. 17th. Attended, yesterday, the funeral of our young friend Ruth Anna Jones.* And just one week has elapsed since we followed to the grave a dear young man, Abraham Atkins. And again on the 20th, departed this life our dear friend Robert Scotton, an old friend of ours, and of our dear mother; and one we were all much attached to. Oh, the sweet heavenly instruction I have received in days long since gone by, under the ministry of this Friend—days of early visitation, which I can now look back to, and call my best days. How near the Lord was, leading me about and instructing me, both immediately and instrumentally! Return, O my soul, again to Bethel, and renew covenant.

Sixth Mo. 6th. Our week-day meeting was a precious season; as also that on First-day: a favor unspeakable.

25th. Passed through a low season since last note. But through favor unmerited, have again been given to know that my Redeemer liveth; and because He lives, I shall live also. Our meetings on First and Fourth-days, were seasons of instruction to me; wherein I was allowed to come very near to Him whom my soul loveth.

Seventh Mo. 25th. "Lovest thou me more than these?" This language to Peter has arrested my attention many times of late, with a close enquiry, how it stands with me, whether any thing is coming between me and my God! Oh,

* For interesting obituary of R. A. J., see "The Friend," vol. xxxiii. page 360.

I fear self is not sufficiently slain! Unworthy as I am, I was favored with a little fresh strength to wrestle this day in our little meeting, and to plead with the people, the dear young people especially. If they could be prevailed upon to yield their hearts a willing sacrifice, vessels to the Lord's praise would be brought forth, I verily believe.

Twelfth Mo. 19th. Have been passing of latter times through low places. No doubt there is a needs be for all this; and if it only deepen me in the root, let not thine hand spare. In our little meeting this morning, I remembered the language of the dear Master: "If I, your Lord and Master, wash your feet, ye ought also to wash one another's feet." I was brought this day to where I could do this: my heart overflowed with love toward each one that composed our small gathering.

Sixth Mo. 2nd, 1861. Departed this life, our dear uncle Richard Williams, in the seventy-fourth year of his age. A heavy stroke to his family. And we all feel that an upright grove has been removed. Though suddenly called away, we humbly trust he was found with his loins girt and light burning. Oh that these repeated removals may not pass unheeded by us, but arouse us all to diligence.

Eighth Mo. 17th. Still another loud call, to "Be ye also ready." Our friend and neighbor, Randall Malin, suddenly called hence. His funeral was attended by a large concourse of people; after which a solemn meeting was held.

25th.—First-day. In our meeting David Cope was engaged in testimony from the words of the apostle: "There is now, therefore, no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus," &c., upon which he enlarged instructively. It has been so long since David has opened his mouth, in testimony in our meetings, that I did not know whether we should ever hear him again.

Deceased, on the morning of the 14th of Eleventh Month, 1861, Elizabeth Evans, wife of Wm. Evans, in the sixty-eighth year of her age. The sudden removal from her labors in the gospel of Christ, to the rest and peace in his kingdom, of this dear Friend, has been felt by a large number of relatives and friends.* How many and how repeated are the calls to be also ready; then it will matter not at what hour the cry is heard, "Behold the bridegroom cometh," &c.

Eleventh Mo. 14th. This year draws near its close. It has been one wherein I have witnessed many trying dispensations inwardly, which I have not written, and which are known to the Lord alone. He has, I humbly trust, measurably been near me at times, to sanctify all trials to me, confirming my devotion to Him, and my desire to follow wheresoever He may lead me."

There is a great deal of spurious modesty in the world which is simply cowardice. When a man shrinks from accepting a well-merited honor, that is modesty; when he shirks the performance of a recognized duty, that is cowardice, though he may call it a modest distrust of his own powers. True modesty shrinks from the reward of work well done; false modesty shrinks from the work itself. This affords an excellent test of true and false modesty in ourselves and others. Is it the honor that we shrink from? or is it the responsibility?—Selected.

A Visit to Lancaster County.

We found many of the wheat fields in Lancaster County gave but a poor promise of an abundant crop, such as that fertile land commonly yields. This was attributed by the farmers partly to a season of dry weather in the fall after the wheat had been sown, which prevented it from attaining the development and strength necessary to enable it to endure the winter; partly, also, to the ravages of the Hessian Fly, which has appeared in greater numbers than usual. On pulling up a stalk of stunted wheat, I found in the stem, close to the ground, several white maggots, which were the cause of its slow growth. The sap which the roots gathered from the ground, was used to fatten these intruders, instead of enabling the plant to develop and perfect the grain, for the sake of which it had been sowed by the farmer.

The eggs from which these grubs are hatched, are laid by a small black, two-winged fly, about one-eighth of an inch in length. It belongs to the same family as the flies which cause the galls on the leaves and twigs of the oak and other plants. Its scientific name is Ceidomyia destructor. Harris, in his book on "Insects Injurious to Vegetation," gives a full account of this species. He quotes the observations made by a Maryland observer, who examined his field in the second week of the Tenth Month, when the first sown wheat was generally up, and had put forth its second and third leaves. He says: "Selecting a favorable spot to make my observation, I placed myself in a reclining position in a furrow, and had been on the watch but a minute or two before I discovered a number of small black flies alighting, and sitting on the wheat plants around me, and presently one settled on the ridged surface of a blade of a plant completely within my reach and distinct observation. She immediately began depositing her eggs in the longitudinal cavity between the little ridges of the blade. I could distinctly see the eggs ejected from a kind of tube or sting." He then took up the plant of wheat with as much earth as he conveniently could, and plauted it in a glass tumbler at his house, where he could keep it under observation. On the fifteenth day from the deposit of the egg, he saw a small maggot or worm making its way down the leaf until it disappeared between the blade and the stem.

These observations have been confirmed by others. The newly-hatched worms go down till they are stopped by the joint in the stem from which the leaf springs, which is at the surface of the earth, or slightly beneath. They do not pierce this but there lie in the sap of the plant, which they absorb by suction. When their growth is completed, they undergo the usual changes of insects, and come forth as flies, ready to propagate their race. These insects do not confine their visits to wheat alone, but lay their eggs on other members of the family of grasses, such as rye, barley, timothy, &c.

It is called the Hessian fly, from the supposition that it was brought to this country in some straw, by the Hessian troops which were under the command of General Howe, in the war of the Revolution. It was first observed in the year 1776, in the neighborhood where Howe's forces landed on Staten Island, and at Flat Bush, on the western end of Long Island. From thence they gradually spread over the southern parts of New York and Connecticut, and continued to progress inland at the rate of 15 to 20 miles a year. They reached Saratoga in 1789, and were found to the west of the Allegheny Mountains in 1797.

That this insect should have proved more abundant and destructive in this country, than in its native home (supposing it to have come from Germany) is not an unusual circumstance. Many of our most common and troublesome weeds are of foreign origin, and, finding more favorable surroundings and fewer enemies to encounter, thrive here far more fully than in the country from which they came; and within a few years we have seen the striped potato bug of Colorado overspread our country, until its eastward course was stayed by the Atlantic waves.

The eggs which are laid in the fall mature early in the spring; and the flies which emerge are soon prepared to lay a new crop on the leaves of the wheat; so that there are two broods in a season. In the fall of the year, the gnats or flies sometimes collect in large swarms. On their first appearance in Pennsylvania, it is said they were seen to pass the Delaware River like a cloud.

It will be noticed that the number of these insects is so immense, and their individual size so minute, that man is almost helpless to protect himself from their ravages. But there is a check to their increase, in the existence of several parasites which prey upon them. The chief among these is a shining, black, four-winged fly (the Hessian fly has but two wings) which in large numbers frequent the wheat fields in the Sixth Month. It pierces the sheath of the leaves under which the larva of the Hessian Fly is lying concealed, and lays an egg in the minute hole thus made. From this egg a little maggot is hatched, which devours its Hessian neighbor. Dr. Harris, after mentioning this and some other forms of parasites, makes the following appropriate comment: "Such are some of the natural means, provided by a benevolent Providence, to check the ravages of the destructive Hessian Fly. If we are humiliated by the reflection, that the Author of the universe should have made even small and feeble insects the instruments of His power, and that He should occasionally permit them to become the scourges of our race, ought we not to admire His wisdom in the formation of the still more humble agents that are appointed to arrest the work of destruction?"

The limestone rocks of Lancaster County do not lie in horizontal strata, but are greatly tilted, and those at the surface often show signs of the wearing effects of water, which exerts a slightly solvent action upon them. In many places a portion of the underlying rock has thus been removed by subterranean streams, and the surface has fallen in, leaving depressions which are termed sink-holes. We saw several of these; at one of which the giving way of the earth had wrecked a building which had to be removed. To the existence of such subterranean streams, some of which may be of considerable length, is probably to be ascribed the unusual size of many springs in the limestone valleys. One of these we visited at Litzitz. It poured into a large oval basin, built of stone by the Moravian congregation to whom it belongs, and flows for a long distance in the midst of well-kept grounds, through a stone channel made to contain it. It is said to send forth 1500 gallons of water in a minute. Another, not much smaller, emerges in the grounds attached to the old Scotch Irish Presbyterian meeting-house in Donegal Township. Its borders, after leaving the basin in which it is first received, are thickly set with Water Cress, originally planted by Simon Cameron, (who owns several farms in the immediate vicinity), and which has now become widely spread and firmly established.

The Moravian congregation at Litz have become wealthy from the increase in value of their lands, of which they originally held a large farm, much of which they still retain. Their numbers remain nearly the same, perhaps with a slight decrease. We visited their burying ground, in which few but their own members are allowed to be interred. A flat stone covers the graves. The men are interred in one part of the ground, and the women in another—the survival of an old custom, the origin of which our informant, an educated member of the congregation, did not seem to know.

The old Donegal Meeting-house, was an interesting spot. The building is on a limestone knoll, with the rocks here and there piercing the soil. The original house of logs, was erected in 1722; and the skeleton of the horse that hauled the logs is said to be buried beneath the pulpit. The present house is an ancient hipped-roof affair, the interior of which has been remodeled of latter times. In the ante-room are preserved an old table and high-backed square post chair, such as were used in generations long past. A noble white oak stood near by; around which, it is said, in revolutionary times the people of the neighborhood gathered, and vowed allegiance to the colonial authorities in their contest with the British government.

The congregation that meets here has dwindled down to a small number, for the descendants of the original settlers appear to prefer other employments to farming, and have drifted into the cities, &c., and their places are largely taken by the Germans. But the grounds and the adjoining grave-yard are kept in good order. On the tombstones in this we could trace some of the old family names. One of rather more recent date was erected to commemorate one John Scott, who followed the humble occupation of a fencemaker, but who had accumulated some property which he left as a fund for the maintenance of schools. A section of a post and rail fence, common in the neighborhood, was carved on the stone, with a broken pannel in it; and the following motto:

"How lov'd, how valued once avails thee not;
To whom related, or by whom begot;
A heap of dust alone remains of thee,
'Tis all thou art, and all the proud shall be."

I was interested in noticing that a large heavy flat stone which covered a grave, and was supported near the two ends, but unsupported in the middle, and had lain there for many years, had so far yielded to the strain as to sink a considerable distance in the centre, and thus assume a bent form, without breaking. The effect of long continued and steady pressure in modifying the form and structure of the most unyielding substances, will probably account for many of the twistings and bendings which we observe in the rocky strata, and for the consolidation of beds of sand and gravel into rock. As the holy oil stayed not upon Aaron's head, but descended and ran down upon his beard, and to the skirts of his garments, so the Holy Ghost, the Spirit of Christ is diffused from Christ the Head unto all the members of his body, the Church, so that the meaneat saints have this anointing in their measure, and do receive of his fulness, even grace for grace; hence they bear his name and are called Christians as being partakers of his anointing.

For "The Friend."

The Afflictions and Deliverance of the Righteous.

"Many are the afflictions of the righteous; but the Lord delivereth him out of them all." So, if we are on the side of the righteous we have nothing to fear, "For the Lord preserveth the faithful." So be of good courage and He shall strengthen your heart, all ye that hope in the Lord. For "Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness;" but no blessing is pronounced on the proud and evil doer. The hungering and thirsting after words without life has to be starved before we can be filled with the bread of life.

"Blessed are they that do his commandments, that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city." But there is no blessing on the unrighteous, who merely hear his commandments and neglect to do them. They have no right to the fruit of the tree of life, and cannot enter in through the gates and enjoy the lost right to the paradise of God. So the righteous will know that it is better to hearken to the in speaking voice of the Lord and to do his commandments than to offer outward sacrifices in the will of man.

And they also know that it is through much tribulation that we enter the kingdom of heaven. And though many are the afflictions of the righteous, yet they know that it is only as we endure the temptations and trials which are in wisdom permitted to come upon us, that we are prepared to receive the crown of life. So the blessing is on such as endure the temptations, not on those who give way to the tempter, as our first parents did. For the very ground became cursed on account of their disobedience; and all those who disobey shall remain under a curse until they are restored to primitive purity, by Christ, the second Adam, who never fell, but who came to bring in an everlasting righteousness into each individual heart, by the washings of regeneration and the renewing of that Holy Spirit of righteousness which was lost in the fall. For though we have been "dead in trespasses and sins," yet, in Christ the second Adam, the quickening Spirit, we may all be made alive, and this life and immortality are now brought to light by his gospel, which is preached to every creature under heaven; and which is the power of God unto the salvation of everyone that will receive and obey it; "For as by one man's disobedience many were made sinners; so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous." "That as sin hath reigned unto death, even so might grace reign through righteousness unto eternal life, by Jesus Christ our Lord."

Our restoration must be by Christ, for He came not to save us in our sins but from them. And we must be raised from the death and darkness of our fallen nature, that as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, so we may walk with Him in newness of life. And if the spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in us, that same Spirit will also quicken our mortal bodies even this side of the grave, that we may be enabled like He was, to walk among men in newness of life, and to finish the work that he gives us to do. But we must first submit to be buried with Him into his baptism of death and suffering, and drink of his bitter cup before we are made partakers of his holiness.

And the more we evade this cross of Christ and live after the gratifications of our fleshly desires, the more we shall die spiritually; and the less we shall partake of the comforts of that life which is hid with Christ in God; so "if we live after the flesh we shall die, but if we through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body we shall live. For "as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God." But the world seeth them not; so we may be reproached for his name, but "if ye are reproached for the name of Christ, happy are ye, for the spirit of glory and of God resteth upon you; on their part He is evil spoken of, but on your part He is glorified."

The righteous have to receive Christ and abide the day of his coming, even though He should come as a refiner with fire and as a fuller with soap, in order to burn up and wash away every defiling thing; for the floor of the heart has to be thoroughly purged before it becomes a fit temple for his holiness to abide in. And where his presence is there is fulness of joy.

But the temple of the heart is not only to be cleansed, but it has to be kept clean; and this can only be done by his abiding presence; for where his Spirit is Satan cannot enter. Far greater is He that is in the righteous than he that is in the world. And while many are the afflictions of the righteous, yet the Scriptures abundantly show us that there is a reward also which richly compensates for all. And they show us that there is a God which judgeth the wickedness of the earth. And David also says, "I have been young and now am old; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread. A little that a righteous man hath, is better than the riches of many wicked—for the arms of the wicked shall be broken, but the Lord preserveth the righteous; the wicked borroweth and payeth not again, but the righteous showeth mercy and giveth. The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord, and He delighteth in his way; for the salvation of the righteous is of the Lord; He is their strength in time of trouble. So east thy burden upon the Lord, He shall sustain thee; He shall never suffer the righteous to be moved; but bloody and deceitful men shall not live out half their day. The righteous cry and the Lord heareth them, and delivereth them out of all their troubles. The righteous shall be glad in the Lord and shall trust in Him, and all the upright in heart shall glory. Light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart. "The Lord is righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works," if they are sometimes past finding out by poor mortal man; for He says, "I will bring the blind by a way that they knew not; I will lead them in paths that they have not known." So if we are "Led by a way that we know not,

But led by a Guide whom we know,
Let us not seek to discover
More than He pleaseth to show.

Step after step we follow.

We know we are nearing our rest.
Surely the way that He leads us
Must be of all ways the best."

Avoid vulgar colloquialisms and slang. There is a fair story of a beautiful young woman from whose mouth, when she opened it, dropped frogs and toads. "I am always reminded of this story," says an English gentleman of perfect breeding, "when I hear a young lady talk slang." Enough words are in everyday use to express the nicest shade of meaning without resorting to the low idiom of the tap-room. Bad words contaminate the blood as insidiously as do the microbes of disease and the poisonous germs that infest animal food. No gentleman is profane; no lady uses slang.—Selected.

Living at the Centre.

In a series of very interesting reminiscences of his early life, Dr. Jeter, of Richmond, Virginia, a veteran editor and a venerable minister, recalls the fact, that when a boy he was possessed with the idea that his father's house was at the exact centre of the world, equi-distant from the horizon on every side; and he says it was a cause of much wonder to him that that home in particular, should have this pre-eminent distinction. He speaks of this as a childish fancy; but after all there was a great deal of truth in his idea. He did live at the centre of his world. His home was equi-distant from the circumference of its far-reaching opportunities and possibilities to the ends of the earth. And every other person lives also at the centre—the centre of his world, or of hers, and so has all the responsibilities of such a central position.

The centre is always a very small point. It is no larger for the greatest sphere than for the smallest. And just here is where a common mistake is made. It is easy to believe that some obviously important station in a great city is at the centre of a wide circle of personal influence; but it is not so easy to think this of a quiet and unpretentious home in that city, or of a far more retired spot among the hills, or out on the prairies, remote from the busiest whirls of life, and having no signs of special prominence; yet from that quieter spot the sweep of influence may be just as vast and just as potent as the more distinguished. It is a centre quite as truly as the other.

A young slave-girl, hiding among the reeds of the river's brink, watches tremblingly a little mud-daubed grass cradle, in which rocks her helpless baby brother, already under sentence of death. Feeble, friendless, forlorn; what folly it would seem for her to count her station the centre of power for good to all the world! But in that floating cradle lies the hope of God's chosen people; and when, long years after, Miriam the prophetess, stands on the brink of the Red Sea, leading the singers of Israel in their rejoicings over the destruction of the royal host of Egypt, at the hand of the brother whom she had guarded so faithfully, she realizes at last that her place was at the centre when she little dreamed of such a thing.

An humble mother working in her country home, on a little coat for her loved son, whom she had piously devoted to the Lord's service, would better have understood how truly she was living at the centre, if she had foreseen that that dear boy would be chosen of God for the anointing of kings, for the judging of a great nation, and for the prophesying in God's name to all the earth, and for all coming time. Nor is it in sacred history only that the centres of extensive spheres of personal influence are found in otherwise undistinguished localities. Phoebe Brown, in her retired home at Monson, Massachusetts, not only pours out her soul in a hymn which finds an echo in the hearts of untold thousands, but she trains an only son to be a missionary of rare power in two countries, and she has no insignificant part in impressing and shaping the spiritual character of a Chinese lad, who in turn is the means of opening the vastest empire of earth to the influences of Christian civilization. There is more than one backwoods school-house which has a mission for the training of men and women of power, whose influence is to be worldwide and eternal. And in many a nursery a mother sits to-day at the very centre of a vaster circle than she has ever prayed or hoped to reach for good. The moving from that spot would be the moving away from the centre—away from the station of prime importance and of grandest possibilities, even though it were the moving to a place of larger apparent influence.

The centre is ever seemingly insignificant in comparison with the area of its circle; but it is never inferior in importance. Do you realize that you are occupying it to-day? S. S. Times.

"FAULTLESS."

(Jude, verse 24.)

"Faultless in his glory's presence!"

All the soul within me stirred,
All my heart reached up to heaven
At the wonder of that word.

"Able to present me faultless?"

Lord, forgive my doubt," I cried;
"Thou didst once, to loving doubt, show
Hands and feet and riven side.

"O, for me build up some ladder,
Bright with golden round on round,
That my hope this word may compass,
Reaching Faith's high vantage-ground."

Praying thus, behold, my ladder,
Reaching unto perfect day,
Grew from out a simple story
Dropped by some one in the way.

Once a queen—so ran the story—
Seeking far for something new,
Found it in a mill, where, strangely,
Naught but rags repaid her view.

Rags from out the very gutters,
Rags of every shape and hue,
While the squalid children, picking,
Seemed but rags from hair to shoe.

"What, then," rang her eager question,
Can you do with things so vile?"
"Mould them into perfect whiteness,"
Said the master with a smile.

"Whiteness?" quoth the queen, half doubting;
"But these reddest crimson dyes—
Surely nought can ever whiten
These to fitness in your eyes!"

"Yes," he said, "though these are colors
Hardest to remove of all;
Still I have the power to make them
Like the snowflake in its fall."

Through my heart the words so simple Throbb'd with echo in and out;
"Crimson," "scarlet," "white as snowflake,"
Can the man? and can God not?

Now, upon a day thereafter
(Thus the tale went on at will),
To the queen there came a present
From the master at the mill.

Fold on fold of fairest texture,
Lay the paper purest white;
On each sheet there gleamed the letters
Of her name in golden light.

"Precious lesson," wrote the master,
"Hath my mill thus given me,
Showing how our Christ can gather Vilest hearts from land or sea;

"In some heavenly alembic,
Snowy white from crimson bring,
Stamp his name on each, and bear them
To the palace of the King."

* * * * *
O, what wondrous vision wrapped me!
Heaven's gates seemed open wide,
Even I stood clear and faultless,
Close beneath the piercèd side.

Faultless in his glory's presence!
Faultless in that dazzling light!
Christ's own love, majestic, tender,
Made my crimson snowy white!

END AND MEANS.

BY SUSAN COOLIDGE.

We spend our strength in labor day by day;
We find new strength replacing old away;
And still we cheat ourselves, and still we say:

"No man would work except to win some prize;
We work to turn our hopes to certainties—
For gold, or gear, or favor in men's eyes."

And all the while, the goal toward which we strain—
Up hill and down, in sunshine and in rain,
Heedless of toil, if so we may attain—

Is but a lure, a heavenly-set decoy
To exercised endeavor, full employ
Of every power, which is man's highest joy.

And work becomes the end; reward the means
To woo us from our idleness and dreams;
And each is truly what the other seems.

So, Lord, with such poor service as we do,
Thy full salvation is our prize in view,
For which we long, and which we press unto.

Like a great star on which we fix our eyes,
It dazzles from the high, blue distances,
And seems to beckon and to say, "Arise!"

And we arise and follow the hard way,
Winning a little nearer day by day,
Our hearts going faster than our footsteps may;

And never guess the secret sweet device
Which lures us on and upward to the skies,
And makes each toil its own reward and prize.

To give our little selves to thee, to blend
Our weakness with thy strength, O Lord, our Friend,
This is life's truest privilege and end.

—The Independent.

Art thou a Mother?

Then thou bearest a sceptre unequalled by any earthly insignia of royalty, bear it unto God! first giving the dear lambs into his keeping, then asking Him who is infinite in wisdom, to make thee wise! For I am fully persuaded that if there is any one thing above another which the world needs, next to an abiding in Christ, it is faithful mothers and teachers and true homes.

"Bring up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it." was uttered by a man eminent for wisdom, which God gave him; and this truth will stand with all other such wisdom until heaven and earth pass away. Are not our first impressions the most lasting? Do they not outweigh and exceed all others? I. F. Ware says, "God hath ordained our homes but he gave them to us to shape: that shaping is our life work; it may be a thing of beauty and of joy forever. God forgive any infidelity in us, which shall prevent it from putting on its appointed glory!"

But do we not see all around us mothers entrusting this holy office unto hirelings? Can the rest and ease for which this is an excuse excuse them? Will they not awaken, and have they not awakened, to the truth of the parable, "While men slept the enemy came and sowed tares," the bitter fruits of which they may never be able to pluck out, and for which they must one day give an account. Give everything else to an hireling that your means will suggest, but oh, I beseech you, accept the royalty which has been conferred upon you as shepherds of your flocks. Let none, climbing up some other way, decoy from your fold a single lamb!

S.

The more any one tastes of the sweetness and comfort there is in Christ Jesus, the more he will long for it, and say, "Lord evermore give us of this bread, more of this bread, more of this comfort, more of this communion with God."

A Visit Among the Mennonites.—No. 3.

The spirit which animated many of these "faithful martyrs" is shown in the account given of the execution of Maria Von Beckum and her sister-in-law, A. D. 1544 :

"As the time of suffering drew near, Maria observed: 'Dear sister, heaven is opened for us; having suffered a short time here, we shall rejoice forever with our Bridegroom.' They then gave the mutual kiss of peace. They also prayed together that God would forgive the judges their sins, for they knew not what they did, and that God would have compassion on a world sunk in darkness, and receive their souls into his heavenly kingdom. They took Maria first, who entreated the magistrate not to shed any more innocent blood. She then earnestly directed her prayer to God, and prayed for her murderers. This done, she arose and went to the stake with inexpressible joy, exclaiming, 'To thee, O Christ, I resign myself; I know that I shall live forever with thee. Therefore, O God of heaven, into thy hands I commend my spirit.' The executioner swore because the chain did not please him: she observed to him: 'Friend, consider what you are doing: my body is not worthy that you should blaspheme Christ on account of it. Repent, lest you shall have to endure the flames of hell.'"

How applicable to such cases is the beautiful language of William Leddra, written shortly before he sealed his testimony to the truth, by suffering death at the hands of the bloody-minded persecutors in New England:—

"Alas, alas, what can the wrath and spirit of man, that lusteth to envy, aggravated by the heat and strength of the king of the locusts, which came out of the pit, do unto one that is hid in the secret places of the Almighty? Or, unto them that are gathered under the healing wings of the Prince of Peace? Under whose armor of light they shall be able to stand in the day of trial."

When the Emperor Charles the Fifth of Germany, resigned his crown in the year 1555 in favor of his son, Philip the Second of Spain, that most intolerant and bigoted of monarchs, reissued in the Netherlands, then under his sway, decrees that had formerly been promulgated against those who had left the Roman Catholic Church. Motley, in his account of the Dutch Republic, says that in these atrocious edicts it was forbidden for lay persons to converse or dispute concerning the Holy Scriptures, openly or secretly; to read, teach or expound them unless they had been approved by some renowned university; or, to entertain any of the opinions of the heretics. All offenders were to be put to death: "the men with the sword, and the women to be buried alive, if they do not persist in their errors; if they do persist in them, then they are to be executed with fire; all their property in both cases being confiscated to the crown." Any one who should "lodge, entertain, furnish with food, fire or clothing, or otherwise favor anyone holden or suspected of being a heretic; and anyone failing to denounce any such" was made liable to the same punishments. The same penalty was prescribed for anyone who knew of a person tainted with heresy, and neglected to denounce them to the judges.

Of the effect produced by the horrible persecution which had followed the original promulgation of these edicts, Motley says:—"Fertilized by all this innocent blood, the soil of the Netherlands became as a watered garden, in which liberty, civil and religious was to flourish perennially. The scaffold had its daily victims, but did not make a single convert. These obscure martyrs, whose names sound barbarously in our ears, were men who dared and suffered as much as men can dare and suffer in this world, and for the noblest cause which can inspire humanity. Fanatics they certainly were not, if fanaticism consists in show without corresponding substance.

"For them all was terrible reality. The Emperor and his edicts were realities, the axe, the stake were realities; and the heroism with which men took each other by the hand, and walked into the flames, or with which the women sang a song of triumph, while the grave-digger was shovelling the earth upon their living faces, was a reality also."

The method of procedure of the Inquisition "was reduced to a horrible simplicity. It arrested on suspicion, tortured till confession, and then punished by fire." Its introduction by Philip into the Netherlands was exceedingly unpopular there, and was the great cause of that revolt, which a few years after broke out, and delivered the country from the Spanish yoke. Foremost among the nobles of the land, who ultimately joined in that movement, was William, Prince of Orange; who, although originally a Catholic, ever opposed the barbarity of putting men to death for their religion.

While the adherents of Menno Simon probably contributed their share to the great army of martyrs who suffered death for their religious opinions in the Netherlands, yet a large proportion of the victims were Lutherans and Calvinists who had not adopted their views as to infant baptism, but bore testimony against other corruptions and errors which had crept into the Church. As non-combatants the Mennonites could not join in the wars and fightings which led to the effusion of so much blood in the expulsion of the Spanish troops and the establishment of Dutch independence. Even after this event they were exposed to trials and hardships, although not of such extreme character, in some of the towns of Holland; but William of Orange always manifested towards them that enlightened statesmanship which from the beginning led him to oppose the persecuting plans of the Spanish monarch.

In 1632, a convention of Mennonite ministers assembled at Dort, and issued a "Confession of Faith" containing the "chief articles of our general Christian faith," divided into 18 sections. This was signed by 51 ministers who were present, and was subsequently adopted by all the Mennonite churches in Alsace and Germany; putting an end in large degree to the disputes respecting doctrines which had before existed among them; as the postscript to the "Confession" states, "the so much wished for peace was obtained, and the light again put on the candle-stick, to the honor of non-resistant Christianity."

These 18 articles closely agree with the views of Protestants generally in reference to the fall of man, his restoration through Christ and the necessity of repentance and amendment of life. They differ from many of them, in restricting water-baptism to those of mature years, who are prepared to renounce their sins and enter upon a life of devotedness to God. They agree with the doctrines held by the Society of Friends in accepting without reserve the prohibition of all oaths, and of wars and fightings; but they differ from our Society in asserting that baptism with water, partaking of the outward bread and wine as a religious rite, and the washing of one another's feet are standing ordinances in the Church of Christ. As it is among Friends, they provide for the appointment of officers whose special duty it is to care for the poor among them, so that the wants of these are provided for by the Church, and they do not become a tax on the public.

Much of the persecution to which these goodly people were exposed, in the intolerant times in which they arose, was probably due to their plainness of dress and manners, and their non-conformity to the spirit of the world in other respects. These rendered them conspicuous to all. Those who could not judge of the truth or falsity of the doctrines they held, could see that in these things they were bearing a testimony against their own practices—and thus the Mennonites came largely to experience the truth of the Apostle Paul's assertion, that "all who will live Godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution."

The experience of the early members among Friends was the same. Their refusal to take off the hat in honor of man, their use of the singular language in addressing others, their refraining from insincere compliments, and their steady refusal to violate the command of Christ, "Swear not at all," were the frequent occasion of their suffering blows, imprisonment and other hardships.

"Getting up in the world" is not always really getting onward in the right sense. One of the old prophets speaks of the people as forsaking God, and says that they have gone away backward. Every step away from the Lord is really a step backward. It is like turning one's face away from the sun, and walking toward darkness. It is leaving home and going toward eternal homelessness and orphanage. A man may be "rising" in business, in wealth, in his profession, socially, intellectually, even ecclesiastically, and really not be rising at all. There are two standards of life,—this world's, and Christ's; we may be making progress according to the former, and at the same time going backward according to the latter. Away from God is always downward, no matter if we be climbing among men. Getting nearer to God in heart, in life, is always getting onward; though in the world's scale we may be descending. We need, therefore, to watch our hearts and our spiritual life when we are prospering in earthly ways. We are likely to be greatly troubled if we lose money, or property, or position; but it is a far worse calamity if we lose faith, or love, or spirituality, or tenderness of conscience, or the friendship of God. We need to beware lest, while we are going forward enthusiastically in men's eyes, we may be going backward, as God and angels see us.—Selected.

Professor Bruce.—The following interesting bit is from David Scott's "Annals of the Original Secession Church":—

"His manse—the hallowed scene of prayer and study—stood apart; a two-story house, with thatched roof, and a garden in front, past which flowed a streamlet, whose gentle ripple pleasantly relieved the stillness of the place. One night, as he sat engrossed in study, a burglar entered the house unheard by him. The man made his way upstairs, and strode into the library, where the professor sat at a table with a lamp burning before him. It was past midnight. The stillness of the chamber, and the venerable, solitary figure that occupied it, arrested the man. Professor Bruce looked up, and, fixing his keen searching eyes upon the robber, he proceeded, in the calmest manner, to address him on the iniquity of the life he was leading, and the enormity of the crime he meditated, and warned him of the consequences. The robber stood riveted to the spot. When the professor had finished, opening his desk, he took out ten shillings, and giving them to the man, bade him depart, and henceforth lead a more honest life.

Evil Thoughts.

Selected.

"We shall not be hanged for our thoughts," cries one. I wish that such idle talkers would remember that they will be damned for their thoughts; and that instead of evil thoughts being less sinful than acts, it may sometimes happen that in the thought the man may be worse than in the deed. He may not be able to carry out all the mischief that lurks within his designs, and yet in forming the design he may incur all the guilt. Thoughts are the eggs of words and actions, and within the thoughts lie compacted and condensed all the villainy of actual transgressions. If men did but more carefully watch their thoughts, they would not so readily fall into evil habits; but men first indulge in thought of evil, and then the imagination of evil; nor does the process stay there. Picturing it before their mind's eye they excite their own desires after it; these grow into a thirst and kindle into a passion. Then the deed is speedily forthcoming; it was long in the hatching, but in a moment it comes forth to curse a whole lifetime. Instead of fancying that evil thoughts are mere trifles, let us remember them as the root of bitterness, the still in which the poisonous spirit is manufactured. Our Saviour put evil thoughts first in the catalogue of evil things; and He knew well their true nature. If we would be lost we have only to indulge these; if we would be saved we must conquer these. Let us make a conscience of our thoughts; he that doth not do so will not long make a conscience of his words or deeds.—C. H. Spurgeon.

Fire-proof Dresses.—To render dresses and other textile fabrics incombustible, add one part of the tungstate of soda to three parts of good dry starch, and use the starch in the ordinary way. For fabrics which do not require starching, dissolve one pound of tungstate of soda in two gallons of water, saturate the fabric well in the solution, and let it dry.

It will not change the most delicate colors or affect the quality of the fabric in any way, and ironing will not in the least interfere with the efficacy of the process. Muslims or silks so treated may be held in the flame of a candle or gas without catching fire; so that, although the portion in contact with the flame may by continuance be charred, or even destroyed, there is no danger of spreading the combustion.—Sanitarian.

Insanity Fighting Insanity.—An interesting instance of fighting insanity by insanity, the Scientific American says, has recently been noticed among the Blackwell's Island patients. Two lunatics had been received who were disposed to commit suicide. In addition each possessed a special delusion, one to the effect that he was a cow, the other that his head was an iron ball, and was to be rolled along the floor. They carried these beliefs into action, one striking his head against the padded walls of his cell, the other rolling his head, and of course his body with it, along the floor. The two patients were placed together, and each was privately informed of the other's weakness and warned to watch his companion to prevent him taking his own life. Thus each had a charge in the other. Their vigilance was unceasing. Each supposed himself perfectly sane, and this belief was accompanied by considerable scorn for the other's weakness of intellect and accompanying delusions. Gradually under the influence of this treatment the patients were observed to improve. To have their attention centered on definite duty and on objects external to themselves proved a tonic for their diseased minds, and gradually a complete cure was effected, and they received their discharge from the asylum.—Public Ledger.

Printers' Rollers and Compositions.—A trifling accident led to the invention of the composition of which printers' rollers are made, without which the marvellous printing machinery of the age would be valueless. The story is familiar of the workman employed at Bentley & Sons in London, who in the year 1804, found out his ball, with which ink at that time was put on the type, having become accidentally smeared with molasses, that it worked better for it. He and his mate surreptitiously continued the use of the treacle, much to the improvement of their work and the enhancement of their reputation. In 1806 the poor fellow who had made the discovery from which such vast results have been developed, learned that in the Staffordshire potteries a mixture of glue and molasses was employed in putting designs on earthenware. Two years after he made an inking ball of a similar compound. In 1814 he bargained away his secret for the promise of a job, and died the next year before he had entered upon an employment as the return of an invention, which, rightly handled, would have made him a millionaire. England thus has the honor of the invention of the composition of which printers' rollers are made.

Hints to Swimmers.—"When the bathing season arrives," remarked a natorium professor the other day, "we'll hear of the usual maximum of drowning cases, and among them, as usual, a fair share of expert swimmers. The chief reason why good swimmers are so often drowned when they are accidentally thrown into the water, is because the shock causes them to lose their presence of mind. The loss of presence of mind leads to paralysis of body, or to such wild exertions as to accelerate drowning, instead of contributing to preservation."

A finger laid upon an oar or the gunwale of an overturned boat, or a board, or almost any floating substance, will sustain the human body in calm water. Persons who have been properly taught, and have acquired the habit of acting with self-possession in the water when they are upset, do not attempt to climb upon the overturned boat, but simply to take hold of it and quietly support themselves. A boat half filled with water, or completely overturned, will support as many persons as can get their hands upon the gunwale, if they behave quietly. In case of accident, a person who understands and acts in accordance with these facts would stand a better chance of being saved, even if he were a poor swimmer, than an expert swimmer would stand who should lose his presence of mind.—Scientific American.

Aquarium at Naples.—Around three sides of a low hall of solid masonry are constructed a number of cells or caves, perhaps six feet square; a few are several times this size; and these are separated from the hall each by a single sheet of plate glass. These caves are covered, except a single aperture in each to admit light from above, and into each flows a stream of sea water, which being discharged at a certain height keeps the cave so far filled. In this aquarium are specimens of all the inhabitants of the bay of Naples, and there they pursue their natural mode of life to the great amusement of crowds of visitors. The hall being entirely dark but for the light borrowed from the caves, the minutest transaction in the caves is distinctly visible.—Friends' Intelligencer.

An Application of the Microphone.—The microphone is now being used in Germany for the purpose of detecting loss of water through leakage in town mains. The apparatus consists of a steel rod, which is placed on the cock in the neighborhood of which the leak is suspected, and the microphone attached to the upper end of the rod. A dry battery and a telephone complete the equipment. No sound is heard in the telephone if the cocks are closed and no leak occurs; but a leak of even a few drops causes a sufficient vibration in the pipe to affect the microphone and give audible sounds in the telephone. At a recent meeting of gas and water engineers in Eisenach, it was stated that the apparatus is so simple to handle, that with a little practice ordinary workmen are able to detect and localize any leak.

Arab Settlements on the Congo.—Arabian semi-civilization appears to have made great advance on the Upper Congo, and the interesting question is to what extent it will prove inimical to European civilization. Slavery is native in Africa, but the Arab brings with him the curse of foreign slavery. His trade is in human beings as well as in ivory. Tippoo-Tib, the great trader of the region, seems to be personally a lover of progress. He is a good friend to Dr. Lentz, is on the best of terms with Stanley, and has himself forwarded desirable ethnological information. Nevertheless he trades in men, and his Arabs besieged Equator Station, and after considerable loss took it. It is now stated that he regrets the action, committed during his absence, and that he has given in his adhesion to the Congo Free States. Kasonge, his headquarters, is quite a town, with houses, many of them large and handsome, arranged in streets. Rice fields lie near, and, indeed, the aspect of the Upper Congo has been quite changed by the extensive cultivation of rice upon its banks. The natives have retreated, and Arabs and Arabized negroes have taken their place. Kibonge, the headquarters of another trader, has hundreds of houses and a few thousand inhabitants, and Riba-Riba does a great trade. Nyangwe, formerly the chief Arab settlement, is becoming less important. From all appearances the Upper Congo region is entirely in the power of the Mohammedans.

Basaltic Columns of Staffa.—Distinctly visible from Iona, at a distance of about eight miles, lies Staffa—"the Isle of Columns,"—so its name signifies in the Scandinavian dialect, an island now as famous for its natural wonders, as Iona for its human associations, though, strange to say, while the latter has from time immemorial been a centre of attraction, first to the Pagan, and then to the Christian world, the fame of Staffa dates back only for one century. It is just one hundred years since its wonderful caves were first discovered by Sir Joseph Banks, whose glowing descriptions drew thither a handful of geologists and men of letters.

And truly, it is well worth the exertion, to know the inexpressible delight of standing alone within that glorious cave, with no sound of jarring human voice to disturb the sacred silence of that grand temple, "not made with hands," but reared by the great Creator himself. A wondrous fane indeed, with the perfect symmetry of its countless gigantic columns and marvellous roof, formed (like the strange pavement outside, and like the gallery on which we stand) of the broken bases of hexagonal pillars, which fit together in faultless honeycomb.

The coloring, too, is a marvel of beauty, for this basalt combines every tint of rarest marble that ever human skill wrought together to decorate the costliest temple. Warm red and brown and richest maroon tones prevail, but the whole gleams with green and gold lichen and seaweed, while here and there a mosaic of pure white lime has filtered through, encrusting the pillars, which seem transformed to snowy alabaster.—In the Hebrides.

—Mennonites and Music.—An editorial in the Herald of Truth (Mennonite paper) says: "In the Mennonite Church instrumental music has been generally opposed and testified against in her Conferences. The use of musical instruments in the family has been discouraged in the main body of the Mennonite Church, and their use in the church services positively forbidden. Yet we are sorry to admit that some of the churches in connection with what they call the General Conference of Mennonites in America (only a small portion of the Mennonite Church in America,) have been using the organ in their church services. But this is plainly a departure from the principles and practices of the Mennonite Church as a body."

—Hawaii and Peace.—"When the French, at several times, threatened the independence of Hawaii, rash counsellors advised preparation for war in time of peace and insisted upon fighting. But the king and council, under the tuition of Titus Coan, the most successful missionary of modern times, and who preached a pacific gospel, sent out a proclamation to the people calling on them not to fight but to pray. The French could not conquer men without arms. They departed. When the British Lord Pullitt took the islands with a small frigate not a gun was fired. The invader was monarch five months, and the British flag floated over customhouse, port and fort. The British could not stay where there was no resistance. Public opinion in the islands and in Europe brought down the British flag and sent up the Hawaiian. Hawaiian forts have been dismantled, their materials utilized and war vessels have been converted to commercial uses. The nation has now only one small battery, for saluting, on the top of an old crater behind Honolulu."—McMurdy on Arbitration.

—Famine in Asia Minor.—The American Board of Foreign Missions have received information from one of their missionaries of a severe famine existing in Asia Minor, in Cilicia, in which province the city of Tarsus is located. It has been caused by a drought. The letter was written on the 5th and 6th of the Fifth Month, and says: "Now the spring has come, and the heaven is as iron, and the earth as brass. There is no grass for the cattle, no harvest of the winter-sown grain, and no sowing for the usual summer crops; absolutely no opportunity to earn a single piaster of money; the little oil in the bottom of the cruse and the handful of meal in the barrel are fast wasting away, and there is yet at least twelve months before there can possibly be any work or another opportunity for a harvest. . . . Already most of the farming villages in the vicinity are quite deserted. The people had hoped to save their vineyards, but now the leaves that are just beginning to come out are turning yellow, and vines are beginning to dry up, and will be ruined. Numbers of people are trying to sell copper vessels, beds, furniture, cows and oxen on the street, at one-fourth of their worth. Cows are being sold at the ridiculous price of thirty piasters each—about a dollar and a quarter."

—The English Clergy and the War System.—"It is a thing greatly to be wondered at and regretted, but I believe it is true, that there is no class of men in this country [England] of equal number, who provide so many sons for the Army and Navy as the clergy of the Church of England."—J. Bright.

—Deteriorating Effect of Alcohol.—Dr. E. W. Richardson, in an article published in The Christian Advocate of New York, says: "To this rule I, with unusual opportunities for observation, have seen no exception. Whenever a person is speaking earnestly in favor of alcoholic drinks as the result of his or her direct experience of the value of such drinks; whenever a person says he finds wine to be absolutely necessary to meet such and such a case—anxiety, fear, indecision, or emergency—I know that the expression means danger; means, if the speaker be in earnest, that he of all men should reprove the agent that is so fair to his sensations, so false to his organic stability. I know that alcohol has there set its seal on the constitution, and its eloquent advocate is one of those veritable brands of alcoholic type who will as certainly go from bad to worse, if he persist in his course, as that the seasons of the year will progress in their regular round.

"The transition is natural. The effect of alcohol is to bring about, on a fixed and certain plan, what we are bound to call degeneration. Changes of tissue, commencing probably in the nervous tissues, and in the peripheral lines of that tissue, extend to the nervous centres, and, by the paralyzing action set up, overcome the will on the one hand, and the nutrition of the organic parts on the other, until the whole system, mental and physical, is alcohol-bound and drownd.

"When the experience or sentiment of the sustaining power of alcohol on the heart and circulation has been firmly implanted, and when from the curious experiences of the recipient the sentiment is strongly affirmed, danger as to the physical condition of the person afflicted is certainly present. A faint heart, a feeble mind that can be systematically restored to power by resort to alcohol is a diseased heart, a diseased mind. Of that I am as certain as I am of the existence of the heart or mind themselves."

—New England Yearly Meeting (the Larger Body).—This body convened at Portland, Maine, on the 10th of Sixth Month.

An amendment to the discipline was adopted, prohibiting further marriage to a person once divorced, except in the case of an innocent party to a divorce procured upon the only ground sanctioned by the Saviour.

The Yearly Meeting endorsed the action of its Representative Meeting which expressed disapproval of receiving in full unity ministers whose views in regard to the ordinances do not accord with the general well-known principles of the Society of Friends.

A notice of the meeting in the Portland Transcript, contains the following paragraph: "Of late years many of the older and more conservative Friends have regretted the introduction, in their devotional meetings, of the methods of other societies. These new ways have crowded out some of the distinctive features of their ancient worship, such as the waiting on the Spirit in silence, until utterance was commanded by an irresistible prompting. Some of the cardinal doctrines promulgated by George Fox are being lost sight of, and during these meetings one hears little of that tenet, which, originating with the Friends, has now penetrated other sects and is being preached from almost every pulpit that is exercising much influence on the religious thought of our age, viz: the immanence of the Holy Spirit. At the meetings just closing, some signs indicate a return to the old ways, and we hail these indications with pleasure. There need be no antagonism between Methodism and Quakerism. Each has a field of its own. The Quakers have had much educated out of them for generations, and may well leave the singing to the Methodists who have been musical from the cradle. We would like to attend once more a good old-fashioned Quaker Meeting, in which communion with one's own soul, and with the Over Soul, shall not be harshly disturbed by utterances that are not edifying."

THE FRIEND.

SEVENTH MONTH 9, 1887.

The editorial reference in number 43 of "The Friend," to John iii. 5, has called forth communications from two friends. One of them quotes some remarks from the Journal of Joseph Hoag on the subject of baptism; in which he relates his own experience and the openings of his mind with respect to this subject. A portion of these remarks are as follows:—

"My mind was much caught by water-baptism; which exercised me much, and I was thoughtful of being plunged; and while waiting to feel an impression in my mind thereto, I felt unusually drawn to attend Friends' meetings again. Soon after I took my seat, these words came into my mind, 'He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire,' &c., this continued with me through the meeting. When I went out, the subject left me, and I thought no more of it until I took my seat in the next meeting, when it again revived, and continued, and left me as before as of the former meeting. At the next meeting, the same passage was again presented to my view, and I queried, what does this mean that this text should continue with me during three successive meetings? It then opened as clear to my mind as the bright beams of the sun, that the soul of man was the spirit which derived its being from the creative breath of the Almighty, and was designed, if obedient to the will of its Maker, to become an inhabitant of heaven, and enjoy His glory.

"It appeared clear to me, that as all matter, all elements were dependent on Spirit for the continuation of their being, it was not in the power of the lesser to comprehend or penetrate the greater; and therefore the produce of the earth could feed the body, but it could not feed the soul; waters could wash and purify the flesh, but could not reach the soul—the spirit in man, to which the Almighty giveth understanding. It appeared clear that John, being under a divine mission, and under the influence of God's Spirit, saw through this mystery, which had been hid for many ages of the world, and felt himself authorized to cry, 'He that cometh after me shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost,' &c., which is the Holy Spirit. Here it appears clear that the spirit which brought the soul into being, which the elements had no concern in doing, was the only power which could restore a sick soul to health, or a wounded one to a healed state. These views brought my mind into solemn thoughtfulness, and this language ran through it; the Holy Spirit is also the Grace of God, and the Spirit of God in creation acted independently of any other source, so the Spirit of God acteth independent of all elements, in the regeneration of man. For any one who had been regenerated, born again, or formed anew in Christ, to be baptized with water, would be like some formerly, who began in the spirit, and turned to the weak and beggarly elements, thinking to perfect their happiness thereby, which an apostle, under the influence and direction of the Spirit of God reproved them for."

The other communication is from our friend William Archut, of Philadelphia, who says the views he expresses are those held by his father, who, although not a member with Friends, holds and promulgates the same spiritual views as those believed in by our Society, among his own countrymen, the Germans, whenever and wherever he finds an opening for them.

He mentions that in the German Bible translated by de Wette, the 3d verse of John iii. reads "Except a man be born from above, he cannot see the kingdom of God." "From above" is a more literal rendering of the Greek, than "again," and indeed is given as a marginal reading in the Revised Version; and implies that the "birth" here spoken of is from the Spirit—from God. The 5th verse is a rehearsing in other words of the 3d, which Nicodemus had not clearly understood. To be born of water, is to be taught and instructed by the Spirit, and thus to have a spiritual or divine life raised up in the soul.

Canada Yearly Meeting—The Yearly Meeting (Conservative) for which Adam Spencer acted as Clerk, commenced with a meeting of Ministers and Elders, on the 16th of Sixth Mo.

Among the subjects claiming attention, was the adverse decision of the Courts as to the legal title to the meeting-house at Bloomfield, and a demand for the possession of the Yearly Meeting house at Pickering, which was made during the time of the Yearly Meeting by the other party. The whole matter was referred to the care of the Representative Meeting.

The Committee to whom was referred last year the subject of a correspondence with Ohio Yearly Meeting, reported entire unity in recommending said correspondence to be opened; and an Epistle was accordingly prepared to be sent to that body.

A letter from a friend in Canada, says: "Our Yearly Meeting throughout was a season in which we were comforted together, and the cementing influence of Divine love was felt to prevail, and Friends separated with their strength renewed, and hope and faith confirmed."

We have received from the publisher, John Murray, Albemarle Street, London, a copy of a work written by A. V. Dicey, entitled, "England's Case against Home Rule," and also a pamphlet, "Why England Maintains the Union," which is a popular rendering of the larger book.

Without entering fully into the merits of a question which is at the present time causing so much discussion among our brethren abroad, it is right for Americans to feel sympathy with them in the confessedly perplexing considerations involved; and to desire that the Ruler of Nations may calm the agitated spirits of the people, and give them the wisdom and forbearance necessary for a right settlement of the disputes which have arisen.

The writer of this book (if we understand his argument) fully recognizes the need of a change; but he thinks the root cause of the discontent that prevails in Ireland, is the land system; and that an improvement of the law regulating it is the direction in which useful reform must be looked for. The proposed scheme of Home Rule he believes, will not remedy the difficulty, even if it should be carried into effect.

The book is dispassionate and argumentative in its tone and may profitably be read by those who desire to know both sides of a question before coming to a conclusion in their own minds.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The public debt statement for Sixth Month shows a reduction of $16,852,725. Total cash in the treasury, $482,433,917. During the fiscal year which ended on Sixth Month 30th, the principal of the bonded debt of the United States decreased $127,911,030.

Captain Coy, who arrived at Benson, Arizona, on the 1st instant from the Santa Rita mountains, reports a terrible waterspout there on the afternoon of the 27th ult. "He and his partner heard a terrific roar resembling the sound of an earthquake. They ran to a bluff overlooking the Cienega Valley and saw a monster waterspout coursing down the valley. The valley, which is fully half a mile wide, was covered with water to a depth of fifteen feet. As the torrent swept through the valley it carried everything before it. A large number of cattle were in the valley. Some of them were thrown upon elevated places, but hundreds of them were drowned. The water must have travelled a distance of fifty miles. It overflowed the hotel and the railroad track at Santano before it exhausted itself."

A telegram from Atchison, Kansas, says the closing of the saloons in that city has cut off a profitable source of revenue amounting to thousands of dollars a year, and as a result the city has not revenue enough to keep going. On Seventh Month 1st, the police force, with the exception of the marshal and one officer, were suspended from duty. The mayor has also notified the freeman that their services will be dispensed with.

The Governor of Maine has sent communications to the Attorney General and to all the county attorneys in the State, calling their attention "to the fact that a conspiracy exists to evade the Prohibitory Liquor law by an unjustifiable interpretation of the United States revenue regulations regarding the sale of liquor in imported packages, and calling upon them to enforce the law to the fullest extent."

In the Prohibition State Convention of Ohio, in session at Columbus, on the 30th ultimo, resolutions were adopted declaring that an ample trial of the Dow liquor law "has shown that it was designed as a measure of concession to temperance, while really putting the cause at a disadvantage;" also, denouncing Anarchism. A full State ticket was nominated.

The trial of Jacob Sharp, in New York, for bribery and conspiracy in connection with the Broadway railroad franchise, resulted in a verdict of guilty as charged. The jury were out only thirteen minutes. They recommended the prisoner to mercy. Sharp heard the verdict without apparent emotion. The court adjourned until Seventh Month 13th, when sentence will be pronounced. A new trial will be asked.

A severe earthquake shook Concord, New Hampshire, at 9 minutes past 5 o'clock on the afternoon of the 30th ult. "There were several distinct vibrations, crockery and windows being rattled and heavy buildings perceptibly jarred. In some instances persons ran from their houses through fear, and the shock at the State House was so severe that several legislators and others sought safety in flight. The course of the vibrations seemed to be from the northwest, and reports from surrounding towns show that the shock was felt as strongly within their limits."

Seventh-day, the 2nd instant, was the hottest day of the season in New York. About thirty cases of sunstroke, six fatal, were reported in and around that city. On First-day, the 3d, two hundred and fifty-six deaths were reported—the largest number in any one day since 1876.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 385, which was 64 less than during the previous week, and 34 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the foregoing 220 were males, and 161 females: 161 were adults and 216 minors: 47 died of consumption; 43 of cholera infantum; 26 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 24 of inanition; 15 of convulsions; 15 of diseases of the heart; 14 of marasmus; 11 of old age; 11 of pneumonia, and 10 of typhoid fever.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½'s, 109½; 4's, 128½; currency 6's, 123½; 134½.

Cotton ruled firm but quiet, at 11½ cts. for middling uplands.

Poultry sold readily and price ruled firm. Quotations: Live fowls, 13 a 13½ cts.; live spring chickens, 15 a 22 cts.; dressed fowls, 13 a 14 cts.; dressed spring chickens, 18 a 25 cts.

Beef cattle were in fair demand at 3½ a 5½ cts.

Sheep.—Good stock advanced ¼c; common declined ¼c. to 1½ a 5c. Lambs declined ¼c. to 4 a 7 cts.

Hogs were inactive at 7¼ a 7½ cts.

Fat cows were dull at 2 a 3½ cts.

Milch cows were fairly active at $30 a $60.

Veal calves were firm at 5 a 7 cts.

FOREIGN.—In the House of Commons, on the 28th ultimo, Maurice Healy moved, as an amendment to the Crimes bill, that prisoners be given the same right to challenge jurors as was granted the Government; that the Government be not allowed to challenge jurors on account of their religion, and that in the trials of foreigners one-half of the jury must understand the language of the accused. The motion was rejected.

On the 4th instant, Sir James Fergusson, Parliamentary Secretary of the Foreign Office, announced in the House of Commons that the Anglo-Turkish Convention in relation to Egypt had not yet been ratified by the Porte. He stated that England would grant no postponement of the signing of the Convention by Turkey beyond to-day.

The British Medical Journal, says, Dr. Morell Mackenzie has removed almost all of the fungous growth that remained in the throat of the German Crown Prince when he left home.

General Boulanger has been appointed to the command of the Thirteenth Army Corps, and is stationed at Clermont-Ferrand, 250 miles from Paris. The Cabinet, it is said, decided upon this disposition of General Boulanger's case in order to insure his absence from Paris during the Seventh Month "fetes."

King Milan, of Serbia, has instructed Premier Ristic to take measures to prevent the return of Queen Natalie to Serbia. A Cabinet crisis is expected if the Premier refuses to obey the King. The Queen is now in Russia, and it is in consequence of her intriguing on behalf of that Government, that the estrangement has occurred between herself and the king.

A telegram from Guayaquil, Ecuador, says the most violent earthquake experienced there since 1868, has occurred. The shock lasted two minutes and twenty seconds, and the direction of the movement was from northeast to southwest. All the clocks in the city were stopped. Several buildings were demolished, and others were badly damaged. So far as reported, no person was injured. It is feared that the shock must have caused much damage in the cities in the interior.

The project to lay a Transpacific cable, connecting Australia and Vancouver, B. C., will, if successful, according to a prime mover in the scheme, reduce the tariff between London, Eng., and Australia, from 65 cents to 27 cents per word. It is calculated that the total cost of the cable will be ten million dollars.

Strong protests are being made at Kingston, Ontario, against the Government exaction of one dollar from each vessel arriving from the United States. The tax is oppressive to ferrymen and owners of tugs.

Selections from the Diary of Abigail W. Hall.

Departed this life, on the 22nd of First Mo. 1862, our dear friend and mother, Debby Cope; after an indisposition of several years continuance. Her close was peaceful. She could say, she "saw no cloud in her way;" and was ready and willing to go; but waited patiently until her change came. May we who were privileged to wait and watch by her night after night and day after day, improve by the lesson; to me one fraught with deep instruction.

Her funeral was attended by a large concourse of people, and conducted in much quietness. After the interment a solemn meeting was held, in which some living testimonies were borne. Oh, that we who are called upon to minister to the people, might keep our ranks in righteousness; and never dare to put forth our hands to steal. Think I have felt increasingly, of latter times, the need that we be found waiting for "power from on high."

Twelfth Mo. 27th, 1863. No entry made in my diary the past year. During it have known oftener what it was to be abased, than to abound. But, O Heavenly Father! thou knowest all things: thou knowest that I love thee. It matters not in what way the great work is perfected, if my robes may only become washed and made white, and I fitted and prepared for an entrance into a kingdom of never-ending rest and peace and joy. For many meeting-days, I have had nothing to say in our little gatherings, by way of ministry; and often having to sit meetings through in great strippedness as to any good. The apostle testified that in all states he was instructed. I repine not at these seasons of desolation, all I ask and desire is, to know I have not brought them on myself. I often am led to mourn over my own frailties and weakness many ways. May Best Help be sought after to overcome.

Eighth Mo. 13th, 1864. "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me," is often the secret prayer of my heart. Am renewedly convinced I cannot keep myself from falling one moment; hence the great need to keep near to our adorable Helper and Redeemer. I feel that I am a poor, weak creature; yet still earnestly desirous to be helped and made an overcomer. Give me, O dearest Father! to see the travail of my soul, and to be satisfied.

Sixth Mo. 23rd, 1866. How often of latter times, has my mind been turned towards a fresh entry in this book. And what can I say but that mercies, unmerited mercies, are still vouchsafed to one of the weakest and poorest of the Lord's flock and family. Words would fail me to set forth my great helplessness, never more manifest than when assembled in our little meeting at Whiteland. Such weakness and great drowsiness and heaviness, has assailed meeting-day after meeting-day, that one continual struggle has had to be maintained to keep from falling asleep; a thing I would not dare to do, not even to allow my eyes to close, or willing the least child should see me thus tried. But oh! how has the cry for help gone up! While thus exercised last First-day, unexpectedly was brought to my remembrance, the condition of the poor woman who had an infirmity thirty and eight years, so that she could in no wise lift up herself. And, how Jesus "had compassion on her," and healed her! As this passed before me, it afforded encouragement still to cry unto our alone great Helper, whose compassions fail not. And I can but believe, if I am only found striving to come up every day of my life in acceptance before Him, that his "compassion" will be extended to me, poor creature as I am. Therefore, faint not nor grow weary, O my soul!

Seventh Mo. 7th. Attended the funeral of that dear mother in our Israel, Elizabeth Pitfield. Few have lived more beloved, and died more lamented, than our dear friend. Her ministry was like the holy waters, which the prophet Ezekiel speaks of, that issued from under the threshold. I feel that I for one, should rise up and call her blessed.*

Second Mo. 18th, 1867. It is with fear I once more take up my pen, to acknowledge afresh the goodness and mercy of our Heavenly Father, still extended towards me, unworthy as I am. Oh, how marvellously has his loving-kindness been vouchsafed in the time of need! Had He not been my helper, my soul had almost dwelt in silence. But through his constraining love and power, I have been enabled to speak well of his ever-worthy name. — and myself have just performed a visit to the families of Birmingham Monthly Meeting. Oh the awful fear that covered my spirit from sitting to sitting, lest I should put forth my hand unbidden, and say: "The Lord saith it; albeit I have not spoken." It is a very weighty service to be engaged in, and one of the most humiliating. But it has been good for me; and may I be kept where it has left me, even at the dear Master's feet, begging for mercy; and for help to come up more in good liking before Him, who I do desire to serve more faithfully than I have done; that so the great work may be perfected; and I know my sins, which are many, all going beforehand to judgment.

* For obituary notice of E. P., see "The Friend," vol. xxxix, page 376. The concluding paragraph of which is as follows: "May more of our dear young Friends, to whom she has so often and so fervently spoken of the unsearchable riches of Christ, and the unalterable terms of salvation, be willing to take up the cross and follow in the footsteps of His companions; that so there may be a succession of standard-bearers raised up from among the children of this people."

Died, at West Chester, Pa., on the 23rd of Tenth Mo. 1866, James Emlen, in the seventy-fifth year of his age, a member and elder of Birmingham Monthly Meeting.*

Died, on the 12th of the Fifth Month, 1867, at his residence in Philadelphia, in the 80th year of his age, William Evans, a beloved minister and member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends for the Southern District†

In recording the death of the two preceding dear Friends, I do it with no little emotion. And can say, it was not for any works of righteousness that I ever did, but through that free and unmerited mercy spoken of in the foregoing, that this love shown forth through these dear friends was so kindly extended to me again and again. With what fatherly care did they watch over me year after year, encouraging and speaking a word in season! But ah! I fear that for these and other favors received, there has not been a walking sufficiently answerable thereto. The time has come to me, that I must walk more alone on the troubled waters, to meet my dear Lord and Master. Now such supporters are removed, fathers in our Israel, no man knows me as these dear friends did, or can care for my soul. May a knowledge of this drive closer home to their God and mine. Thou art my God and I will praise thee; my father's God and I will exalt thee.

First Mo. 13th, 1869. I often upbraid myself for neglecting entries in my diary. As an apology for this, I may say, that an abiding sense of my utter helplessness for any good word and work, hindered me. May He, who hath been pleased still to spare my natural life, grant afresh ability from day to day, rightly to improve this offer of mercy, that so the day's work may keep pace with the day. Speak peace, oh dearest Father! to my troubled soul, and enable me, more and more, to mount upwards with wings as eagles; to run and not be weary, to walk and not faint, in my heavenward journey.

22nd. My feelings were very solemnly impressed last night with having brought to my remembrance the condition of him who was found at the marriage supper without a wedding garment on: with the query, "how cometh thou in hither not having a wedding garment?" As I dwelt under the very solemn feeling, renewed desires were raised that I be not found in the condition he was. The work of regeneration is a great work! The words of Jesus to Nicodemus were: "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God."

Second Mo. 22nd. My mind has turned towards Abington Quarterly Meeting, to be held at Germantown on Fifth-day of this week.

* See obituary of J. E. in "The Friend," vol. xl, page 112.

Whilst I feel very desirous to attend to every little pointing of duty, a great fear rests, not to run when I am not sent; as this will not profit the people, help the good cause, or advance me one step in my heavenward journey. But, can I not adopt the language of David where he says: "My soul followeth hard after thee," though often, very often having to walk in darkness and have no light.

Third Mo. 23rd. Comforted before leaving my bed this morning, by remembering how the poor disciples were encouraged, after toiling all night, by the command of Jesus to launch out into the deep, and let down the net, &c. It has long been with me a night season of toiling, for an evidence of mercy and acceptance. Oh! may my indwelling be deep, that I may realize in my own experience, the goodness and mercy of Him, who is Lord over all, blessed forevermore. He still condescends to the low estate of his children; therefore faint not nor grow weary, O my soul!

22nd. Feel a little comforted and consoled this morning, under a fresh feeling, that poor and unworthy as I am, my Heavenly Father still owns me. Assembled with my friends in a meeting capacity under an humbling sense of my stripped and poor condition. Our meeting was composed more than half of those not members with us in religious profession. How I desired that the Lord would condescend to administer immediately to the wants of these, indeed of us all! I remembered how it was with the Centurion, who asked help of Jesus for one he loved; yet felt unworthy that he should come under his roof. He knew the Saviour's word was sufficient for the healing of his servant. Just as meeting was closing, light broke through the darkness; and his word was as a fire shut up in my bones; and I was constrained once more to lift up my voice in the assembly of his people. Oh! it seemed indeed like opening the prison doors, whereby the poor captive spirit should be set free. May I walk answerable for the favor received! For I had said again and again in my heart that morning, surely "I shall go softly all my days in the bitterness of my soul."

For "The Friend."

A Summer Walk.

I have been renewedly impressed of late with the many opportunities for pursuing the study of natural history which are furnished by a short walk, or are to be found even in the limits of a small garden. The present season seems to have been an unusually favorable one for some forms of insect life. In the little space in the rear of our humble home, are growing among other plants, a moderate-sized Pear-tree, a Hop-vine and a Hydrangea. On all of these I noticed swarms of small yellow caterpillars, thickly studded with brushes of long white or gray hairs radiating from rows of small black warts on the sides of the insect. Round the clusters of leaves on which they feed they spin a loose web. The Hop-vine seemed to be an especial favorite; probably 50 worms would be crowded on a single large leaf; and the branches, on which nothing was left but the skeletons of the leaves, from which all the green pulp had been devoured, and these enveloped in the webs of the insects, presented a forlorn and desolate appearance.

Finding my muscles, for lack of sufficient use, were feeling fatigued with very moderate exercise, I determined on the afternoon of Sixth Month 28th, again to visit my "favorite swamp," which I had not before entered since the advent of Spring. On my way I observed that the same caterpillar which was foraging on the home premises, was busily at work on many of the trees I passed—particularly the Apple, Elm, Ash-leaved Maple, Linden and Persimmon.

By the road-side, I passed a clump of the Milk-weed or Silk-weed, (Asclepias Syriaca), whose large globular balls of greenish purple flowers gave forth a sweet odor, and were attractive to the honey bees and other insects. I noticed on the blossoms a number of the common fire-flies, and three kinds of small beetles, one a pretty red variety, with some black spots. On breaking off a specimen, the milk-white juice of the plant dropped from the severed stem. After my return home, I broke off a leaf from a specimen of the Milk-weed I had brought with me, and suffered a drop of the milky juice to fall on a glass slide, so that I might examine it more carefully. To my surprise, I found that as it dried, the whiteness disappeared, and it was transformed into a transparent, colorless solid, like a drop of varnish.

This behaviour of the Milk-weed juice led to a further examination of the character of the colored fluids of plants; and I learned that they mostly belong to the class which in medicine are termed emulsions—a name given to those preparations in which oily or other substances are rubbed in a mortar with water or some other liquid in which they are not dissolved, but mechanically suspended in a state of fine subdivision. The whiteness of the mixture is an optical effect produced by the reflection of the light from the minute particles of the suspended substance, in the same manner as the foam of water appears white, although the liquid itself is colorless. The substances thus suspended in the milky juice of different plants are often valuable to man. Among the more important of them are caoutchouc, gutta percha and opium. Some of these have a color of their own which modifies the whiteness of the emulsion, as is the case with the common Celandine, whose juice is a decided saffron.

Plants with milky sap evidently have peculiar attractions for some varieties of insects; which may be collected from them, although seldom found elsewhere. Soon after leaving the Milk-weeds, I came to a part of the road, that last year had been bordered with a profuse growth of another milky-juiced plant, the Dogbane (Apocynum). The careful farmer had mowed the "weeds" by the side of his field, but I found a number of plants a few inches high, and feeding on their leaves were the most brilliant little beetles that I suppose our country produces—polished and shining with a metallic lustre and glowing like animated masses of fire.

In a sand-field by the side of the swamp, I found another species of Asclepias, the beautiful orange-colored Butterfly-weed (Asclepias tuberosa). The sap of this, however, is not milky, and does not seem so attractive as its cousin, the Milk-weed, to the insect tribes. This plant, which is quite common in our dry fields and road-sides, is still more abundant in the Southern States, where the root is used medicinally, as a remedy in pleurisy. It promotes the action of the skin, and thus tends to relieve the inflamed membranes of the cavity of the lungs. From this use it receives one of its popular names—the "Pleurisy root."

It was the flowering season of the common field Garlic (Allium vineale), a troublesome plant introduced from Europe, and thoroughly naturalized. The flowers grow in a cluster on the top of a stem about two feet high. But frequently their place is largely taken by small purple bulbs. One of the specimens I gathered was crowned with a compact ball of bulbs, about three-fourths of an inch in diameter, among which I could not find a single floret. Others contained both bulbs and flowers, but the bulbs were far the most numerous. In some of the plants the bulb had commenced to vegetate, perhaps stimulated by the recent rains, and presented the curious spectacle of a colony of young garlic plants growing on the summit of the parent stem.

On the edge of a piece of dense woodland that bordered the swamp, were several bushes of the Arrow-wood (Viburnum dentatum). In this species the leaves are arranged on the twigs in pairs opposite to each other. They have short footstalks; and are somewhat thick in texture and rounded, or rather broadly oval in shape; with prominent ribs on the under side. Each of these ribs ends in a broad projecting point. The flowers, which are white, come at the end of the branchlets, in flat-topped clusters of about two inches in diameter, considerably resembling those of the common Elder (Sambucus Canadensis) which belongs to the same natural family of plants. Scarcely a trace of the white corallas or floral leaves were to be seen; and as the season had not advanced sufficiently for these to fall by their natural decay, I attributed their loss to the ravages of insects, of which the destructive rose-bug was seen on the bush. I gathered a small branch for examination, and noticed that the footstalks of the flowers were thickly covered with a brown plant-louse, or Aphis, sucking the sap which should have gone to develop the bloom. Among these Aphides, as may almost always be found in such places, were some active ants, who feed on the liquid emitted by them.

It was pleasant to find myself once more buried in the recesses of the swamp—away from the usual haunts of men. The pleasant song of the Maryland Yellow Throat from the thicket near by, showed where that beautiful little songster was hiding itself from the eye of the curious; and but a few feet over my head the Red-winged Blackbird poised himself in the air and complained of the stranger who had intruded into his haunts. The secret of his uneasiness was made plain when I saw his young scarcely fledged, with feeble flight escaping among the bushes. Around me was the abundant, varied and interesting vegetation which this spot has never failed to yield me. The white Aletris, looking as if its long slender stalk of flowers had been dusted over with meal; the wild Yam vine (Dioscorea), with its slender twining stems, and beautiful thin, wrinkled, heart-shaped leaves; the Fox Grape, with berries already formed; the Cinnamon Fern (Osmunda cinnamomea), with large clusters of radiating fronds, in low grounds, one of the commonest and finest of our ferns; the widely spreading branches of the Common Brake (Pteris aquilina) whose leaves are bordered on the under side with a continuous line of fructification; the Blue-eyed Grass; the Loosesstrife; the Scull-cap; the Meadow Rue; and other plants were there, as well as many whose time for flowering had not yet come. J. W.

It is always safe to do just right, whatever are the appearances of danger. It is never safe to do wrong, however small the risk may seem. The whole universe is ordered of God so as to have these truths stand out over against each other in unfailling continuance.

For "The Friend."

Old-Fashioned Quakerism.

This is the title of a pamphlet, written by William Pollard, an English Friend, which attempts to set forth the distinctive features of Primitive Christianity, the identity with it of the "Quaker Reformation," some of the results of the "Quaker Movement," and, to some extent, the future of our Society.

In some particulars the writer does not seem to come up fully to the Quaker standard, as understood by our forefathers, especially with respect to music as a social recreation, and other testimonies which may be included under the general advice given by the Apostle, "Be not conformed to this world; but the essay is well written and interesting, and forcibly presents to its readers some of the fundamental principles of true religion.

After speaking of the inestimable blessings which the coming of Christ, and the spreading of his religion, brought into the world; and that the root of spiritual life is faith or trust in a Divine Being, he remarks that there is one aspect of truth, "which the New Testament is full of, and which dominates everything,—that of the indwelling Spirit; in other words, the direct communication of the believer with his Lord. Christ's whole teaching and ministry led up to this. When He was about to depart,—when seemingly his entire work must fall to the ground through the loss of its leader, this was his grand word of consolation and hope to his followers:—'I will send you the Comforter, the Spirit of Truth. He shall abide with you always.' And He pointed out that this Spirit of Truth would be Himself,—that He whom they had come to love and trust, would be with them always, even to the end of the world." "The New Testament Epistles for ever revert to this Divine Presence, as the source and mainspring of Christian life. 'Ye are led by the Spirit,' 'Walk in the Spirit,' 'The Spirit of God dwelleth in you.' 'The Spirit is Life.' 'Ye are the Temples of the Holy Ghost,' &c. First, last, always—this is the great Fact—a Present God revealed in Christ—Who enlightens and quickens, Whose very life flows through the mind and heart and will of the disciple."

The religious meetings of the early Christians were founded upon the Jewish synagogue, the arrangements of which were continued with some modifications. "When the congregation came together, which was often very early on the First day of the week,—one had a psalm, another a teaching or exposition, another a revelation, another a tongue, another an interpretation, (1 Cor. xiv. 26.) So it is evident that these meetings were not occasions, where one man monopolized the service. Christ alone was the Master and Teacher; and all the congregation, whether rich or poor, learned or unlearned, were brethren, met in His name, and seeking to be taught and led by His Spirit." "So far from the gift of preaching being confined to one individual in the church, the Apostle teaches that all may preach, one by one, that thus by the variety of ministrations, all might learn and all be comforted." (1 Cor. xiv.)

"The nature of the call to the ministry, among the primitive Christians, was in strange contrast to that too prevalent in modern times; (though not strange to those who have been brought up as Friends.) It is not too much to say, that this work is still often entered upon, amongst other churches, to get a respectable, gentlemanly occupation; and that if a person is clever, amiable, fond of reading, gifted with a good voice, and so on, he is thought fit to be trained for the ministry,—sometimes even, he is thus trained when all these are markedly absent!

"But how was it in the Primitive Church?"

"Paul says he himself was a preacher, because 'necessity (a strong sense of duty) was laid upon him by the Holy Ghost.' Again, he says he was called to be an Apostle, by the will of God; and again,—that he was called—'not of men, neither by men, but by Jesus Christ, and God the Father.'

"He says that Archippus received his ministry in the Lord.

"The Apostle Peter tells the believers, that 'each man is to minister as he has received the gift; and again, he says: 'If any man minister, let him do it as of the ability which God giveth.' And we read that it was not man, but the Lord Jesus Himself, who 'gave some to be apostles, and some prophets, and some evangelists, and some pastors and teachers; and again, that 'there are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit qualifyeth in all.'

"And so these ministers, with their varied gifts, looked for the direct guidance and help of the Spirit of Christ, in their service. Like the prophets of old, the word of the Lord came to them. In more modern phrase, they preached under a sense of duty at the time, and they sought to be qualified at the time, by Divine help.

"How, indeed, except by Divine guidance, could the word in season be spoken, and the secrets of many hearts be revealed?"

"In accordance with this, we read of Paul and Barnabas being sent forth by the Holy Ghost, on their missionary tours. In one district, Paul is forbidden to preach, by the Holy Ghost. Again, 'the Spirit suffered them not to go into Bithynia.'—all this evidencing the direct guidance of the Spirit, in the work of the ministry.

"We further find that in the Primitive Church, human learning was not considered essential to the work of the ministry. This is made very pointed by the fact, that almost all the Apostles were unlettered men. Not that God needs a blank sheet of ignorance, on which to write his truth; but that spiritual wisdom is a different thing from intellectual lore. The very fact that the most active and gifted of the Apostles, was a blank sheet of ignorance, on which to write his truth, the value of mental cultivation, in this as in every duty, in life.

"Then, further, these early preachers proclaimed the truth freely. They were not professionals. They did not gain their livelihood by their service. They were simply members of the community, in which all had some gift or calling, and theirs was preaching. This engagement was a labor of love, bringing its own reward. The wages were ample, but they were of the same kind as the gift and the service—spiritual and not temporal. In illustration of this status of the preacher, we read Paul's statement, repeatedly made, that his own hands ministered to his necessities. We are told that he was a mechanic—a tentmaker—and that he worked at his calling; and Aquila, another preacher, worked with him. Barnabas did the same. Paul tells the bishops, or overseers of Ephesus, (who were probably preachers,) that so laboring they ought to support, not themselves only, but the weak. Again, Peter tells the bishops, that they should labor, (not for filthy lucre, as the servants of the heathen gods did,) but 'willingly, and of a ready mind.'

"And if any of the Apostles and early preachers did not entirely earn their living, it was simply because their position as itinerant missionaries, stood in the way. For this case the Lord had expressly provided. He had said that the workman was worthy of his meat, the laborer of his hire. The disciple who ministered to others of spiritual things, might rightly, in such circumstances, partake of their carnal things. But this was so carefully guarded on both sides—on the side of the ministers, who had to maintain their true independence, and the freeness of their gift; and on the side of the congregations, many of whom were true ministers of Christ in other ways, and so were on the same footing as the preachers—that we nowhere read of stated payment for the ministry during the first two centuries. We find in the writings of that period, plentiful allusion to the contributions in the churches, for the help of the poor, the sick, the aged, the imprisoned, and the shipwrecked; but no stated payment for the preachers.

"Well would it have been for the Church of Christ, had she continued to maintain in their integrity, these simple views, as to the position and calling of the ministry of the Word."

Of the Rites and Ceremonies, which have so important a place in the public service of many of the professing churches at the present time, William Pollard says, that in the ordinary meaning of those words, they are scarcely to be found in the simple service of the apostolic days. "There were doubtless some Jewish arrangements, which clung to the church; as was natural in a religion which was mainly propagated by Jews, few of whom in their lifetime laid aside the practices, in which they had been trained.

"Hence we find strict directions, not to eat things strangled, or to partake of blood. Hence also, the Jewish practice of chanting hymns, was more or less adopted in the Christian meetings. But all these, and other externals were evidently appraised at their true value by the apostles, and hung very loosely; and when certain ritualists visited some of the churches, and insisted upon observances as important to salvation, they were very sternly rebuked; and the churches were solemnly reminded, that the work of Christianity did not consist in ritualistic performances, but in a changed heart and a dedicated life.

"Water baptism in those early days, was not so much a ceremony, as a Jewish plan of admitting proselytes; and as such it has long been in vogue in that nation."

"This Jewish practice was adopted by the disciples, in the lifetime of our Lord, as the common method of enrolling members, (though the evangelist significantly states, 'Howbeit Jesus himself baptized not, but his disciples;') and it was afterwards continued in the Primitive Church; taking much the same place as our proceeding, for admission into membership. But how Paul valued the method, we may learn from his almost contemptuous words, 'Christ sent me not to baptize but to preach the gospel.'"

"The Primitive Christians had also a practice of holding a periodical Repast, partly social and partly religious, to which the whole congregation was invited. The Gentiles had been accustomed to have frequent sacrificial feasts, which this would seem to have replaced. It was a meal of Fellowship and Christian love; in which master and slave, rich and poor, learned and unlearned, sat down together on a footing of equality, and recalled together the great Fact of Christianity,—the coming and sacrifice of their Lord, His dying, and His undying love for the whole family of man. This simple Love Feast became in after times distorted by priestly minds, into a Rite and a Sacrament, that had in itself spiritual efficacy; but there is not a trace of this idea to be found in primitive days.

"The simple practice, as adopted by the Early Christians, was doubtless of great value for that time; but it is no more binding upon Christians now, than the command so clearly given to the Primitive Disciples, to wash one another's feet.

"With regard to all this tendency to outward observances in religion, the Apostle's words on the very subject, are pointed and clear. He says:—'With freedom did Christ set us free;—stand fast therefore, and be not entangled again in a yoke of bondage.'

Flowers at Funerals.

The reading of a recent article in "The Friend" called to mind a departure from our usual practices and testimonies witnessed at the burial of our members, where a pillow of roses and other flowers had been presented as a token of esteem for the deceased. Those flowers were allowed to accompany the remains, and to be deposited upon the grave in the burial ground, without protest or objection, as far as known. It was said that those flowers were furnished and presented by others not members of our Society. But, dear Friends, are we released in the least from maintaining our discipline by the circumstance that the objectionable things have been presented to our families? While, at the same time, it is our duty to guard and respect the tender feelings of our fellow-beings, and to accept their sympathies and earnest regards for our afflictions, with all thankfulness.

That many of our members, and particularly those holding responsible positions, often have a feeling sense of their weaknesses, and almost seem as they would faint by the wayside, I do not doubt. To all such I extend my sincere sympathy and encouragement, and also fully believe that a continued looking in the right direction, from whence all goodness comes, will strengthen them in their faltering steps. It is our duty to feel Christian sympathy with, and to desire the encouragement one of another. In unity there is strength.

Dear Friends, though we may feel faint and weak for the task before us, we are compelled, praying for Divine help to guide us, to buckle on the armor of duty and stand steadfast for those principles and testimonies through which our forefathers in the Society were led out of darkness unto light; out from under man-made ministry unto the pure spiritual worship which we find so fully taught by Jesus Christ, our Saviour, in the New Testament. "Z."

The Uses of Earthly Trouble and Grief.—This world is full of sorrow and grief. But few hearts will escape sore afflictions in some form or other, if they live for many years. Surely all this sorrow must have its use, and be designed for some good purpose. We lose a dear child, and are downcast and sad, but has this grief no ministry of good to us or to others? "Sorrow hath pressed many sweet songs out of me," says Luther. Sometimes a chastisement which seems altogether grievous and needless, in the end yields the peaceable fruits of righteousness to them that are exercised thereby. Out of the Egyptian prison comes Joseph, to be the Saviour of his people; through the casting of the Hebrews into the fiery furnace, comes the decree "no man shall speak anything amiss against the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego;" and through the consigning of Daniel to the lions' den is given that royal edict that throughout the kingdom of Darius men should "tremble and fear before the God of Daniel." We are indebted to Bedford jail for Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress; and it was while walking through shadows dark and cheerless, in the twilight of departing reason, that Cowper wrote that hymn which has consoled so many troubled hearts:

God moves in a mysterious way,
His wonders to perform;
He plants his footsteps in the sea
And rides upon the storm.

Ye fearful souls, fresh courage take,
The clouds ye so much dread
Are big with mercies, and shall break
In blessings on your head.

There is a need-be for our "heaviness through manifold temptations;" it may be for our own sakes, it may be for the sake of others. The stroke that breaks our own hearts may be the binding up of the hearts of many; and we, having been stricken and made desolate, may be able to "comfort those that are in any trouble, by the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God. Let us have faith in the wisdom and grace of our Heavenly Father, let us bear our burdens and endure our crosses, and trust that He who hath loved us will cause all things to work together for good to them that love God."

THE END OF THE WAY.

The following beautiful lines were written by a young lady in Nova Scotia, an invalid for many years.

My life is a wearisome journey;
I'm sick with the dust and the heat;
The rays of the sun beat upon me;
The briars are wounding my feet;
But the city to which I am journeying
Will more than my trials repay;
All the toils of the road will seem nothing
When I get to the end of the way.

There are so many hills to climb upward,
I often am longing for rest;
But He who appoints me my pathway
Knows just what is needful and best;
I know in his word He has promised
That my strength shall be as my day;
And the toils of the road will seem nothing
When I get to the end of the way.

He loves me too well to forsake me,
Or give me one trial too much;
All his people have been dearly purchased,
And Satan can never claim such.
By and by I shall see Him and praise Him
In the city of unending day;
And the toils of the road will seem nothing
When I get to the end of the way.

When the last feeble step has been taken,
And the gates of the city appear,
And the beautiful songs of the angels
Float out on my listening ear;
When all that now seems so mysterious
Will be plain and clear as the day;
Yes, the toils of the road will seem nothing
When I get to the end of the way.

Though now I am footsore and weary,
I shall rest when I'm safely at home;
I know I'll receive a glad welcome
For the Saviour himself has said "come."
So when I am weary in body
And sinking in spirit, I say,
All the toils of the road will seem nothing
When I get to the end of the way,

Cooling fountains are there for the thirsty;
There are cordials for those who are faint;
There are robes that are whiter and purer
Than any that fancy can paint;
Then I'll try to press hopefully onward,
Thinking often through each weary day,
The toils of the road will seem nothing
When I get to the end of the way.

THE RAINBOW.

BY J. H.

The evening was glorious; and light through the trees Played the sunshine and rain-drops, the birds and the breeze:

The landscape outstretching, in loveliness lay
On the lap of the year, in the beauty of May.

For the Queen of the Spring as she passed down the vale,

Left her robe on the trees, and her breath on the gale;
And the smile of her promise gave joy to the hours,
And rank in her footsteps sprang herbage and flowers.

The skies, like a banner in sunset unrolled,
O'er the west threw the splendor of azure and gold;
But one cloud at a distance, rose dense and increased,
Till its margin of black touched the zenith and east.

We gazed on the scenes while around us they glowed,
When a vision of heaven appeared on the cloud:
'Twas not like the sun, as at midday we view,
Nor the moon that rolls nightly through star-light and blue.

Like a spirit it came on the van of the storm;
And the eye and the heart hailed its beautiful form:
For it looked not severe like an angel of wrath,
And a garment of brightness illumed its dark path.

In the hues of its grandeur sublimely it stood
O'er the river, the village, the fields, and the wood;
And the river, fields, village, and woodlands, grew bright,
As conscious they felt and afforded delight.

'Twas the bow of Omnipotence, bent in His hand Whose grasp at Creation the universe spanned:
'Twas the presence of God, in a symbol sublime:
His vow from the flood, to the exit of Time.

Not dreadful, as when in the whirlwind He pleads,
When storms are his charlots, and lightnings his steeds;
The black clouds of vengeance his banner unfurled;
And thunder, his voice to a guilt-stricken world:

In the breath of his presence when thousands expire,
And seas boil with fury, and rocks burn with fire;
And the sword and the plague-spot with death strew
the plain,
And vultures and wolves are the graves of the slain:

Not such was that Rainbow, that beautiful one!
Whose arch was refraction, its key-stone the sun:
A pavilion it seemed which the Deity graced;
And Justice and Mercy met there and embraced.

Awhile, and it sweetly beat over the gloom,
Like Love o'er a death-couch, or Hope o'er the tomb:
Then left the dark scene, whence it slowly retired,
As though Love had just vanished, and Hope had expired.

I gazed not alone, on that source of my song;
To all who beheld it these verses belong;
Its presence to all was the path of the Lord,
Each full heart expanded, grew warm, and adored.

Like a visit, the converse of friends, and a day,
That bow from my sight passed forever away:
Like that visit, that converse, that day, on my heart,
That bow from remembrance can never depart.

'Tis a picture in Memory distinctly defined
With the strong and unperishing colors of Mind;
A part of my being, beyond my control,
Beheld on that cloud, and transcribed on my soul.

Taking out the Kinks.—When an Indian is making arrows, if there happens to be a kink in the material, he soaks the arrow in water to moisten it, fastens one end to a tree and attaching a very heavy weight to the other end, he leaves his arrow hanging. After a while he finds that the weight has served to take the kink out of the arrow and so to straighten it. God's people are sometimes subjected to weights of care and trial. Let such take courage, knowing that the Lord will use them in his service when by these weights He has taken the kinks out, and straightened them in accordance with his Divine requirements.

A Visit Among the Mennonites.—No. 4.

The long series of wars into which Europe was plunged by the religious disputes that agitated it after the Reformation of Luther; and still more by the ambition and rivalry of the Spanish, French, German and Austrian princes, was a great hindrance to the prosperity of the people, whose property was destroyed and their lives endangered by disputes in which they had no interest. The peaceful Mennonites, in this respect, experienced the truth of the Scripture assertion, that one event happeneth to the righteous and the wicked. Many of them were settled in the valley of the Rhine, a section of country that was continually traversed by the contending armies. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that the thoughts of many of them were turned to the new and fertile lands beyond the Atlantic, which were at that time offering a refuge and a home to the persecuted and war-smitten inhabitants of Europe.

A large proportion of the Mennonites who emigrated to America, settled in Pennsylvania, and were the ancestors of those who now occupy the fertile plains of Lancaster and other adjoining countries.

E. K. Martin, in his pamphlet on the Mennonites, says the Lancaster County immigration had its impulse in the Swiss intolerance, the ravages of the Palatinate, and the continuing disturbances on the French and German border-lands. In spite of the harrings of the Swiss, the ravages of the cruel generals of Louis XIV, and the revocation of the French edict, these poor people, diminished in numbers, still had clung to their homes. "Meantime," says Bancroft, "the news spread that William Penn, the Quaker, had opened an asylum to the good and the oppressed of every nation, and humanity went through Europe gathering the children of misfortune."

About the beginning of the eighteenth century, the Holland Mennonites, who had become rich and powerful, formed the "Committee on Foreign Needs," the object of which was to assist their brethren in other communities. It was under the supervision of this committee that the greater part of the Lancaster County immigration was made. In 1709, several families from the Palatinate, descendants of the distressed Swiss Mennonites, came to that country and selected a tract of 10,000 acres of land to the north of Pequea Creek. An old account states that they came at the invitation of William Penn. Other groups of Colonists followed in 1711, 1717 and 1727.

The early emigrants received help not only from their Dutch brethren, but "the English Friends who are called Quakers, helped them liberally;" and London Yearly Meeting, in 1709 contributed fifty pounds "for the Mennonites of the Palatinate, who had fled from the persecution of the Calvinists in Switzerland."

Whatever may have passed between William Penn and these poor people at that time, it is certain that their descendants in Lancaster County still hold his name in honored remembrance. During our recent visit among them, we were frequently told that it was to him they were indebted for their settlement in the rich and beautiful country they now possess; and his name was mentioned with affectionate esteem—an illustration of the Scripture testimony, "The memory of the just is blest."

In connection with this subject, E. K. Martin quotes a memorial addressed to the government of Pennsylvania in 1718 by the Amish Mennonites, in which they say, "We were invited to settle in this land by William Penn." "We came to Pennsylvania to seek an asylum from the persecution to which we had been subjected in Europe. We knew the character of William Penn, and rejoiced God had made such a man."

The history of Lancaster County states, that in 1711, William Penn met the Indians at Conestoga, gave them some presents, and required their friendship to the Palatines who were settled near Pequea. These Mennonites were the first regularly organized religious denomination in the county. Their minister was Hans Herr; and we met with several of these ministers during our recent visit, of the same family name, some of whom may have been descended from this individual.

The emigration of 1717 was stimulated by a fresh outbreak of Swiss persecution. Many of the Mennonites were put in prison in Berne, and finally, through the intercession of the Dutch government, were sent to the Netherlands, and after the lapse of a few years joined their brethren in this country. The emigration from this source and from those who were living in the Palatinate, became so extensive, that it became very difficult for the "Committee on Foreign Needs" to answer the large and constantly recurring demands on their treasury. E. K. Martin remarks:—"The struggles of this good-natured committee, and their endeavors to tighten their purse-strings when their hearts were wide open, is one of the finest tributes in history to the genuine Dutch benevolence and Dutch liberality. One cannot help smiling as he reads over remonstrance after remonstrance, and declaration after declaration, that this was the last dollar they would pay, that their funds were exhausted and their patience too, and then finds a new shipload and a fresh cargo invoiced in their name from the land of trouble and tyranny to the land of peace and plenty."

It truly has been to them a "land of peace and plenty;" settled on a fertile soil that generously responded to their labors, freed from heavy exactions, industrious and economical in their habits, they have prospered abundantly; and while there may be few excessively wealthy among them, there are great numbers who may fairly be called rich, having all that is needful for the comfortable maintenance of their families, and ample means to spare for the help of those in want. We were at the homes of many of their preachers, and found them generally living on fine farms of their own, with large and substantial buildings, and everything around them betokening thrift and prosperity. The fact that these teachers receive no pay for their religious services, although they have duties devolving upon them besides preaching, which require considerable time and labor, was a confirmation to us that gospel ministers do not need salaries, that those who are not expected to study and prepare sermons beforehand, can attend to their outward business as successfully as others.

Herzog in his "German Encyclopedia" says: "The holy Christian life in opposition to worldliness was the point whence Menno proceeded, and to which he always returned." This principle of leading a plain, self-denying life, and refusing to conform to worldly practices, is one which has generally marked the rise of those people who have been raised up by the Spirit of God to bear a renewed testimony to vital religion. It was so with our early Friends, and it was so with the followers of John Wesley. But it must be conceded that the disciples of Menno Simon have more closely adhered to his teachings in this respect than most others. We visited a large number of their congregations, and our meetings were attended by thousands of persons, a large proportion of whom were members of their society; and it was a source of satisfaction to notice how large a part of those we met with were clothed in plain apparel, often strikingly resembling that worn by consistent Friends. The similarity was increased by their habit of not wearing a beard; so that many of the men had far more of the appearance of a Quaker minister than some who come among us under that profession. J. For "The Friend."

"The Editor of the Sunday-School Times, H. Clay Trumbull, has published in that paper an affectionate and touching tribute to the memory of one of his assistants, which is both interesting and instructive. From it the following is extracted:

"It was one morning in the autumn of 1879, that, as I sat in my editorial room, a young man was shown in as having called to know if he could find employment in the line of proof-reading, or in any other department of religious newspaper work. He had made application at the business office below, and the publisher had been sufficiently interested in him to bring him to my notice.

"His story was, that he had recently come to this country, with his parents, from Scotland, where he had been studying at the University of Glasgow. Not wishing to be idle, he was seeking such occupation as might be available to him; and noticing the sign of 'The Sunday-School Times,' as he walked down Chestnut Street, he had made application for employment there. There was nothing in his appearance that commanded special attention. His age was about twenty-two, but he looked younger than that. He was quiet and retiring in his manner, and he made no claim for himself beyond his readiness to undertake any service open to him in the office he had entered.

"In response to his application, I said that I was, just then, needing an office helper, to be at hand for any call in looking up references from my library; or to run out to one of the public libraries, or to a bookstore, in search of a needed volume; or to take a copy of an extract from some authority I was citing; and if he chose to try his fitness for that position, he could take a chair near my desk, and wait for calls from me accordingly. Without a word of suggestion that he had any qualifications for a higher place than this, he instantly accepted it as the one opening available to him in his new American home, and he seated himself to await my orders. And this was the beginning of my acquaintance with John T. Napier.

"I little thought how much of a man, how rare a scholar, how true a poet, how Christ-like a spirit, was in that unobtrusive youth in the chair before me; and he was the last man in the world to tell of his abilities or his worth. He sat in ready watchfulness for service. If I asked for a book from the library shelves, he had it ready for me almost before its title had passed my lips. If I sent him outside on an errand, he was back again with his mission accomplished sooner than I could have believed it possible for him to have reached the place to which I had directed him. He was a wonder and a delight to me in his fidelity and efficiency in the sphere I had assigned him; but I had no thought as yet that he was kept far below his proper position as a worker.

"One day he quietly handed me an article he had written on the promised joys of the heavenly city, 'No more sea . . . No night there.' It was a forcible exhibit of the contrast between the ancient view of the sea and the night, with their perils and their gloom, and the view of these which prevails in our own day, when 'the sea seems to be the great uniter of the nations, health-giver and health-preserver to all the earth; while night is the time for rest,—the time when the labourer, weary with the toils of the day, lays down his burden and forgets his labors in the sweet obliviousness of sleep.' The freshness of the thought, the gracefulness of the treatment, and the fulness of acquaintance with both biblical teaching and classic lore, which the article exhibited, were a surprise to me, and I began to have an apprehension of my new treasure in my new helper.

"Before a year had passed the position of office editor, or principal helper of the Editor-in-chief, was suddenly vacated, and J. T. Napier was requested to occupy it temporarily. At once he showed himself as competent to that position as to the first one accepted by him on entering the editorial-rooms. From that time onward he was a chief factor in the conduct and in the character of The Sunday School Times, and the impress of his rare attainments and of his rarer qualities of mind and heart was felt in its every department, until his failing health necessitated his return to his native land, in the vain hope of staying the progress of consuming disease.

"In breadth and thoroughness of scholarship, in clearness of thought, in quickness of perception, in delicacy of sentiment, and in versatility of intellectual power, J. T. Napier was the most remarkable man I have ever known. As a scholar in Hebrew, in Arabic, and in Egyptian, he certainly had few peers in America. In the Greek and Latin classics he was at home as few professional students of English literature are at home in their chosen field.

"With all his rare intellectual powers, J. T. Napier was modest and unselfish to the last degree. If he already had the knowledge which would be useful to me in the line of my special researches, it was at my disposal by day or by night, most generously. If he still lacked such knowledge, he would set himself to acquire it, that he might put it at my disposal. It was in this way that he came to perfect himself in both Arabic and Egyptian, in order to aid me in my special studies after my return from the East, in 1881. Without this aid I could not have accomplished even a tithe of the work I have been permitted to compass within the past eight years; and for his abounding and unselfish services, I am profoundly grateful.

Seeing that I had difficulty in securing assistance in a style of editorial writing which was peculiar to The Sunday School Times, and that I needed help just there, in order that I might pursue my outside Oriental studies, J. T. Napier determined to attain success in that style of writing; which was quite different from anything he had before attempted. He studied the spirit and method and form of those editorials, and began their writing. Quickly he was imitating them so closely that I was startled at finding my trust personality re-expressed by another. On one occasion I said to him, as I left my office in the evening, 'I feel poorly able to write an editorial to-morrow, but I must do it.' During the night I had in mind a theme for my writing, of which I had said nothing to him. Reaching my office in the morning, I found on my desk an editorial on that theme, which he had written during the night. Startled at this, I said, 'But I have been planning that editorial, while you have been writing it.' 'I think I felt your thoughts during the night,' was his quiet answer. And this is but a single illustration of the unique help I have been having from him for years.

"But meanwhile the fire of his genius was consuming his very life. As reticent concerning his sufferings as he was concerning his attainments or his deserts, he gave me no intimation of the progress of disease in his system, until he was already in extremest peril, and must leave the country as a last hope of regaining his health. It was a year ago that he left America for Scotland. From time to time he has still written for these pages; even as recently as within the past few weeks. But at last his physician told him that the end was at hand. With the utmost calmness he received this intelligence, and made ready for leaving his home loved ones, and entering his loved Saviour's presence. He was conscious till the last moment. 'About an hour before it, he called in a whisper, "Mother!" and half rising, pointed upwards, indicating that he was going now. He spoke [to those about him] from this time to the last almost incessantly, giving his final directions, speaking comforting words, and finally, with an expectant upward look, and wave of the hand, and a smile on his face, his sweet, patient spirit was freed from its earthly tabernacle, to take its place in the house of the Lord forever."

A Letter of Isaac Pennington.

Dear friend.—Some Scriptures did spring up and open in my heart towards thee this morning.

One was that of 2 Cor. x. 4, 5 and 6. That which was chiefly on my heart therefrom, was about the fulfilling of obedience. First, there is a knowing the will of God; a waiting to know and understand from God what is his holy, good, perfect and acceptable will. Then, as God gives the knowledge, He requires obedience; which is to be learned of God in the new spirit and life. For, in the old nature, mind and spirit, there is nothing but darkness and disobedience; in the new creation is the new obedience. So that there is first a beginning of knowledge in the Spirit, a beginning of faith in the renewing power, and a beginning of obedience (in the same) to Him that calls. Then, there is an increase of knowledge, of true, pure, living knowledge; an increase of faith, and a growing more and more obedient under the exercises, judgments and chastisements of the Father's Spirit; even till, at length, the soul comes to witness a full readiness, skill and strength (in and through Christ, in and through the measure of the gift of grace received from Him), to obey in all things. When the new birth is thus grown up into strength and dominion, into the stature of a man in Christ, then the senses which have long been exercised in discerning between good and evil, grow strong; and there is a quick discerning in the fear of the Lord, and an authority, in his name and power, over the enemy and his temptations; so that every stronghold is broken down, every imagination and false reasoning concerning the Truth is subjected and broken by the evidence and power of Truth, every thought brought under into captivity, even to the obedience of Christ; with a readiness to reject all unbelief and disobedience, that will so much as offer to rise up. Now, is not this the Christian state which God would have his children aim and arrive at?

And are not they blessed who witness it? And doth not the true ministration of the gospel light, spirit and power lead to it? And should any be at rest in their spirits, in an careful, formal, dry, dead profession without it? I. P.

God hath been frequently pleased to move in the hearts of the obedient to visit the rebellious, that the inward strivings of the Holy Spirit might be the more efficacious by its strivings through some outward instruments; but still it is the same Light, Grace or Spirit of God. Nor is the Light within any whit more insufficient to reclaim the rebellious if minded; for it is the same light with that which moves in the hearts of the obedient to bear record for God against their ungodly deeds. Only men's minds being far strayed from that holy light or word in the heart, and gone abroad into the wide world of lusts and vanities, it hath pleased God to visit mankind, so degenerated, by those who have been obedient children, to the end they might be the more easily gained to a subjection unto the holy light in themselves; so that all conviction and conversion are to be ascribed to the Light, Grace and Spirit of God, whether immediately in the creature, or mediately by any instrument.—William Penn.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Nutritive Value of Fungi.—A German chemist, who has been investigating the nutritive value of edible Fungi, finds that it varies considerably in different species; but, owing to the quantity of water they contain, is slight in all. He estimates that one egg would be equal in value to 10 ounces of common mushroom, which is one of the most nutritive; and that the equivalent of a pound of beef would be from 9 to 67 pounds of the species he examined. These conclusions were arrived at by submitting the specimens to artificial digestion, and ascertaining the quantity of nitrogenous material they contained.

Aluminium.—A process has been invented for procuring aluminium from the Greenland mineral Cryolite, which is a double fluoride of sodium and aluminium. It has the advantage of melting at a comparatively low temperature; and an electrical current is passed through it when in a fluid state, which separates the metallic aluminium from its previous combination.

Gymnema Sylvestre.—This is a plant found in India and Africa, which belongs to the Asclepias or Milk-weed family. Its leaves contain a vegetable acid which has a peculiar effect on the nerves of taste of the tongue. When they are chewed they destroy the sensation of sweetness usually caused by sugars, so that when taken into the mouth it seems like sand. When a piece of gingerbread was tried, the spiciness of the ginger was apparent, but in other respects it was tasteless. The leaves have a similar effect in reference to bitters. After chewing one or two of them, sulphate of quinine, which is intensely bitter, tasted like so much chalk. This effect passes away in a few hours, and the tongue recovers its sensibility.

Platinum Wire.—May be drawn so fine as to be invisible to the naked eye, although its presence upon a perfectly white card can be detected by the touch, and can be seen by the aid of a small magnifying-glass when the card is held in such a position that the wire casts a shadow.—Scientific American.

Infantile Diarrhoea.—The health officer of New Haven reports that of 32 deaths that occurred in the Eighth Month in New Haven, the homes of 28 of the victims were inspected, and that 27 of the 28 had been living over privy vaults and cess-pools, and 13 of them drinking the water of wells so situated as to be contaminated by leakage of impurities into them. He says the most obvious and positive inferences which these facts teach is, that fatal infantile diarrhoea is limited to those who are exposed to impure exhalations, and that the large portion of the population not so exposed are exempt from these intestinal disorders in a fatal form.

Cunning of the Pike.—A gilling-net had been placed across the outlet of a small tributary of Poactnessings Creek. In this little spring-brook several large pike had wandered in search of minnows. Being disturbed, they rushed with great impetuosity towards the net, and the foremost was at once securely entangled in its meshes. Straightway the others stopped as suddenly as they had started, and recognizing that their fellow was in trouble, "took in the situation" at once. Each pike evidently realized the true condition of affairs, and reasoned thus: that pike tried to go through this obstacle in the water, and is in trouble; it is necessary for me to avoid it by some other means. There were five of these fish that paused close to the net; and each acted, I believe, as it thought best. One of them came to the surface, and after a moment's pause, turned upon one side and leaped over the cork-line. Seeing the success of this effort on the part of one, a second did the same. A third came to the shore near where I stood, and discovering a narrow space between the brail and the net, passed very slowly through, as though feeling its way, although the water was so shallow that its body was fully one-third above the surface as it did so. The others were either more timid or less cunning. They turned to go up stream; but being met by my companion, who was making a great noise by whipping the water, they rushed again towards the net, but checked their course when their noses touched the fatal cords. Prompt action was necessary. They had not confidence in their leaping-powers, and both, as though struck with the same thought at the same moment, sank suddenly to the bottom of the stream, and burrowed into the sand and beneath the lead-line, which was in full view. In a moment they reappeared on the other side of the net, and were gone. I could have prevented the escape of all these fish, but was so much interested in the evidence of thought exhibited by them, that the idea of molesting them did not occur to me.—Upland and Meadow.

Chinese Water-clocks and Time-sticks.—The water-clock or clepsydra is a most ingenious contrivance which seems to have been in use among various ancient nations. The simple apparatus consists of four copper buckets, placed one above the other, on four steps of brick-work. The four buckets are connected by tiny troughs, by which the water drips drop by drop from the base of each bucket into the one below. Hence the Chinese name, "Copper-jar water-dropper."

The lowest vessel is covered. In it is a wooden float, through which is passed an upright copper tablet, marked with divisions of time. This is set at a given height twice daily, — at 5 A. M. and at 5 P. M.—and as the index rises through an opening in the cover, the watchman in charge of this strange clock announces the hours by placing on the clock-tower large white boards, on which the hour is marked in black characters. During the watches of the night he strikes the hour on two great drums. Twice a day the water is transferred from the lowest vessel to the upper one, and once in three months a fresh supply is allowed.

A man in charge of this place sells time-sticks, 32 inches in length, which are warranted to burn for twelve hours, and so exactly are the divisions calculated, that they are true time-keepers. Two sorts are sold, however, a special stick being calculated for windy weather, when the consumption is more rapid. They are advertised as being constructed according to the direction of official astrologers. This method of reckoning is so ancient, that its origin is lost in the mists of ages. But here we find both fire and water enlisted in the service of Old Time.—Gordon's Wanderings in China.

Items.

—Proposed Episcopal Cathedral in New York.—Some of the denominational papers do not respond favorably to the appeal of Bishop Potter for funds to build the proposed Cathedral. Since the sect to which the bishop belongs (Protestant Episcopal) look upon other bodies, such as Methodists, Presbyterians, &c., to be mere human organizations, contrary to the New Testament model, and there is no probability that their ministers would be permitted to preach within its walls, they think the funds for its erection should come from the members of his own society.

—Spiritualistic Investigation.—The Commission appointed by the University of Pennsylvania, in compliance with the conditions of a bequest made to it by the late Henry Seybert, to investigate the phenomena of spiritualism, have made a report of their labors, which however by no means cover the whole ground. The report says that no "medium" who has been tested could stand an "honest investigation;" and that a professional juggler performed in their presence more remarkable feats of "slate writing" than any of the "mediums;" and afterwards fully explained the trick by which it was done. They add, "We beg to express our regret that thus far we have not been cheered by the discovery of a single novel fact."

—The Crimean War.—John Bright made a speech in the interests of peace, at Westminster, England, in the Second Month last, in which he said of the Crimean war: "It did not last very long, but as to its severity and the mortality caused by it, no man has ever been able to make any accurate computation. There has been a book written lately by a French gentleman, who has visited the Crimea, on the melancholy subject of the condition of the Crimea, and he says that the bodies of at least 250,000 men were lying in the graves there. I believe that the Russians themselves buried more than 100,000 men on the north side of Sebastopol. These 250,000 do not include vast numbers of the Turks and of those who died at the hospitals in Scutari, and the thousands of Russians who died on the long marches from north to south. I believe Kinglake in his history thinks that, first and last, nearly, if not quite a million of human lives were lost. Well, a million of human lives would include every living man in this great city of London. Conceive as you pass from east to west and from north to south of London, and see the streets all full; why, you would think the whole nation before you. But that is the number I am told which it has been estimated that the Crimean war sacrificed. And for what? Nothing whatsoever, because there was nothing done by it except the slaughter. The slight limitation that was put on the Russian Government with regard to its future fleets in the Black Sea, a few years afterwards was abandoned and surrendered the moment that Germany and France got into war. The Emperor of Russia knew that England could not and would not care of itself to insist on the existence of that limitation. There was a meeting of those statesmen, as they are called—I mean the representatives of the different Powers—in this city; and the limitation was withdrawn, and now Russia is just as free in every respect as she was before the Crimean war took place."

—The Effects of Beer-drinking.—For some years a decided inclination has been apparent all over the country to give up the use of whiskey and other strong alcoholics, using as a substitute beer and other compounds. This is evidently founded on the idea that beer is not harmful, and contains a large amount of nutriment; also that bitters may have some medical quality which will neutralize the alcohol which it conceals, &c. These theories are without confirmation in the observation of physicians. The use of beer is found to produce a species of degeneration of all the organs; profound and deceptive fatty deposits, diminished circulation, conditions of congestion and perversion of functional activities; local inflammations of both the liver and kidneys are constantly present. Intellectually, a stupor, amounting almost to paralysis, arrests the reason, changing all the higher faculties into a mere animalism, sensual, selfish, sluggish, varied only with paroxysms of anger that are senseless and brutal. In appearance, the beer drinker may be the picture of health, but in reality he is most incapable of resisting disease. A slight injury, a severe cold, or a shock of the body or mind, will commonly provoke an acute disease ending fatally. Compared with inebriates, who use different kinds of alcohol, he is more incurable and more generally diseased. The constant use of beer every day gives the system no recuperation, but steadily lowers the vital forces.—Scientific American.

—New York Yearly Meeting.—In addition to the information respecting the meeting at Glen Falls, already published, its printed Minutes state, in reference to the proposed Conference to be held at Richmond, Indiana,—"It is understood that the conclusions of the Conference are to be only advisory in their character, and our Committee is instructed that no subject shall be introduced into the Conference by any individual member of our delegation without the previous approval of a majority of them."

It was advised "To use particular care to ascertain that applicants for membership are both convinced of the truth of the Gospel and of the distinguishing views of our Society."

"The subject of the support of the ministry was continued for further consideration."

The Preparative and Quarterly Meetings of Ministers and Elders were excused for the next year from answering three queries addressed to them, which are simply to be read and considered; and in like manner the queries on the state of Society for the next year, in the meetings for discipline, are to be read but not answered. In lieu thereof a concise report of the state of Society is to be forwarded.

Commencing with the year 1887, our Monthly Meetings shall appoint Committees, once every three years, to ascertain the doctrinal views of the ministers belonging to this Meeting, and that no one shall be acknowledged or continued as a Minister whose belief is not clearly in accordance with the affirmative of the Nine Questions contained on pages 48, 49, and 50 of our printed Discipline."

"Ministers coming among us with removal Certificates from other Yearly Meetings, shall be subject in all respects to the provisions above mentioned."

THE FRIEND.

SEVENTH MONTH 16, 1887.

A valued friend, who feels a concern that Friends should not lose sight of the ground of their testimony against conformity to the world in dress, language, amusements, &c., sends us the following extract from a pamphlet written by John Mulliner, about his becoming a "Friend," in which he gives his own experience respecting music. The pamphlet was printed in 1677.

"And I was a great lover of Musick, and many times as I have been thinking of God, and of the Condition that I was in, it would have brought trouble upon me; so that many times I have took my Cittern, or Treble Viol, or any instrument as I had most delight in, thinking to drive away these thoughts, and I have been so troubled, as I have been playing, that I have laid my instruments down, and have reasoned with myself after this manner, and fell a crying to God: It is true I love this musick, but what good can these sounds do me when my soul wants peace with God, and this doth but stir up laughter and lightness of spirit, to make me forget my Maker, and this will last but a little while, and I had better seek my peace with God, and then At his right hand there is pleasures for evermore; and these thoughts I had then; So that my musick began to be a burthen to me, and I would fain have sold them, my instruments, but that I had not freedom in my mind to do; for if I did, those who bought them would have made use of them as I did, and I thought I would not be the cause of it; so I took as many as I suppose cost Forty Shillings, and burned them, and had great peace in my mind in doing of it, which is more to me than all the pleasures in this world."

The manner in which John Mulliner disposed of his musical instruments, reminds us of the case of an Indian whom we met with at St. Regis, a few years ago. He was a large, finely developed man, and had been accustomed to go to the various frolics and scenes of dissipation in his neighborhood, with a fiddle which he used in making music for the company assembled. Coming under the power of Divine Grace, he felt that his manner of life was not pleasing to his Heavenly Father; and as he submitted to the work of the Spirit, he could no longer practise an amusement which tended to stir up "lightness of spirit." So taking down his fiddle from its place on the wall, he said to it: "You go where you belong!" and put it in the fire.

In some of the Colleges of this country there has grown up a custom among the students, of holding mock trials, and indulging in other foolish and unprofitable amusements, called "Cremation exercises," some of which are very undignified. We were pleased to learn that at the last Haverford Commencement, the students had sufficient good sense and self-respect to prevent them from following this foolish custom.

The American of this city, in speaking of the Pennsylvania University, remarks; "Nothing now is wanted but an infusion of dignity into the Class-day exercises. By a bad tradition these have been allowed to sink in some parts toward a kind of rude buffoonery, which very ill expresses the spirit and character of the class itself, and even of the young gentlemen who become its spokesmen. Perhaps the cure will not come until the University throws open its classes to young women. Horse-play has no place in a college where co-education has been established."

The presence of young women in the classes of our colleges and universities, would undoubtedly introduce a degree of refinement among the students which would prevent such unseemly exhibitions; but, independently of their influence, there ought to be a reformation in this particular.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Taxable property in New York City increased over $86,000,000 in assessed valuation last year, and now amounts to $1,500,000,000. The increase in value of real estate is $50,000,000, but this is not all what Henry George would call "unearned increment." The greater part of the added value comes from new buildings, which, under the new theory, would be wholly exempt from taxation. Nearly one-half of the increase in value is reported from the Twelfth Ward—the extreme northern section of Manhattan Island—which is most rapidly growing because it contains the largest amount of cheap land recently brought into market by an extension of railroad facilities.

Slight earthquake tremors were felt in different parts of lower South Carolina on the afternoon of 10th instant.

Fifty acres of land in East Atchison, Missouri, have been washed away by a flood in the river within the last forty-eight hours. "The school-house, which a month ago stood a quarter of a mile from the river bank, was moved east, and the ground on which it stood is now in the river. The bank at that point is perpendicular and thirty feet high. All the residents of that portion of the town have been forced to hastily remove their houses or abandon them to the mercy of the river." The current has washed out a bed of quicksand, which underlies a stratum of clay, and the undermined sections of clay have tumbled into the river.

At the Smithsonian Institution, in Washington, yesterday, a valuable collection, numbering more than ten thousand objects, illustrating the habits and accomplishments of prehistoric man in Western Europe, was opened to the public exhibition. These were gathered during a five years' residence abroad by Thomas Wilson, ex-United States Consul at Nice, and his wife.

On the 6th instant, lightning struck the wire connected with the dynamite cartridges placed in the holes drilled for blasting at Shaft 6 on the new aqueduct, New York, causing their premature explosion in both the north and south headings of the tunnel, and killing a laborer named Strancker. The men in the tunnel had just been called away when the explosion took place, otherwise the loss of life would have been large. The wire was disconnected with the battery at the top of the shaft when the lightning struck it.

The crops in Southern Minnesota are reported to be in bad condition, owing to drought and chinch bugs. In the central and northern sections of the State and in Dakota the crops are doing well. The country around Perham, Minnesota, is suffering from a plague of locusts. Everything is covered with them, and they have utterly devoured thousands of acres of vegetation.

Papers were filed with the Recorder of the Board of Pardons at Harrisburg, on the 9th, by Representative Robinson, of Delaware County, asking for the commutation of the death sentence of Samuel Johnson, the murderer of John Sharpless, to imprisonment for life. The papers include a petition signed by over 5000 persons and a number of letters.

Efforts to end the strike of the men in the coke district of western Pennsylvania has not yet been successful. It is reported that the majority of the strikers are as determined as ever. The strike has lasted ten weeks, and it is estimated that the men have lost $1,500,000 in wages during that time.

On the evening of the 7th instant, a terrible mine disaster occurred in the Sturgen River Mine at Metropolitan. A number of miners had just got a blast ready when water rushed into the mines so fast that many could not escape. Eight Italians are known to be in the mine and are surely dead. It will be impossible to recover the bodies before morning, although work will be kept up all night. The names of the victims cannot be learned.

A flow of natural gas was struck on the Kanawha River, eight miles above Charleston, West Virginia, on the 7th inst. The gas was struck at a depth of 1800 feet.

The exports of petroleum from this port last week footed up 2,043,070 gallons.

The number of deaths in this city for the week ending at noon on the 9th, was 555, an increase of 170 from the previous week, and an increase of 57 from the same period last year. Of the whole number, 202 were adults and 353 children, 248 being under one year of age; 50 died of consumption; 117 of cholera infantum; 32 of convulsions; 33 of marasmus; 17 of inflammation of the lungs.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½'s, 108½; 4's, 128½; currency 6's, 123 a 134.

Cotton was quiet, but steady, at 11½ cts. for middling uplands.

Feed was in moderate supply, and quiet at former rates. Choice winter bran, $16 per ton; spring, $14.50 a $16.

Grain.—Wheat, 84½ a 87½ cts.; Corn, 48½ a 49½ cts.; Oats, 35 a 38 cts.

Hay and Straw. Average price—prime timothy, 85 a 95 cts. per 100 lbs.; mixed, 75 a 85 cts. per 100 lbs.; straw, 80 a 90 cts. per 100 lbs.

FOREIGN.—The Russian newspapers unanimously disapprove of the election of Prince Ferdinand, of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, to the Bulgarian throne. They all pronounce the choice of him by the Sobranje the result of Austro-German intrigue, and urge the Porte to intervene and the Powers to withdraw their representatives from Sofia.

The Novoe Vremya says, that Russia in no case will allow Prince Ferdinand to go to Sofia, and adds that it will arrive there with an Austrian escort Russia will tell Austria to keep her hands off.

The latest news from Stanley, the African explorer, is that on the journey from Leopoldville to Lonkolela, he encountered and had to overcome serious obstacles. One of the gravest difficulties he found was to replenish his commissary. The threatened scarcity of provisions greatly excited a number of his men, and it became necessary to punish the malcontents with much severity to reduce them to subjection and save the expedition. Stanley himself is ill from the excessive heat. The expedition left Bolobo on the 11th of Fifth month, and was expected to reach the Congo at its confluence with the Aronhomby by the 6th of Sixth Mo. Stanley's programme was to encamp at this point, there to await the arrival of Tippo Tip, who is approaching from Stanley Falls with provisions and a force of several hundred more men.

The Wenchow river, in China, has overflowed its banks, submerging much territory. Thousands of persons are believed to have been drowned. The sufferings of the survivors are described as terrible. Chuchow City is submerged, and the inhabitants have taken to boats.

The town of Nagy Karolyi, in Hungary, was destroyed by a hurricane and waterspout on the 6th inst. The site of the town and the adjoining district are converted into a vast lake. Many persons lost their lives.

There have been 40 cases of cholera and 15 deaths from the disease among the troops at Catania. Three Catanians have died of cholera at Palermo. The alarm is spreading.

Information of a terrible disaster at Zug, the capital of a canton of that name, which occurred on the 5th inst. The substance of the news is as follows: "Half the new quays at Zug fell into the lake. Forty houses, a crowded inn, and the Hotel Zurich, a four-story structure, full of visitors, vanished entirely. The occupants of the buildings were engulfed while they slept, and at least one hundred perished. Men are now at work trying to recover the bodies of the victims.

J. G. WILLIAMS, Supt.

MARRIED, at Friends' Meeting-house, Concordville, Delaware Co., Pa., Fifth Month 4th, 1887, WILLIAM TRIMBLE to JANE MENDENHALL.

DIED, at his residence, near East Carmel, Columbiana County, Ohio, on the 12th of Fourth Mo. 1887, MORTON NEILL, in the 76th year of his age, a member of Middleton Monthly and Carmel Particular Meeting of Friends. He bore a protracted illness of over three years, with a good degree of patience and resignation, appearing much of the time very tender; but from the deprivation of his speech during the whole of his affliction, occasioned by a paralytic stroke, he was unable to converse. Many and wearisome were the days and nights allotted him, but for the space of two hours before death closed the scene, his sufferings to all appearance seemed to cease; and his departure was remarkably easy and quiet, leaving his family and friends a consoling hope, that through redeeming love and mercy, his end was peace.

Selections from the Diary of Abigail W. Hall.

Fifth Mo. 25th, 1869. A very uncomfortable feeling in my head last night and to-day. May I be more and more concerned to set my house in order: that should the language be unexpectedly sounded, thou shalt die and not live, I may not be as one alarmed out of sleep. I am daily convinced, "that in me, that is in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing;" hence the necessity of applying unto the Physician of value. He who can heal us of our maladies, and love us freely. "Oh thou that hearest prayer! unto thee shall all flesh come."

Third Mo. 2nd, 1870. On the 26th ult. I entered my fifty-ninth year. Greatly have I been humbled in looking back over the leaves of my past life, there being so little to show. I have not attained to the stature in Christ I ought. It is of the Lord's mercies alone that I am not consumed, "because his compassions fail not." I have nothing of my own to clothe myself with; all my own righteousness is but as filthy rags. Hence there should be a putting the mouth in the dust if so be there may be hope. Which is a condition I have known of latter times, accompanied with the petition, "Oh spare me that I may recover strength before I go hence to be seen of men no more." Let me stand continually upon the watch-tower in the day time, and be set in my ward whole nights.

Second Mo. 1st, 1873. A few more entries in my neglected diary. "Surely goodness and mercy have followed me all the days of my life!" and what have I to show in return? nothing but blushing and confusion of face. I do desire to walk more carefully than I have hitherto done; but good desires and resolutions will avail nothing, unless I experience the efficacy of that power, which enabled the lame man formerly at the gate of the temple asking alms, to walk, leap and to praise God. There are so many ways of sinning and falling short of the glory of God, that I often go mourning all the day long. Oh, how low the creature is at times laid!

On the 26th of Second Mo. 1873, I entered my sixty-second year. I feel that I have little to say or show, for the years that have in mercy, one after another, been lengthened out. How many since the entry of my birth-day, three years ago, have been numbered with the silent dead! fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters, in our Israel, gathered from our midst. The past winter has been a remarkable time for the calling of the aged, may we not hope, to an heavenly home. If any of us, older or younger, come short of this rest prepared for the children of God, the fault will be our own. May I double diligence "to make my calling and election sure, before I go hence to be seen of men no more." I feel that I am a poor halting creature. An abiding sense of this, has often deterred me from making memorandums in this book which I might otherwise have done. It is resumed now, in no wise to exalt the creature, but to humble; and to inspire me from day to day, to endeavor "to walk as becometh a follower of Christ."

I notice in looking back over deaths noted in this book, that many with whom we "took sweet counsel and walked to the house of God together," have been removed from the church militant to the church triumphant whose deaths I have not recorded; among whom are David and Samuel Cope, who stood nobly in their day for the precious cause and testimony; many of us who are yet left on this earth, can rise up and call them blessed. Yea, "blessed are the dead who have died in the Lord, they do rest from their labors and their works do follow them."

First Mo. 3rd, 1874. Comforted last night in having brought to my remembrance what was said concerning the heavenly Jerusalem: "The gates of it shall not be shut at all by day; for there shall be no night there." It has now been a long night season with me. If only permitted, all of mercy, just to get within the gates spoken of, it is all I ask.

Second Mo. 27th. Sixty-two years old yesterday. It seems as though it could not be possible that I have numbered so many here upon earth. Our dear mother only reached her 64th year; and father not much more than half that number: and how many dear ones younger than I, have been called hence. I have been brought to query with myself, why am I still spared? surely but as a monument of his love and mercy, that I may bring forth fruit to the praise and honor of the great and good Husbandman; notwithstanding I have so little to show for the years that have been multiplied, and for all that has been done for me! But wilt thou continue to spare me, O Heavenly Father! till I am made fit for thy kingdom, where nothing impure or unholy can ever enter? Suffer me not to take up a rest short of the true rest. Blessed as I am with a good kind husband, precious relatives, and so many outward comforts and blessings, well may I be fearful of settling down at ease! But, O Father! "Thou knowest all things, thou knowest that I love thee." And that I am willing to follow thee whithersoever thou leadest, that so the "full corn in the ear" may be brought forth.

Third Mo. 6th. Whilst musing on my condition, the plaintive language ran through me, "How many hired servants of my father, have bread enough and to spare, and I perish with hunger!" the reply came sweetly to me: "It is not the will of your Father which is in heaven, that one of these little ones should perish." While it seemed too good for me, I nevertheless greatly desire to be one of the "little ones" to whom this was addressed.

Fifth Mo. 6th. Our little meeting which convened to-day, was much before me during the morning, and in the night; with desires it might be a season of renewing of strength; which can only be witnessed by silent waiting upon the Lord. "I cried unto the Lord and He heard me;" and lifted me up a little out of my troubles. I attended on Second-day last, Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting. He who is rich in mercy to all those that call upon Him in truth, drew very nigh, and so spake peace to my troubled mind, that I dared not withhold to speak well of his ever-excellent name.

Seventh Mo. 2nd. Upon looking over my diary, I cannot understand how it is that no allusion has been made to my tenderly beloved and only brother, Jesse Williams, who has been confined to a bed of sickness for the last fifteen months, and much longer to the house. But all is over now; and the immortal part has been carried, I most surely believe, "by the angels into Abraham's bosom." Through all, good things were uppermost with him—heaven and heavenly treasure—which the world cannot give, neither can it take away.

9th. They that wait upon the Lord, shall renew their strength:" was the watchword sounded in my ears, as I sat in our week-day meeting, clothed with great weakness. Oh! that I may know an increase of that strength which will enable me to come up with acceptance before the Lord; feeling, at the same time, that I have nothing to glory in save my infirmities.

20th. Feeble desires have been raised this morning to the God and Father of my life, that I may be kept in the way I should go. Another week has opened before us, fraught with worldly cares! How a sense of this pressed upon my spirit yesterday! How did the world and all things pertaining thereto, sink into nothing in comparison of the "one thing useful!" A little glimpse was also given, of that "kingdom, which standeth not in meats and drinks, but in righteousness, and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost." In that Heavenly City and New Jerusalem, whose streets are of pure gold, and its gates of pearl, no sickness or death can come; nor need of the light of the sun or moon to shine therein. Oh, how my soul panted after an admission, there, when done with this transitory scene.

First Mo. 17th, 1875. Have been confined to the house, and part of the time to my bed, with a heavy cold; which has affected my breathing more than any cold I have ever had. How it may terminate, is alone known to Him, who knoweth all things, and who doeth all things well. May the afflictive dispensation be improved by me as it ought, through holy help; for of myself I can do nothing. Be pleased, dearest Father, to enable me to come very near unto Thee, and there plead my helplessness, and the need of a Saviour. Thou hast promised that "for the crying of the poor, and the sighing of the needy, thou wilt arise." Oh, be pleased to arise for my help.

Third Mo. 25th. How did I long, as we sat silently together in our meeting, for a little crumb of soul-sustaining bread! The language of David was brought feelingly to remembrance: "A day in Thy courts is better than a thousand," &c., which I could fully adopt. My expectation is from the Lord, and Him alone.

(To be concluded.)

For "The Friend."

A Visit Among the Mennonites.—No. 5.

We found that there are several branches of the Mennonite family, differing from each other mainly in the degree of strictness with which they observe the principle of non-conformity to the world, to which I suppose they all adhere. We made frequent inquiries in regard to the points of difference between the various Mennonite non-resistant bodies, but were unable to find that there were any differences in doctrine. All, so far as we can learn, would adopt the Confession of Faith issued by the convention of their ministers at Dortrecht, in 1632, as representing their present belief. By far the larger number of these people now reside in the United States and Canada, in which countries there are estimated to be about 100,000; and of these, those with whom we mingled,—the old Mennonites—are much the most numerous; and it is to these that our observations peculiarly apply.

Next in point of numbers are the Amish Mennonites (pronounced Omish), who are so named from Jacob Amen, of Switzerland, a zealous reformer, in their earlier days.

They form "the strictest sect of their religion;" use hooks and eyes on their clothing in the place of buttons, which they probably regard as a departure from the simplicity of the olden times; and meet for worship in their private houses. They are much esteemed in the neighborhoods where they reside, for their industry and uprightness. The feeling of the Old Mennonites towards them seemed to be very friendly, and we heard nothing to their disadvantage. We had not the opportunity of personal intercourse, yet we were quite prepared to believe that these people have some experience of vital religion, or they would not be kept in so innocent and blameless a manner of life as they appear to live.

On the other hand, we found, especially in the districts north of Philadelphia, an offshoot of the Anabaptist family, who were spoken of as the "New School Mennonites," and who were represented to us as a people who desired greater liberty in dress, and were disposed in a general way to coincide more fully with the customs of the world around them than was agreeable to the feelings of the body. They originated some forty years ago; the leader in the schism had been chosen by lot as a minister, but refused to conform to the form of dress prevailing among them, and persisted in wearing garments which caused uneasiness to the brethren. He became the mouthpiece of the "liberal" section of the members; and from this apparently trifling difference arose a separate branch. They are not nearly so numerous as those from whom they separated; but have several congregations. They publish The Mennonite, a small monthly. In looking over its pages, I find no attacks upon the others, or any references to questions of organization or of difference.

About forty years ago another division took place, which had its origin in Lancaster County, from the labors of a minister named John Herr-

His followers call themselves the Reformed Mennonites, but were often spoken of to us as Herrites, from the name of the chief instrument in their organization. They are said to be very strict in the observance of the peculiarities of the sect; and to have no spiritual intercourse with others, neither attending their meetings, nor allowing their ministers to come among them; so that we had little or no opportunity of becoming acquainted with them. They accept literally the advice of Paul to the Corinthians (1 Cor. v. 11), to have no company with those that obey not the gospel; and therefore they practise the ban, or the exclusion from social intercourse of those who have violated their discipline and have not been reconciled to the Church. We were told that if a husband or a wife had been expelled from the Church, the other is not allowed to eat with the one who had been disowned. I believe the severity of the ban has so far been relaxed by some, that they will permit such offenders to sit at the family table, but they are not allowed to dip into the dishes placed thereon, but must wait to be served by others. It was evident that the Old Mennonites, from whom these had separated, regarded the Reformed or Herrite branch, as having been too much inclined to feed on the weaknesses and defects of their brethren. Whether this was the case, we had not the means of ascertaining. It would, however, be a natural tendency of the controversy attending their forming a separate organization; and if such had been the result, it is much to be hoped, that this eating of sour grapes has ceased, or soon will cease.

The custom of the Mennonites in selecting and appointing ministers or preachers, is different from that of most denominations. When they believe an additional minister is needed in any congregation, any of its members are at liberty to suggest the name of a fellow-member whom he may believe suitable, or to whom his mind has been drawn. On the day of selection, all who have been so named are seated in the fore part of the meeting, and as many books as there are persons are placed before them. In each of these books a slip of paper is put, on one of which, but which one no one of them knows, is written the text, "The lot is cast into the lap, but the disposing thereof is of the Lord." After prayer that the Lord will rightly guide the lot, &c., that it may come to the one He has designed should be the minister, each takes a book in his hand. These are then opened by the bishop, and the man in whose book the written slip is found, is regarded as the divinely selected preacher.

In a similar manner, when there is need of a bishop, he is selected by lot from among the preachers. He is the executive officer of the congregation, who performs the rite of baptism on such as desire to be received into membership, and performs other duties.

We were interested in learning that their ministers do not receive salaries for their services; and still more, that they are not expected to prepare their sermons beforehand, but to come to their meetings trusting in the Divine power to influence them and give them matter to deliver which may be adapted to the spiritual wants of the people. We had interesting conversations with several of them, as to their experience on this point—a point in which they approach so nearly to the views of the Society of Friends as to the nature and exercise of Gospel ministry. One of them said, he had often stood up to preach without any knowledge of what he should say—trusting in the Lord for such help as He might be pleased to vouchsafe. On one occasion, when young in the ministry, he was called upon to officiate at the funeral of a child. He felt very anxious about the responsibility thrown upon him, and thought it might be allowable to select a text, if he did not plan out a line of thought to be used in his discourse. So he selected the sentence, "The child is not dead, but sleepeth." He looked for it in his Bible, but in vain. So he began to fear that it was not the Lord's will he should use it, and felt sorry that it had come into his mind. He went to the funeral empty of all thought; opened the Bible in the Psalms; repeated the first sentence his eye rested upon; and as he proceeded in his discourse, trusting in the Lord for help, was favored with more than usual freedom of expression.

We felt that our own beloved Society had gone one step in advance of these worthy people, in relieving its ministers of any necessity of addressing an audience, except when favored with the Divine authority and command; and in teaching its members to look immediately to the Spirit of the Saviour as the one ever-present Teacher. Yet we felt much unity with many of those with whom we met, and received, as we believed, fresh illustrations of our Saviour's words: "Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold."

After one of our meetings, we dined in company with one of their older ministers, with whom we had much interesting religious conversation. Among other topics discoursed upon, was the danger of man's taking to himself the praise of that which the Lord might have enabled him to do in his cause. Our visitor remarked that he had at times thought, that if the Lord blessed the messages which He gave to him to deliver, and he should take the honor to himself, and become elated, he would soon take his presence from him. He compared it to the case of a man who should furnish an employe with capital and send him to perform his business. If the man should manage it to his own benefit and glory, instead of his master's, he would soon lose his situation and employment.

This friend seemed to be a truly spiritually-minded man. In speaking of the long continued visitations of the Lord to man, he exclaimed (in substance), "What a dear friend Jesus is! He comes again and again, and knocks and knocks at our hearts, and follows us even to the brink of the grave!"

He said he would be afraid to write out a sermon beforehand, but when he had a prospect of going to a meeting, he was not afraid to prostrate himself before the Lord, and ask for Divine help. As he parted with us in the afternoon, he said to my companion, "I will tell you that I was on my knees this morning, asking that we might have a good meeting."

At one of the meetings which we attended in Montgomery County, or near the boundary line of Bucks, we met with a large congregation, who were more than usually ignorant of the English language. The conversation in their families, and the services in their meetings were in German, or rather that mongrel dialect, the Pennsylvania Dutch. Towards the close of the meeting, one of their ministers arose and addressed the people in their native language. His manner was dignified, yet earnest and impressive; and although we knew not what he said, yet we listened with comfort and satisfaction to his utterances, with a feeling that he spoke under a measure of the Divine anointing. We learned afterwards that he had delivered afresh to the people the substance of the vocal exercises that had preceded.

Worldly and Heavenly Wisdom.

We are enabled to attend to earthly things by the wisdom of this world; but the world by its wisdom knows not God. We can only comprehend heavenly things by the wisdom which is from above; and the heavenly spirit or wisdom searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God. Although earthly things may be understood by the intellectual and earthly wisdom of man, which is useful and good in its place, yet "the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned."

Where is the wise man of this world? Where is the learned scribe? Where is the disputer of this world, in a religious point of view? Are their names written in the Lamb's book of life, or are they not more likely written in the earth? Is not what we look upon as the foolishness of God, wiser than man? And the weakness of God stronger than man? Hath not God chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise? that no flesh should glory in his presence. But where is the glorying of the fleshly man? Where is his faith? Does it not stand more in the wisdom and eloquence of man, than in the power of God? Hence the words which man's wisdom teacheth, are placed by many ahead of the words which the Holy Ghost teacheth. But the Spirit searcheth all things; yea, the deep things of God. And while the deep things of God are hid from the wise and prudent of this world, they are revealed to the little new-born babes in Christ Jesus. And to such they become the power of God and the wisdom of God. While to the outward Jew, they are a stumbling-block, and to the wise Greeks, foolishness.

Such as have a saving faith in Christ must believe in Him in all his fulness, as to what He has done outwardly; and they must receive Him as Christ within, their hope of glory, to sanctify and cleanse the heart: for He becomes unto them the power of God, and the wisdom of God; and also tongue and utterance, with a wisdom that all their adversaries cannot gainsay nor resist.

And are there not favorable and encouraging signs in places, that God by his superior wisdom and power, often confounds this earthly wisdom, until some are getting weary of it, and searching more for that heavenly wisdom which is hid with Christ in God? Are not some beginning to "ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein?"

But there are others, more presumptuous, that seem to think they can, by their limited capacities, find out the deep things of God; although we have so much evidence that they are past finding out by poor finite man.

Paul speaks of a saving gospel, which he says has been preached to every creature, or human being, under heaven, whereof he was made a minister; warning every man, and teaching every man in all wisdom from above: that he might present every man perfect in Christ Jesus. But what man of himself, unaided by the wisdom from above, is sufficient for these things? For what man knoweth the things of God, but by the Spirit of God that is in him? And if he knows them not by an experimental knowledge in the heart, how can he availingly teach them to others? All the activity of man, with his cultivated intellect, can never make a stream rise higher than its fountain. But man, through the wisdom which is given him, is capable of doing great and marvellous things; yet they are things belonging to the earth, and are from an earthly fountain; while heavenly things are revealed from a heavenly fountain, by the God of heaven, as He sees the man of God needs them, in order to assist in raising his soul from earth to heaven. The wisdom of God is as much higher than the wisdom of man, as heaven is higher than earth. Then let us not seek to exalt earthly wisdom, as if it were capable of comprehending heavenly things.

All our religious acts and duties must be performed in the strength and light and power of Him who is the wisdom of God, and the power of God. Then would our acts as a church, confound the wisdom of the wise, and bring to nought the understanding of the prudent; because greater is He that is in the disciples in his Church than he that is in the world.

But does the greater power rule in the popular ministry of the present day, and in the formal professing Christian churches? Does the wisdom and power of God predominate? Or is it not too common for the wisdom and power of a cultivated intellect to bear rule? Is not the innocent but oppressed life and wisdom which springs from the Babe Immortal, too much trampled under foot; and looked upon as an insignificant thing, in comparison to the wisdom and learning of man? Are the words in the ministry, and in our meetings for discipline, clothed with the wisdom and power of God? Or have they not become as sounding brass, that amuse the ear without benefit to the heart? Where the spiritual life of Christianity is lacking, can the wisdom of man, with all his cultivated intellect, or scholastic aids, form a living substitute, that will raise the hearers higher than earth?

God is not mocked. When we meet for worship, we profess to meet with Him who sees not as man sees, but looks upon the heart. Do we leave the cares of life behind us, that we may worship Him in Spirit and in truth, and in the beauty of holiness? The life of our meetings depends on the spiritual condition of the congregation that composes them. If our faith stands more in the wisdom and eloquence of men, than in the power of God, then is the wisdom of man glorified. He that speaketh of himself, and from his own wisdom and strength, seeketh his own glory; "but he that seeketh the glory of Him that sent him, the same is true, and no unrighteousness is in him."

How prone we are to love the praise of men more than the glory of God. Christ said, "I am come in my Father's name, and ye receive me not; if another shall come in his own name him ye will receive." Is it not even so now? Because our spiritual eyes have become so darkened that we are no better than blind leaders of the blind. And such cannot lead others to the light of life. They cannot lead from the wisdom of men to the wisdom of God. They cannot lead others higher than they themselves have gone, because like begets its like; and a stream cannot rise higher than its fountain. So, if the speakers in religion would not go before their Guide, we should have more vitality amongst us; more of the wisdom of God, and less of the wisdom of men; our religion would be more in the heart, and less in the head—more in life and power, and less in words.

Old-Fashioned Quakerism.

In the preceding number of this article, we have endeavored to show some of the leading characteristics of the Primitive Christian Church, as pointed out in the essay under review.

Among the causes of decline which very early began to operate, was the tendency to lapse into Ritualism. "It seems historically certain," says Dr. Arnold, "that the Judaism that sought to enforce the Mosaic Law on the primitive believers,—after having thus vainly endeavored to sap the very life and freedom of the Gospel, did even within the first century, transform itself into some sort of Christian guise, and, substituting Water Baptism for Circumcision, and the mystic influence of the Bread and Wine for the Jewish doctrine of purifying and defiling meats, did thereby pervert Christianity to a fatal extent."

"Traces of this tendency to that which is outward and ceremonial, are apparent in the Primitive document, called, 'The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles.' They are probably to be seen from time to time, in all religious communities. The 'weak and beggarly elements,' as the Apostle boldly stigmatized them, please a merely sensuous and sentimental taste;—and seem to construct an easy path to religiousness. And so, as these cravings are gratified, Conscience is by degrees lulled, and apparently satisfied, with the form without the power, or the reality.

It is even possible that some tendency in this direction, has at times shown itself,—and that in various ways,—in such an anti-ritualistic body as the Society of Friends. We might query, in passing, whether the preference shown by some among us, in recent days, for Reading, Singing, and other pre-arranged service, in meetings for worship, does not contain more than a trace of this subtle danger, that has done so much mischief to the professing Church in the past? This is a thought that may well claim our earnest attention.

"After the death of the Apostles, one of the earliest tendencies to Decline, was in some respects more serious than even this craving for externals; though possibly it was less startling. A disposition grew up here and there, to entrust the work of the Ministry in its varied aspects, to one person or 'parson,' who was set apart for the work; and for the members of the congregation thus to relieve themselves in some measure, of their spiritual responsibilities."

"Congregations by degrees, abandoned both their rights and responsibilities, and placed themselves under the authority of one man, who was hired to preach to them, to pray for them, to shepherd and govern them, and if possible, to be religious on their behalf! At length this substitutional system became almost universal. In course of time the priestly or clerical class thus generated, were to be found almost everywhere; and they often proved worldly, ignorant, self-seeking, superstitious;—the lineal descendants of the heathen priesthood whose temples they came to occupy.

"As was sure to be the case, they sought to enslave men's thoughts and consciences,—made elaborate creeds, which they used their authority to enforce;—and assumed to be lords over the heritage of God. They, in effect, denied the living Presence of Christ, imprisoned the Bible, and exchanged the spirit and power of religion, for pomp, and shows, and sacramental mummeries, that had all the characteristics of empty idolatrous charms.

"After the introduction of what Dean Stanley calls 'baptized heathenism' into the professing Church, when the Emperor Constantine declared his allegiance to it—the course was steadily downward. There were centuries of settled gloom. Religion became more and more a thing of externals:—something to be performed:—confessions,—asceticisms,—pilgrimages,—influxions,—gifts to the Church,—anything, in fact, of living the Christian life! The protests and labors of the great German Reformer, show us to what a fearful head, these priestly traditions had at length grown; and what a tremendous uprising was needful, in order to break them down.

"But during this long period of darkness, there were some bright and shining lights:—some brave and faithful witnesses, who proclaimed, and lived out,—nay, had, in multitudes of instances, to die for truths, near akin to what we call Quaker principles. These men kept the torch of truth burning, and handed it on from age to age, throughout that dreary night; until, at length, it set fire to some of the more outrageous growths of superstition and priestcraft, and there was a great conflagration, and a great clearing away of rubbish. This was the period generally known in History as that of 'The Reformation.'

"Many of these noble souls were called Heretics. The pen of History was in the hand of their enemies; and in the records of the time, they are generally denounced, and often misrepresented. But we shall not be far wrong, if we call some of these standard-bearers, Quaker Reformers;—on the principle of our text, that true Quakerism is Primitive Christianity. They testified, according to their light, to the Primitive Truth. They believed in a Living and a Present Christ. They sought to uphold the freedom and spirituality of the Gospel, against innovations, which were turning the servants of the Church into a pretentious priesthood, and the service of the Church into a tawdry pageant."

In England, "during the stirring times of the Reformation era, religion was treated very much as a sort of State engine; and the English movement was, at first, largely political, and did not carry the people with it. It was pre-eminently a compromise with Rome; not a return to Primitive truth. The English Prayer Book bears upon its face, abundant marks of this compromising spirit.

"During the twelve or thirteen years which followed the death of Henry VIII.,—says Macaulay,—'the religion of the State was thrice changed. The faith of the nation seemed to depend on the personal inclinations of the Sovereign.' It is a remarkable fact, and one that displays the degradation induced by the long bondage to Rome, that out of 10,000 benefices, there were only 243 incumbents who, having acknowledged the Romish supremacy under Mary, declined to accept Protestantism and the supremacy of Elizabeth in its stead."

George Fox has been called "the last of the Reformers." He was born in 1624. In his early boyhood, there was for years no Parliament; there was no free speech. Heretics were remorselessly hunted in almost every parish in the kingdom. It became the great object of his life to obtain the true knowledge of God and of Christ—and after a long season of doubt and anxious search, he says, "When all my hopes in men were gone, so that I had nothing outwardly to help me, nor could I tell what to do, then, O! then, I heard a voice which said, 'there is one, even Christ Jesus, that can speak to thy condition;' and when I heard it, my heart did leap for joy. Then the Lord let me see, why there was none else that could speak to my condition, viz., that I might give Him all the glory; that Christ might have the pre-eminence, Who enlightens, and gives Grace and Faith and Power."

He soon felt called upon to proclaim to others what had been made known to himself. "I was commanded," he says, 'to turn people to that inward Light, Spirit and Grace, by which all might know their salvation, and their way to God; even that Divine Spirit which would lead them into all truth.'

"He found the religious world divided between High Church professors, who based their faith largely on Church traditions,—and the Puritan and 'Evangelical' parties, who believed in the exclusive authority of Scripture. They were in fact, almost entirely ignoring a truth, which Fox felt to be the main Factor, in the relations of man to God. Fox had discovered,—had had revealed to him,—that it is the indwelling Spirit, the living Christ, and not the Church, nor the Bible only (or even primarily,) which is the real restorer and guide of life. He had reached out to a living Person who is Divine, and he could rest no longer on a Book, or a Creed.

"Stephen Crisp refers to the same discovery, when he says,— 'There are two kinds of Faith. The one says, 'I believe, because good men have told me, and because I find it in my Catechism and Prayer Book.' The other says, 'I believe because God hath visited me by His Love, and given me a personal assurance, that He is my Deliverer.'

"Charles Kingsley proclaims the antiquity of this great Quaker principle, in the following words. He says: 'The doctrine of Christ in every man, as the indwelling word of God,—the Light who lights every one who comes into the world,—is no peculiar tenet of the Quakers;—but one which runs through the whole of the Old and New Testament, and without which they would both be unintelligible; just as the same doctrine runs through the whole history of the early Church, for the first two centuries, and is the only explanation of them.'"

AT LAST.

Selected.

When on my day of life the night is falling,
And, in the winds from unshaded spaces blown,
I hear far voices out of darkness calling
My feet to paths unknown,

Thou who hast made my home of life so pleasant,
Leave not its tenant when its walls decay;
O Love divine, O Helper ever present,
Be thou my strength and stay!

Be near me when all else is from me drifting,—
Earth, sky, home's picture, days of shade and shine,
And kindly faces to my own uplifting
The love which answers mine.

I have but thee, O Father! Let thy Spirit
Be with me then to comfort and uphold!
No gate of pearl, no branch of palm, I merit,
Nor street of shining gold.

Suffice it if, my good and ill unreckoned,
And both forgiven through thy abounding grace,
I find myself by hands familiar beckoned
Unto my fitting place.

Some humble door among thy many mansions,
Some sheltering shade where sin and striving cease,
And flows forever through heaven's green expansions
The river of thy peace.

There from the music round about me stealing,
I fain would learn the new and holy song,
And find at last beneath thy trees of healing,
The life for which I long.

—John Greenleaf Whittier.

GROWING.

Selected.

"And what have you been doing
Through the last happy year?"
I asked a tiny maiden,
Who answered, "Auntie, dear,
I've been just growing higher,
Papa says, like a weed,
Come see my birthday measure;
You'll think me grown indeed."

She tripped away and left me;
Her words remained behind,
A silver little echo
Of music in my mind.
Not taller only—higher!
What weed would do so well?
I changed the "weed" to "flower,"
My dainty Isabel.

What work so sweet as growing
For any Christian child,
Who, like the gentle Saviour,
Would fain be meek and mild?
He grew in wisdom truly,
In grace and stature, too,
In favor with the Father,
In beauty daily new.

That home where Mary pondered
And hid within her heart
Thoughts solemn, glad and sacred,
Which made her quick tears start,
The home where Christ was growing!
It must have been a shrine
Lit up with beams of heaven
By that fair Child divine!

Our children are not sinless.
Alas! we see with pain
Upon their baby features
Full of the shadow-stain;
And they must meet the tempter
And fight with many a foe;
But they shall win the battle,
If like the Lord they grow.

What joy, when growing higher
And leaving folly's ways,
They tune their lips to sweetness,
They walk life's path with praise,
Just growing every hour,
And finding all things prove
A help to upward training,
Devised by sovereign love.

And we, whose birthday measures,
Are not in pencilled lines
On wall or door, are growing,
If Christ our mind inclines
To study well His image
And like the Master grow,
Till we shall see His glory
Where living waters flow.

Chinese Reverence for Written Papers.

In the courtyard of a temple at Ningpo, stands a brazen furnace, in which are daily burnt all papers collected in the streets, on which are written or printed characters.

That furnace for the burning of all scraps of paper, points to the strange reverence for learning which characterizes this people. As the Mohammedan carefully commits to the flame any paper on which the name of the Almighty might chance to be inscribed, that he may thus save it from possible profanation, so the Chinese honor all papers, that by so doing they may preserve any quotations from the writings of Confucius, or other classical authority, from being trampled under foot. It is therefore an act of merit either to go in person, or by deputy, carrying large baskets, and therein to collect every paper which chance or house sweeping may have deposited in the streets; careful housekeepers help in this good work by saving all such fragments, and on hearing the cry of the paper collector, they hurry out to add their stores to his big baskets. These are then carried to the temple to be burnt, and the correct thing to do is to collect the ashes of the brazier in earthenware jugs, in which they are carried to the nearest river and are sprinkled on its waters, that so they may be borne along to the ocean!

This is done in obedience to an edict of the great Emperor Kang-hi, who proclaimed that there is nothing more precious in heaven and earth, than written characters, and who consequently forbade shop-keepers to traffic in such when disposing of waste paper, but bade them reverently collect all fragments to be committed to the sacred flames.

It would however, appear from a memorial to the throne, published in a recent issue of the Peking Gazette, that this commandment is frequently infringed at some of the eighty establishments for the remanufacture of waste paper which exist in Peking. The memorialist prays that the proceeds of the sale of an escaped criminal's house and furniture (though they will not fetch much) should be devoted to the purchase at so much per lb., of such paper as bears written characters, in order to secure proper burning thereof.

For "The Friend."

High License.

For a number of years I have had a business acquaintance with a family, the head of which has been, and still is, engaged in the liquor business. He claims to be strictly abstinent himself, not being willing even to partake of wine at the so-called communion table. He and his wife are foreigners, and both of them profess to be desirous of giving up their present and engaging in some other means of making a livelihood. The man defends his position by saying that he was brought up to buy and sell liquor, as his father did before him, and that it is his duty to provide for his family.

About a year or so ago, he went to Saint Paul, Minnesota, and opened a store for the sale of liquor there, which has proved so profitable, that he has recently sold out his business in Philadelphia, and taken part of his family to the new place,—the others to follow in a short time.

I met him in the street several weeks ago, and had some conversation about his prospects in Saint Paul. He informed me he had to pay to the State, for a wholesale and retail liquor license, $1200 per annum. The wholesale and retail United States license, and the mercantile tax, swelled the amount to $1800 per annum. After adding his rental, he found that the net profits over all his necessary expenses, aggregated $350 per week! Oh, but he said he sold to gentlemen only now! He wanted no bummers and drunkards about his place! He has, what I suppose some people would call a first-class liquor establishment. I suggested that in selling to those he called gentlemen, he was pursuing a course that might make drunkards of them! Those who were already the victims of the drink appetite, would generally find the means of gratifying it, and few of them would reform. He said if such continued to drink to their destruction, the fault would be their own. But, I told him, we should not tempt the weak; that those whose intellectual powers are such that they are unable to take care of themselves, are provided for by the State with homes and caretakers. I appealed to him whether he would like his boys—the older now nearly ready for college, and the other several years younger—thus to be treated, as himself had put it, as gentlemen? He said I had touched him in a tender place, and he desired to part with me.

I have since had some conversation with his wife. She expects to erect a fine house for their home, and thinks the profits of their business in Saint Paul will enable them to retire in three or four years. I assured her I could not believe the Divine blessing would attend the money thus made by the sale of intoxicating liquor. Poor woman, she hoped otherwise! She appears to think that high license gives a respectability to places where gentlemen resort, and that these are a great advance over such places as are frequented by low and abandoned creatures. Rather will not high license be responsible for a multitude that no man can number, of fresh, helpless, hopeless inebriates. E. M.

[That ancient method of giving instruction by fables or allegories, is not very often resorted to at the present time. But many of our older readers can remember the pleasure and profit which they derived from the perusal of those which Lindley Murray placed in his series of Readers, and the strong hold which some of these took of their memory and imagination; so that they have often been brought to mind since, with instruction. Perhaps the following piece of more modern date may prove acceptable.—Ed.]

The Bridge.

There was once a beautiful city which stood upon the slope of a hill; it could be seen from a great distance and the fame of it was such that many people came from far to admire it, as well as to talk with its inhabitants, who were said to be a very wise race of men, skilful in all the arts of life, and constantly making new and great inventions.

One evening, a long time ago, a stranger came to this city. He had travelled a long way and seemed weary, but he had heard so much of the city and its wise inhabitants that he allowed himself little time to rest before he set out to inspect the streets, and admire the large squares with their long lines of overshadowing trees, the fountains springing up and tumbling into their deep marble basins, the tall graceful spires, and the clear windows shadowed with sweeping curtains and filled with flowering plants.

The more he saw the more he was delighted. The city was as beautiful as he had expected, and the people were wise and kind. Some of them were rich, and had houses like palaces; others were poor; but the rich were very good, and had built schools for their children, where they taught them the peculiar learning of the place with various arts and trades, by which the boys soon learned to get their own living, and the girls to practise needlework and other useful arts, besides which they had them instructed in the laws which had been made by the King; and so well were the children taught on this point that many of them knew as much about the King and his laws as their richer neighbors, who had founded these schools.

The stranger thought this such a pleasant city, that he wished to remain in it for awhile, that he might observe the manners of the people and how they employed themselves. So he went about from day to day, and observed how industrious the men were—how they built houses and wove cloth, dug wells and made bread—and how the women spun and knitted, and took care of their children, and of their houses. He was pleased, too, to see the children going so regularly to their schools; and when their task was over he often followed them into the meadows to see how happy they were, gathering flowers and playing about in the long grass.

"This town of yours seems a very good place to live in?" he said one day to a man who was weaving a basket.

"So it would be," said the man, looking up thoughtfully, "if it were not for the river."

"What river?" asked the stranger. "I have not seen or heard of any river."

"Why, no," replied the man, "I dare say not, for it runs a little way out of the city, and we have planted some trees in that direction, that we may not see it; you will not often hear it mentioned, for in fact we do not consider it good breeding to allude to it."

"But what harm does it do to the town?" asked the stranger.

"I don't wish to say much about it," replied the man, "it is a very painful subject; but the truth is, our King, whom you may have heard of, lives a long way off on the other side of the river, and sooner or later he sends for all here to cross over. We shall certainly all have to cross before long. The King sends messengers for us; there is scarcely a day in which some one is not sent for."

"But are they obliged to go?" asked the stranger.

"Oh, yes, they must go," replied the man, "for the King is very powerful. If he were to send for me to-day I could not even wait to finish my work. Sometimes he sends for our wives or our children, and the messenger never waits till we are ready."

"What sort of a country is it on the other side of the river?" asked the stranger. "Is it as pleasant as it is here?"

"The river is so wide that we cannot see across it distinctly," said the man; "and when our friends and relations are once gone over they never come back to tell us how it fares with them there. But yet every one here is agreed, and the highest evidence confirms it, that the country across the river is a far better one than this. The air is so pure that it heals all their diseases; besides there is no such thing as poverty or trouble, and the King is very good to them and so is his Son."

"Well, then," said the stranger, "if the country be so fine, I do not see why you should think it such a misfortune to have to go to it, particularly as you are to see there all your parents, and children, and friends who have gone there before you. Why are you so much afraid to cross the river?"

The man did not answer at first; he seemed to be thinking of his work: at length he looked up and said:—"When any of our friends are sent for we always say they are gone over into that beautiful country; but to tell you the truth this river is so extremely deep and wide, and it rushes along so swiftly—"

"Well," said the stranger.

"I don't mind telling you," replied the man, "as you do not know much of these parts, that I think it very doubtful whether many of those who have to plunge in can get to the other side at all. I am afraid the strong tide carries some of them down till they are lost. Besides, sometimes they are sent for in the dark, and, as I said before, the messenger never waits till we are ready."

"Indeed!" said the stranger, "in that case, so far from envying these people, I wonder to see them looking so happy and so unconcerned. I should have thought they would have been so anxious lest the messenger should come. Pray cannot your friends help you over?" The man shook his head. "We have made a great many rafts at different times," he said, in a doubtful tone, "but they all went whirling down the stream and were wrecked. We began a bridge, too, and it cost us incredible labor, but we could never make it reach beyond the middle of the river."

"Then," said the stranger, "are there no ships to convey you over; must you needs plunge alone and unhelped into those dark, deep waters?"

"I am not learned in these matters," said the man, evidently uneasy, "and I do not pretend to be wiser than my betters, who generally think this a disagreeable subject, and one that we should not trouble ourselves about more than we can help."

"But if you must all go?" said the stranger.

"I am a working man," replied the basket-maker, interrupting him, "and I really have no time to talk to you any further. If you want to know anything more about this, you had better go and speak to that man whom you see talking to that group of children. It is his business to teach people how to get over the river, but I have not time to attend to him. I dare say, when my time comes, I shall get across as well as my neighbors."

So the stranger went up to this man, who had been pointed out to him, and inquired whether he could tell him anything about the dreadful river.

"Certainly," said the man, "I shall be very glad to tell you any thing you wish to know. It is my duty, I am one of the ambassadors of the King's Son. If you will come with me a little way out of the town, I will show you the river."

So he led him over several green hills, and down into a deep valley, till they came to the edge of a whirling hurrying torrent, deep and swollen. It moved along with such a thundering noise that the stranger shuddered and said:

"I hope, sir, it is not true that all the people in the city are obliged to cross this river?"

"Yes, it is quite true," answered the man.

"Poor people!" said the stranger, "none of them can strive against such a stream as this; no doubt they are all borne away by the force of the torrent. Do you think any man could swim over here in safety?"

"No," said the man looking very sorrowful, "it is quite impossible, and we should all be lost if it were not for the bridge."

"The bridge," exclaimed the stranger very much surprised. "No one told me there was a bridge."

"O, yes, replied the man, "there is a bridge a short distance higher up; it was built by the King's Son, and by means of it we can pass in perfect safety."

"What! may you all pass?" asked the stranger eagerly.

"Yes, all. The bridge is perfectly free, and is the only way of reaching the country beyond. All who try to swim over or cross in any other way will certainly be lost forever."

"Sir," said the stranger, "if this be the case, I must hasten back to the city and tell the people that no more of them be lost in these swelling waters."

"You may certainly do so if you please," replied the man, "but know first that all the people have been duly informed of the bridge. My brethren and myself spend nearly all our time in telling them of the goodness of the King's Son, and how neither he nor his Father is willing that any should perish. But their pride is very great."

"What! so great that they would rather die than use the bridge?" asked the stranger in astonishment.

"Some of them have built up works of their own," replied the man, "which they think are strong enough to bear them over into the King's country; others say they do not believe there is but one way of getting over; and some men throw themselves headlong into the flood, saying they do not believe there is such a provision, or at least that it was not meant for them. But, as I told you before, it is perfectly free, and the voice of the King's Son may sometimes be heard calling to the people over the flood, and inviting them to come to him; for, strange as it may seem to you, he loves them, though they are so backward to believe that he means them well."

"What!" interrupted the stranger, "does not the King's Son repent of what he has done, is he not sorry that he built a bridge for such a thankless race?"

"No," said the man, "though they slight his offers of safety he still sends ambassadors to call them to him, even at the very brink of the river. Nay, he often himself visits them, and by night, when all is still, he comes to their doors and knocks; if any man will open to him he will enter and sup with him. He will tell him how he has loved our nation, and what he has done for our sake; for indeed it cost him very dear to build that bridge, but now it stands stronger than a rock."

Now when the stranger heard this he wondered greatly at the ingratitude and foolishness of these people; and, as he turned away, I went up to the ambassador and ventured to ask him the name of that city and the country it stood in.

But it startled me beyond measure when he told me the name of that country; for it had the same name as my own!—Jean Ingelov.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Lead Poison in Confectionery.—Several deaths have recently occurred in Philadelphia, which are attributed to the use, by bakers and confectioners, of a coloring material which contains Chromate of Lead.

Petroleum of the United States and Russia.—United States crude petroleum oil is to Russian crude as cream to skim milk. United States crude yields about 75 per cent. of the finest illuminating oil the world produces. Russian crude yields only about 29 per cent. of an inferior illuminating oil. United States crude yields about 12 per cent. naphtha or spirit of such a valuable character that it readily sells for 20 per cent. per gallon more than the oil. Russian naphtha is unmarketable, and it is mostly burned to get rid of it. United States lubricating oils, another product of crude, are now so low in price, that Russian lubricating oils are practically debarred from competition in many of the European markets. United States crude yields a considerable percentage of scale, used for candle-making, and this is a product of great value; weight for weight it is worth four times more than refined petroleum oil. The Baku crude yield no scale. Thus the United States, in the surpassing richness of its crude, has an enormous and unapproachable advantage over Russia.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Natural Gas.—The possibilities of danger from the use of natural gas were illustrated in a novel way at Johnstown, Pa., a few days ago. A bolt in the pressure regulator at the central station of the company, which supplies the natural gas, slipped out of position, and allowed the pressure, which is normally about two ounces to the square inch, to get as high as two pounds. The result was a tremendous outflow of gas at all points where it had been left burning, and as the accident occurred in the early morning, considerable damage was done by the overheated stoves before the accident was discovered. Floors, wainscotings, furniture, were scorched, and in many cases set on fire; and in a hardware store of the town assumed quite serious proportions, and inflicted a damage of some $3,000 before it was put out. Many of the stoves had been left burning all night in order to dry the cellars and rooms overflowed by a recent flood, and this of course increased the chances of mischief.—The American.

The Danger of Emotional Excitement.—The habit of reading sanguinary recitals, bristling with the details of the most hideous crimes, is one which can hardly fail to produce an unhealthy moral tone in those addicted thereto. Instances are not wanting in which the perusal of the legendary feats of Dick Turpin and his congeners has paved the way to the commission of crime by young and inexperienced persons, to whom crime has been described with a halo of heroism and courage, in which, as a matter of fact, it is generally wanting. The Birmingham coroner recently held an inquest on a young woman, the circumstances of whose death open up another point of view in the harmful results which may accrue from inconsiderate tampering with the emotions. The young woman in question had been to a theatre. She was very much affected by what she saw, and took the earliest possible opportunity of putting an end to an existence which she had just seen depicted in gloomy colors. No doubt suicide is a comparatively rare sequel to a theatrical performance; but there are moments, however, when the mind becomes more amenable to such enervating influences; and there are persons who are constitutionally prone to experience violent emotional disturbance, and, on whose nervous system too dramatic a recital may produce a really damaging shock. Violent emotional disturbances, when frequently repeated, leave a mark on the mind akin to the wrinkles which follow their expression on the features, and disfigure one like the other. Too great care cannot be shown in shielding the young and the emotionally weak from such influences, the effect of which may be injurious and lasting.—British Medical Gazette.

A Large Dam.—It is proposed to build a wall across the San Mateo Canon, so as to form a reservoir that will contain 32,000,000 gallons of water. The wall will be 700 feet long, 170 feet high, 175 feet thick at base, and 20 feet thick at top.

An Old Form of Capital Punishment.—Death by precipitation is one of the oldest modes of capital punishment. It prevailed widely over the earth in primitive times. Traces and traditions of it are found here and there in different countries, and in localities far apart. We can easily understand how this should be so, for in ancient times towns and villages were almost exclusively built upon elevated rocks and heights for the sake of security. The nucleus of a town was usually a large isolated rock, such as the rock of the Parthenon at Athens, the rock of the Palatine at Rome, the rock of the Chateau at Nice, and the rock of Zion at Jerusalem. Precipitation among the Jews was one form of stoning, which was the recognized legal punishment for blasphemy. Indeed, "stoning," as the Mishna informs us, was regarded as merely a term of breaking the culprit's neck. It was made imperative that "the house of stoning" as the place from which the criminal was cast down was called, should be at least "two stories high;" and it was the duty of the chief witness to precipitate the criminal with his own hand. If he was not killed at once by the fall, the second witness had to cast a stone on his head; and, if he still survived, the whole people were to join together in putting an end to him with a shower of stones. This precipitation constituted an essential and humane feature in the act of stoning. Both modes we must regard as an exceedingly primitive custom, the most natural method in which a rude people would wreak their vengeance, or inflict deserved punishment.—Quiver.

Cotton Seed Oil.—The English Mechanic says that "Two-thirds of the cotton seed oil sold in the United States, goes to the makers of lard and butterine, and its use to the extent of about 20 per cent, has, it is stated, been one of the most powerful influences in reducing the price of lard. It is also being used for cooking, and a large proportion of the oils taken with salads and sardines, is the product of the cotton fields. Scientific men declare it is perfectly wholesome, and some even say it is better than animal fats. It is estimated that not far from 600,000 tons of cotton seed is used in this industry every year, and that from 400,000 to 500,000 barrels of crude oil are produced, half of which is exported from the States."

Captive Bill-Fish.—Recently a bill-fish was found on the sandy shore of the river at low tide. It was apparently unhurt, and twisted and squirmed vigorously, but did not move towards the receding waters as doubtless it desired to do. Why did it not leave with the tide? was the question asked by each of those who saw the struggling creature, but no one offered a solution of the problem. Reaching the spot, the cause was evident enough. The inquisitive bill-fish had snapped at the extended soft parts of an open mussel, and the enraged mollusk had closed its shell with a snap, and caught the fish by the lower jaw. The mussel showed no inclination to relinquish its hold, and now that the water had gone, was evidently striving to bury itself in the sand until return of tide, as is their usual custom. It could not, however, drag the fish down with it, nor could the captured bill-fish lift the mussel from its bed in the sand. Both were prisoners, each being the other's jailer, so long as they chose to remain so. It was a most curious and instructive sight.—Upland and Meadow.

Items.

—Prohibition in Maine.—The United States Government has recently abolished the collectorships of Maine and Vermont, and merged them into that of New Hampshire, indicating that the revenue from the tax on spirits has decreased. An analysis of the Internal Revenue Statistics shows that while these taxes amounted last year to an average of $1.76 per head of the population of the United States, the amount collected in Maine was only four cents per head of the population of that State—of which it is probable much came from apothecaries and druggists.—The Independent.

—Belligerent Clergy.—The Executive of the Manchester Peace Society (England) lately adopted a resolution expressing regret at "the belligerent and anti-Christian language" used by the Bishop of Manchester in a public address. The resolution says: "In the judgment of this committee such utterances are singularly unfortunate and mischievous, as coming from a prominent representative of a Church professing to accept the teachings of the Prince of Peace."

The tendency of the Bishop's speech was to sow the seeds of suspicion and jealousy towards Germany, Russia and the United States. Towards Germany because she had occupied a part of New Guinea in the Pacific Ocean—as if England had the exclusive right of taking possession of unoccupied lands! Towards Russia for a similar reason, on account of her advances in Central Asia. Towards the United States because she has so long a frontier on Canada, across which she may at some time be tempted to take a hostile step. The policy which the Bishop suggests in face of the possible perils he foresees, is to make "every Englishman a match bodily and more than a match mentally and morally for each foreigner, . . . to make them so that they would die biting."

On this the Herald of Peace makes the following comment: "Very curiously, surely, does this contrast with the words of the Master whose spirit and teaching the Bishop professes to venerate: 'Behold I send you forth as lambs among wolves.' This Christian prelate cannot conceive of men of different races, or indeed of kindred races, existing side by side with any other feelings than those of 'malice and envy, hateful and hating one another,' or in any other relation than that of vigilant and deadly antagonism."

—Moral Influence upon England of its Indian Empire.—The American refers to an article in the Pall Mall Gazette, which insists that the governing class which constitutes Imperial England, has been "Paganized in belief and morals by the necessary methods of imperial government. These methods involve the transfer of a great body of Englishmen to a celibate life among a people who entertain low ideas of morality. The best of them resist the temptation of such a life, and keep themselves pure. The most behave as might be expected. And having thrown off the moral code of their country, they easily come to cast aside the theological belief on which that code rests, and to think that Christianity "makes too much of purity." At the end of his term of service, and even during his leaves of absence, the Anglo-Indian comes back to England as an influence for evil. He corrupts English "society," and especially London, by his immorality and scepticism.

—Secret Societies.—The Synod of the Reformed Presbyterian Church of America, in session at Newburg, New York, has adopted resolutions declaring "that secret societies, of which secrecy is an essential characteristic, are, because of their secrecy, immoral, selfish and unjust; that they are degrading and enslaving to the consciences of their members; that, in addition to the secrecy of these fraternities, many of them are Christless, yet counterfeit the worship of the Church and obstruct her work, and, for that reason, as well as on account of the secrecy maintained, the members of such societies ought not to be admitted to the Church's membership, and that the Synod enjoin the courts of this Church to refuse admission to the privileges of the Church to the members of all secret orders, and to exclude from the membership those belonging to such societies, if there be any in the Church who may have crept in unawares."

THE FRIEND.

SEVENTH MONTH 23, 1887.

Some of our readers may remember the publication in "The Friend," several weeks ago, of some extracts from a letter written by a Friend in Kansas, expressing the difficulties occasioned him by the departure, among those he was connected with, from the principles and practices of our Society.

Those extracts have drawn forth a communication from another Friend in a different part of the West, who has found in them a description of his own experience,—as face answereth to face in a glass. A part of this is here inserted, with the hope that it may strengthen others in their efforts to hold fast to that which they have received from the Spirit of Christ, and not lose the benefits which flow from a faithful walking in the Light of the Lord.

"I always hail the coming of "The Friend" with pleasure, as I find much therein to cheer me amid the trials and discouragements with which I have been and am still surrounded. And on the other hand, I often find my soul travelling in unison with it, on account of the degeneracy in our beloved Society. I believe the present low state of our Society on account of ritualism and a dependence on the ordinances, (so-called), had its beginnings many years ago. And I, with many others, on account of a low spiritual state, were more or less deceived thereby."

"Soon after coming here, my dear Heavenly Father was pleased to lead me in a way that I had not known before, and by His blessed Spirit enabled me to see many things in a very different light from that in which I once believed them. Since that time I have believed it my duty to uphold the precious spiritual doctrines of our Society in all their fulness, and have endeavored by word and pen in my weak way, to labor with those members of our meeting who seemed disposed to assail them. I have passed through many trying seasons during this time, and have had to bear with many things that would have seemed very hard, had it not been that His loving hand was near to sustain.

"But under the leading and influence of those connected with the Christian Worker of Chicago, our little meeting has steadily receded from the principles once held by Friends, until it seems there is but little done or said with which I dare unite, and it begins to feel as if I had no Christian home any more.

"My heart was stirred within me as I read the touching quotations from the letter of the minister in Kansas. His experience and feelings have been very much my own; and I doubt not there are many others scattered over this Western country who are now passing through this same lonely waiting. I still hope and believe that there are better times for us sometime in the future, and I suppose it is our Christian duty to patiently endure."

"There are two or three others of our little meeting who have remained steadfast through all these trials, and in our loneliness we often turn our mental eyes towards Philadelphia, believing that through your faithfulness, help may yet arise for us, the scattered sheep of our once united fold."

The members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting may well feel humbled at the thought, that others are looking to them for sympathy and help; being conscious, as many of them are, of their own weakness, and of the need of strength from on High to maintain the holy warfare against the individual temptations that assail them, and against the evils which threaten the church collectively. But surely the knowledge that lovers of primitive Christianity elsewhere may be helped or hindered, according as they are faithful or otherwise, ought to animate them to increased earnestness in "walking worthy of the vocation wherewith they are called."

"Friends' Book and Tract Committee," 56 Lafayette Place, N. Y., inform that Katharine Backhouse of England, has placed at their disposal, for free distribution among Bible Schools and Meeting Libraries of Friends in America, 250 copies of "Witnesses for Christ and Memorials of Church Life, from the Fourth to the Thirteenth Century."

They say:—"These books will be mailed from Europe, postage paid, direct to the officer of the Library who may be designated to receive it; subject only to United States duty, which will be collected at place of delivery."

"Assuredly the Lord has many servants with whom we are unacquainted: He has hidden ones whom we may never hear of in this world; and many a country, and many a city, would perhaps long ago have been as Sodom and Gomorrah, had not a small remnant of such been left in those places.

'The kingdom of God cometh not with observation,' for behold, 'the kingdom of God is within you.' We do not sufficiently consider this even as Elijah did not, and therefore we may often be mistaken with reference to this kingdom. It is not unfrequently the case, my brethren, that we measure the temple of God with a very incorrect measuring-line, and therefore deceive ourselves as to its breadth and extent. For instance, we are apt to take it for granted, that where there are no enlightened preachers there can be no true Christians; but where has God made the regeneration of his chosen entirely dependent on human instrumentality? Lo! in the midst of the desert He often plants, with his own hand, the loveliest roses. We are also apt to think, that where nothing is heard of awakenings, no awakenings take place. But must there be always a sound when it rains, and cannot children be born to the Lord as dew from the womb of the morning—silently and secretly, before day-break, and while multitudes are asleep."—From Krummacher.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The total value of our exports of domestic breadstuffs during the twelve months which ended on Sixth Mo. 30th, was $102,426,194, against $122,510,379 during the preceding twelve months.

Secretary Bayard has received a despatch from our Minister at Honolulu, dated 5th instant, saying that affairs were then quiet in Hawaii.

The apple crop in Maine, which was expected to be phenomenally large at the time the orchards were in blossom, has not "set" well, it is reported, and will not be by any means as bountiful as at first anticipated.

It is reported from Pittsburgh, that notwithstanding the shut down of the blast furnaces on account of the coke strike, the ore shipments from the lakes show a large increase over last year, and it is estimated that the production this year will be 1,000,000 tons in excess of what it was in 1856.

In the Woman's Christian Temperance Convocation at Lake Bluff, on the 16th inst., Senator Colquitt, of Georgia, gave some details of what prohibition is doing in the South. In the twelve Southern States, he said, "there were fewer saloons to the population than in any other dozen States, not excepting Maine and Kansas. Local option had been adopted in Georgia and Alabama, and prohibition was a complete success."

In reply to the despatch published in this Summary two weeks ago, to the effect that "the closing of the saloons in Acheson, Kansas, has cut off the most profitable source of revenue, amounting to thousands of dollars a year, and, as a result, the city has no revenue to keep it going," &c. Governor Martin, of Kansas, has since sent a long communication to the General Manager of the Associated Press, in which he says: "I am thoroughly familiar with the condition of the city of Acheson, and personally know that the statements embodied in the St. Joseph despatch are false and misleading." "The most wonderful era of prosperity, of material, moral and intellectual development, of growth in country, cities and towns, ever witnessed on the American continent, has been illustrated in Kansas during the six years since the temperance amendment to our Constitution was adopted, and especially during the past two years, the period of its most energetic and complete enforcement."

Jacob Sharp has been sentenced by Judge Barrett, in New York, to pay a fine of $5000 and be imprisoned in Sing Sing Penitentiary at hard labor for four years.

In the last live pigeon shooting match in Louisiana, the contestants, with an exception or two, used assumed names, and "one of the crack shots" stated to a writer who communicates the information to the Picayune, that he would never again indulge in the cruel sport, and that he believed the last match in which live pigeons would be used had taken place in that section. This is encouraging.

The city of St. Paul was visited on the night of the 13th inst., by countless swarms of what are called "day bugs," which swarmed around the gas lamps and electric lights, and covered buildings and the ground. In one place they covered the pavement to the depth of over a foot.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 543, which was 12 less than during the previous week, and 95 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the whole number, 276 were males and 267 females; 224 adults and 319 minors; 224 being under one year of age; 108 died of cholera infantum; 57 of consumption of the lungs; 23 of convulsions; 27 of marasmus; 24 of inanition; 21 of diseases of the heart; 20 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 20 of inflammation of the brain, and 15 of debility.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½'s, 109; 4's, 127½; currency 6's, 123 a 134.

Cotton was dull at 11 cts. for middling uplands. Feed was quiet and unchanged. Winter bran, $15 a $16 per ton.

Flour and Meal.—Flour was dull, but steadily held. Sales of 125 barrels Pennsylvania straight, at $4.20; 375 barrels Ohio straight, at $4.40 a $4.50; 500 barrels winter patent, at $4.60 a $4.75; 125 barrels Minnesota, clear, at $4.10, and 625 barrels do, patent, at $4.60 a $4.85. Rye flour, $2.60 a $2.75 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat was quiet, and No. 2 red closed at 80½ cts. bid and 81 cts. asked. Corn was nominal at 44½ a 45 cts. Oats were a shade firmer at 38½ a 39½ cts. per bushel.

Beef cattle were in fair request and lower, at 3½ a 5½ cts.

Sheep were higher for good and lower for common, at 13 a 15½ cts.

Hogs were fairly active and ½c. higher, at 7½ a 8 cts. FOREIGN.—The Coercion Bill is being discussed in the English House of Lords.

A British commission of scientific men, appointed last year to inquire into Louis Pasteur's treatment of hydrophobia, have just reported to Parliament. In it they state:

"The committee think it therefore certain that the inoculations practiced by L. Pasteur have prevented the occurrence of hydrophobia in a large proportion of those, who, if they had not been so inoculated, would have died of that disease; and his discovery shows that it may become possible to arrest by inoculation, even after infection, other diseases besides hydrophobia. His researches have also added very largely to the knowledge of the pathology of hydrophobia, and supplied a sure means of determining whether an animal which has died under suspicion of rabies was really affected with that disease or not."

The Sultan of Turkey has persisted in his refusal to sign the convention with England in reference to Egypt in its present form, notwithstanding he is urgently advised to ratify it by both Germany and Italy. The London Standard says: "The break-down of the Egyptian Convention is a decided advantage to England, who stands unpledged before Europe, and may continue the occupation of Egypt as long as considered necessary."

A despatch from Constantinople dated Seventh Mo. 15th, says: Kiampil Pasha, the Grand Vizier, has resigned. The resignation was in consequence of a violent article published in the Misra attacking the Grand Vizier, the Cabinet and the whole administration, which was inspired by the Sultan in order to excite public indignation against them and thus cover his own responsibility in connection with the Egyptian convention.

On the 15th, Prince Ferdinand of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha received the deputation sent to officially notify him of his election to the Bulgarian throne. In his reply he said: "If I should follow my heart's impulse, I would hasten to Bulgaria and put myself at the head of the nation. But the Prince elected ruler of Bulgaria must respect treaties. Such respect will increase the strength of the Bulgarian Government and assure the grandeur and prosperity of the nation. I hope to justify the Porte's confidence and obtain the consent of the Powers, and to regain in time Russia's sympathy, to which Bulgaria owes her freedom. I hope to prove my devotion to Bulgaria when the moment comes. Courage, prudence, unity and patriotism, with which God has blessed Bulgaria, promise a brilliant future for her."

Russia has replied to the circular note in relation to the Bulgarian question issued by the Porte. The reply states that, while there is personally no objection against Prince Ferdinand as ruler of Bulgaria, Russia declines to accept the decision of the present Sobranje, Germany, Austria, and Italy reply that they will accept any solution of the question which is based on the Berlin treaty.

At 8 o'clock of the morning of the 17th instant, slight shocks of earthquake were felt in Sicily and along the Italian coasts. Mt. Etna is in a state of eruption. No damage is reported.

DIED, at the residence of his son, Robert Taber, in Massachusetts, of Third Mo. 29th, 1857, FRANCIS TABER, aged 83 years and 6 months, an esteemed member of New Bedford Monthly Meeting of Friends. This, our dear aged Friend, had endeavored through a long life, to follow his Lord and Saviour in the way of his leadings, though often in the way of the cross. He passed through many painful vicissitudes and trials, hard to bear; but we trust they were sanctified to him, and tended to prepare him for his everlasting habitation. He was strongly attached to the principles and testimonies of our religious Society, and his spirit was often clothed with mourning because of the departures therefrom, so prevalent of late years. He was at times engaged in public testimony in our meetings, to the comfort of faithful Friends. For several years he appeared to be quietly awaiting his release; and his friends feel an assurance, that through redeeming love and mercy his purified spirit has been admitted to a mansion of everlasting rest and peace.

—, at his residence in Guthrieville, Pennsylvania, Fourth Mo. 4th, 1857, WILLIAM WINDLE, a valued member of Bradford Monthly and Cain Parishes Meetings, in the 84th year of his age.

—, at her residence, 809 Spruce St. Philadelphia, Pa., on Seventh-day evening, Sixth Mo. 15th, 1857, SARAH MARSHALL, aged nearly 76 years. She bore a serene, and proved incurable, ailment for years without a complaint or murmur. Grateful to the Lord for his blessings, she looked daily to Him for strength. With full faith in his atoning blood and sacrifice, she relied on her crucified and risen Lord; not for works of righteousness, but of his unbounded mercy, she was assured near her close that salvation awaited her. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."

Selections from the Diary of Abigail W. Hall.

The remaining entries in the diary of our beloved friend are comparatively few, and made at long intervals. In them she records some of her own mental exercises; which manifest that she retained the same watchful care over herself, and the same earnestness of purpose to work out her soul's salvation, as have been conspicuously apparent in her earlier memoranda. She notices also the decease of several valued friends and relatives. Amongst these was her niece Alice Roberts, a young woman, of whom she says, under date of Eighth Month 15th, 1876:

"Her pure and spotless life has left a fragrance behind her, comparable to the odor that filled the whole house." She had nothing to express in regard to leaving us, or the great change which was so close at hand; but as an innocent child, was, I believe, "leaning" on the bosom of her Saviour."

The entry made Fifth Month 20th, 1882, shows that she was sensible of increasing physical weakness. It is as follows:

"Feel this morning, that I owe much unto my dear Lord and Master, who has so many blessings bestowed—too many to enumerate. The time has come to me, when I cannot accomplish what I once could. Often do I look back to what I used to go through, but I can do it no more. O, that I may not be suffered to lose 'the dew of my youth' when I was mercifully 'led with weeping and supplication,' and covenants were entered into."

Eleventh Month 23rd, 1882. "As I lay on my bed this morning, humbled under a fresh sense of my many weaknesses and shortcomings, and fears that I should never be made pure enough for the kingdom of Heaven, my tears flowed comparable to a little shower of rain. As I looked at my helpless condition, with longings for a little evidence of acceptance; the language saluted my inward ear,—'I write unto you little children, because your sins are forgiven you for his name's sake.' It seemed too good for me."

The last entry in her diary is dated First Month 23rd, 1883. "Beautiful for situation the joy of the whole earth, is Mount Zion, on the sides of the north, the city of the Great King. God is known in her palaces for a refuge." The above was comfortingly brought to remembrance on my bed, a few mornings since."

The following account of the closing period of her life is an abridgment, from notes taken principally by her husband, immediately preceding and during the last illness unto death of A. W. Hall; with which it is proposed to close this account of her.

"Fifth Mo., 1883. She attended her (Concord) Quarterly Meeting for the last time. In that for Ministers and Elders, she said, she believed there were many honest, struggling ones who, like Hezekiah, had been turning their faces to the wall. She could see one here and another there, raised up to support our precious doctrines and testimonies; and she remembered the encouraging language: 'A seed shall serve Him; it shall be accounted to the Lord for a generation.' Said, she had remembered the exercise of a dear young woman on her dying bed, who desired all to go out of the room, that she might 'wrestle alone'; thus exhorting to individual faithfulness and wrestling for the blessing." This, with a few words in the General Meeting held on the following day, closed her public gospel service. After meeting and dining at our kind friends B. W. and R. G. P.'s we returned home. Next morning, Fifth Month 15th, she was stricken with apoplexy, followed by paralysis of the left side. This sudden prostration of her physical powers, though accompanied with much weariness and not a little painfulness, left her able to see and converse with her family and numerous friends for nearly seven and a-half months, wherein the chastening hand of disease and affliction was appointed unto her. Though feeling often very poor in spirit, she yet endured all without a murmur; never intimating that she thought her Heavenly Father dealt hardly with her, but seemed to feel the most filial fear, tenderness and humility towards Him, even in her most distressing seasons. Her petitions were more often than the day, put up for help and support; frequently saying, "I am willing to do anything called for by the dear Master."

Fifth Month 18th. She addressed quite a number of the young Friends of her Particular Meeting; and it proved to be a heart-tendering occasion, as she spoke to the different ones, with entire composure; sending, also, kind messages to several who were not present. At another time, after quoting the Scripture, "All thy children shall be taught of the Lord, and great shall be the peace of thy children;" she went on to say: "I want my dear relations that are so kindly waiting on me to remember that there is room for us all in this school. I hope there will not be one of us missing from that countless number that surround the throne. If there is, the fault will be our own. There are many mansions in our Father's house; if we can only obtain one of the lowest, all will be well."

30th. Her friend M. D. A. spent the forenoon with her. Upon her taking leave, A. W. H. said to her, "We have often drunk together of one cup. I have been thinking that this affliction has been permitted in order to deepen me in the root of life. It does seem to me sometimes, that I am privileged to get very near to the dear Master's feet." In allusion to our reading to her, she did not wish her friends to think she was depending on that; she chose rather to draw from the fountain-head—from Him who had often comforted her in times of distress.

Sixth Mo. 4th. She spoke of our little meeting, and seemed clothed with love for the members of it. Expressed the hope that some of the older ones would come forward and take their places, and share in the exercises and services of the church. Felt as if she could put her arms around the dear young people and gather them all; and manifested a great desire that little children should be brought up, as respects their dress, with proper christian restraint. She spoke of the sweet peace she had experienced by making little sacrifices in dress; and to see young people doing this, had often been as narrow to her bones.

15th. She supplicated: "Oh Thou who dwellest on high, be pleased to draw nigh to us this morning—to thy children who have long compassed thine altar. In great weakness we appeal to thee for thy help, and ask that thou wouldst enable us to bear our afflictions, as Thou wouldst have thy children bear them. Thou knowest why these things are permitted! Let them work out thy own end and designs; that we may all be prepared at last, through thy mercy, to enter into that city which hath no need of the sun, neither of the moon to shine in it, for the glory of God doth lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof. Be pleased to draw near, not only to this present company, but to those of the neighborhood, that there may be a little army raised up in this place who will uphold Thy cause of truth and righteousness in the earth."

Speaking of different ones in our meeting, she said: "And dear sister S., we have sat together, and loved each other. She will not be left alone. The Lord is very near her, and will be near her both by day and by night." Spoke to her sister — of the great unity and congeniality that had existed between them, and of her dedication to the best of Masters, &c. In allusion to her husband, said: "We have taken sweet counsel together, and walked to the house of God in company." Of J. K., he has been a very kind brother-in-law to me; and desired his faithfulness as an armor-bearer in the good cause. She also sweetly addressed her nieces, and sent loving messages to her nephews.

She alluded to her little gift in the ministry with its attendant exercises. Often felt as if she had gone down to the bottom of the mountains, and that the weeds were wrapped about her head. Had often been keenly sensible of her frailties and shortcomings; and desired that none might be stumbled thereat. Said she was a very poor thing, and that she could not think of an act or a word to rest her hopes now upon in this honest hour; but that her only hope was in the mercy of God through Christ Jesus. She exhorted to a preparation for said honest hour, by which only we can experience that

"Jesus can make a dying bed Feel soft as downy pillows are," &c.

Seventh Mo. 31st. When under a good deal of suffering and some discouragement from not feeling more of the sensible presence of the Master, she put up the touching little petition: "O Heavenly Father! be pleased to look down upon thy poor afflicted child, an unworthy worm of the dust. Thou alone knowest what a poor thing I am. Be pleased to help me. I have not a shred of righteousness out of thee to depend upon. Be pleased to make me pure and fit for thy heavenly kingdom. I have none to depend upon but Thee."

Ninth Mo. 30th. She said, "If I could but touch the hem of His garment!" And upon the 91st and 92nd Psalm being, at her request, read to her, after a little silence, she said: "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me, bless his holy name." Be pleased, Heavenly Father to encamp round about, and spread thy wing of ancient goodness over us. Be near to this little company, who feel that they have no might of their own," &c.

Upon another occasion she remarked to a young man, I remember what Samuel Fothergill, in addressing some young people, said: "I have found my duty and great advantage to place in view my worthy father; and in matters of importance, or in dubious cases, to consult what would have pleased him, who was ripe in experience and judgment."

Twelfth Mo. 27th. To-day she put up the filial, feeling intercessions, which proved the last recorded of her: "Be pleased, dearest Father, to receive me unto thyself. Thou knowest, O Lord, that I have always loved Thee, and have tried to keep thy commandments. And, Oh, the deep places I have had to pass through!" At nine o'clock the following morning she was taken with spasms, and gradually grew weaker until the next afternoon, Twelfth Month 29th, 1883, when she quietly passed away.

A precious feeling of solemnity, which had been over those assembled on the occasion, continued; and a tendering religious opportunity was had. The interment took place on the following Fourth-day; when a favored meeting was held, and divers feeling testimonies were delivered. In which, with other pertinent matter, the Scriptures were quoted: "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints." And, "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth: yea, saith the Spirit, they do rest from their labors; and their works do follow them."

Tuckerton Pond, New Jersey.

About the easiest and most pleasant mode of gathering botanical specimens on a warm summer's day, is to be seated in a little flat bottomed boat, on one of our extensive ponds, with an enthusiastic companion to take the rower's seat, and to propel the little vessel into the bays and among the islands abounding in the shallower parts of such collections of water. Such was my experience at Tuckerton on the evening of the last day of the Sixth Month, and on the following morning. The pond, whose water is the motive power of a mill, is fed by streams which rise at no great distance; and in that level country, the dam which retains the water, causes it to spread over a wide area, extending far back towards the sources from which it springs. The water itself is colored dark by vegetable growths, as is common in Southern New Jersey and many other sections of our country.

Though dark in color, the water is clear in other respects, and we could watch the plants below, when not more than two or three feet from the surface. How it may be in the deepest parts of the pond, we could not tell, but it was interesting to notice the abundance of the plants in the shallower portions, so that almost all the space available was occupied.

As we glided gently along, we observed a dense growth of a thread-like pond-weed (Potamogeton), whose slender stems were crowned with masses of seeds, forming clusters about the size of large peas. Below, the plants were subdivided into stems or leaves as thin as sewing cotton. The top of the plant was several inches below the surface, and when a specimen was gathered, the parts were unable to sustain themselves without the support of the water in which they had floated, and collapsed into a mass resembling a tangled skein of silk.

Floating loose in the water were white threads several feet in length, with numerous short branches coming out in whorls, and much subdivided. These were thickly studded with small kidney-shaped bladders, which keep the plant afloat, and are said also to contribute to its nourishment, by entrapping and digesting some of the innumerable animalcules which frequent these quiet waters. Some of the bladders were transparent, and the bubble of air they contained was plainly visible by the unassisted eye; others were of a dark purple color. The plant was not now in bloom, but was probably a Bladder Wort (Utricularia inflata), such as was described in "The Friend," of Eleventh Month 20th, of last year.

Patches of Yellow Pond-lilies (Nuphar advena), of the fragrant Water-lily (Nymphaea odorata), and of the curious Water-Shield (Brasenia peltata), were frequent. They were all in bloom. But the small dark purple blossoms of the Brasenia were less numerous and far less conspicuous than the larger and more showy flowers of the others. The leaves of all these are beautiful, and they lie gracefully on the surface of the water, presenting their green upper surface to the sky, and turning the dark purple of their under side to the water below. As we gazed into the quiet waters, we could see leaves struggling upward from the bottom below to reach the sunlight. From how distant a rooting place their stems had started we could not tell, for we had nothing to measure with, except our oars, which were but about five feet in length, and they would not reach to the bottom, whence the leaves and flower stems had their origin.

We saw in the depths below a number of small white heads of flowers, about the size of peas, growing up towards the light; in places where the water was shallower, these had emerged. They were specimens of the Pipe wort, of which we found two species. The footstalk which bears the head of flowers, is often very long, and the leaves which are grass-like, spring from its base. Both they and the numerous long rootlets are very cellular in their structure.

In the shallower parts of the pond we found a number of small islands, some scarcely more than a yard in diameter, which were very attractive from the abundance and beauty of the plants that grew in them. But we soon found that they furnished a very insecure footing to the explorer, and were only floating islands with water beneath as well as around them. They appeared to be moored to the stem of some bush, or to the stump of a cedar, around which had grown the water-moss. This was overrun with the vines of the Cranberry (now in bloom), and permeated and held together by the roots of various plants. We drew our little boat to the edges of these islands, and thus collected many interesting plants. Among these were the pitcher plant (Sarracenia purpurea); a Bladder-wort with brilliant yellow flowers (Utricularia cornuta) which was rooted and stationary, and not floating as the species before described; and two beautiful orchidaceous plants, Pogonia ophioglossoides, and Calopogon pulchellus—the former bearing one rose-colored flower about an inch long, at the top of its stem, midway on which stands a single leaf; and the latter crowned with an open cluster of blossoms, which were larger and of a rose purple hue.

The plants which have been mentioned were far from being all that we met with. So attractive was the pond and its contents, that we prolonged our tarryance on its waters till the shades of evening had settled over them, and the Whip-poor-Will, who were skimming over the surface, and darting after their insect prey with zigzag flight, reminded us that the time had come for the animals of the day to retire from the scene and leave it to the more nocturnal peccies.

Old-Fashioned Quakerism.

After speaking of that doctrine of Primitive Christianity, and of Quakerism—the Light of Christ in man—as fundamental truth, William Pollard is careful to draw attention to the fact, that it is not the only truth of importance. He observes: "On examination, it will be found, when held in its true sense, really to include, or to reveal, all the great Facts referred to in the Apostles' Creed: for, as promised by Christ, it leads into all truth. Our knowledge of God is progressive. Truth comes to us by degrees largely according to faith and faithfulness. This was what George Fox meant, when he said, he was called 'to bring people to Christ, and to leave them there.' He knew that when a man had come in faith to this living Christ, he would seek more and more to learn of Christ, and to obey Christ, and to promote the cause of Christ;—that he would honor and love the Bible, which testified of Christ."

"And so we find this great fundamental truth of a living and present Saviour, underlying all that the early Friends taught. It was this that gave the unique character to their meetings for worship. It shaped and guided their ministry. It was at the root of all their testimonies, and their service for the Truth. It was to them the power and reality of the Gospel. It was 'God's gift for man's salvation.' And the reason is not far to seek. It meant to them, the one Foundation, on which prophets, and apostles, and Primitive Christians, had built;—Jesus Christ.

"In view of this mighty fact, they might well ask,—'What need is there of a human priest, or a professional pastor, at the head of the congregation; when the Great High Priest,—the Minister of ministers,—is Himself really present? What need is there, of a symbolical washing by outward water, when the real cleansing is applied direct to the soul, by the Divine Baptizer Himself? What need is there of a formal ceremonial, with outward bread and wine, when the soul is invited to the real table of the Lord, to partake of the veritable Bread of Life?"

"We sometimes hear Quakerism described, as if it were identical with what is known as 'Evangelicalism,' plus a few specialities, about the Ordinances, War, and Oaths. On this point we may appeal both to the early Friends, and to their cotemporaries, the 'Evangelicals,' of the seventeenth century;—and we shall find the answer from each, clear and unmistakable. Leaders of the 'Evangelical' sects in those days,—such as Baxter and Bunyan,—never would admit that the fathers of Quakerism were in harmony with themselves, as regards even primary Christian doctrine. They stigmatized them as one-sided,—as tending to Socinianism,—as undervaluing the Bible,—and so on;—charges which one still hears at times, applied by 'Evangelicals,' to old-fashioned Quakerism: though more unfounded statements as regards each particular, both then and now could hardly be made. So far from being one-sided, they proclaimed afresh the central truth of Christianity. Their testimony to Christ, as Almighty and Divine, was a practical testimony;—and as such, it was more definite, and unequivocal, than that of any other religious community. And their reverence and love for the Bible, were so marked, that its plain teachings were accepted by them, at great cost and suffering, on points respecting which, other churches seem still 'halting, as between two opinions.'

"The 'Evangelical' sects,—as we have already pointed out,—declared, and still declare, their central truth to be the Death of Christ. The early Friends, going wider and deeper, proclaimed the great central and foundation truth, to be Christ Himself;—the Living Saviour,—the same yesterday, to-day, and forever. They ignored no revealed truth;—the human life of Christ,—his death,—his resurrection,—his ascension,—all for our sakes they thankfully accepted, and believed. But Christ the Living,—the Indivisible,—He who had been God manifest in the flesh, and is now God manifest in the spirit,—was their foundation Rock. And on that Rock they built, and found safety and rest."

We will not follow our author through that part of his work which treats of the results, both religious and political of the "Quaker Movement," but briefly refer to the concluding portion, which speaks of the present and probable future condition of the Society of Friends: of this he says:

"Its condition is undoubtedly very critical. It seems to have almost reached the parting of the ways. One of these ways,—a plain, well-defined road, leading straight-forward,—is what Whittier calls,

"The narrow way
Our faithful fathers knew."

The other leads—where? Does it need much prophetic foresight to perceive, that this other way, with all its windings and accommodations, must inevitably lead back again, to that artificial church system, from which our forefathers thought it such a deliverance to come out?

"I, for one, cannot shut my eyes from the fact, that the tendency at present,—especially with our American brethren,—is strongly setting towards this new road, that leads round and back;—and if this tendency increase,—and prevail,—not only there but in England,—I say without hesitation, that so far as the Society of Friends is concerned,—Quakerism has no Future."

"But the principle of Quakerism is eternal. If our testimony fails, it is certain to spring up in some other place and way; and we shall be like the Jews of old,—a rejected and discredited people. No one doubts that we have had a high and special calling of God:—a special place and service among the churches! What a sad apostasy, if we abandon this calling, and lose our place!

"To those who had been trained to think that religion meant believing in a series of dogmatic statements, it was an indescribable relief to be taught that the "great fundamental truth to be first recognized, is a plain universal fact:—that there is a living Saviour, Who visits each heart;—Who cares for, and understands every man;—and Who invites all to come and put their trust in Him. The 'one thing needful,' became thus a simple, practical, and soul-satisfying truth. It was,—to have faith in Christ:—to listen for and obey his voice:—and to receive from Him, not only forgiveness, but power to overcome, and guidance for life and duty."

"The genuine Friends' meeting is a continual,—and though a quiet, still a very striking testimony, to the real Presence of Christ, and the power of faith. No Quakerism of the future, would be worthy of the name, which did not maintain this most remarkable institution,—the Friends' meeting,—in all its spiritual integrity and life. In these innovating days, when certain Friends are hinting, that meetings held on the basis of silence, are not fitted for either children or unlettered people, we may be called upon to say firmly, that whatever is changed, the old-fashioned Friends' meeting,—based on the fundamental doctrine of Quakerism,—must not be tampered with or touched.

"I doubt if there be anything more truly edifying and heart-reaching, in the way of congregational worship, than the stillness of the silent meeting, in which genuine though secret prayer, ascends from many hearts, for the spiritual help that is needed; and in which the silence is at times broken, by the few unadorned but earnest words,—the solemn exhortation—and the fervent heartfelt prayer;—all uttered under the conviction, that God is calling for this sacrifice of the lips; and giving the needful power and utterance. At such times and over such assemblies,—as Charles Lamb says,—'The Dove seems almost visibly brooding.'"

While not prepared fully to endorse every sentiment of the author of this essay, we have found in it much which has been interesting and strengthening.

A Visit Among the Mennonites.—No. 6.

The customs and character of the Mennonites will be further illustrated by a reference to some of the scenes and incidents that were witnessed during our visit.

The first of the meetings which we attended was at Deep Run, north of Doylestown in Bucks County, on Third Mo. 7th, where several hundred assembled. We found a large, plain, one-story building, seated with plain, movable benches, and provided with a narrow platform on one side, elevated one step from the floor, on which was a single bench for the ministers. A retiring-room was partitioned off at one end; and this was furnished with shelves to receive the bonnets of the sisters, who leave them there, and enter the main room with their heads covered only with simple clear-starched caps, very similar to those worn by our plain women Friends. It was an interesting spectacle. Bench after bench was filled with nice-looking, plainly dressed women, sitting in a reverent manner, a number of them having their infant children with them. Many of the men also were plainly dressed, and looked like old-fashioned Friends. We were favored with a comfortable meeting, and warm feelings of affectionate interest were excited, under the influence of which we could greet them as beloved brethren.

As the Mennonites are of German descent, we found the services in their meetings in Bucks and Montgomery Counties are almost exclusively held in German, or to speak more accurately, Pennsylvania Dutch. But the fact that the school education of their children is altogether in English, and that the use of that language is steadily increasing, is compelling them to consider the propriety of introducing it into their meetings also. This has been done only to a limited extent in Bucks and Montgomery Counties; but in Lancaster County it has come to be the general practice to have two sermons at each meeting, one in each language; and were it not for this, the Lancaster County preachers say they would lose their hold on the young people. One of them, who was among the first to use the English language many years ago, gave us a graphic account of the difficulties he met with, and of the charges of pride, &c., made by some of the old people, who could not think of a Mennonite as anything else than a German.

It may have been partly owing to this change, and partly to a revival of zeal among them, that the number of their members has latterly much increased in Lancaster County. We were assured that it had at least doubled in the last 20 or 30 years; and some meetings had been enlarged in a still greater ratio. They do not recognize birth-right membership. Their young people often join the church about the time that they marry and settle in life, which is generally between 18 and 22 years of age. As with Friends their discipline does not permit marriage with those who are not members.

While in Bucks County we called on an aged bishop, now superannuated, who is mostly confined to the house in winter, and in delicate health. The tender and serious feeling which prevailed during this visit, evidenced an overshadowing of the Divine presence. This dear old man, in rather broken English, expressed his views and feelings, which manifested much religious experience, and a close approximation in doctrine to our own sentiments. He seemed to think his end was drawing near, and he felt willing to leave all earthly things, if he could retain his hold on the Lord Jesus, and have his treasure laid up in Heaven.

At Blooming Glen meeting-house in the same county, being somewhat early, we walked into the graveyard; and noticed that the graves were arranged in rows, which were not parallel to the walls of the inclosure, but extended diagonally across. On inquiring into the reason of this, we found the object was that the bodies might be placed in an east and west direction, with the feet pointing to the sunrise. No one seemed to know why this order had been followed, except that it was an ancient custom. It was an interesting evidence of the tenacious hold which ancient superstitions retain upon the people, to find this relic of the pagan worship of the sun still practiced in this country and in this age. We subsequently, found, however, that in some of the Mennonite burying-places no regard was paid to the points of the compass.

An interesting incident of the civil war was related to us, respecting some of the Mennonites who resided in the Shenandoah Valley in Virginia. Sixty or seventy of these and of the Dunkards, who are also a non-fighting people, attempted to make their escape to the mountains, and so north into Pennsylvania, so as to escape military service. They were arrested by the Confederates, taken to Stanton, and urged to join the army. They refused, and were shut up in a box car for the night, with the threat that they should be shot in the morning if they persisted in their refusal. They spent the night in praying and singing hymns; and in the morning announced their determination not to fight, let the consequences to themselves be what they might. Their lives were spared, but they were sent to Richmond and confined for some months in the Libby prison; but were finally released under an act passed by the Confederate congress, to exempt from military service those conscientiously opposed to war on the payment of a fine of $500.

The Mennonite brother who related to us the above anecdote, also told us of the experience of one of the "sisters," with whom he had dined at her home in the Shenandoah Valley, about two years after the close of the war. During that terrible season, her husband had been carried off by the Confederates, who wished him to fight for their cause. She was left with three children, and their provisions were so nearly exhausted that she had only flour enough left to bake three loaves. Some Confederate soldiers smelled the baking, and demanded the bread. Two of the loaves she gave up, but endeavored to retain the third for herself and her children. One of the soldiers attempted to take it by force. She finally told the man, if he would release his hold on her, she would give it to him; but before he went out of the house she wished him to do her a favor. Her husband, she said, was gone, and might be dead; she had nothing to live upon; and she told him to kill her and her children, and then he might take the loaf. He looked at the children, laid down the bread, and departed without it. Her husband made his escape, returned home, and contrived a place of concealment under his hay-mow.

The Mennonites in Lancaster County seem to feel much interest in their Virginia brethren, who suffered greatly during the war. Towards the close of that awful scourge, some of them residing in Shenandoah Valley became so wearied with their prolonged troubles, that they had concluded to leave the country, and make their way over the mountains to a more secure home. On the morning of their proposed departure, their bishop, Samuel Coffman was sitting on a log, when an unusual feeling came over him, with a clear impression of the Divine will that they must not go; and an intimation that the conflict was nearly over. He ordered the horses to be unhitched from the wagon, and sent word to the others. The war soon ended, as he had foreseen; and their Southern neighbors seeing that they had given up their purpose of moving, felt more friendly towards them. Our informant said, that when Samuel Coffman related the circumstance to him, it was with an evident feeling of reverence.

At one of the meetings an exhortation was extended to the young to yield to the visitations of Divine Grace; and testimony was borne to the universal extension of the love of God to mankind, in which the language of Peter was quoted, "I perceive that God is no respecter of persons, but in every nation he that feareth Him and worketh righteousness is accepted of Him;" and also that of Paul, "The grace of God which bringeth salvation hath appeared unto all men, &c.," and the comment was made, that the foundation of all true religion is in the work of this Divine grace on the heart, and that all those everywhere who live in obedience to it, are members of the one universal church.

Afterwards, two or three of their ministers addressed the people in German, going over the substance of what had been communicated, endorsing it as sound doctrine, and recommending them to heed the advice given. We find it is a frequent practice among this people, for some one, usually one of the elders or deacons, thus to bear witness in respect to the sermons that have been preached. They speak of the custom as giving "evidence."

It was encouraging to us to meet with many proofs that the visit among them was acceptable, and that unity was felt with the doctrines proclaimed. One expression that was several times made use of, in private conversation, was that they could say "Yea and Amen" to what they had heard. The general character of the public testimonies delivered, probably contributed to their acceptance, being largely on the offices of our Saviour, as the Author of salvation to his obedient followers, through the one saving baptism, the washing of regeneration,—the change of heart and of life wrought in man by his divine Grace and Spirit; the spiritual nature of his kingdom; the continuance of the immediate revelation of the will of God to man, as the foundation of all true religion; the need of self-denial, and bearing the cross; the importance of maintaining the holy watch against evil; together with exhortations not to despise the visitations of the Almighty, and so frustrate the Grace of God; and at times views of the glorious blessings laid up in store for the righteous—"They shall hunger no more, nor thirst any more, neither shall the sun light upon them, nor any heat, but the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them unto fountains of living waters, and God himself shall wipe away all tears from their eyes." On these points the views of the Mennonite brethren were one with our own.

(To be concluded.)

MY FIELD.

I turned the turf of a pasture old,
And sowed upon the fragrant mold,
My hoarded grains of wheaten gold.

The little field grew fair and green,
And smiled in the autumnal sheen,
A summer dream, the hills between.

But those who saw it could not see
How beautiful it was to me,
Or what I hoped its fruit would be.

They did not know the toil and pain
That was the price of every grain,
They only saw the greening plain.

They said "This wheat looks very fair,
But yet we think 'twill hardly bear
The winter's cold." O heart of prayer

That broke within me as I heard!
How all my faith and hope were stirred,
Responding to each doubting word.

And, as I laid me down to sleep,
I said, the while I could but weep,
"In faith I sowed, I needs must reap."

But while I slept, all through the night,
The snow came down, with footstep light,
And hid the green field from my sight.

The morning sunlight as it shone,
Between white hills, looked down upon
A spreading plain of white alone.

All through the winter closely sealed,
To passers by, my little field
Its secret kept, still unrevealed.

The winter long! the winter cold!
When snows were gathered fold on fold,
Alas for green! Alas for gold!

Alas for me! how could I know
My wheat would lie beneath the snow,
Doubt, at my ear kept whispering, "No."

Faith like the snow birds often came,
And sweetly chirruped o'er the plain,
But, like them, ever went again.

Until at last, wearied I thought,
"With honest purpose I have wrought
So yield me much, or yield me naught."

O hidden field my Master knows,
The secret hidden by the snows,
I wait the love that shall disclose.

THE TICK OF THE CLOCK AT MIDNIGHT.

'Tis the click of the clock at midnight,
Solemnly, startlingly clear,
Like the throb of a fevered pulsation
Made audible to the ear.

Through the house reigns a death-like silence,
The death-like silence of sleep,
While the fragments of time, like meteors,
Pass flashing across the deep.

From the coming eternity rushing,
They illumine for a moment our sky,
But no power can stay their departure;
They touch us and hover by.

They touch on the heart of the watcher,
And utter these words in his ear:
"Can ye not watch for one hour,
And our soul-stirring message hear?"

We are God's messengers, speeding
With swift and invisible flight,
And we speak to you best in the silence
Of the quiet dead-hush of the night.

Remember we carry our message
Of what ye are doing on earth,
To the Bountiful Father in heaven,
Who endowed you with souls at your birth.

What are ye doing, oh, mortals!
With that glorious gift of a soul?
For what are your strongest yearnings,
And what is the longed-for goal?

Pleasure, and power, and riches,
Leisure, and freedom from care—
Is it for those ye are striving?
Such strivings must end in despair.

Like a butterfly crushed in the grasping,
So pleasure is crushed when caught,
And power must end in weakness,
And riches must end in naught;

While indolent leisure lies basking,
Sleepily, selfishly glad,
Till the adder of conscience stings it,
And the terror driveth it mad.

Soon the dawn will streak the horizon
And herald the fateful day;
Prepare! Lo, the kingdom of heaven Approacheth! Watch and pray!"

PRAYER.

I know not by what methods rare,
But this I know, God answers prayer.

I know not when He sends the word
That tells us fervent prayer is heard.

I know it cometh soon or late:
Therefore, we need to pray and wait.

I know not if the blessing sought
Will come in just the guise I thought.

I leave my prayers with Him alone
Whose will is wiser than my own.

—Eliza M. Hickok in Christian Union.

It is not the clamorous importunity, travail, and labor of the natural man, to be favored with Divine consolation and peace, that will be heard and answered; but the prayer that arises from the sensible operation of the Spirit of God on the heart, will never be sent empty away.—

For "The Friend."

On page 343 of the present volume of "The Friend," is a request for "any exposition of the passage [John iii. 5] within the writings of the early members of the Society." The following is from the pen of Richard Claridge, and is to be found in the 1726 edition of his "Life and Posthumous Works," pages 136 et seq. As the book is somewhat scarce even on this side the water, I have ventured to make the extract for "The Friend." The well-known scholastic attainments and ability of the writer enable him to speak as a scholar; and these, coupled with the heavenly wisdom, which by obedience and faithfulness, he had learned in the school of Christ, give his exposition an authority not lightly to be set aside. The text is:

"Except a man be born of Water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." John iii. 5.

Richard Claridge says:—"Of such as suppose Water in this text, to be understood of Elementary Water, I would ask,—What water that is, of which Christ spake to the woman of Samaria,—John iv. 14? Which the Lord promised to pour upon the thirsty,—Isaiah xlv. 3. And to sprinkle his people with,—Ezekiel xxxvi. 25. And of which John writes in Rev. vii. 17, and xxi. 6 and xxii. 1 and 17? Is this elementary or spiritual Water? Spiritual Water, doubtless, as the context shows. And so John iii. 5,—Except a man be born of Water, and of the Spirit, &c., cannot be understood of elementary water.

1st. Because the Water of which Christ speaks to Nicodemus, is of a regenerating quality; but elementary water is not.

2nd. Because this Water is absolutely necessary to salvation, but elementary water is not so.—Except a man be born of Water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God.

But it may be objected, that if Water here, is not to be taken for elementary water, there is a tautology in the text.

I answer:—Redoubled expressions are very frequent in Scripture; that is, one thing expressed by two terms, (by a figure called Hendiadys, or ἑνὰ διὰ δύο.) Therefore Water and Spirit are taken simply for the spirit, the Spirit being often signified by water. The copulative and is here exegetical, or explanatory, the latter member [and of the Spirit], explaining the former [of water]. And to me the context puts it out of all doubt; for in the 6th, 7th, and 8th verses, as also in verse 3, there is no mention at all made of water. I might cite the opinion of several learned men upon this text, as Grotius, Piscator, Gomarus, &c., to show my interpretation is not singular; but finding it done very fully by Calvin, I shall waive them, and transcribe him at large. [He then quotes Calvin in the Latin, and gives the translation thus]:—

"It is an error in those, who, because they hear the name of water, think that kind of baptism is mentioned in this place. For after Christ had opened the corruption of nature to Nicodemus, and taught him the necessity of the new birth, and Nicodemus dreamed of a corporeal one, Christ here shows him the manner how God doth regenerate us, namely, by Water and the Spirit; that is to say, by the Spirit, which, in cleaning and watering the souls of the faithful, performs, by way of resemblance, the office of water. And therefore, I take Water and the Spirit, simply for the Spirit, because it is as water. Neither is this a new or strange way of speaking, for it accords with that in Matt. iii. 11.—He that cometh after me, He it is that baptizeth in the Holy Ghost and fire. Therefore, as to baptize in the Holy Ghost, which in regeneration resembleth the office and nature of fire;—so to be born again of Water, and of the Spirit, is nothing else but to receive that virtue or power of the Spirit, which produceth the like effects in the soul that water does in the body. I know that some give another interpretation of the text; but that this is the genuine sense I have no doubt or scruple; because it is apparently the purpose of Christ to teach all who have breathings or desires in them after the kingdom of heaven, that they must put off their own corrupt nature.' (And a little afterwards Calvin says): 'Laying aside all evils, let us keep to this simple interpretation which I have given, that no man can enter into the kingdom of God until he be regenerated of Living Water, that is, the Spirit.'" (Calvin Inst. book 4, chap. 16, Sect. 25.)

R. Claridge proceeds:—"But if any will needs take Water in John iii. 5 for elementary water, why should not fire, Matt. iii. 11. He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire, he taken also for elementary fire? There is the same reason for the one that there is for the other, if not greater, if the bare letter of the text must determine the matter. For in John iii. 6, the word baptize is not mentioned; but in Matt. iii. 11, it is said expressly, He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire. From whence some, taking the word fire for elementary fire, do mark their children, either before baptism, with a hot iron, (See Brewerood's Enquiries, chap. 21, of the Jacobites in Syria, Cyprus, Mesopotamia, Babylon and Palestine); or, after baptism, as Grovius reports of the Ethiopians, (Synop. Crit. in Matt. iii. 11.) Such is the blindness and ignorance of many that make profession of Christianity. But if the word water, in the place under consideration, must be understood of elementary and not spiritual water, will it not follow then, that baptism with elementary water is absolutely necessary to salvation, and that they who die without it unavoidably perish? A consequence full of horror and uncharitableness! But blessed be the name of the Lord it is as untrue as it is horrid and uncharitable; for salvation is not tied to any outward rites or ceremonies, but to faith and obedience. 'God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him, should not perish, but have everlasting life,' John iii. 16. 'He that believeth on the Son, hath everlasting life, (v. 36), and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death to life,—John v. 24. * * * Christ is the author of eternal salvation, unto all them that obey him'—Heb. v. 9. 'In every nation he that feareth Him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with Him,'—Acts x. 35. This is infallibly certain, He that doeth righteousness, is righteous,—John iii. 7, and 'He that is righteous shall go into life eternal,'—Matt. xxv. 46.

As the Gospel Dispensation has put a full end to the Jewish ritual, so it has not authorized another. The law of figures and shadows was given by Moses, but Grace and Truth is come by Jesus Christ. It is the new creature that is the Christian, and not the old man, dressed up with a new profession. Now a fair outside is nothing worth where purity of the inside is wanting. The water dispensation has had its time and period, and now no baptism avails anything, but that of the Holy Ghost. This alone is saving; for whosoever is baptized therewith, and abideth therein, shall certainly enter into the kingdom of God."

Richard Claridge was educated at Oxford University, and made B. A. in 1670, and was "ordained" "Deacon" in the same year. In 1672, "he was ordained priest in the King's chapel at Westminster," and in 1673, became "rector" of Peopleton in Worcestershire, where he kept a Grammar school for several years. He was made M. A. in 1676. While he was at Peopleton, his heart was led to consider his own practical acquaintance with Divine things, and what he knew experimentally of the workings of Divine grace in himself. Did he know what this Grace really was, and such like considerations grew upon him, and he saw that although occupying the post of a teacher of righteousness, he was himself unacquainted with the Life, the Power, the Grace which comes by Jesus Christ to make men righteous. He was much cast down, and deeply exercised by the judgment of God in his heart, and applied himself seriously to repentance, and to co-operate with what he knew of the teachings of Divine grace in his heart. And then the Lord in mercy opened the eyes of his understanding, leading him to search and prove many things he had received as good, and lawful for him to do. He was shown that it was unlawful for a minister of Christ to receive payment for his ministry, and being faithful to the convictions of the Spirit of Christ, he resigned the rectorship of Peopleton in 1691.

His mind was further enlightened to see the inconsistency of many things connected with the doctrine and practice of the Church of England, and shortly after his resignation of the living at Peopleton, he joined the Baptists—many of whom at that day were very tender people—believing they came nearer the Gospel pattern than any other he knew. "At the time he was baptized, as soon as he was come out of the water, and gone into a house, his wet clothes being yet upon him, a certain person came into the room, and pulling off his hat, accosted him thus, 'You are welcome, sir; out of one form into another.' This man's words struck him home, and often after returned with weight upon his mind." He became a preacher amongst the Baptists in 1691, and he continued as such until 1695, when he desired to be dismissed, not feeling easy to continue with them. He left them in love, and to their great regret. In 1696 he withdrew from their community and began to attend the meetings of the then despised Quakers, in London, where he found what he had long been seeking,—a pure Gospel ministry, which answered the witness in his own heart. In one of their meetings, held at the house of Sarah Sawyer, in Aldergate Street, he first spoke as a minister, his testimony tending "to recommend a broken and contrite spirit, to the debasing of self, and magnifying the grace of God, that had turned him from darkness unto Light, and enabled him to testify of his goodness, from a living experience."

He continued steadfast in his fidelity to the Truth as professed by the Society of Friends, being highly esteemed by them for his works' sake, and died in peace with God and in the unity of his Friends, on the 28th of the Second Month, 1723, in his 74th year. He was buried in Bunhill Fields' burying ground.

This short account may serve to show somewhat of the position and character of Richard Claridge. It is evident he was bent above all things, on knowing his foundation to be on the unchanging Rock, Christ Jesus, who had been pleased to reveal Himself to him, by his free grace and mercy, to the comfort and satisfaction of his soul. His experience and exercises amongst the Baptists give additional value to his exposition of the text, "Except a man be born of Water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God."

Hoping the above may prove of service to the enquirer and to others,

I remain thy sincere friend,

CHARLES ELCOCK.

For "The Friend."

Westward Motion of the Stars Jupiter and Venus.

The continual westward motion of the stars, makes a number of groups and constellations now appear in the western half of the sky, which a few months ago were east of the meridian. And others are now visible in the eastern sky, which could not be seen in the Spring. It is interesting to watch these changes—to observe the steady on-goings of the "orbs around us," as though some important goal in the west were to be gained. But it is only a consequence of the apparent steady travel of the sun eastward, caused by the earth's annual revolution around the central orb.

I suppose more than one reader of "The Friend," has noticed of late how the Sickle, with its bright star Regulus is wending its way from the meridian westward; how the red star Antares in Scorpio, is moving slowly from the southeastern toward the south part of the heavens. And how Altair, with a small star each side of it, is gradually, peeping up from the eastern point of the sky. And so the bright planet Jupiter, with Virgo's first star, Spica, make their passage across the meridian about 6 o'clock, in the evening, two hours earlier than they did a month ago; being now in the south western sky at dark, near half way up from horizon to zenith. With even a small telescope Jupiter is an object of much interest. The body of the planet comes out like a small moon, with one or two dark lines across it, and the four satellites swinging back and forth—from east to west—as they revolve around the planet, altogether make a sight which the amateur astronomer—or indeed most any person—delights to view.

The satellites in their circular goings around the planet, with a small exception, always pass across the disk—first on this side and then on your side, as they come back. And the exact times that they pass the edges of the disk are calculated and published in Washington Time, several years before hand. So by having a table of these phenomena and a telescope of moderate power, say 30 or 40, one may correct his time piece if he knows his longitude, or ascertain his longitude if the local time is known. Thus it has been aptly said that Jupiter with his satellites is a great natural clock hung up in the heavens, giving absolute time for the whole world.

That fine ruby in the west—the planet Venus, is not at present of special interest in the telescope. But it is approaching its most interesting shape—the crescent form. This will be in fair view in a month or so; and will be a sight worth looking after by any one who has even a fair spy-glass, or access to a telescope. Many have observed that Venus can be seen in bright twilight; and by knowing just where to look it would be visible long before sunset. Its brightness will increase until the middle of eighth month, after which it will grow dimmer, and the planet will rapidly approach the sun—coming to inferior conjunction (between the sun and earth) on the 21st of Ninth Month. Then it passes to the other side—west of the sun—and becomes a morning star. It continues to be an evening or morning star about 9½ months each—making its synodical round in 19 months.

Venus is pretty nearly as large as our world and a little over two-thirds as far from the sun as the earth is. Its day (axial revolution) is about half an hour shorter than ours; and the presence of air, and perhaps other circumstances, give evidence that Venus is more likely to be inhabited than most of the other planets.

Natural History, Science, &c.

The Brazil Nut.—This well-known, hard-shelled triangular nut, is the produce of a tree, which abounds in the forests of Guiana, and other parts of South America. The trunk of the tree is straight and cylindrical, three or four feet in diameter, and from 100 to 150 feet in height. The leaves are about 2 feet long and 6 inches wide, and somewhat the shape of the common Magnolia, or Cucumber tree. The fruit is a round ball of about 6 inches in diameter, with a hard shell, inside of which from 18 to 24 triangular wrinkled nuts are so closely and beautifully packed, that when once disturbed, it is impossible to replace them.

When the fruits are ripe they fall from the trees, and are collected by the Indians, who visit the forests for this purpose at the proper season. The meat of the Brazil nut is very good when fresh, but contains so much oil that it soon becomes rancid. Though the fruits had long been known, the tree which produces them was first described by Humboldt and Bonpland, who named it Bertholletia excelsa. "We were very fortunate," says these authors, "to find some of these nuts in our travels on the Orinoco. For three months we had been living on nothing but poor chocolate and rice cooked in water, always without butter, and often without salt, when we procured a large quantity of these fresh fruits of the Bertholletia. It was along in June, and the natives had just gathered them."

One of the characteristics of the natural order of plants to which the Bertholletia belongs, is the formation of large, woody fruits, from which the top spontaneously separates in the form of a lid. All are natives of South America.

Burning of the Museum of Confucius.—The ancestral home of the family of Confucius, who is held in such reverence by the Chinese, has been occupied by the male heirs of this great teacher for 2500 years. In it were accumulated many precious relics, texts on stone and marble, commentaries on his works, carvings in jade and alabaster, vases of porcelain, jewels, and gold and silver work. It has recently been destroyed by fire, and nearly all these treasures have been destroyed.

Solidifying Petroleum.—The Russian Government is making some experiments on solidifying petroleum for fuel. The oil is heated, and from one to three per cent. of soap added, which dissolves in the oil. When cold the mass has the appearance of cement, and the hardness of compact tallow. It burns slowly without smoke, and gives out much heat.

To Drive Away Flies.—Rub with an alcoholic solution of oil of winter green.

Gofio.—Dr. C. F. Taylor, in the Popular Science Monthly, speaks of the superior physical development of the inhabitants of the Canary Islands, which he attributes to the nutritive qualities of the farinaceous food used by them. This is called gofio, and is simply flour made from grain of different kinds, which is parched or roasted before grinding. When it is to be eaten, it may be mixed with milk, soup, or any suitable fluid.

While on a visit to the Canaries, Dr. Taylor adopted it as an article of food, and found it digestible and nutritious. During this time he was entirely free from the acidity of stomach, to which he was very liable. After leaving Teneriffe, and landing on the West Indies, where gofio was not used, his acidity returned, but promptly disappeared on resorting to the gofio, a small quantity of which he had brought with him.

Manufactured Sand.—The sand used in glass making in western Pennsylvania and eastern Ohio, is mostly made from sandstone, which is crushed, ground, and washed. About 400 tons per day, are used in and around Pittsburg alone. It costs when dried about $2.50 per ton.

The May-Apple (Podophyllum) is common growing in rich woods and in adjacent fence corners. The fruit when ripe, is eaten by boys, but the root and leaves are poisonous.

Poison Vine, is a common climbing plant, found on old fences and on trees, clinging to these by numerous wiry rootlets which the plant throws out, and into the object over which it climbs. This plant somewhat resembles the Virginia creeper, but that may be known by a five-fold leaf, while the leaf of the poison vine is three-fold. This plant poisons many persons, if they simply touch the leaves, producing a distressing eruption of the skin. The effects are worse in the morning when the dew is on the leaves.

The Poison Sumach (poison elder) belongs to the same family as the last. It is a small bush, and grows in swampy places or along rivulets. It is quite poisonous to some persons, affecting the skin as does the poison vine.

Wild Parsnips of several kinds are poisonous. It is well to avoid all wild plants which in leaves or seed-stalk look like the garden parsnip, and to remove them from the farm. The garden parsnip sometimes runs wild, and then it too becomes poisonous. These plants are generally found in low grounds and along rivulets, though sometimes on high ground. The water hemlock belongs to this family, it grows in swamps and along creeks. This plant somewhat resembles "sweet cicely," and the lives of children are sometimes lost by their eating the roots, which are very poisonous. The only safe rule is to leave all wild plants looking like wild parsnips alone.

Datura (thorn-apple or jimson weed) is a common, coarse and unsightly weed, found in rich grounds about the barn and other farm buildings. It has heavy stems, large, much dentated leaves, large purplish or white flowers, which have a mawkish odor. The dried seeds, found in the dry burr-like pods are very poisonous, and are occasionally eaten by children with fatal effects.

Stagger-bush (lamb-kill, calf-kill, &c.) Andromeda maritima is a shrub two or three feet high, found in many woods and on sandy plains. The plant bears somewhat leathery leaves, and pretty white flowers. It is said to kill lambs and calves, and to give sheep the staggers, when they eat the leaves. Where this plant is abundant, bees cannot be safely kept, because the honey gathered from the flowers of this plant, poisons the whole product.

Pokeweed is a plant well-known for its purple berries. The young shoots are used in the early spring for "greens," or as a substitute for asparagus; but this is not a safe thing to do, as when too old the plant is poisonous.

The leaves, flowers and all parts of the common oleander are poisonous, and hence the plant should always be kept out of the reach of children and our domestic animals. The fruit of the horse-chestnut is sometimes poisonous when eaten.

Acorn (monk's hood), a plant cultivated in some yards and gardens, for its flowers. All parts of this plant are highly poisonous, so much that careful people should banish it from their grounds. The root resembles horseradish, and cases of poisoning have resulted from mistaking it for that vegetable.

Foxglove (Digitalis purpurea), is cultivated in flower gardens for its long clusters of large, mottled, showy flowers. The leaves contain an acid poison, and the plant is so dangerous, that its cultivation should be abandoned.

Pumpkin Seeds contain a medicinal principle, which, in large quantities, proves poisonous to chickens and turkeys, and is probably injurious to cows. Where large numbers of pumpkins are fed in the open air, the chickens eat the seeds, and some become paralyzed in the legs, while others walk as though intoxicated. It would be well to remove the seeds when pumpkins are fed to stock, for they probably counteract all the good the fruit does. Peach pits, peach leaves, and the bark of the wild cherry tree all contain a poisonous acid (hydrocyanic), and they should not be eaten in any quantity.

Potatoes exposed to the light become green and unwholesome, if not actually poisonous. The little balls on the potato vines are unwholesome. Decaying fruits and vegetables of all kinds are unwholesome and should not be eaten. Decaying fruits and vegetables in the cellar generate poisonous gases, which ascend into the rooms above, to the injury of the inmates. Potato skins are sometimes poisonous when eaten. Mushroom beds better be left alone, unless gathered by one well acquainted with the edible species. It is claimed that the fruit and young branches of the yew tree are poisonous, also the leaves and roots of the lily of the valley.

In case of poisoning from eating wild berries, it would be proper to administer an emetic, such as a tablespoonful of ground mustard in a pint of warm water, or copious draughts of warm water to which a little grease or oil has been added. Tickling the throat with a feather will also bring on vomiting. The sufferer should be placed in bed and a physician called at once.—The Independent.

Race Question at Atlanta.—The Atlanta University is a colored institution, towards the support of which the State of Georgia annually appropriates $8,000. A few white children, the children of the professors employed, and of the white pastor of a colored congregation, attend the school along with the other pupils. The Board of Visitors, in making their report on the school, refer to this as a misuse of the funds, which were appropriated for the benefit of the negro race. The report is a curious development of race prejudice; and much of the same nature, as would be the attempt of a railroad conductor to eject a white man from a car appropriated to colored passengers.

—Military Waste.—Lord R. Churchill, M. P., writes to the Times, [London] saying:—"In my speech at Wolverhampton I thus summed up my examination of the expenditure by the Admiralty on the construction of ships:—

"What is the grand result of all this? The result of all this is that in the last twelve or thirteen years eighteen ships have been either completed or designed by the Admiralty to fulfil certain purposes, and on the strength of the Admiralty statements, Parliament has faithfully voted the money. The total amount which either has been or will be voted for these ships is about ten millions, and it is now discovered and officially acknowledged that in respect of the purposes for which these ships were designed, and for the purposes for which these ten millions either have been or will be spent, the whole of the money has been absolutely misapplied, utterly wasted, and thrown away."

The Times itself says: The facts, as disclosed in the reports of Committees and Commissions, speak for themselves, and the inquiry now being conducted by the Committee of the House of Commons on the Army and Navy Estimates is daily furnishing additional evidence. When we learn that in one Department of the War Office it costs £5,000 to superintend an expenditure of £250 a year, we need not be astonished at any revelations of incompetence which the inquiry may subsequently disclose.

—Russian Fanaticism.—On the 10th of Seventh Month, an attempt was made at the Paulovsk Palace to murder the Grand Duchess Elizabeth. The cause given for the attack was that the Grand Duchess, who is a Lutheran, refused to modify the terms of her marriage settlement, which accords her the privilege of remaining a Lutheran, and joining the Greek Church.

The would-be murderers were all arrested, being captured near the Palace. While they were being removed to jail they cried out: "We have already had enough of Maria Paulowna!" referring to the wife of the Grand Duke Vladimir, brother of the Czar, whom the populace have suspected of making proselytes to her faith. It is stated that a previous attempt was made to assassinate the Grand Duchess Elizabeth.

—Church Sincere.—Canon Gregory, at a recent meeting of the English Church Union, exposed a miserable scandal. A friend of his had occupied a prebendal stall which brought him in £5,000 a year for sixty years. In return for this he had to preach two sermons a year—a task which was done for him by a minor canon for a guinea a sermon!

—The New Testament in Hebrew.—The New Testament, which was translated into Hebrew by the late Isaac Salkinson, Missionary among the Jews of Vienna, of the British Jews' Society in London, has been reprinted at Vienna in a second edition of 120,000 copies. Of this number 100,000 have been bought by the subscription of one generous Scotch donor, who requested that they might be distributed gratis among Hebrew-reading Jews all over the Continent. Two missionaries lately came from England to make a distribution from Vienna, and they have been sending copies to about 300 Rabbis, many of whom have undertaken to circulate these Scriptures among their co-religionists. Very few have stated that they had any objection to read the New Testament.

—Dancing Prohibited.—At a Catholic service in Allenton, Pa., recently held, the rector, in severe terms denounced balls and dancing, and commanded the young ladies of his congregation to discontinue attending balls. He said, if they persisted in doing so, he would read their names from the altar. It is said several contemplated balls were abandoned in consequence.

—Excommunication of Edward McGlynn.—E. McGlynn was a Roman Catholic priest in New York City, popular for his eloquence, who adopted the visionary theories of Henry George about land, and entered with much zeal into his political movements. He refused to obey the command of his archbishop to discontinue his political speeches, and has been excommunicated for his refusal to go to Rome, and submit the case to the Pope. He denies the right of his ecclesiastical superiors to interfere with his political sentiments, and has since declared at a public meeting, that "an unjust excommunication is not worth the paper it is written on. It is with his own conscience one has to deal." The most interesting point in this controversy is the light it throws on the growing disposition to reject priestly interference in temporal matters. One of his fellow professors lately stated to a reporter of a New York paper (The Voice), "We have been led spiritually by the Holy Church at Rome, but deny the right of Pope or priest to fetter our consciences, or to tell us, free American citizens, how we shall vote or for what we shall vote. This thing, this complete separation of Church and State, which began with the overthrow of the Pope's temporal power, has been working ever since until many of our largest congregations, like that at Aurora, Ill., refuse point blank to let the priests control the secular affairs of the Church any longer. We are as willing as ever we were to acknowledge the spiritual leadership of Pope and priest, but neither must undertake to do any longer what was the practice for centuries, viz., to have and exercise absolute control of our minds, bodies and consciences. That notion has been completely exploded, and the sooner the Church authorities recognize the fact the better for them."

THE FRIEND.

SEVENTH MONTH 30, 1887.

There has been for a considerable time past a large amount of discussion in some of the "Religious papers," and in theological circles, of a doctrine that has been gradually obtaining some foothold among Protestants, that "there will be a probation after death for all men who do not decisively reject Christ during the earthly life." This is analogous to the doctrine of purgatory held by Roman Catholics, and rejected by the Protestant Reformers as a mere human invention.

The present tendency to this belief has probably arisen from that narrow and erroneous view of the redemption which is in Christ Jesus, which limits its blessed effects to those who had heard of his coming in the flesh, sufferings and death for our sakes, and who had accepted Him as their Saviour. It follows from such a limitation, that the countless myriads, who, in the providence of the Almighty, had never had the opportunity of knowing the history of the Saviour as recorded in the New Testament, are shut out from any hope of salvation. Against such a horrible conclusion the mind naturally revolts; and some of those who had imbibed this sentiment, seem eager to adopt a theory which may neutralize its injustice, by imagining that these victims of unfavorable circumstances will have in a future state an opportunity of doing what was denied to them in this.

But this theory is not sustained by the teachings of the Bible; nor is there any necessity for its adoption by those who accept the universality of Divine love, and believe that the offers of Grace are extended to all men in this state of being. No language can be clearer than that of the Apostle Paul, who says, "The Grace of God, which bringeth salvation hath appeared unto all men."

That same blessed Saviour, who appeared in an outward form among the Jews formerly, now visits his creatures inwardly and spiritually; and all those who believe in and obey his manifestations to their souls, are partakers of that saving faith which is the gift of God; and, if they continue faithful to the end of life, will be reckoned among his adopted children, even if they have never heard his name outwardly spoken.

Some of the professors in the Theological Institution in Phillips Academy, in Andover, having been charged with holding and teaching the views in regard to future probation before referred to, a recent trial of one of them has been held by "The Board of Visitors," who have the authority to judge of departures from the doctrines for the support of which the endowment funds of that school were given. They decided that the charge was sustained, and decreed that the said professor be removed from his office. As most of the Trustees are opposed to the decision of the Visitors, it is not unlikely there may be a further contest over this matter.

The American Institute of Civics is an association designed to promote integrity and patriotism among the people of this country; and thus promote the real welfare of the country. Social order, good government, and proper educational influences are among the objects to which its attention is directed.

It issues a quarterly magazine, under the title of Civics, devoted to the discussion of questions of vital public concern, and published at 83 Cedar Street, New York (subscription price $1.00 per annum); the first number of which we have received.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The President has accepted an invitation from a large delegation of citizens of Missouri, to visit St. Louis next Tenth Month.

The President and his Cabinet are expected to visit the Centennial Anniversary, to be held in Philadelphia next month.

New buildings in this country this year, according to the estimate of a building trades journal, will cost not less than $700,000,000.

A telegram was received at the Treasury Department on the 20th instant, from Captain Sheppard, commanding the revenue steamer Rush, dated at Ounalaska, Seventh Month 5th, confirming the press despatches in regard to the seizure of the British steam schooner Annie Beck and the American schooner Challenge for illegal sealing.

The volcano of Akontan, on the Island of Akontan, one of the Aleutian group, has been in almost constant eruption since the middle of Fifth Month. Rocks and lava are thrown out, and the surrounding country is shaken by earthquakes.

A bill imposing a tax of $10,000 on wine-rooms, has been passed by the Georgia House of Representatives. It is thought the Senate will agree to the bill.

The beautiful elm trees, the great number of which has long been the pride of Plainfield, N. J., are being destroyed by some sort of a bug, resembling in appearance the ant.

The olive is said, by the Sacramento Bee, to be the most profitable tree in California at present, and the orange probably next, with a prospect that the fig will yet take the first place.

Professor Forbes, State Entomologist of Illinois, says that "chinch bugs have obtained a foothold in the northern portion of Illinois to such an extent as to assure an immense number of them next year, unless weather unfavorable to their development should intervene." He says that "the danger from this source threatens to damage the wheat crop of 1888 to an extent in comparison with which the pleno-pneumonia and other recent outbreaks of contagious diseases among domestic animals will be insignificant.

It is reported from El Paso, Texas, that "close upon the heels of the news of the earthquake at Bavispe, come the details of a still greater calamity at Bacaric, a town twenty miles from Bavispe. It had before the catastrophe 1200 inhabitants. When Bavispe was destroyed the town was badly shaken up, and most of the inhabitants fled. Since then the town of Bacaric has been visited by a succession of shocks that have reduced the whole town to ruins; most of the people escaped, as they fled to the country terror-stricken on the first disturbance."

A telegram from Utica, New York, says Giles Smith, of Deerfield, lost three cows on the 26th, by bloody murrain. He had them buried near a running stream, which infected the water. Three cows belonging to William Budlong, Jr., a neighbor, died of the disease. Budlong and John Kaymen, while looking for the cause, were stung by mosquitoes, and are now seriously ill, having been inoculated with the murrain virus.

Up to Seventh Month 24th, there have been 152 cases of yellow fever reported at Key West, Florida, and 39 deaths. There remained 55 still sick, and 58 were discharged well.

The deaths in this city last week numbered 691, which was 148 more than during the previous week, and 256 more than during the corresponding period last year. Of the whole number, 268 were under one year of age; 131 died of cholera infantum; 67 of sunstroke; 50 of consumption; 34 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 30 of inanition; 31 of marasmus; 25 of congestion of the brain; 29 of convulsions; 21 of inflammation of the brain, and 19 of old age.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 4½'s, 109½; 4's, 128½; currency 6's, 123 a 133.

Cotton was quiet but steady at 10½ cts. for middling uplands.

Feed was steady, without, however, any demand of moment. Sales of 1 car good winter bran, at $15.50, and 1 car prime do., at $17.75 per ton. Quotations: Bran, winter, choice, $16; do. do. fair to prime, $15.25 a $15.75; bran, spring, $14.50 a $15.

Flour and Meal.—Trade in flour was sluggish, and prices favored buyers. Sales of 125 barrels Penna. family, at $3.75; 375 barrels Ohio straight, at $4.40 a $4.50; 500 barrels winter patent, at $4.50 a $4.75; 125 barrels Minnesota, clear, at $4; and 500 barrels do. patent, at $4.60 a $4.80. Rye flour moved slowly at $2.60 a $2.75 per barrel, as to quality.

Hogs were ¼ c. lower, at 7½ a 7 cts.

FOREIGN.—On the 19th instant, the House of Commons went formally in a body to the House of Lords, where the Royal assent was given to the Irish Crimes Act Amendment Bill, and it was thus made the law of the realm.

On the 25th instant, all the Counties in Ireland, either in whole or in part, had been proclaimed under the Crimes Act.

In the Land Bill, now under consideration, Balfour has agreed to adopt several provisions in accordance with Parnell and his associates.

John Morley, in opening the Liberal Club at Hackney on the 23d instant, said that the Government had waited half a year in passing a measure that was intended to suppress the National League, but directly they obtained it Lord Salisbury changed his attitude and said he would adopt the League's policy regarding rents in Ireland. Lord Salisbury, — Goschen and other Conservatives had contended that to interfere with rent contracts would be dishonest. It was useless now to say that they only meant to be dishonest for three years. They were deluding themselves if they thought the proposals dependent upon the passing of the Tory Land Purchase bill would only be temporary.

The Marquis of Salisbury, replying to a deputation which called on the 22nd to urge the Government to take some action to protect British trade from the effects of foreign competition, assisted by bounties, said it was impossible to speak too strongly of the injustice which the foreign bounty system inflicted on British workmen. A European conference, he said, would soon consider the matter, and in the meantime he could only say that there were two ways for Englishmen to deal with their assailants in this contest. If reasoning failed, Englishmen might return the blow.

Wooden shoes, whose chief value is that they are so cheap that nothing can be obtained on them in the pawnshops, though they are serviceable enough for the purpose, are now given to poor children in London.

The Republique Francaise, commenting on the Anglo-Turkish Egyptian Convention, pronounces it a masterpiece of duplicity, intended to transfer Egypt entirely to England. "France," the paper continues, "does not dream of seizing Egypt; she only asks that England shall regard Egypt as inviolable, England equally with France."

On the 21st, de Lesseps presided at a meeting in Paris, of shareholders of the Panama Canal. Dom Pedro, Emperor of Brazil, was present. The annual report of the company showed a decrease in the former confidence that the canal would be opened in 1889, but expressed a hope that a connection between the Atlantic and Pacific would then exist across the Isthmus of Panama, and that the works would be completed soon afterwards.

On the 24th, 99 deaths of cholera and 22 deaths from the disease, were reported at Catania in Sicily. The people are panic stricken. Robbers are pilfering houses whose owners have fled to escape the scourge. The fugitives are spreading the disease throughout the island. Business is at a stand still everywhere.

Advices recently received in Constantinople indicate that the Bulgarians are about to proclaim their independence.

The Turkish Commissioner at Crete has proclaimed the concessions which the Porte has decided to make to the Cretans. One-half the customs revenue collected in Crete is ceded to the Cretans. The resolutions of the Cretan Assembly are to be sanctioned by the Porte within three months after they are passed, and the Christians of the country are to have an enlarged share in the local government.

A violent volcanic eruption has occurred on the Island of Galitia, off the coast of Algeria. Streams of lava are issuing from the crater of the volcano, and the glare of the flames emitted are visible for fifty miles.

DIED, at her residence in Philadelphia, Fifth Mo. 18th, 1887, MARY W. WOOLMAN, daughter of John and Sarah G. Woolman, a member of Northern District Monthly Meeting, in the 34th year of her age, after a short, severe illness, which was borne with patience and resignation; and at the last there seemed a realization of the joy into which she was about to enter. She early surrendered to the requirements of a tender conscience, and through her life exemplified the declaration, that "the fruit of the spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance." For a number of years she was engaged as a Teacher, and for the last six years of her life was Principal of the Girls' Department of Friends Select School in this city. Her deep sense of the responsibilities of this position was often manifested, as well as her great interest in the comfort and welfare of each individual pupil, both in and out of school. She was deeply concerned for the religious instruction of her charge, endeavoring by example and precept to lead them into the paths of useful womanhood. Her sympathy was always practically enlisted for the needy, and she felt an ever-present desire in no way to cast reproach upon the high profession of Christian and Friend.
